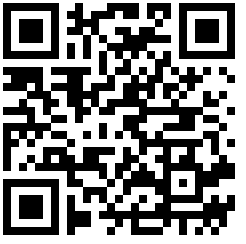
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google™ books

https://books.google.com



Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Per. 256 d. 768

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 418. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 2ND, 1897. [ONE PENNY.

MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH — Sample Box Post Free, Two Stamps.

Produces beautiful, white, glossy linen. Saves time and labour. In 1d., 3d., & 6d. Boxes. Name this Publication.

BROMLEY'S COFFEE ESSENCE — Sample, 2d. to cover Postage.

Delicious Coffee at One Farthing per cup, prepared in two seconds. In 6d., 1/-, 2/-, 3/6, or 5/- Bottles. 6d. Bottle, Nine Stamps, Post Free.

RISIN' SUN METAL POLISH — Sample Bottle Post Free, Two Stamps.

Gives to all metals a beautiful, soft, brilliant polish. In 1d., 3d., 6d. & 1/- Bottles.

C. CHANCELLOR & CO., LONDON, E.C.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

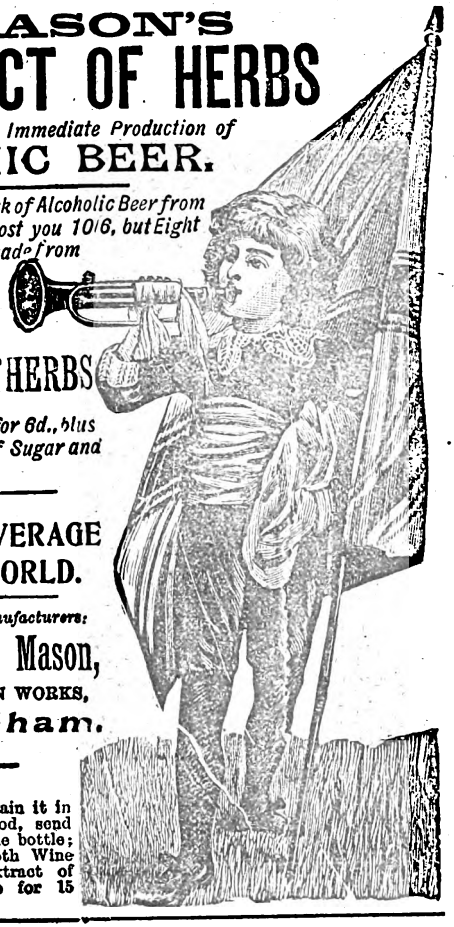
Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.



"No flaw in its claim to be ABSOLUTELY PURE." MEDICAL ANNUAL.

FRY'S

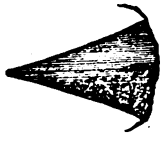
Pure Concentrated

COCOA

Awarded H'ghest Honour.. | "Strongest and Best." HEALTH.

Over 200 Gold Medals and Diplomas awarded to the Firm.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.



C. BRANDAUER & CO.'S CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"SHORT STORIES" best suit the mood of this eager, restless age, so

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES,

Ready-made and to measure, may be briefly and simply set down as

"ABSOLUTELY the BEST VALUE in the WORLD."

MODEL 583 is one of the latest up-to-date designs made in that ideal fabric, The John Noble Cheviot Serge. It has a smart well-cut Bodice, with the back shaped to the figure and the front pleated at the waist.

10/6. There is a pretty Yoke Collar, and the whole is very daintily trimmed. The Skirt is a full, wide, tailor-made design. Price, for complete Costume, only 10/6; safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

SKIRT ONLY, as sketched, 5/6; carriage 6d. extra.

SIZES IN STOCK fit figures 34in., 36in., and 38in. round bust, under arms; skirts being 38in., 40in. and 42in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

COLOURS. — Black, Brown, Navy, Myrtle, Bronze-Green, Ruby, Cinnamon, Electric Blue, Fawn, Grey, and Petunia.

John Noble's Knockabout Frocks,

With long full sleeves, saddle top, and pocket.
Sizes 21 24 27 30 33 36 39 42 45"
Prices 1/6 2/- 2/6 3/- 3/6 4/- 4/6 5/- 5/6
Sent Carriage Paid 4½d. extra.

"AN IDEAL SCHOOL OR HOLIDAY GARMENT FOR GIRLS."

AN UP-TO-DATE FASHION VOLUME, containing numerous choice designs of Ladies' and Children's Costumes, sent, together with Patterns, post free on application. PLEASE MENTION "SHORT STORIES."

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

BODLEIAN P 16 MAR 1981 LIBRARY

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

All Wool Underclothing.

HAWICK HOSIERY is the BEST.

Lamb's Wool Shirts and Pants, 3/6 each.
Men's Socks, 1/6 each.
Ladies' Stockings, 1/6 and 2/- each.
CARRIAGE PAID.

THE TEVIOT TWEED CO.,
HAWICK, N.B.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS COCOA.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

WITH FULL NATURAL FLAVOUR.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay.
Saves Extraction.
Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

Dr. Mackenzie's
ARSENICAL TOILET
SOAP.

The greatest beautifier in the World. Produces a lovely skin and complexion, and cures spots, pimples, redness, and freckles. The finest and purest soap made. For Eczema and all irritations it is the most emollient and soothing. Absolutely harmless. But beware of the many worthless imitations. Have Dr. Mackenzie's or none. At all Chemists and Stores, 6d. and 1s. a tablet.

Madame Adelina Patti writes from Craig-y-Nos Castle: "I find Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap most excellent."

SUFFER FROM CORNS, BUNIONS, OR ENLARGED TOE JOINTS, when a packet of Thompson's Celebrated French Corn Plasters will cure you? It is thin as silk, and can be worn with tightest boot. Post free for 14 stamps from M F. THOMPSON, Homœopathic Chemist, 17, Gordon St., Glasgow. Thompson's Guide to Health post free

HAIR DESTROYED. On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 26, Belvedere Rd., Lambeth, London.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
January 2, 1897.
No. 2.
S.S. S.S.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 2.
Jan. 2, 1897.
NEWSAGENTS
S.S. S.S.

CAN YOU WRITE?

Of course you can! Why not then emboss your Notepaper, etc., with a pretty Monogram? using the

Patent Pocket Monopresse

Every Initial and Monogram kept in stock. Monograms of one or two letters, 9d. each, post free. Apply—
CHAS. ROMPLER, 7, New Basinghall St., London, E.C. Agents wanted.

THE DEAF HEAR

The New Patent
SOUND DISCS

Completely overcome DEAFNESS and HEAD NOISES, no matter of how long standing. Are the same to the ears as glasses are to the eyes. Invisible. Comfortable. Worn months without removal. Explanatory Pamphlet Free.

The L. R. WALES CO., 62 & 63, New Bond St., London, W.

Digitized by Google

No. 418.] [ONE PENNY.
For the Week ending January 2nd, 1897.

TEMPER AND MUSIC.

I.

"ARE you the inspector?"

"I am acting inspector for the night, sir."

"Can I speak to you privately for a few minutes?"

"Certainly, sir; if you'll just wait until I get a man here."

"My name is John Mayburn; I live at 2, Weston Square. This evening my wife and I had a tiff over some trivial matter—I really forget what it was about. We patched it up in the orthodox manner, and all was as usual until I, like a fool, reverted to some tabooed topic. My wife retaliated with interest, and smarting under the stings she was rubbing in one after the other, I forgot myself, and like a brute openly accused her of having more than a penchant for a man whose name I need not mention. She threatened to leave me, and I laughed at her, and—on my honour I only pretended to dare her, but she has gone.'

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"Oh, she'll come back soon, never fear, sir. Maybe she's home now."

"I am not so sanguine on that point. It is three hours since she left the house—and she took a lot of things with her, including all her jewels."

"Has she any relations near her, sir, or some friends she could stay the night with?"

"I don't think she has a single relation anywhere; at least, I have never heard her mention the fact, and we have no friends in London."

The sergeant acting as inspector had in his time been told similar tales. Some had turned out bonâ fide, others what he termed "frosts," one a murder. He looked this man hard in the face, and the mental calculation resulting from the scrutiny was that it was a real case or uncommon fine acting.

"I don't think much can be done to-night, sir; you see it is on the stroke of midnight, but you had better give me a description, and I'll see it sent to headquarters and they will circulate it. The men that come off night duty shall be questioned, and the ones going on told to make what inquiries they can. I don't know what else can be done. If she doesn't turn up by morning I would put a line or two in the papers. I will take her description down, sir."

"I don't exactly know how to describe a person."

"'Age, height, hair, complexion, clothes, the linen mark,' is our style, sir."

"She is twenty six or seven, about medium height, dark hair, pale, good mouth and teeth—dressed, I think, in dark brown or black coat and skirt, black hat with a few red flowers and things on it—patent boots. You see I did not think for a moment that she was really going, so took no notice."

"Well, sir, I hope you'll find her at home when you get there. In any case I should like you to call here as early as you can in the morning."

"Thank you, inspector, I will be here in good time."

"Humph!" mused the inspector, "men take their gruel very differently. Some come and expect us to turn night into day for 'em, as if we had the sun on tap. While some of 'em again, like this chap, go and make blithering idiots of themselves, and cause a shindy, and think we can bring their wounds together, like sticking-plaster. I'm sorry for this chap though. When they're quiet like him, you can always put a bit on it that it's a case of bein' hard hit."

To reach his house Mayburn had a mile of straight road to traverse, but crossed and re-crossed it a dozen times ere reaching home. He couldn't have defined his feelings as he let himself in—no, not if every earthly desire were at stake. He half-expected to find that his wife had returned, yet felt a dull, sinking sensation at his heart—a pain that became more acute when he knew he was alone.

He sat down determined to think of the best things to do, and the likeliest place his wife could have got to, but think! His mind was chaos. All he could understand was that his wife had left him through his brutality; and he loved her, positively adored her. What could he do? Wait. Ah yes, sit down and act the stoic. It is a mere matter of will power, but when a man is gradually working himself into a frenzy there is but one means of supplying a safety-valve, and that is walking, or running if you like, until, exhausted, nature collapses. The limited space of a room Mayburn found unbearable, so grasping a hat and jamming it tightly on, he quickly got into the street, and began the race against his mind. Without the slightest idea of destination, time, or his whereabouts, Mayburn kept on, as thousands of men have before, until the wearied body and mind united in their demand for rest.

Everything that was possible had been done, even to supplying the police with photographic duplicates, and yet it was six o'clock the next evening and no tidings. Mayburn was making a pretence at eating. He was really gazing at his printed message in the agony column of an evening paper, and wondering if the people ever saw those messages. After contemplating for some minutes, his attention was drawn to a paragraph at the bottom of another column:

FOUND DROWNED.—The dead body of a well-dressed woman was picked up by the river police this morning near Westminster Ferry. No papers or effects were found that might enable the police to trace the deceased's relatives, but she was dressed in a black coat and skirt, black stockings, and underclothes marked M.M. The body was taken to the mortuary pending identification.

"Madge! My God! I am a murderer."

As the policeman on duty at Westminster Bridge was going his rounds that night, he noticed a man leaning over the coping in a suspicious manner, so accosted him with the customary: "Move on, sir, please."

"I wasn't contemplating suicide, officer, I was envying those who have the courage to do it."

II.

"Oh, you positively must come, Mrs. Danvers; there will be quite a collection of lions, I can assure you, and we don't often have such golden opportunities in Liverpool."

"No, that is true, but it is such a bother, and I suppose I'm getting too old to care."

"Rubbish, too old indeed. Besides, that man who writes those charmingly sad stories, you know, will be there. What's his name?"

"Do you mean Saunders?"

"Yes. He wrote 'Coming'—a peculiar title, my dear, isn't it? and awfully sad, but very pretty. By-the-way, have you noticed that he always makes his heroines out such exquisite musicians? He is fond of music himself, I'm certain."

"Talking of music I had a strange experience to-day."

"Had you, dear? Do tell me all about it."

"I had occasion to go to my agent's this morning, and, contrary to custom, sent cook out to make a few household purchases. I met my agent by accident in Princes Road, consequently wasn't away from the house more than ten minutes. You can imagine my astonishment on my return to hear someone playing on the piano. It was my housemaid!"

"What impudence! Really, I don't know what servants are coming to. I should have dismissed her on the spot."

"I didn't. The front door was open and I crept softly to the drawing-room door, and stood there spell bound."

"You don't say so?"

"She was playing a most difficult piece of Chopin's, and I listened, and enjoyed it, and as she finished was about to enter the room and gently reprimand her, when she began playing the most dreamy thing I ever heard. I could have stayed there for hours listening, but she stopped suddenly, and I heard she was crying, so I crept out of my own house as quietly as I had entered."

"Dear me, most remarkable. Well, I must run away now, dear; remember I shall call for you and drag you to the Fishers' to-night."

Digitized by Google

True to her threat the vivacious Mrs. Tarrant called to drag her victim to the great gathering of celebrities at the Fishers', but though the sightseers or hunters found the lions charming, the one supposed to have the finest mane in the company soon came to the conclusion that the whole show was insufferably slow. The Fishers were excellent types of the genus snob, and as the young author who wrote sad stories had to listen to the vapid conversation of three Fishers one after the other, he wished they had sailed away to the west before he had turned up, and utterly bored, made his excuses and left.

The night was fine and he was in no hurry, why not take a stroll in the park. No sooner thought of than acted upon, and Mr. Saunders strode out, only to reach the park gates to find them closed.

Few people cared to have their plans thwarted, but when a decision is suddenly made to do or see something in particular, it is the one thing for the moment that will give pleasure, and Mr. Saunders, vulgarly human, muttered a naughty word because he couldn't enter the park. Debating in his mind what to do, he stood there for some time, until the faint sound of music settled the question for him, and unwittingly he walked in the direction whence it came, and stopped opposite the house, listening.

Lost in reverie, he lived in the atmosphere of another world; scenes recurred to his memory that he had long wished were dead. It made him miserable and sad, yet he felt fascinated and showed no inclination to move until the last note had died away. As he turned to retrace his steps he met Mrs. Danvers face to face.

"So this is your press of work, Mr. Saunders, eh?"

"Must I admit that I was horribly bored by my host's daughters, and was glad of any excuse that would get me out? You were walking this way I think, Mrs. Danvers; may I see you to your house?"

"This is it, Mr. Saunders, thank you."

"Is it really? Do you know I've been at this gate quite half-an-hour, listening to some member of your family playing the most exquisite music."

"I have no family. You must have heard the housemaid."

"Hardly that, Mrs Danvers, it was a touch above even the latest up-to-date slavey."

"It is perfectly true; she plays simply divinely. Come in for a cup of tea to-morrow and you shall hear her."

The air must have been faintly tinged with frost, or some exhilarating wave passing over the southern part of Liverpool the next afternoon, for Mr. Saunders admitted to himself that it was ages since his spirits had been so buoyant, and the brisk pace he kept up soon took him to Bentley Road, where he found Mrs. Danvers gathering the last flowers of autumn.

"The musical maid will be bringing tea in just now, but as she doesn't know that I am aware of her accomplishment, can you suggest any means of getting her to play?"

This was a poser for Saunders, who thought the programme was all cut and dried.

"I can't just at the moment; perhaps if we wait a little an idea may occur."

"At all events we must have our tea first. I cannot do without mine, and really I often prefer my cup of tea in the afternoon to any other meal, I was going to say."

A gentle tap at the door, denoting the arrival of that delicious beverage, put a stop to any further remarks being made on the subject, and as the maid entered Mrs. Danvers looked in her direction, possibly with the idea of getting some inspiration concerning the forthcoming musical performance, certainly never anticipating what was to happen.

The approach of tea was heralded by a piercing shriek, the dropping of the tray and its contents, and the collapse of the housemaid.

Mrs. Danvers clutched the arms of her wicker chair and sat appalled, for Saunders had risen from his seat only to fall back into it fainting. She thought he was dead.

Contrary to the prevailing idea, it is at critical moments like this where a woman's nerve does not desert her. A second or two's frightened gaze, and Mrs. Danvers and the cook—who had come to see what was the matter—carried the maid to the nearest bedroom. Restoratives were applied, but nothing seemed capable of wresting her from the dead faint, and Mrs. Danvers was contemplating sending for medical aid, when Saunders walked deliberately into the room, pushed the cook to one side, and calmly lifted the lifeless form of the housemaid and kissed her—not once merely but several times, and the efficacy of the new treatment soon became obvious, for the patient sighed once or twice, then slowly opened her eyes, and Mrs. Danvers and the cook heard:

"My husband!"

"My darling wife!"

Mrs. Danvers at once beckoned to the cook, and the two left the room.

When the heart is light and happy, how beautiful everything seems, an indescribable charm pervades the very atmosphere, and, sunshine or rain, the world appears a glorious panorama, with no such things as partings or sorrow.

To such a world Mr. and Mrs. Mayburn awoke next morning. At the first glimmer of consciousness it all seemed like a dream, but the warm, gentle pressure of loving lips soon dispelled that nightmare.

"Oh, Jack, my own dear Jack, will you ever be able to forgive me, and forget that I ever left you?"

"My own sweet wife, it is I who have to be forgiven; can you for——"

Nothing further was actually said, but somehow a complete understanding was arrived at. Perhaps the method of interruption was partly, if not entirely responsible.

Jack, of course, explained how he had taken it for granted that the hapless creature found by the police was his wife; and she in her turn, why she preferred the menial duties of a servant to the unending drudgery of a governess.

"Tell me just once more, Jack, that you never meant what you said that night, and that you are sure I have been true to you."

"You know I never meant it, sweetheart. Oh, I was mad and wicked, but God knows I've been punished."

"You poor dear; well, let us forget the past and live only in the present and the future."

"Kiss me, my beloved."

And the compact was sealed.

C. ENGLAND COWAN.

One rode a horse, the other rhododendron.

Digitized by Google

The Story of Mag.

JUST above this little mountain village there is a place known as Lost Creek waterfall. The name is not a specially romantic one, but it has at least the merit of describing the place which it designates.

Lost Creek is a typical mountain stream that comes roaring, brawling down the mountain until it reaches a certain high cliff, over which it plunges in a graceful, quivering column. It throws up a shower of silvery spray from the rocks below, but instead of flowing on down the surface of the mountain it plunges into a dark, small-mouthed, subterranean cavern and is in all verity "lost" to human sight, as the name implies. Occasionally a wayfarer will throw a stone inside and listen to the hollow thud, thud, as it seems to bound from ledge to ledge into the awful darkness of the earth's interior.

Almost half a mile farther down the mountain the stream emerges from its underground course as abruptly as it disappeared. There are vague rumours that soldiers, hard pressed by their foes, traversed this awful passageway during the dark days of the War, but these are only rumours, and no one now cares by actual test to prove or disprove their possibility.

Only one person is really known to have passed through this journey, and that one brought no news as to its mysteries. The lips were sealed for ever, and the eyes, unwavering, stared up at the sun above them. The memory of the awful exit gives the subterranean passageway a horror deeper than its own, but the self-engrossing heroism of the entrance gives the waterfall a grandeur greater than that of its rocks, purer than the snowy whiteness of its foam, and more soul-refreshing than the coolness of its spray.

Tom Houston was one of the pleasantest, most industrious young farmers on that slope of Cumberland mountain, and Mag Lassiter was one of the wildest, most worthless of the mountain belles. The neighbours all said a great deal of good about Tom and very little of bad, beyond the fact that he was rather easily influenced. The best that could be said about Mag was that she was pretty and full of life, and that she generally stuck to her friends through thick and thin—as long as she cared to.

As to the evil said about her, there was almost no end to it.

The whisperings that connected her name with certain moonshining operations could hardly be included under this head, for public opinion on the mountains in those days was far from unanimous in declaring such things evil. Far more serious were the rumours that she had used the power of her beauty to lure numerous young men on to destruction. Many rather serious misdeeds were supposed to have their origin with her influence, but nothing definite was ever known about them. When she first began to make friends with Tom Houston, everybody said that no good could come of it. Several of the older men and women took it on themselves to warn Tom, but he refused to be warned. As usual, the voice of youth and life and beauty had more influence than the voice of old age and experience and ugliness.

The crash came sooner than anyone expected. One night, at a dance, Tom called out the two Dickens' boys, and, seemingly in cold blood, shot them dead.

The Dickens' boys were members of one of the most prominent families on the mountain, and the excitement which followed the killing was intense. Everybody remembered that Mag had formerly had a fierce quarrel with the elder of the brothers, and that he was said to be the only young man on the mountain who had successfully resisted her wiles. Everybody suspected that the murder was instigated by Mag, but nobody knew it. Only Tom Houston could know it, and it was recognised by all that Tom would never tell. Besides, after the killing, Tom had fled and was now somewhere in hiding.

There was reason to believe that he had not gone far away, but it was hard to find him. The mountain was thoroughly aroused. The prominence of the murdered men and the cold-bloodedness of the deed made everyone feel an interest in bringing the slayer to justice. Pickets were scattered in a line that surrounded the whole of the mountain where Tom was supposed to be hiding, but still the task was no easy one. The mountain side at that place was so full of deep ravines and holes in the rocks, that a dozen men might easily elude anything but the most careful search. Still, it was only a question of time.

Digitized by Google

"Gimme fifty dollars."

One evening, several days after the killing, Mag walked into the sheriff's office at Jasper. Without even glancing at the group of loungers hanging about as usual, she looked defiantly at the sheriff and addressed him in harsh, strident tones, very unlike those in which she generally spoke.

"I've come to tell you that your men has got Tom Houston penned safe an' sound," she said. "Thar ain't no possible way out for him. I guess you already knowed that, though."

"I sorter guessed it," replied the sheriff, as he chuckled and looked round in some uncertainty.

"Ef you think you'll have an easy job to take him you're mistaken, though," continued Mag. "That mounting is as full of little gullies an' holes as an old kitchen is of rat holes, an' no man in Tennessee knows 'em better than Tom does. It may be a month before you catch him. Besides, Tom's got shootin' irons, an' he knows how to use 'em, too. There'll be the devil to pay before you take him unless you get help."

"Help?" repeated the sheriff rather vaguely. "Ain't I got half the men on the mounting to help me now? What kind of help do you mean?"

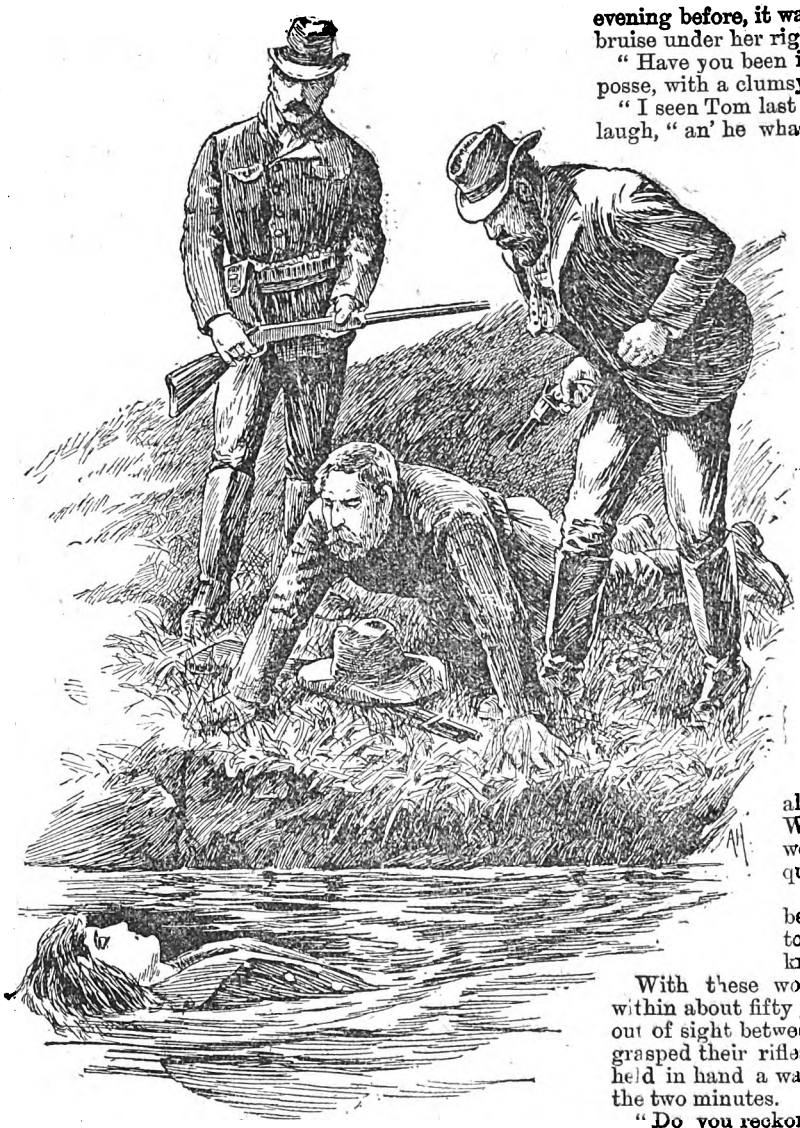
"Gimme fifty dollars, an' I'll take you right where he is to-morrow mornin', an' I'll gyarantee he don't fire nary shot neither."

The sheriff uttered a low, long-drawn whistle of surprise, and the longers about the office exchanged remarks in an undertone. They had always known "that gal was no good, but darned if they'd ever have believed she was low down enough to get a fellow into trouble an' then sell his life to the officers for fifty dollars, darned if they would."

"There's some conditions about it," continued Mag haughtily and without heeding these comments. "Them fifty dollars must be in my hand in bills in the mornin' before I budge any step of the way. After I take you where he is you must give me two minutes by the watch to talk to him before you do anything. Then, if he tries to run, you must give him at least fifty yards start before you begin shootin'. I ain't a-goin' to see him shot down like a dog without no chance at all. After it's all over I'm goin' to leave this here country myself, an' you've got to promise me that nobody'll try to foller or to see which way I've gone."

The figure made a final leap.

Digitized by Google



The watchers gazed at the placid features.

"I don't blame her for that last part," whispered a bystander, winking significantly.

The sheriff thought the matter over. He went out and talked to several of the friends of the murdered man about it. All agreed that Mag's plan, though an unspeakably base one on her part, might result in saving several weeks of time and possibly several human lives. Perhaps it was the cheapest way out of the difficulty. Old man Dickens readily agreed to furnish the money. The result of the consultation was that Mag was informed that her terms were accepted.

The next morning, before sunrise, when Mag met the sheriff's posse at the meeting point agreed upon the evening before, it was noticed that she had a big, black bruise under her right eye.

"Have you been in a scrape, Mag?" asked one of the posse, with a clumsy attempt at jocularity.

"I seen Tom last night," replied the girl, with a forced laugh, "an' he whacked me in the eye with his fist an' cussed me for gettin' him into trouble, as he said. I didn't mind the lick—but the cussin'."

Here the girl's voice quavered, and those nearest to her thought they saw the glimmer of a tear in her eye.

"I soon made it all right with him though," she continued, regaining her self-possession. "But I didn't tell him what a nice lot of visitors I was goin' to bring him this morning. He, he!"

There were some black looks exchanged and some remarks made in an undertone as to the baseness of the girl's treachery, but she deigned no reply until she came within hearing of the Lost Creek waterfall, to which reference has been made before.

"Call in all your pickets," she exclaimed imperiously. "Tom's mighty nigh here somewheres, an' you is such pore shots that you'd better have a lot of men ready to shoot."

The pickets had spent the night before on the mountain as they had also spent several nights preceding. Word was now sent out, and all of them were summoned down to the spot in question.

"Now stay where you are an' remember about them two minutes you promise to give us—for our last interview, you know. He, he!"

With these words Mag cautiously advanced until within about fifty yards of the fall. Then she stepped out of sight between several large boulders. The posse grasped their rifles and waited in silence. The sheriff held in hand a watch with which to tell the passage of the two minutes.

"Do you reckon he's been hidin' all this time in that hole?" asked one man in a low whisper.

"What do you reckon she's a-sayin' to him?" asked another.

Then all was quiet save for the "tick, tick" of the sheriff's watch. When the time lacked but a few seconds of being out, a woman's figure hurriedly glided from behind the rocks and hastened up the mountain side. The left hand pressed a handkerchief to the eyes, but the right hand pointed backwards towards the rocks. Scarcely a moment later a man's figure emerged and made a wild dash for Lost Creek waterfall.

Perhaps it was the recollection of their promise, or perhaps it was only the suddenness of the apparition; at any rate, not a shot was fired until the figure made a final leap before disappearing into the deep, dark hole into which the water fell. Just as it was poised in mid-air, half-a-dozen rifles rang out loud and clear. High above the multitudinous mountain echoes, which they awoke, a wild, shrill scream arose. Every man in the posse rushed pell-mell to the black hole, but when they peered into its depths nothing was to be seen and nothing was to be heard save the roar of the fall and the swish of the foam.

Digitized by Google

"Those rocks on that side would give a fellow plenty of foothold," remarked one man to the sheriff. "Air yo' a-goin' in?"

"Naw!" answered that official. "I ain't hankering to run afoul of Tom Houston's shootin' irons in the dark."

However, he put his face in at the dark opening and shouted, "Surrender!" though his voice was well nigh drowned by that of the water. Then very cautiously he pushed a big revolver into the darkness and pulled the trigger. A long, cavernous bellow was the only response.

"Jeeminy!" he ejaculated. "It sounds like a million of devils might live down there."

Then a sudden thought seemed to strike him.

"See here," he shouted. "About half of you fellows run down the mountain—quick, an' stand guard at the place where Lost Creek comes out again."

His meaning was comprehended in an instant, and about half the posse dashed away to execute his orders.

"So that was Mag's little game, was it?" continued the sheriff. "She thought I'd call in my picket lines an' then Tom could slip out the lower end of this hole—guess nobody knows it better than him, an' she'd have her fifty dollars besides. She was sharp to get her money beforehand. I wonder where she is now?"

She was nowhere to be seen. It seemed that during the tumult she had slipped away unobserved. The sheriff made no attempt to follow her; perhaps he remembered his promise not to do so.

"It don't make no difference," he remarked. "We've got Tom in a hole this time sure, with both ends of the hole guarded. It's only a question of a little time now. If we don't drive him out, we can easily starve him out. I think some fellow winged him when he jumped anyhow."

That night three men with rifles in their hands stood guard at the lower opening of the underground passageway of Lost Creek, and three stood at the upper one. The next day they were relieved by others, and so it continued for a full week. Tom Houston did not appear. One afternoon at the end of this period Tom's big peaked slouch hat floated out into the sunlight at the lower entrance. The watchers examined it with all the eagerness of intense excitement.

"Somethin' else is goin' to float out pretty soon now," exclaimed one in an awestruck whisper.

Sure enough, not half-an-hour later "something else" did float out.

"Look out! It's comin'," exclaimed the first one who saw it.

As it reached the first faint rays of daylight the watchers peering in could recognise the well-worn suit of "butternut" jeans which Tom Houston had been used to wear. When it reached the full light of day, they saw that a wealth of soft brown hair had fallen back from the marble brow of a woman.

They had to take a second glance to realise that it was Mag. The old, radiant beauty was unconquered even by death, but the old look of haughty defiance was gone, and in its place was a look of tender restfulness that was new to them. The only sign of a struggle was the black welt on the face where Tom had struck her when she went to him to unfold her plan for saving his life. As the watchers gazed at the placid features the various details of her self-sacrifice came to them one at a time.

"I bet she had him hid in this place all along," whispered one. "The only trouble was that the lines was drawed so tight around that she couldn't get him out."

"She changed clo'es with him mighty quick that evenin'," said another.

"Tom slipped off with her clothes on, but I bet she had some others hid out somewheres for him to put on. I wouldn't doubt but she gave him them fifty dollars to go on. Lord knows where he is by this time—in Halifax mebby."

HERBERT FLAXMAN.

RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION. No. 25.

THE Provincial Guinea last week was won by Mr. F. Hutchinson, Church Street, Bingham, Notts; and the London Guinea by Mr. W. H. Holton, 26, Holles Street, Newcastle Street, Strand, W.C.

POST-CARD COMPETITION.—No. I.

NEW SERIES.

A Prize of Two Guineas is offered to the reader of SHORT STORIES who sends us the best anagram on the words, "A Happy New Year."

Competition closes on Monday, January 4th.

Post-cards only, please.

Jumbled Story Competition.—26.

ON page 15 appears a story, each line of which is numbered. The lines are all in their wrong position, and the prizes mentioned below are offered to those who write on a sheet of paper the numbers of the lines in the order most nearly correct. The title is jumbled up, and should be correctly given and pasted on the paper containing the effort.

The conditions are jumbled in the following paragraph as an example. The correct order of the lines is given in line 10.

1 SHORT STORIES on or before Monday,
2 awarded to the readers whose solutions first
3 JUMBLED STORY.
4 Four Prizes—one of £5 and three of £1 each—are
5 January 4th, and envelopes must be marked
6 correct. In the event of a tie, the prizes will be
7 reach this office.
8 All attempts to be delivered at the offices of 9 offered to the readers whose keys are most nearly 10 4—9—6—2—7—8—1—5—3—12—11—13—10.
11 a sheet of paper the figures in the order they
12 Competitors in doing the story should write on
13 believe to be correct, thus:

£2 is offered to the first of the readers living in Ireland who succeeds in forwarding the correct, or most nearly correct, solution.

Digitized by Google

THE APPLE TREE.

A Study of Murder.

JACQUES was not a bad sort of fellow, although somewhat hasty and little disposed to resist a first impulse. A hard-working student-at-law, imbued with Schopenhauer's philosophy, life was a perpetual struggle for him; his penniless condition obliging him to give lessons, and, as often as not, go dinnerless and supperless to bed.

Still, life had not absolutely soured him, and at heart he remained a good fellow. The burden of existence, however, at this particular moment began to seem almost too heavy for him to bear, and at times he rebelled against his destiny in a way—as the sequel will show—that was perhaps slightly exaggerated.

One summer's evening—it was a Saturday—both purse and stomach being empty, Jacques, being filled with rage at the thought that he would, for lack of a few napoleons, be unable to take part in an excursion planned for the morrow, started off through the streets of Paris, going on aimlessly and steadily straight before him, right through the suburbs, till he finally found himself, at eight o'clock at night, on a long, bare road in the plain of Aubervilliers—a road that looked like a white chalk line on blank darkness.

Then, as ill-luck would have it, great drops of rain began to fall, and peals of thunder burst forth. Jacques was no coward, neither was he troubled by conscience; indeed, he cared little about the thunder, but he was annoyed at the rain drenching his clothes—valuable from a monetary point of view—and his skin, frail protection against pneumonia. No shelter within sight, right and left of the road; nothing but the bare, gloomy plain.

At last he saw a tree—a lonely apple tree—a good-natured sort of tree that bent over on one side rather like a tipsy man with his hat askew. Jacques greeted the tree with affection, and crouched under its protecting branches.

The storm increased. Jacques felt exasperated against his bad luck. He felt as though Nature itself rose up against him, and he shook his fist at the dark skies.

"Brr! Brr! What weather!" growled a fresh arrival, taking refuge also under the tree on the opposite side of Jacques, whom he had not noticed. This man had evidently been dining, and seemed to be a horse-dealer who had just concluded a bargain, for he muttered between his teeth:

"This is jolly, indeed. Nice fellows those, making me drink and then going off with my carriage. Fancy having to walk home in such weather, and with a lot of money, too."

Jacques was not a bad fellow; it seems necessary to repeat this, for some doubts may perhaps arise on that point.

Hearing the muttered observations of the stranger, and convinced that even with the most exquisite and insinuating politeness he would fail to obtain a loan from him, Jacques softly went round the tree, seized him by the throat, and, being very powerful, strangled him. This preliminary affair accomplished, he took the man's purse, emptied it into his own pocket, threw it on the ground near the body, and, as it was getting late, started off in the direction of Paris.

The apple tree, which had remained motionless during this episode, now started off in his wake.

It is not strictly customary for an apple tree to follow a man who has just strangled another; it would, therefore, be somewhat unjust to Jacques to accuse him of cowardice on the pretext that he was slightly surprised.

Hearing behind him a trailing sound of roots on the road, he turned and saw the tree.

"Dear me," he said; "how muddled my brain is! Want of habit, no doubt. Shall soon feel all right."

He resumed his walk, and the tree continued to follow.

"Either I am mad," thought Jacques, "or what is now taking place is some unexplained manifestation of natural forces. I shall soon find out, for it is not likely that the custom-house officers, who are sensible men, will allow an apple tree to pass by without notice."

At the city gates, the officials did not even move aside. The apple tree did not seem to heed them, and Jacques and the tree found themselves, one behind the other, in the streets of Paris.

Jacques resumed his meditations.

"Thus," he said, "it is evident that this apple tree is the visible form of remorse, just as Banquo appeared to Macbeth, and the Commander to Don Juan. This hallucination is the more extraordinary that I do not feel any remorse. Really, this tree has a disregard for all tradition, Never mind; I have got the money. I shall sleep soundly, and to-morrow morning the apple tree will have returned to its proper place. You may consider yourself a failure, my dear fellow!"

He had, you see, a calm mind, and knew how to rise to an emergency. He hurried on, not to escape from his apple tree, which appeared to have indefatigable roots, but in order to get sooner to bed.

At last he reached his hotel—Rue de Seine. As he paused at the door he wondered if the tree would come in also, and felt a kind of interest about it, as he reflected that the narrow passage would certainly crush its branches.

He rang, opened and closed the door. The apple tree remained outside. Jacques smiled, not that the tree bothered him, but he thought of his landlady, who objected to strangers at night.

In his room, Jacques, by the glimmer of a candle, counted his money, and found that the little operation had brought him in some nine hundred francs. It could not be considered a bad business.

Suddenly he felt a pang at not having thought of his apple tree, which, in truth, had most discreetly played the part of avenger, and, raising the blind, he looked out of the window. The tree was on the pavement, calmly gliding up and down. Jacques noticed that it even politely moved aside to allow people to pass.

Digitized by Google

ONE
Rode a Horse
THE OTHER
Rhododendron
A £20 Prize
See current number of Pearson's Weekly.

Jacques went to bed and slept soundly.

At nine o'clock he awoke. Some one was loudly knocking at his door. He rose, his eyes heavy with sleep. His friends had come to fetch him for the projected excursion which had necessitated this acquirement of funds. Joyfully he opened to them, and they began joking while he dressed. He slipped some gold pieces into his pocket and gaily went downstairs.

The apple tree, which was respectfully waiting on the pavement, immediately began to follow him like a well-trained lackey. Jacques smiled to it, like an old acquaintance. The whole party went off and took a morning glass. Jacques treated the others, and the sight of his money was hailed by joyous acclamations.

"Waiter," said Jacques, "give my apple tree a glass."

The waiter, not understanding, looked annoyed; he thought he was being chaffed. Jacques roared with laughter; he thought, however, that the tree had, by a slight wave of a branch, made a gesture of refusal. No doubt it was a sober tree, or at least one that took nothing in the morning.

The party decided upon going to Nogent-sur-Marne. Jacques suggested taking a cab to the station.

"Now you'll have to stir your stumps," said Jacques to his apple tree, giving it a friendly nudge.

Impossible. The apple tree stood on the edge of the pavement while they clambered up, then it followed the cab at a jog trot. Leaning out of the window, Jacques watched it. At one moment he uttered a scream. His tree had nearly been run over. Luckily it was able to get out of the way in time.

"What on earth is the matter with you?" inquired his friends.

"Don't mind me," he replied; "it is my apple tree."

"His apple tree—his apple tree again!"

At the station the tree did not lose its way. Jacques began to think it was really cruel to wear out his tree; he was getting quite fond of it. But he was soon reassured, for the apple tree got on to the platform—without a ticket, the scamp!—and, keeping up good traditions, remaining at the side of the carriage, prancing like a body-guard following a king's coach.

Jacques, however, absorbed in his apple tree, rather neglected the amiable ladies of the company, one of whom, having a tender feeling for him, reproached him with his inattention.

"Are you jealous of my apple tree?" he said laughingly.

"Apple tree! apple tree!" all his companions began singing to a popular tune. They even improvised words which Jacques feared might wound his apple tree. But the tree maintained a calm and well-bred impassibility.

On arrival there was a terrible crush; Jacques almost lost his apple tree, but it is most convenient to have a tall friend in the crowd. He saw it cleverly extricate itself, and faithfully resume its post.

They all went to a restaurant on the banks of the Marne. Jacques now really felt uncomfortable; was it not most improper, anti-democratic, for him selfishly to seat himself on a comfortable terrace and leave his apple tree alone on the road, strolling about, with its branches crossed behind its back? Nevertheless, Jacques did not dare to move.

The talk grew loud, merry, and noisy, wine flowed freely, and Jacques felt a delightful sensation of comfort after the period of sad privations he had recently gone through. He even became rather over-excited, but that was really excusable; not every day do you strangle a horse-dealer, nor have an apple tree kicking its heels in front of your eating-house. His excessive boisterousness was therefore to be excused; moreover, his friends of both sexes did not fail to keep him company. Generously he flung a glass of champagne on to the boughs of his apple tree.

"Let us hire a boat," said his companions, "and go to the island."

"No, no," cried Jacques tearfully; "perhaps it can't swim!"

"Who—what—cannot swim?"

"My apple——"

"Apple tree! Apple tree! This is a joke; bravo!"

Jacques flushed. Would these fellows never understand? He looked at the apple tree to ask its opinion, and thought it did not seem to dread a little swim, glad, no doubt, to refresh its roots.

The boat was unfastened. The tree jumped gracefully from the bank and floated on the water. Jacques followed it with his eyes, ready to hold out an oar if necessary.

In the evening Jacques was abominably drunk. He screamed to his friends:

"You annoy and bore me! Your society is odious to me! I shall go off with my apple tree."

They laughed, strove to detain him, but in vain. The ladies, vexed, pouted. He, ungrateful fellow, did not care a bit. It was pitch dark; he went along the bank, accompanied by his apple tree.

For hours Jacques wandered on, following his apple tree, and at last it led him back to the plain of Aubervilliers. There the apple tree stopped; it was at home.

* * * * *

The next morning, as two gendarmes were riding over the plain of Aubervilliers, the private said to his comrade:

"Look at that apple tree, where the horse dealer was murdered! There is something hanging to its branches, and it is not apples!"

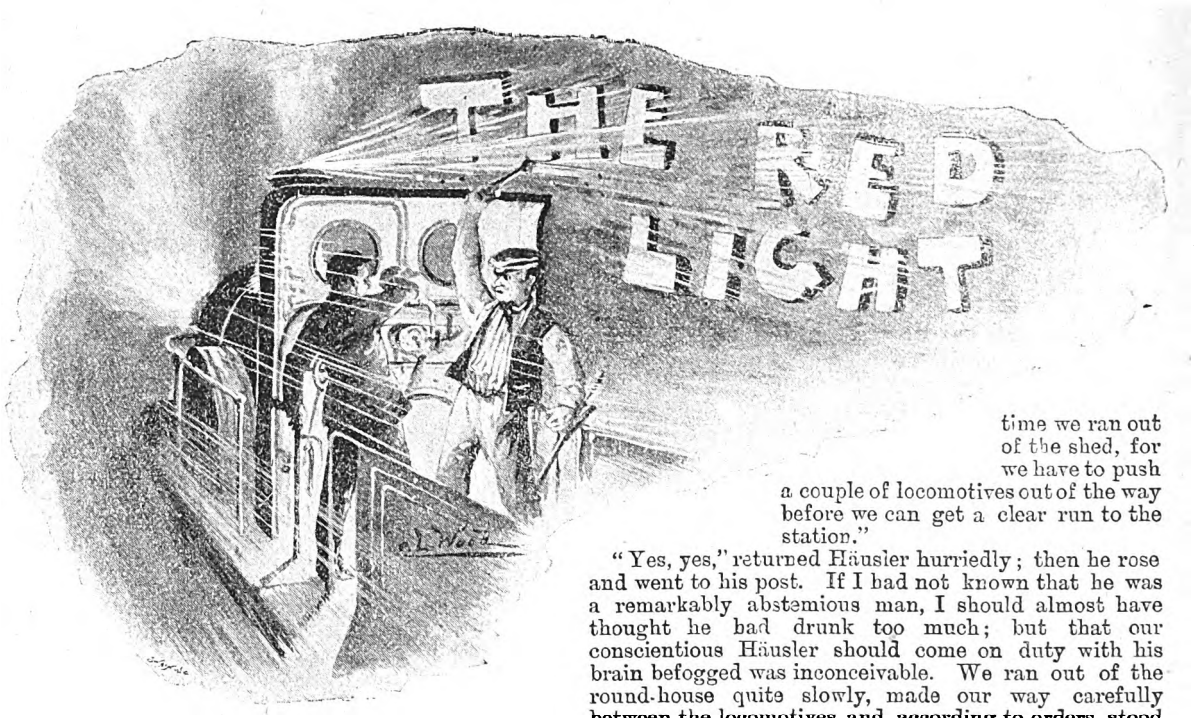
They approached and examined the apple tree.

The thing which was hanging from its branches was a body.

The body was the body of Jacques.

LE VIER.

Digitized by Google



Two years ago I qualified as stoker, and together with the driver, Häusler, ran the Berlin-Vienna express on the Berlin-Falkenberg division. Our train left the Central Station at 5.30 in the afternoon, and on that particular day I was in the round-house at three o'clock to see that the fires were good and everything in running order. According to rules, the driver had to be in the round-house an hour before the departure of the train, and usually Häusler complied with the greatest punctuality.

Nevertheless, to-day it was a quarter to five and still he had not come. I tried the sandbox, the two steam pumps that force the water from the tender into the boiler, and saw diligently to the fire, which required to be in the best possible condition if we were to make the required run of ninety-one minutes in the given time. We could not allow ourselves full speed until we had passed the station Grosz-Lichterfelde. Then there were still almost sixty-two miles in a stretch, and only at the larger stations through which we passed was it necessary to slacken our speed.

It was nearing five, and still no sign of Häusler. I had come to the conclusion that he was ill or that some accident had happened to him, and was just on the point of going to the superintendent of the locomotive house and reporting the case to him when I saw Häusler approaching in considerable haste. He gave me a hurried nod and merely asked if everything were ready. Then he mounted the locomotive and tried all the valves for himself, but while at other times he made this most important inspection of the locomotive with great care, to-day he did it hastily and with a lack of attention. In the midst of his inspection he stopped suddenly and seated himself upon the tool-chest which is attached to the tender. For a good five minutes he sat staring blankly before him; then he laughed outright and asked me again: "Is everything ready, Max?"

"Of course, Herr Häusler," I replied. "It's about time we ran out of the shed, for we have to push a couple of locomotives out of the way before we can get a clear run to the station."

"Yes, yes," returned Häusler hurriedly; then he rose and went to his post. If I had not known that he was a remarkably abstemious man, I should almost have thought he had drunk too much; but that our conscientious Häusler should come on duty with his brain befogged was inconceivable. We ran out of the round-house quite slowly, made our way carefully between the locomotives and, according to orders, stood outside the station at ten minutes before the train was to start, not having coupled as yet. We had a good head of steam and all the valves let off the superfluous vapour.

"How is your wife?" I asked to rouse Häusler from his lethargy.

"My wife?" he asked with a start. "She is very well, very well, she knows nothing yet."

"Has something unpleasant happened to you, Herr Häusler?"

"Unpleasant to me? No, I know of nothing. Did I say anything? It was only a way I have of talking, and my wife must not know about it."

Two great tears rolled down his cheeks, but he turned quickly away to hide his sobs from me. I was at a loss to understand his behaviour, but, after a few seconds, he turned to me again and his face was calm, even sinister.

"Don't you feel well?" I asked.

"Oh, yes," he replied hastily, "I am very well, very well indeed."

The three strokes of the bell announced the time for departure; the twice-repeated signal of the guard gave us the order to start. Häusler woke out of his reverie, gave the whistle of response, and then, as deftly as ever, he set the train in motion.

Unless some accident should occur we would make our ninety-one minutes. It was exactly 7.1 when we at last pulled up in Herzburg, and punctually at 7.11 we steamed into Falkenberg. We were uncoupled and ran upon a siding, four minutes later the train sped on its way. We ran our locomotive first to the water crane, and filled for the return trip; then we took in coal and ran upon the turn-table to be set right for the whole run. Lastly, we ran across on a siding, and after Häusler had fulfilled his duty as driver he went into the engineers' house to rest a bit.

I had to stay upon the engine, but could take a little turn off for relaxation, thanks to the polisher. The fire and boiler were kept low so that it did not go out and could be brought to a full heat a half hour before starting. The machine could not run away, for it stood on a "dead" track and the pressure of steam was lowered so quickly that I was safe in leaving it to the care of the polisher.

Digitized by Google

It was an hour after our arrival, when I went into the engineers' quarters and hunted up Häusler in the large waiting-room. The engineers' room in Falkenberg is fitted up with tables, chairs, and some sleeping couches. There is a small library at hand from which one can inform himself by various technical works, and Häusler formerly made use of this library to study different treatises on locomotive construction, the science of mechanics, and so on.

To-day I found him busy writing. There were, besides ourselves, two drivers who lay upon the couches asleep. Häusler wrote with a speed which I was not accustomed to see in him. He nodded to me as I entered, and went on with his writing. I thought I noticed that the letter upon which he was engaged, and which already covered at least three octavo sheets, concerned large sums of money, and the name Rothschild, too, I observed repeatedly.

I asked Häusler whether he would not take a little something in the way of refreshment. He was never, as I have said before, inclined to be dissipated; but he was accustomed to drink at least one glass of beer and eat a trifle, because he did not get home to supper until eleven o'clock. To-day, however, he refused, explaining:

"I have no money. I shall, in fact, have to go hungry, for I cannot eat again. Everything is gone, quite gone."

This manner of talking naturally struck me as strange. It was not intended as a joke, for Häusler did not look as if he could joke. But if it were meant in earnest it gave me cause to fear for Häusler's reason, and the uneasiness which had taken possession of me increased.

I could only stay in the engineers' room long enough to get a bite to eat and a glass of beer; then I had to go back to my engine to start the fire into fresh life and get up the pressure of steam. I threw coal into the fire-box, raked the fire until it burned briskly, and had steam up again in a short time. When it came time to run across to the metals where we were to be coupled to the Vienna express, I sent the polisher to Häusler, for the latter, contrary to his custom, did not appear of his own accord. He did not test the working of the feeding pumps or valves either, as was his wont. He seemed to-day to rely entirely upon me and my conscientiousness.

The train came promptly into Falkenberg a little before nine o'clock, and the change of locomotives had to be made as quickly as possible. The train was full of passengers, and had over a dozen carriages.

As far as Herzberg we ran at a normal rate in twelve minutes. Then to Jüterbog we had fifteen minutes, and I noticed the constantly growing agitation on the part of Häusler. He talked to himself, flung out angry words which sounded sometimes like a curse, gesticulated violently with his hands, and seemed to forget entirely where we were.

Through the three intervening stations to Jüterbog we ran at a terrific rate, with no slackening of speed. I did not dare to call Häusler's attention to the gauge, for on this point he was very sensitive; but when, before reaching the Jüterbog station, we received the telegraphic signal to slow up, and Häusler did not mind in the least, I stepped up beside him and turned the lever a little myself, for otherwise we would not under any circumstances have been able to bring the train to a standstill in the station. Whereupon Häusler closed the regulator himself and kept his place doggedly at the step.

At 9.52 we pulled out of Jüterbog, and fourteen minutes later drew up in Lückenwald. Contrary to his deportment on the preceding trip, Häusler had become very quiet, but his face darkened perceptibly, and when, shortly before coming to the station, I reached for the throttle, thinking that Häusler would again forget to slow up the train, I received from him a rough push, and his voice was raised to almost a scream as he called to me: "What do you want? That is my business!"

The stop of a minute at Lückenwald was utilised by me to put on fresh coal; then we sped away again. Nearly thirty-one miles, that is, half the run to Berlin, now lay before us. Häusler was at his post. Suddenly he laid hold of my arm and said:

"Did you see him?"

"Whom?" I asked in astonishment.

"He looked out of the coupé in Falkenberg," said Häusler. "He comes from Vienna, and I've got him this time."

"Whom do you mean?" I asked, naturally surprised.

"Rothschild," said Häusler. "He is coming from Vienna to carry off the gold that he has stolen from me, and now he intends to carry me off, too. But I have got him fast this time. Throw on coal. We need steam!"

I opened the door of the fire-box and saw that enough coal had been put on.

"It's not yet time to throw on more, Herr Häusler!" I exclaimed.

In a rage he seized the wrench by means of which one opens the self-closing door of the fire-box, and exclaimed angrily:

"Shovel in the coal, I need more steam. I am going to run straight through Berlin, directly into the sea. There I will drown Rothschild, and then he shall not take my gold again. Will you obey me or not?"

Häusler seized a double-screw wrench which hung within reach, raised it aloft, and looked as if he would strike me down. I threw on coal until Häusler cried:

"Enough, for the time. But look after the fire; I need sixty atmosphere pressure. We are going to run three hours yet, without stopping."

Any man is likely to find it uncomfortable to be alone with a person in whom he suddenly discovers traces of insanity. But the matter becomes somewhat graver and more complicated when one is in the company of a madman upon an express locomotive which is forging ahead with a velocity of fifty-six miles an hour. I will add, here, that I did not tremble for my own life, but I thought with terror of the three hundred passengers behind us, who had no suspicion of the danger which hovered over them. The driver, out of his mind, as it appeared, standing close to the brink of insanity, and determined, under no circumstances, to bring the train to a stop at the terminal station at Berlin, but to forge ahead with it; that is, to cause a catastrophe in which probably half the passengers would meet their death.

Of what use was it for me to try to force Häusler from his position at the decisive hour, and bring the locomotive to a standstill? He would strike me down if I merely reached out a hand. I looked at his eyes, flaming with anger, as he watched me suspiciously. I might gesticulate, and call ever so loudly, to draw the attention of the officials in the station through which we passed. It would be of no avail, for only one man could stop the train, and that was Häusler, the mad driver.

Digitized by Google

At first I was as one paralysed; but then I told myself it was sheer cowardice to give everything up for lost. I would gladly have talked to Häusler, but I knew not what I ought to say. I should only provoke him by opposition, and to begin an indifferent conversation—that was a task to which I did not feel myself equal. Nevertheless, I must do something to divert his attention from me. He continued to regard me with the suspicion that is peculiar to all demented persons, and only ordered me now and then in crisp words to throw fresh coal into the fire-box. The iron wrench he held firmly, and every time he gave me the command to throw on coal, he raised it threateningly. It was necessary for me to calm him and distract his attention because my aim was to get possession of the two screw-bars which lay in the chest behind me. There was no other possibility of saving the train and passengers than to strike Häusler down at the critical moment.

God knows it came hard enough for me to fell to the floor like a wild beast a man whom I honoured and loved. But when it was a question of the rescue of three hundred human beings, there could be no room for hesitation.

Ludingsfelde was passed; we had nearly fifteen miles yet to make, and, before I slew, perhaps, twenty minutes of time.

I shall never forget how frightfully absurd, in spite of the horror of the situation, I seemed to myself when I addressed to Häusler the remark:

"It is cooler than usual this evening."

Häusler cast a look of distrust upon me and was silent.

"Your wife will be waiting for you at the station," I remarked, as calmly as possible.

"That's no matter!" he exclaimed. "I shall run through, I shall run straight through at one stretch into the North Sea. I shall not stop again."

"Won't your wife wonder at it?" I asked, as innocently as I could.

"Of course, she will wonder," said Häusler, laughing. "But when she sees Rothschild in the train she will wonder no longer. She will know then that I am going to drown him. Besides, we shall return at once. She will only be kept waiting half-an-hour."

We flew past Groszbeeren without lessening in the slightest degree the speed of the train. We were nearing Grosslichterfelde, where, owing to our being ahead of time, we might easily find a Berlin local standing on the metals. The train had been announced from the last station, and the signal "open" was up. Enveloped in a thick cloud of dust, which had been whirled up by our wild flight, we rushed through this place also. The engine, as it passed through Herztucke and Weichenkreuze, seemed to make veritable leaps.

Like a vision Lichterfelde, with its houses, flew past, and we sped onward towards the large Berlin station whose hundreds of lights gleamed far ahead of us.

I looked out towards the right, and thought I could not be deceived when I noted in the far distance the red light of the danger signal for our train. We stood on the verge of catastrophe; in a few seconds not only my own fate, but that of the three hundred passengers behind me would be decided.

Plainly I saw the signal "stop" for our train; the station was not free to us.

I could feel that my hair was standing erect on my head with fright and apprehension. I became in a certain sense, insane myself.

With mad swiftness we were nearing the danger signal. I seized Häusler's arm and cried with an awful voice in his ear:

"Red light!" (roth Licht.)

Häusler stared at me, and then cried:

"Rothschild! Where is he?"

"Red light, there ahead!" I shouted again, with all the force of my lungs.

"Rothschild, there ahead!" said Häusler after me.

Then with a piercing yell he suddenly broke away and swung himself out upon the narrow gallery which runs along the locomotive's boiler, and is provided with a railing. He supposed, in his madness, that his enemy, Rothschild, was there in front of us, and wished to get at him. I tore the heavy screw-bar out of the tool chest; then I sprang into the empty place. I dared not shut off the steam at once, lest the train should close up on itself like a hand harmonica, and a fearful disaster be the result. Gradually I pushed in the throttle, and noticed that the train was running slower. I turned on the steam for the air-brakes, and heard directly the grinding and rumbling of the brakes. Then I shut off the steam—the train came to a stop close to the danger signal.

Again I heard the piercing yell from Häusler, who had crouched on the front of the locomotive. I saw him raise himself and leap from the engine; then he sprang up and ran shrieking away between the shining rails.

Not a human being on that train had any intimation of the danger which had threatened us. Out of the station came the Leipzig express headed towards us. With this train, which was closely packed with passengers as is usual at that hour of the evening, we should have come into collision at full speed in the station.

Our train received the signal to go ahead and I steamed slowly into the station. We arrived ten minutes ahead of time. The inspector hurried up at once with the guard and demanded an explanation; they were amazed to find me alone, and I was so overcome by all that I had gone through in those last few moments that I could with difficulty give them the desired information. Frau Häusler was naturally surprised when she did not see her husband, and I could not keep back the sad news that he had gone insane.

I was myself so broken down mentally that I remained off duty for several days by direction of the Company's physician.

When I reported for duty once more, I learnt that Häusler, who was stark mad, had been captured in the station that same night, and the following morning had been taken to a lunatic asylum. The cause of this outbreak of insanity in him was the loss of his entire savings. He had intrusted them to a small banker, and the latter had absconded with all his deposits.

Oscar Klauzman.

OWING to the Christmas Holidays, this number of Short Stories goes to press before the result of Jumble Story No. 23 is known. The names of the winners will appear next week.

Digitized by Google

An Ingenious Swindle.

THE diamond merchant from Kimberley—his name was Colomb—was tossing the third officer for drinks in the smoking-room of the Hun, which vessel, her bow pointed for Madeira, seemed inclined to make a record run. The latter lost. "Just my luck," he exclaimed, as he signed the wine card. Graham, the lawyer, always loquacious, promptly took him up. "Luck," he said scornfully, "luck, there is no such thing. It is an effete superstition, and should go the way of witches, spirits, evil eyes and kindred nonsense which civilised people no longer believe in."

Colomb, sipping his whisky, looked at him over the rim of the glass. "I don't agree with you," he said slowly as he set it down. "I believe in luck; it's a possession some people have and some haven't. My luck has been good through life, without it I should never have pulled through some tough places I've been in. I've only made one big mistake," he continued after a pause, his face lighting up as some reminiscence came into his mind, and that by a most wonderful piece of luck—for one can call it nothing else—was, as it turned out, the most fortunate thing I could have done."

"Let's hear the story," said someone.

"Well, I don't mind trying. I'm not a professional story-teller you know, gentlemen. I don't think I've ever told one in the smoking-room yet. It's a little adventure I had last year, and it occurred on board a Union boat."

The third officer said he was very sorry he couldn't stop to hear the story, but his watch began at twelve and he wanted a couple of hours' sleep, so he finished his whisky and left. The rest of us made ourselves as comfortable as possible, and prepared to listen with some curiosity, for Colomb did not often expand like this. He was a man of middle age, though his hair and moustache were yet jet black. From a boy he had been in the diamond trade, and was accounted one of the best judges of stones living, and wonderfully successful in all his dealings.

He now leaned back in his seat, put his hands in his trousers pockets and, apparently addressing the wall opposite him, began:

"I was in Johannesburg when last autumn I received a hint that a certain merchant in Durban was rather hard up and would most likely sell a fine parcel of diamonds he possessed and which he had bought with the intention of keeping. I had never been in Durban before, for, as you all know, there's no diamond trading there, but from what I heard I judged it would be worth a visit, so off I went next day. The railway was not open then beyond Charlestown, so I had to endure the coach, which brought back to my mind reminiscences of when Kimberley was without a railway. I reached Durban and saw my man, and after a long palaver we did a deal. I took his diamonds and paid him £6,000 for them. They were a very fine parcel, De Beers stones, and I got them pretty cheap. Then I went straight to the Universal, which is my bank, though never having been at Durham I had never done business with that branch before. I give them to the manager myself to keep till I went away, and saw them locked up in the strong room.

"'When will you call for them?' said he as we went back to his private room.

"'Why,' said I, 'I sail for Cape Town in the Grecian. She will leave, I believe, on Thursday morning. The Gallio is in too, rather queer two of the G's being together, isn't it?'

"'Yes,' he replied; 'I believe the Gallio sails to-morrow morning at day-break. You call for the diamonds yourself, of course?'

"I said 'yes,' and went off to book my passage in the Grecian. I had one old Kimberley friend settled in Durban with whom I was going to spend the evening, but he was unable to put me up, so to avoid trouble I made arrangements to go straight on board the Grecian, and took my portmanteau down to the harbour. She had arrived from Delagoa Bay, and was, of course, almost empty. I chose a deck cabin on the port side, unpacked my bag, and made things comfortable, then, telling my cabin steward I should not be back till late, went on shore again. The Gallio lay berthed next us, for she was sailing for Delagoa Bay next morning. I knew her captain slightly, and thought of calling, but my cab was waiting, so I didn't, but drove back to the town. It was rather early to go to my friend's and I stood at the corner of West Street, hesitating what to do, when I recognised that old rascal Speckels coming along the pavement arm in arm with another man. Speckles was a Kimberley man with a shady reputation. He had already undergone one imprisonment for T.D.B., and was strongly suspected of still following that dangerous but highly remunerative calling.

"'Hullo,' said I, and he stopped.

"'Ach, Meester Colomb. I hope I see you well.'

"'Why, what brings you here?' I inquired.

"'I am taking one holiday from beesness.'

"'And who's your friend?' I went on, looking at the other man, and noting that he wore dark spectacles and had a black beard. I had really no curiosity about either of the men, and merely spoke because I had nothing to do. The man in dark spectacles bowed to me but said nothing. Speckels said:

"'Mine friend, he is just from Hamburg last week, and knows no Eenglish.'

"'Good heavens,' said I, 'a German and knows no English! Your friend is a remarkable man.' I would have gone on chaffing the two men, but they took off their hats again and moved on. Presently I took a rickshaw to my friend's house, and in the course of the evening mentioned having seen Speckels.

"'That fellow is a rascal,' said he, for he knew him in his Kimberley days, 'but very cute. Too clever for the police to catch. He's up to no good here. What was his companion like?'

"'A dark man,' I said, 'of about my own height, but he wore blue spectacles, so I couldn't make much of him?'

"We played cards after dinner and I stopped late. It was after midnight when I reached the wharf again. I was most desperately sleepy, having passed the previous night in the train. I fell asleep in my rickshaw going down and was only half awake when I scrambled on board. However, I knew where my cabin was and entered. Lights were out in the cabins, the ship being in port. I pulled off my coat, collar and shoes, and felt for my pyjamas which I had laid out on the upper bunk. They were not there, the steward must have moved them. I felt on the lower bunk with the same result. I was too sleepy to light the candle or even to strike a match, but scrambled into the upper berth, pulled the sheet round me, and went sound off to sleep.

Digitized by Google

"I am a heavy sleeper, and it was bright daylight when I awoke. I lay a few seconds in the drowsy half unconscious state in which we always feel when waking from a sound slumber. Then the noise of engines sounded in my ears and I noticed that the cabin oscillated.

"I sat up, yes, the ship was undoubtedly moving. What did it mean? I sprang out of my bunk and ran outside. We were at sea, swiftly moving along, and no land in sight! Dazed and speechless I stared round me when a steward suddenly appeared going along the deck.

"'Where am I?' I said helplessly to him. He stared, as well he might.

"'Who are you, sir? I never saw you before.'

"'Isn't this the Grecian?'

"'Lord no, sir. This is the Gallio, bound for Delagoa Bay.'

"I laid hold of the railing and cursed myself till I felt better. I was on the wrong ship. I had climbed the wrong companion ladder, entered the cabin corresponding to my own and gone to sleep in it. All my luggage was on board the Grecian, which would have sailed before I could get back to Durban. Fortunately the diamonds were safe in the Durban bank. The first breakfast gong sounded as I stood on the deck turning the matter over in my mind. In a very bad temper I went back to the cabin and dressed. Coming out again the humour of the thing struck me, and I could not help smiling, when a voice sounded in the cabin I was just passing. It was Speckels. Glad of someone to speak to, and curious to learn what he was doing on this ship, I pulled the curtain in front of the cabin door away with a jerk and looked in. Speckels and his friend of the previous day were just dressed, and looked up at the sound of the curtain rings running back. I was still smiling as I looked at them, but my smile faded at their extraordinary behaviour at sight of me. Speckels shrieked: 'Mein Gott,' and fell back against the bunks with a shock which made the woodwork creak. His face turned livid, and he shook as though he had the palsy, while his eyes seemed starting out of his head. The other man turned white, uttered a bitter execration, and saying in good English: 'The game's up,' sat down.

"Now I was utterly astonished at the fright my presence caused them, but I saw it would not do to appear ignorant.

"'The game is up,' I said gravely, wondering to myself what the game was. 'You didn't expect to see me here?' I went on. This was a safe thing to say, for their utter surprise at sight of me would have been visible to a blind man.

"'Ach! dear Meester Colomb,' said Speckels, going down on his knees before me. 'You veel not too hard on me? I have one wife and four leetle children. You will take them back and say nothing and I will make it worth your while. You are one gentleman and will be merciful?'

"'Take them back,' I said sternly—take what back I wondered—'you don't know what you are asking.'

"At this point the other man rose to his feet. His whole appearance and especially his eyes seemed familiar to me, but I could not remember where I had seen him. 'The game's up, Speckels,' he repeated, 'what's the good of whining? Give up the diamonds.'

"'Yes,' said I, 'give up the diamonds at once.'

"It may have been very stupid of me, but even now I did not guess the truth, and when Speckels produced a familiar looking case, it was all I could do to prevent crying out. For they were my diamonds, the diamonds I had bought the previous day and handed over to the bank manager. What did it mean? Had they burgled the strong room or was the manager in the plot? Both superstitions were equally impossible. My fingers promptly closed on the diamonds and I quickly ran my eye over them to see that none were missing. They were all there, and I pocketed the parcel and made for the door. 'You two men,' I said, 'had better stop here for the present,' and I left the unlucky thieves sunk in despair.

"Still utterly at sea—in a double sense—as to what had happened and how they had gained possession of the diamonds, I re-entered my own cabin. Then as I stood mechanically looking at myself in the glass over the washstand the explanation flashed upon me. The face and appearance of Speckel's accomplice had been vaguely familiar to me. Those eyes which I had seen somewhere before were now looking at me from the looking-glass. There were my own eyes. That was the explanation, the man's beard was as false as himself and without it he bore a wonderful likeness to me. He had impersonated me in the most barefaced way, and walked off with the diamonds, but my unexpected appearance that morning had convinced them that I had discovered the plot and followed to regain possession of my property. Hence their horror and despair at sight of me.

"Well, I've nearly finished. I had the two swindlers arrested, and my double confessed. He had bought a ready-made flannel suit like mine, made up like me—he had been an actor once—and gone to the bank just on closing time. He said he was going to sleep on board and would take the diamonds then and give them in charge of the purser. The manager had only seen me once, he suspected nothing, and handed them over. It was the boldest swindle I've ever heard of, and but for my mistaking the ships would have been successful."

"Yes," said someone, "but wouldn't the bank have been responsible?"

"They would, but I should have had a lot of trouble to get the money. They would have said I ought to keep my double under lock and key. It would have meant a quarrel with some of the directors who were friends—and useful friends—of mine. And that's not all. The diamonds were of a peculiar shape, and I had a special order for such. As a matter of fact I sold them in a fortnight at a large profit. It was this knowledge that took me down to Durban."

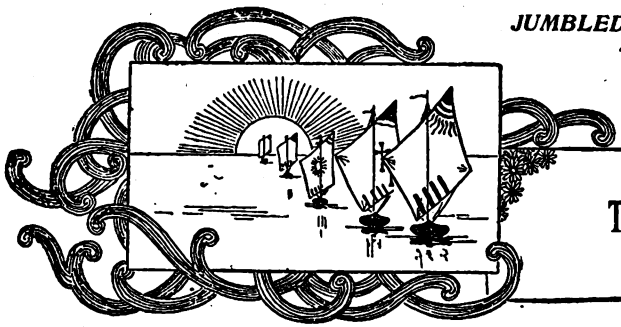
"But," said another listener, "did you find out how the two men knew you were buying these diamonds?"

"No, I didn't, but I fancy they had been watching me for a long time and got wind somehow of what I was after. Well, the two men are safely looked after now, and my double won't impersonate me again in a hurry. Yes, gentlemen, I believe in luck. And now, who's for a rubber?"

CHARLES D. LESLIE.

Digitized by Google

JUMBLED STORY No. 26.]
See Page 7.



THE FORCES ON AYOEII.

The maid knocked at the door.
The girl did not answer.
Alone in her room, she waited feverishly and went suddenly to the door.
Then she threw herself on the cushions again, turned up the lights, and crossing to the writing stage."
He turned on her fiercely.
Cicely put out a soft hand, and stroked her pile of soft cushions.
"I have told you why I do it. It is impossible for jokes in the future. I am going to enter St. Anne's convent. I wrote to Sister Catherine, my aunt, as fair as an angel, as tender as a dove, but as nearly as bad as the tragic love scenes on the hideous devilry beneath it all."
With a gesture of impatience, he turned round, Good Heavens, Cicely, why do you do it? At least remember that you have left me in—the other place."
"Don't scream so, Will," the girl interrupted. she came again to her lonely home. She stood for me to marry, so I may as well treat the matter a moment in the hall, and it seemed that the into a troubled sleep.
"There you go again, making a joke of it all.
"Poor old Will," she said gently.
"Don't. You'll drive me mad. Cicely you are stubborn as a——"
"I cannot. Believe me, I cannot."
Banish the thought, weak woman!
"You can. You know you can. But you won't."
"You are making me dreadfully tired. It is convent? Heaven?"
"You will not, then, Cicely? Remember it is lightly as seriously. I won't be able to make many for the last time, and you say you will not?"
"Then why do you do it, Cicely? Can't you see I have a right to know that."
Man-like, he did not notice the break in the girl's lover's.
He jerked his hand roughly away.
"What are you going to gain by entering this house.
"Well, go to Heaven," he cried, almost shaking up.
He strode up and down the room, kicking his fist at her. "Go. And may it cheer you to prepare your reward."
The door slammed behind him. His steps could throughout the long watches of the night until the breeze played on her heated face, and refreshed her shadow of a man awaited her, with arms outstretched. She is expecting me shortly."
Presently, when her sobs had calmed a little, she held tightly round her neck.
She sat quite still for a moment. The lights in early post should come. Towards morning she fell savagely at the furniture.
Cicely sprang up, her heart throbbing.
She went out herself to post this letter. A cool freak? I don't understand it. There is some slight frame, until it seemed that her delicate body turned them down.
In answer, Cicely wrote this:
"My letters, quick, girl."
The man telegraphed in reply: "Whatever you come at once and comfort you and we shall be very happy. I was a brute to treat you as I did."
A man, flustered, angry, tearing a bunch of violets to pieces, standing before her.
The violets went into the fire, and were burnt He did not see them.
She tore one open eagerly. It was very short, and wept tears of bitter sorrow. Sobs racked her hall door closed, and the girl was alone in the voice. Her great, pleading eyes were fixed on his. Little children ran forward, and clasped her knees, the room seemed to blind her. She rose, and and ran: "Write and tell me everything, I will be heard running down the stairs. Then the that you are ruining both our lives by this girlish do is right. My brave heroine, may the angels and told her that I had finally determined to come. a little. A curious thought occurred to her when with faces upturned to be kissed. Tiny soft arms could not withstand the strain.
So Cicely entered St. Anne's convent.
A pale-faced, slender girl, lying wearily back on a table, wrote this letter:
I had intended that you should leave me for ever as you under restraint. "A little queer in her head," they said. There is some hideous devilry beneath it all, as you say. I have fought against the horrible craving that assails me. Then you came, and I felt that with you I should conquer. Catherine, as you know, entered St. Anne's convent. If you think it would be better, I will lay bare my soul should descend to innocent lives? Now you know everything. That was not the reason. She was an inebriate, and died more worthy to love. And that is why I tried to send you this life, and entering St. Anne's convent for your sake. When I was born the curse descended on me. All my life might have forgotten me, and perhaps found someone else think ill of me, Will, for I love you from the bottom of my soul. Think of me rather as a martyr, who is going out of drinking. My mother had a loathing for intoxicants. The grandmother, as you know, spent the latter part of her life Do you blame me?
First I must tell you a little family history. My mere sight of wine on the table made her faint. Her sister, Then another thought came to me. What if my curse have done, with bitter thoughts in your heart, and then you away so lightly. But I cannot bear that you should always to you, and tell you why I am doing this thing.

CICELY.

Digitized by Google

THE QUEEN AGAINST OWEN

BY
Allen Upward
Author of "Secrets of the Courts of Europe," "The Prince of Balkistan," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

ELEANOR MARGARET OWEN is charged with the murder of her benefactress, Ann Lewis. Charles Prescott, who has known Eleanor since a child, holds the brief for the prosecution. His friend, George Tressamer, is in love with Eleanor, and holds the brief for her defence. The prosecution is vigorously pressed by Mr. Lewis, deceased's nephew.

CHAPTER IV.

THE ASSIZES.

ON a certain day in the month of July our lady the Queen, probably clad in ermine, and wearing on her head that gorgeous specimen of the jeweller's art which, when not in use, may be viewed at the Tower of London for the absurdly moderate sum of sixpence—our lady the Queen, I say, was reminded by her faithful Chancellor that various prisoners were awaiting trial in different parts of England and Wales, and among other places in Mynyddshire.

Whereupon her Majesty, with that constant attention to the welfare of her people which befits a sovereign, at once sat down and wrote, or possibly only signed, a stately document, requiring and empowering Sir Daniel Buller, Knight, one of the judges of her High Court; Sir John Wiseman, Knight, another of the aforesaid judges; Walter Reynold Davies, Esquire, one of her counsel learned in the law; Joseph Robert Pollington, Esquire, another of her counsel learned in the law; and Henry Jones, Esquire, yet a further specimen of her counsel learned in the law, to proceed to Mynyddshire, and there and then open the gaols and try such prisoners as were inside them.

In a similar and not less elaborate document she thoughtfully went on to provide for their hearing, and deciding at the same time any disputes over civil matters which might possibly have arisen among the population of that remote locality since it was last honoured by the presence of such bright visitants. This considerate act on her Majesty's part was, of course, intended to save her emissaries a second journey. Even a monarch in the administration of justice need not be above killing two birds with one stone.

In proceeding to Mynyddshire, however, a very invidious distinction was drawn between the gentlemen mentioned in the Royal Commission. The two first named because they were knights and judges, went down in state, were met at the station by the high sheriff of the county, and escorted by twenty javelin-men in gay attire to the comfortable lodgings prepared for them. The other three, for no other earthly reason than because their position was less exalted, had to get down as best they might, scramble into cabs with their portmanteaux, and put up at a common hotel. How true is the venerable saying: "To him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath!"

Having thus got an unfair start, the two judges preserved it to the end. They tried all the cases themselves, and their unfortunate colleagues had to be content with what crumbs they could pick up by appearing in court as common advocates.

The Southern Circuit has long been popular with judges. There is a great difference in circuits. The two Northern ones, with their vast populations and immense amount of work, are the bugbear of the puisne judge. The scenery of some of the other circuits is flat, and there is not much amusement going on in the assize towns. But the Southern combines several advantages. It is far from heavy as regards work, the country in many parts is beautiful, and the train service between the county towns is fairly good.

For these reasons the old stagers on the Bench are in the habit of trying to get the Southern Circuit. On the present occasion they had been successful. Sir Daniel Buller and Sir John Wiseman may not have been extremely popular with the Bar, but they were very popular with each other. They came down to Abertaff feeling in good form, Sir John to preside over the civil court, and Sir Daniel to mete out justice to the inmates of the county gaol.

Digitized by Google

Not for many years had there been such excitement at assize time in the city. This excitement was due to two causes—the javelin-men and the society murder.

Javelin-men are dying out. In former times, when the office of sheriff was a mark of high social dignity, and before the new-fangled post of lord-lieutenant had usurped so much of its splendour, the shrievalty was an epoch in a county gentleman's career. It was considered almost worth being ruined for. A heavy mortgage was not grudged as a consequence of the lavish splendour with which the office was surrounded. In those days javelin-men were a reality. Clad in semi-military uniforms modelled on the master's family livery, and armed with weapons of an extinct fashion, they simulated the state of vice-royalty. Many a German princelet has enjoyed a less imposing body-guard than an English sheriff of the olden time.

But the railways have killed all that. Everyone now seeks distinction in the Metropolis. County society has become a by-word for the old-fashioned and humdrum, for bad living, bad manners, and bad taste. No one would dream of embarrassing his estate to secure a merely local renown. Hence the decay of the shrievalty. The modern high sheriff looks upon his obligatory office as a duty rather than an honour. He contents himself with the cheap services of the county police force for his retinue, and foregoes the expensive luxury of the javelin-men.

Met at the station by the high sheriff.

There are a few brilliant exceptions, however. The present sheriff of Mynyddshire was one. In the first place, he was master of what in the country is regarded as a colossal fortune. In the second place, he was the founder of his family. Money, therefore, was not an object to Mr. Simon Reynolds. Glory was. His office gave him just the chance he wanted, and he revived his mediæval honours with a willing hand.

Two-and-twenty men, counting the buglers, in gorgeous clothing of pink and yellow hue, accordingly gladdened the eyes of the Abertaffians as they paraded the streets and hung about the court-house. Each man of the rank and file carried a weapon the like of which has not often been looked upon. It resembled an axe with an exaggerated handle, only the back of the blade was prolonged into a formidable spike, while the handle extended beyond into a species of spear-point. Armed with these truly terrific weapons, Mr. Reynolds's faithful henchmen might well strike awe into the heart of the boldest boy in Abertaff. It was felt that they were the principal feature of the assize. The judges, by common consent, took a secondary place. Their robes were fine, no doubt, but their rather ill-fitting wigs formed a poor substitute for the gleaming steel of their rivals. The sober charms of justice cannot successfully compete with the dazzling splendour of arms.

As for the high sheriff himself, in his black velvet coat and frilled shirt-front, he was a very inferior attraction, while his chaplain was simply nowhere. He had his innings for one brief hour in the cathedral, where the judges were compelled to sit as meekly as so many jurymen under a lengthy summing-up; but after that one bright flash he sank into insignificance, and dragged out the remainder of the assize like the stick of a burnt-out rocket, unnoticed and unpitied by all.

Yet even the javelin-men were cast into the shade by the other great feature of the assize week. The crime of murder remains, after all is said and done, the one thing which most fascinates the public mind. And when to murder is added mystery, and when that mystery centres round the figure of a woman, and when that woman is young and beautiful, and in a social position which does away with the presence of squalid details or coarse motives, the public may be pardoned if they take the very fullest interest in her fate.

Indeed, the case of "The Queen against Owen," to give it its legal designation, was of more than local interest. The whole kingdom was excited about the position of the unhappy girl who lay in one of the cells of Abertaff Gaol. Every eye was watching eagerly for the unfolding of the tragic drama in which she was about to play the leading part.

All the great London dailies had their representatives down at the assize town to gather every detail of the forthcoming trial. Already the names of the counsel on both sides were being wired from one end of the country to the other, while in Mynyddshire and in the county town itself the excitement was so great that not the smallest attention was bestowed on any other case that was to come before the courts.

Even the judges themselves were infected with the excitement all around them. Mr. Justice Buller had read the depositions taken before the magistrates prior to leaving town. He had discussed little else with his brother Wiseman in the train. In all their experience, they agreed, they had never met with a case so clear upon the evidence, and yet so unsatisfactory to the mind.

In the presence of the sheriff, of course, the subject was dropped. Nor could it be resumed after dinner. Later on the judge of the criminal court sat down to make notes for his charge to the grand jury on the morrow. In this he dealt with several other serious cases that appeared in the calendar; but his gravest attention was devoted to the one that dwarfed all the others. This disposed of, he soon retired to rest.

Digitized by Google

The formal business of opening the assizes had been gone through on the afternoon the judges arrived. Sir Daniel Buller had been trumpeted off to the Court-house, and had sat with as much patience as he could command—and that was not a great deal—while a rather short-sighted and very fidgety clerk of arraigns, afflicted, moreover, with a severe cough, stumbled his way through the important documents already described. This proceeding was necessary in order to inform the loyal inhabitants of Mynyddshire, chiefly represented by errand-boys and loafers from the neighbouring taps, who their red-robed visitors really were, and what they had come to do.

The wholesale piano warehouseman.

On the following morning, therefore, the judges were free to proceed to work. They drove down to the court at half-past ten, accompanied by the swelling Reynolds and the visibly crestfallen chaplain, and escorted by the inevitable javelin-men, who swarmed about the place all day under the pretext of keeping order.

Sir John Wiseman went quietly off to his own court, and began at once at the unexciting work of trying whether the drippings from a wholesale piano warehouseman's spout had or had not damaged the hats in a neighbouring hat store, and, if so, whether the wholesale piano warehouseman was to blame, and if to blame, how much he ought to pay to the aggrieved hatter. Two of the gentlemen so unfairly deprived of seats upon the bench were engaged in this important case, and it occupied more than half the day.

But it had a rather poor audience. The crowd had rushed into the other court, where the gentlemen of the grand jury were answering to their names as often as the infirmities of the Clerk of Arraigns would allow them to discover whom he was calling. As soon as the necessary twenty-four were sworn, Mr. Justice Buller began his charge.

After a few civil remarks on the state of the county as regarded crime generally, and brief references to some of the other cases, he came to the all-absorbing topic. And now the reporters, who had sat listlessly under the infliction of previous remarks, woke to sudden life, and every word of his Lordship was caught and taken down as eagerly as if it had dropped from the lips of Shakespeare.

And this is what he said:

"And now I come to what is by far the gravest case in the calendar—one of the gravest cases that has ever come before me in my judicial experience. The prisoner, Eleanor Owen, is accused of the most serious crime, short of treason, known to our law. Gentlemen, it is not for you to try whether she is guilty. You have to hear the witnesses who will be sent in before you on behalf of the Crown, and if you are satisfied that they are speaking the truth, and the effect of their evidence on your minds is such as, if uncontradicted, to raise a fair presumption of the prisoner's guilt, then it is your duty to find a true bill against her. From the depositions taken by the magistrates, which have been put before me, I do not anticipate that you will have much hesitation in coming to your decision. The case is entirely one of what is called circumstantial evidence, as such cases most generally are, and must be from the nature of things. Doubtless there are difficulties in the case—many and grave difficulties—with which it will be the duty of this tribunal to deal when the prisoner comes, if she does come, before us.

"The fact that the prisoner is charged with the deliberate murder of her friend—I may almost say her benefactress—with whom she had been living on terms of intimacy for a considerable time, and for no motive that has yet been suggested except a low and mercenary one, is calculated to arouse a natural repulsion in the mind, and to indispose it to believe that the charge is well-founded. But, gentlemen, these things, as they come before you, are matters of evidence. If the witnesses you are about to hear satisfy you that there is a primâ facie case made out against Eleanor Owen, that there are grounds for suspicion which she ought fairly to be called upon to answer and explain away if she can, then it is your duty not to hesitate, but to bring in a true bill for murder. And I must tell you, gentlemen, that so far as my reading of the depositions has guided me, this is not a case in which the crime admits of being reduced to any lesser charge. There are none of the elements present which may, and often do, justify a jury in reducing the charge of murder to that of manslaughter. There is no question, so far as I have been able to discover, of sudden provocation, of accident, or anything of that sort. Whoever committed this crime must, if you believe the evidence, have done so knowingly, designedly, and with premeditation, and therefore your finding, if you find against the prisoner, must be one of wilful murder. Gentlemen, I leave you to your deliberations."

With these words his Lordship dismissed the grand jury; and the barristers, in their wigs and gowns, some of them with briefs and a good many with none, came streaming into the well of the court, filling up the seats specially reserved for them, and overflowing into those occupied by their colleagues of the "lower branch." It seems rather hard on the Bar that some mysterious rule of etiquette, which they themselves probably do not understand, should forbid them to enter the assize court till this particular stage in the proceedings. Or can it be that this rule had its origin in the wisdom of their remote predecessors, devising artful means to escape the infliction of a tedious charge without appearing disrespectful to the Bench?

A lull followed. The judge, accustomed to have the eyes of men upon him, calmly betook himself to letter-writing. The high-sheriff, not so accustomed, fidgeted in his seat, looked round and counted the javelin-men in court, wondered how long the grand jury would be, and remembered, let us hope with remorse, the time when he was a grand juryman himself and wasted the time of the county by unnecessary questions to the witnesses. The fact is that the grand jury is played out. Everything for which they originally existed is now done by somebody else. Every case that comes before them now has already been investigated once by the committing magistrates. Their duty is simply to accuse the prisoner, nothing more; and it would be quite sufficient if they would just read the depositions and sign the indictment. But man, brief man, placed on a grand jury, and shut into a room without the interference of a legal authority, delights to show himself off by vain and superfluous inquiry. And hence it was that more than half-an-hour elapsed before the foreman was seen returning into the court with a trumpery indictment for larceny.

The interval had been usefully employed by the Clerk of Arraigns in compiling a petty jury, something in this fashion:

The Clerk of Arraigns (taking up a ticket, rather larger than a visiting-card, from a heap before him): "John Henry Mullerall." (To his clerk, a humble person in plebeian attire, who is popularly believed to know a great deal more about the procedure than the judge and the whole court put together): "Did he answer?" (The clerk hasn't heard him.) "John—Henry" (very loudly) "Mull—oh, I see, it's Muggle"—at the top of his voice: "Mugglewrath!" (testily) "Are you there?"

Digitized by Google

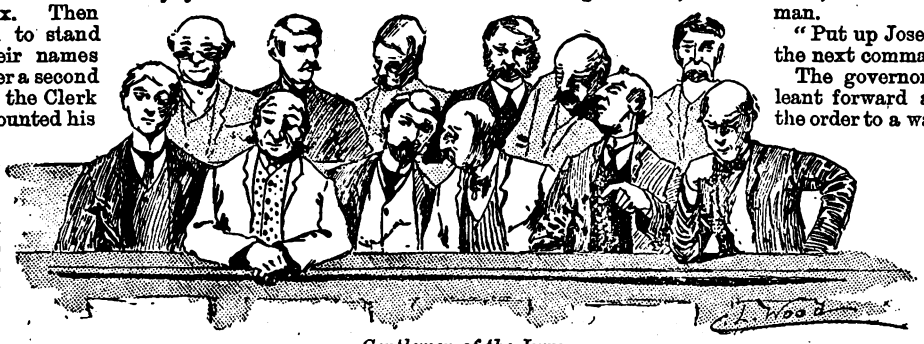
John Henry Mugglewrath (from a seat close by): "Here!"

The Clerk of Arraigns: "Oh! there you are. Why don't you gentlemen answer when you hear your names? Go into the box, please."

After about ten minutes of this sort of thing, twelve respectable inhabitants of Mynyddshire were collected in the jury-box. Then they all had to stand up while their names were read over a second time. Then the Clerk of Arraigns counted his tickets to make sure he had used up twelve, while his clerk counted the jurymen to see that they came to the same number. Then all was ready.



Gentlemen of the Jury.

Meanwhile, those gentlemen at the counsel's table who rejoiced in the possession of briefs made a great show of reading them, and making copious notes and interlineations with pencils of different colours—red, blue, and black. The public were greatly impressed as they watched these young giants of intellect at their work. There they were, mastering the most knotty points with ease, and constructing ingenious arguments, doubtless, as they went along. One gentleman excited the greatest interest, and quite threw his brethren into the shade, by pushing aside his brief and drawing towards him one of the loose sheets of foolscap which the kind forethought of the authorities had provided, and beginning to write on it in an abstracted manner. The onlookers deemed him to be wrestling with an opinion on some weighty question bristling with legal difficulties. They little guessed that he was addressing congratulations to a maiden aunt on the occasion of her approaching birthday.

But what really occupied the minds of the spectators, and kept their lips moving in subdued conversation, was the ending of the judge's charge.

"He has made up his mind that she is guilty," whispered Mr. Jenkins, the stationer from Queen Street, who had come to the court in the capacity of a common juryman, but had not been among the names first selected.

"And I don't wonder at it," replied his neighbour, a farmer from near Porthstone, who had been summoned in the same way. "A bad lot, I'll be bound. Wouldn't say nothing when her was before the magistrates. That looks bad, don't it?"

"Silence!" bawled a javelin-man just behind them, a rebuke which the worthy farmer at first thought was meant for himself. But the word was repeated instantly by other javelin-men, and then he perceived that the grand jury had at last achieved a stroke of work, and that the satellites of justice were merely drawing attention to that fact in their usual impressive manner.

The Clerk of Arraigns now received the document, and proceeded to expound its contents in this manner:

"Gentlemen of the grand jury, you find a——" here he stopped and turned it over to read what was on the back, a task which occupied several seconds; but he completed the sentence as if no break had occurred—"true bill against——" another pause—he was looking for the name concealed amid the mazes of technical phraseology. This time the foreman rashly attempted to help him out by murmuring, "Joseph Hall." The Clerk of Arraigns turned round and glared at him, then resumed his investigation, and finally brought out the name in a tone of triumph as of one who gloried in overcoming obstacles and was not to be baffled by any indictment in the power of man to draw: "Joseph Hall, for stealing a coat of the value of thirty shillings; also for receiving the same, knowing it to be stolen."

He then turned again and bestowed an impatient nod on the waiting foreman, who withdrew, a crushed and miserable man.

"Put up Joseph Hall," was the next command.

The governor of the gaol leant forward and repeated the order to a warder who had already heard it perfectly and dived below, apparently through the solid floor of the court. The next moment Mr. Hall appeared, with easy nonchalance, and leant forward in a graceful attitude on the bar of the dock, while the Clerk of Arraigns proceeded to acquaint him with the crime of which he was accused.

Exhibiting no surprise at this piece of information, which, considering he had been lying under the accusation for two months, was, perhaps, hardly to be wondered at, Mr. Hall in emphatic tones pronounced himself innocent.

"What?" said the Clerk of Arraigns, stretching anxiously forward.

Mr. Hall repeated his sentiments.

"What does he say?" exclaimed the Clerk of Arraigns, appealing to the court generally for assistance.

The response was a loud but confused roar of voices from the junior Bar, out of which the only clear sound that penetrated to the unfortunate man's brain was the word "guilty."

"He says he's guilty!" he remarked to his clerk, in what he intended for an aside, but which was perfectly audible over the whole building.

At this point the judge, becoming impatient, leant over and tapped the Clerk of Arraigns on the shoulder. He turned round.

"He pleads guilty, my Lord," he said, thinking that the judge wished for information.

"No he doesn't, Mr. Hughes. He said 'not guilty,'" answered the judge.

Mr. Hughes was nearly beside himself by this time. Leaning forward in the direction of the prisoner, he shouted fiercely:

"What do you say? Are you guilty or not?"

"No," came in tones loud enough for him to hear at last.

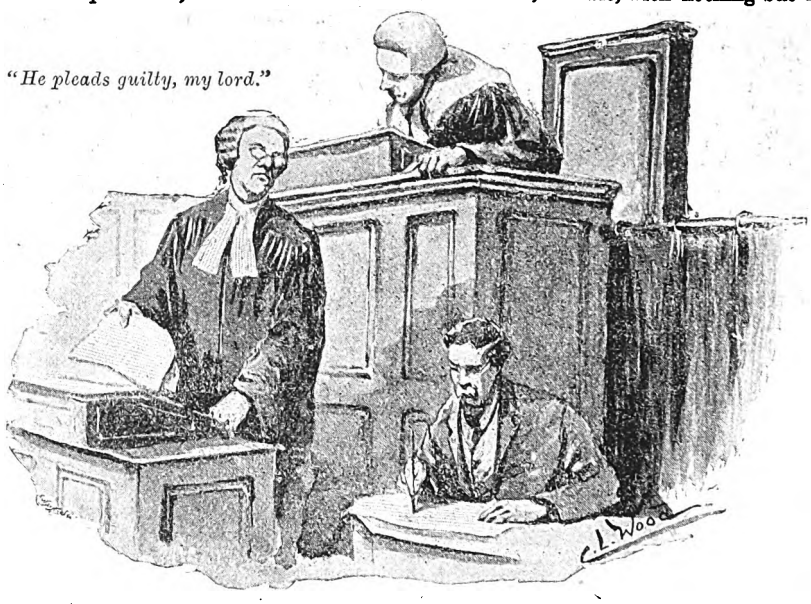
"Then why can't you speak distinctly? The names you are about to hear called are those of the jurors who are to try you, if you have any objection to them or any of them you shall make it as they come to the book to be sworn, or before they are sworn, and you shall be heard. John Henry Mugglewrath, stand up."

And, leaving this overwhelming communication to gradually make itself clear to the prisoner's mind, the Clerk of Arraigns went on swearing in the jury as hard as he could go, with the assistance of the judge's clerk (who recited the oath) and his own clerk (who handed the testament, as it is called, though really containing only the works of the four Evangelists). It need scarcely be observed that the jurors never came to the book at all. The book came to them.

Digitized by Google

A rather flighty young counsel, who seemed to consider the whole thing somewhat in the light of a joke, or a species of amateur theatricals on a large scale, having presented the case for the prosecution, Mr. Hall was called upon for his defence.

It then came out that the poor man, than whom no more honest creature ever walked the earth, had been made the victim of a truly diabolical hoax. He was sitting reading the newspaper in a public-house, the "Three Hens"—he had not even been drinking, mind, simply reading the newspaper—when a perfect stranger, whom he had never seen before or since, but whom he should know anywhere, came in, with an overcoat (the one produced in court) over his arm.



"He pleads guilty, my lord."

The stranger, with a craft for which an innocent being like Mr. Hall was no match, began by offering refreshments. These consumed, he asked Mr. Hall to do him the favour of pawning his overcoat for him. Mr. Hall then very naturally put the question: Why didn't he pawn it himself?

The stranger replied that he was unfamiliar with pawnshops, that he doubted his ability to make a good bargain, and that he was willing to pay his new acquaintance a commission on the proceeds. This last offer Mr. Hall had magnanimously refused, but out of mere good nature he went forth to do the stranger's bidding. The pawnbroker, however, with a distrust in human nature which stamped him as having an evil mind, called in a passing policeman, and gave this victim of his own kindly disposition into custody.

The sequel was inevitable. The constable was led by the unsuspicious Hall to the bar of the "Three Hens," but the mysterious stranger had gone and left no trace. Poor, humble, with nothing but his good character to rely on, Mr. Hall now cast himself with confidence on the discernment of the gentlemen before him.

The gentlemen had made up their minds already. But they could not give their verdict till the judge had had his turn. Mr. Justice Buller set to and occupied exactly fourteen minutes in telling the jury that there was not much evidence of stealing, but there was strong evidence of the receiving. The jury then occupied exactly fourteen seconds in deciding that the prisoner was guilty of stealing.

It then transpired that this was not the first time Mr. Hall had been the victim of appearances. His trusting nature had led him on six previous occasions to incur the censure of the law. He was, therefore, now bidden to take up his abode where no such temptations could assail him for the next five years.

By this time several other bills had come in from the grand jury, and it had become apparent that the all-absorbing murder would not be tried that day. The audience gradually drifted off, and the remainder of the day's performance took place before a half-empty house.

(To be continued.)

£400. * IN CASH PRIZES. * £400.

AT the bottom left-hand corner of the second page of Short Stories cover will be found two coupons. These coupons will appear every week during the whole of 1897. They will also appear in Pearson's Weekly and Home Notes.

WHAT TO DO.

Procure as many of these coupons as you possibly can. Once you get them keep them safely. Either paste them on to slips of paper, or into an exercise-book.

WHY YOU SHOULD DO IT.

Because we are going to give £100 to the reader who collects the greatest number of these coupons from Short Stories and Pearson's Weekly;

ANOTHER £100

To the reader who collects from HOME NOTES;

ANOTHER £100

To the NEWSAGENT who collects from SHORT STORIES and PEARSON'S WEEKLY;

ANOTHER £100

To the NEWSAGENT who collects from HOME NOTES.

Readers must not collect newsagents' coupons, and they should lump Short Stories and P.W. coupons together. Home Notes Coupons are to be collected separately.

£400 In Cash Prizes £400.

If you go the right way to work about it, it will not be difficult to induce people to read such interesting papers as Short Stories, Pearson's Weekly, and Home Notes undoubtedly are, and they will give you their coupon.

One Hundred Pounds is a big sum to earn for, say, an hour's work a week, fifty-two hours in the year, six working days at eight and a half hours a day.

£100 for a Week's Work.

No coupons are to be sent to us until January 1st, 1898.

Digitized by Google

AN ANIMAL ELIXIR.

The Extraordinary Story of How an Old Man Became Young.

ONE August afternoon, in the year 1870, I met at the outskirts of Berunegui, in the San Blas mining regions, not far from the town of Legutiano, a company of villagers who were following the body of a child to the cemetery. The little corpse reclined upon a cushion surrounded by followers, and, as is customary in that country, was borne upon the head of an old woman. Moved by idle curiosity, I inquired whose child it was.

"No one knows, sir," replied a villager; "it was found, alive and naked, there in the glen some two years ago. It was taken to the house of Gussurrandi and continued, little by little, shrinking, shrinking, and falling away, until it became like a new-born infant, finally ceased to nurse, and died. Stranger still, its face is wrinkled like an old man's, and its fingers are burnt and stained like those of one in the habit of smoking a pipe."

These details aroused my curiosity, and I joined the party in order to obtain a view of the strange corpse. Before it was deposited in the grave, while the women wept and prayed, I examined it. The villager was right; the body certainly presented a most incomprehensible appearance. Imagine a newly-born child, the forehead and cheeks marked with hard, callous wrinkles, the half-opened eyes retaining an expression of marked intelligence, and the upper portion of the thumb and index-finger of each hand yellow and discoloured like those of an old smoker.

The child being buried, I returned with the party to Berunegui to pass the night with the Gussurrandi family, being well acquainted with them.

"What did that child die of?" I asked my hosts.

"Ah, Mr. Richard," replied the wife, "it must have been a case of witchcraft, for a stranger thing never happened. When we first found the child it ate bread, meat, and pottage; afterwards the four teeth it had fell out, it stopped eating, seemed to lose all knowledge of persons and things, and we were compelled to suckle it, and in the last days of its life, it lost even the power to do this. When first discovered it seemed a well-sized child, but it gradually shrunk to half its original size. The expression of its eyes was remarkably intelligent; it acted at times as if it wished to speak, seemed to understand perfectly all that was said, and appeared continually labouring under some mysterious and terrible agitation."

"And you have no idea as to where it came from?"

"Not the slightest. One day, on returning from work, we found it, quite naked, amidst a heap of old clothing. It aroused our pity, we took it in, and cared for it. Among the old clothing there was a bundle of papers and an old pipe."

"Where are these objects?"

"I have them all in a box," replied my host; "but as I cannot read, I have never examined them closely. One day I showed them to the priest, but he told me they were written in Bescayan, and he could not understand them."

"Bring them! Bring them!" I cried excitedly.

"I will bring them, but will you read them all, every bit, to us?"

"Yes, friend Gussurrandi, all, and will make all as plain as possible."

So, after supper, a lamp was lighted and placed at my side, and, after the men had filled and lighted their pipes, and all taken seats around me, I unrolled the bundle of papers given me by my host. It was composed of many leaves of different sizes, ages, and styles of writing. I arranged them in order, and, with ever-increasing astonishment and curiosity to myself as well as to my listeners, read the following:

The 20th of August, 1785, completed my eighty-fifth year, and I found myself in the kitchen of my beautiful home, seated at the table with Don Juan Manuel de Ursubil, a famed Empiric, a man of great ability and recondite knowledge, whom I had known intimately from youth. My children and grandchildren, after celebrating the anniversary of my birth, had retired to their homes. The Empiric, myself, and an old serving-woman who waited upon me, were alone in the house. It was one o'clock in the morning, we had smoked thirty-four pipes of tobacco and drunk five jars of cider, and, though at that time I was rugged as an oak tree and of an exceptional constitution, so much smoking and drinking caused my head to spin.

The Empiric was even worse than myself. For more than an hour he talked unceasingly of humours, clavicles, systems, plasters, and other things, of which I understood not a word. I listened intently.

Digitized by Google

"You do not answer me," he finally said.

"What can I answer?"

"You might say something, man. What are you thinking of?"

"That I am very old and shall not last much longer."

Juan Manuel struck the table with his fist, and with a long laugh, exclaimed: "'Not much longer'—what folly! Why, you can live as long as the fancy strikes you."

"Truly?"

"Surely. I have a secret of everlasting life; but I fear the Inquisition and the priests, if they learnt of it. I would be taken for a sorcerer, and it would go hard with me."

"Juan Manuel, are you telling me the truth?"

"The exact truth. Ah, if I could but find one who did not wish to die."

"You could easily find many."

"You are mistaken. Men are peculiar in their mode of reasoning; they fear death, but they fear more the operation they must undergo to escape death. They would rather die than suffer for a few days."

My brain reeled. This learned man expressed himself with such positive conviction that it already seemed to me that death no longer existed. There was an ineffable satisfaction in the thought.

We drank several more glasses. The old servant was sound asleep, the stocking she had been knitting had fallen from her hands, and the cat was playing with the yarn.

"Why do you not make a proof of your theory upon yourself?" I asked the Empiric.

"What nonsense! How could I operate upon myself when the performance demands all my care, observation, and strength?"

We again relapsed into silence. My eighty-five years weighed heavily upon me, a new life appealed to me too strongly to be resisted. I decided, and rising suddenly cried: "I do not wish to die! Dispose of me!"

"Done!" answered Juan Manuel, rubbing his hands with pleasure. "Eighty or eighty thousand years hence we will again drink cider in honour of the twentieth of August."

He rose staggering, seized my arm, and said: "Let us go."

"Where?"

"To my house. This very night all shall be accomplished."

"Let us go then." And in my shirt sleeves, just as I was, we set out, unsteadily, reeling, and stumbling, towards his house.

On reaching his room Juan Manuel lit a lamp, took off his hat and coat, opened a drawer of a table, from which he took an apparatus composed of wires, bandages, tubes, and bulbs with wooden keys, then rolled up his sleeves, pushed a bed from an adjoining alcove into the centre of the room, placed a large copper kettle beside it on the floor, and, turning to me, said smilingly: "Now place yourself full length on the bed, and remain perfectly quiet."

I extinguished my pipe and threw myself upon the bed, stretching myself out as much as possible. The Empiric then produced a lancet, and, after feeling my left arm, made a broad incision in one of the veins. I heard the splashing of the blood as it fell into the cauldron, while Juan Manuel busied himself preparing his strange apparatus.

This must have consumed a quarter of an hour, when I began to feel horribly weak from loss of blood. All effects of intoxication had disappeared. From time to time the Empiric felt my pulse, murmuring as he continued his work: "More—more yet!" I do not know how long a time elapsed, but I suddenly found that I could not move; I was consumed by thirst, but could not make an articulate sound; I could only lie there and listen to the monotonous dripping, dripping of the blood as it fell into the cauldron. My sense of vision, though, had remained remarkably clear and distinct.

The Empiric again felt my pulse. "Good!" he exclaimed; "a little more," and finally, "enough!" and he remained contemplating me for some time in a species of abstraction. Then he bound up the wound, and taking some small pieces of linen moistened in water, he introduced them into my mouth, pushing them into my throat, using for this purpose the wooden handle of a spoon. Then he closed my nostrils with a piece of dampened tow.

"So!" he said, when this was accomplished, "we are progressing finely. Now breathing almost imperceptibly, and with the heart barely fluttering, we shall come within a step of death, but that step we will not take."

My condition was now simply indescribable. I seemed to have no body, for only the head retained warmth and life. A terrible oppression weighed upon my breast, my ribs seemed crushed in, and I felt an intense agony in every respiration as I inhaled a little air through the damp cloths. My head seemed burning, and the slow pulsation of my heart reverberated in my ears like the blows of a hammer.

Juan Manuel, after contemplating me for some time, took a deep drink. "It is necessary," he said; "my nerves must be steady."

He then went out and returned in a short time, carrying in his arms one of his grandsons, a beautiful four-year-old child, who appeared wrapped in profound slumber. He laid the child down beside me and made the sign of the cross over it.

"My plan," he said, communing with himself, "must have occurred to many; but the actual problem is that the regenerating blood shall not come in contact with the air; that it shall pass warm, pure, full of life, and throbbing with power, from the heart of the child to the almost lifeless old man. The old man loses his blood; there it is in the cauldron, weakened and vitiated by the sins and pains of eighty-five years. The child is going to transmit his almost entirely; but it will not matter, for, after eight days, the little that will be left will have multiplied, and the child will be as robust as before. Blood is fire; a single drop serves for the base of a life. I know there are doctors in Salamanca and Alcala who laugh at me, for it is the privilege of men of science to laugh with impunity at others, whether they are right or wrong. But after my friend shall have lived for two thousand years, where, then, will be the doctors of Salamanca?"

He again placed his hand over my heart; it scarcely fluttered and the noise in my ears had died away.

"Now is the time," he exclaimed; "he will feel nothing now."

He then took the strange apparatus from the table and enveloped my neck with its bandages, doing likewise with the child, who still remained without moving at my side. Next, from another vessel he took a dark ointment, with which he smeared the wooden keys of his apparatus and also my neck, all but one side, where, by means of a cupping-glass, he had drawn the flesh into a roll. The bulbs were squeezed together, the tubes in which they terminated adhering firmly to my own and the child's neck. Among the wires constituting the apparatus were two long and strong ones which the Empiric, grasping with both hands, gave a sudden jerk, as if he wished to separate them; at the same instant. I felt a sharp pain in the side of my neck and the child gave a terrible start. Then a cloud passed before my eyes, but I could still hear Juan Manuel rubbing his hands with pleasure and murmuring to himself: "It beats, it beats!—after twenty years of thought and study—the air does not enter—the priests and doctors are vanquished!"

Digitized by Google

On opening my eyes on the following day, I found myself stretched upon that same bed. The Empiric was beside me. I endeavoured to speak, but could not; the Empiric placed his finger on his lip and shook his head.

"You now have within your veins," he said, "the revivifying blood of youth. You will begin life at the age of four years. What terrible heat! A hundred and eighteen pulsations! the new blood pours through your veins like a torrent in a millrace. This fever will last for fifteen days, during which time you must take nothing but milk. My little grandson is resting well; in six more days he will have recovered. Ah, my apparatus is a marvel."

At this juncture a knock came at the door, and my old servant, Maria Anton, entered.

"What has become of my master?" she asked.

"Here he is; a little indisposed because in accompanying me home he stumbled and——"

"That terrible cider!"

"No, Maria, it was owing to the darkness. Two of his ribs are displaced, but inside of fifteen days he will be all right."

Maria Anton, thus reassured, departed.

"Poor old woman," mused the Empiric; "how many of your granddaughters will have to wait upon your master!"

For many days the Empiric paid me hourly visits, feeling my pulse, giving me milk, and talking to himself. My condition was very peculiar. My whole body was burning with a feverish heat, and I experienced a general trembling, with light pains in the chest, back, and ribs on drawing a breath, but felt a sensation of restful satisfaction when the air was expelled from my lungs.

By degrees my strength returned, and at the end of twenty days, accompanied by Juan Manuel, I returned to my own house.

"I believe your life is now assured for another epoch," he said, as he approached my door; "but you must be careful, as it is, of course, exposed the same as before to disease and violent accidents. I have merely lengthened your days by renewing the vital element which sustains life; what you should do is to be silent and watchful."

Some time passed, and my health and strength became enviable, save for that strange, persistent pain in the breast accompanying each respiration. Yet I could never convince myself that Juan Manuel had succeeded in his undertaking, but looked upon the operation as a grave indiscretion, committed while we both were intoxicated, and I expected to die at the usual age of mankind.

Five years later my face was more ruddy, my pulse stronger, my appetite and strength doubled, and, strangest of all, the bald portion of my head was again covered with beautiful grey hair and the wrinkles on my hands had disappeared. Juan Manuel, then just turned seventy, was mad with exultation; he would spend whole hours smoking and contemplating me with all the affection and interest of an artist looking at his work.

"What puzzles me," I said, "is that constant pain in my breast."

"And me also," he replied; "I have been thinking of that for three years without being able to discover the cause. It seems to me that after five years my grandson's blood should have become accustomed to flowing through your veins."

After three more years, my face was still rosier, my health and strength greater; in fact, my wonderful vitality terrified my friends. On my hundredth birthday I entertained all the relatives who had assisted at the celebration of my eighty-fifth—that is, all save some eighteen, who had passed away.

The Empiric, meanwhile, had aged greatly, and his health was visibly failing from day to day, only in his eyes still gleamed the old expression of vivacity and satisfaction.

One morning, very early, he came to my house, and, shutting himself in my room, said to me:

"You are now convinced?"

"Yes, my friend, entirely convinced."

"Well, then, we must wait no longer. I feel very old, and, to tell the truth, the idea of dying does not suit me, holding, as I do, life in my hands. But there is a difficulty in the way. We cannot continue living here to repeat and exploit my discovery; they will persecute us relentlessly. It is, therefore, necessary for you to make a great sacrifice for me. Let us go to France."

"To France?"

"Yes. There we shall enjoy our marvellous conquest; there I shall initiate you into my secret. You will operate upon me, and a thousand years from now we shall be able to give an account of ourselves."

"I owe you this second life, and will obey you."

I collected some gold I had laid by, bought two good mules, and, under the pretence of paying a vow to the Virgin of Aratte, took the road to the frontier.

We established ourselves in Bordeaux, and Juan Manuel began to instruct me in his secret. My intelligence, far from weakening, seemed clearer than ever; and my eyes, which had been far-sighted, had become strong and regular. Still, sometimes I felt a vague pain on thinking I should never die. Juan Manuel was astounded; my hair was gradually turning black, and my appetite becoming daily more enormous; but his consternation was complete when I one day told him I had become enamoured of the daughter of our hostess, Mdlle. Busant, and was inclined to marry her. As all the world knows, the entire city was aroused when the news went out that I, an old man of a hundred and six years, was going to take a wife. They pursued me, caricatured me, besieged me—our house became a perfect Babel.

"Your madness may cost us dear," the Empiric said to me with great sadness. "Now that I am ready for you to operate upon me, you have doubled your age, and soon all France will be talking about you. I am profoundly disgusted with you, and feel like abandoning you and dying myself, if you do not listen to me. Will you hear me?" continued the old man, beginning to weep.

Digitized by Google

"Yes," I replied, "I am all yours."

"Well, then, abandon this Mdlle. Busant, forget this insensate love, and let us flee from here."

"But whither?"

"To any of the American colonies; and as soon as we land, you will operate upon me."

I separated therefore from my aggrieved little lady as diplomatically as possible, leaving her a magnificent present, and, almost in secret, we set out for Vera Cruz in an English vessel. During the tedious passage we entertained ourselves by conversing amicably, always, though, upon the same theme.

"What I cannot explain," said the Empiric, "is your complete and entire regeneration. After my wonderful operation, it was natural that you should have retained your aged appearance, grey hair, baldness, etc., indefinitely, the new blood merely maintaining your actual state. But it has been exactly the reverse; you are younger, stronger, and more full of life each day."

"As for myself," I answered, "what annoys me is this complete revolution here in my breast."

"I have not forgotten that, either," said the Empiric; "night after night, I have revolved it in my brain until I felt as if I were going mad." And once again Juan Manuel resumed his discussion of his apparatus, plans, hopes, and glory.

One afternoon as I was enjoying a siesta he came to me with dilated eyes, pulled me from my bed, and dragged me on deck to a solitary spot, where, seizing me by the neck, he made a careful examination of the scar left by the famous operation. At its conclusion he fell into my arms completely overcome, saying as he wiped away a tear: "Well, we have done it."

"What?" I interrogated.

"That cursed drink! Horror, horror, and a thousand times horror! You are the most unfortunate of men, my poor friend!"

"What are you saying? What have you discovered in me?"

Seizing me by the hands he dragged me back to our cabin.

"At last," he exclaimed, "I have found the explanation of the pain of your abnormal respiration—of your astonishing regeneration. When, on that never-to-be-forgotten night, I injected the blood of my grandson into your veins, I was a little—a little——"

"Exhilarated, eh?"

"That's it, exhilarated. That unlucky cider! You scarcely lived, your veins were empty after the great bleeding. On performing the operation, I lanced the child in an artery, and—oh, curse of drunkenness!—in you I opened a vein. The action of your heart was so weak, the rush of new blood reversed it. Through your veins rushes arterial blood, and through your arteries venous blood flows. No wonder there were pains in your chest. Your heart and lungs act contrarily. Your circulation is reversed, and you live the reverse of all men. Your organisation is being reconstructed exactly contrary to what happens to all other men—while they journey towards old age, you travel towards infancy. You are not a hundred and six years old, you are only seventy-four, eleven years younger than I, because we must count backwards from the day of the operation. Oh, forgive me, forgive me!"

"But, man," I said, "what of all this? I feel well; what can happen to me?"

"Unhappy man, you will be seventy years old, then fifty, forty, and, after——"

"But can you not correct this?"

"Impossible! Your case is one that no doctor or scholar has foreseen, one no book refers to, one no man has imagined or believed possible. For you there is no scientific precedent or explanation; you are a living paradox, an absurd positive, and an impossible reality. It was a case of malpractice on my part. You will operate upon me without drinking, of course—after two days of clear water, you understand—and then we will see if, after observing, you can remedy the evil. But, ah me! it is impossible. We can do nothing but weep." And large tears flowed over the old man's wrinkled cheeks.

One night, a little before reaching Vera Cruz, our vessel foundered in a fearful tempest. The Empiric clasped the box containing his precious apparatus, I lashed myself to a spar, and for two hours we were the playthings of the furious waves.

"I can do no more," cried the poor old man.

"Courage!" I called to him, "do not die now when you are on the threshold of immortality. Courage! We shall soon reach the shore."

"Impossible!" he answered; "take it," and he pushed the box towards me.

"Hold out one hour longer," I cried, and at the same moment a mass of water buried us in an abyss. When I came to the surface, buoyed up by the spar, Juan Manuel de Ursubil and his box had disappeared for ever.

A short time afterwards a launch from Veru Cruz picked me up, together with the other survivors of the wreck.

In Vera Cruz I joined a caravan of muleteers and set out for the City of Mexico, where I purchased an estate and two servants with the gold I had preserved in a belt clasped round my waist. There, in reading and contemplation, I passed fifteen years. I never worked at anything. I said to myself: "Unlike other men, I do not need to make provision for old age, for, when I am a child, there will surely be some blind man whom I can serve as a guide. And when I become a mere infant, some good woman will be found who will suckle me at her breast." At my forty-fourth year—that is to say, the one hundred and twenty-first counting from my birth—I was strong and erect, had lost all wrinkles, my eyes were bright, and a full black beard covered my face.

My servants were wont to say their master dyed his hair, and the ladies of the quarter murmured that the Señor Bescayan seemed to grow younger daily. There was one ripe blonde of some thirty years whom I thought seriously of marrying, but always on reflection I saw the impossibility of it. "In a little time," I considered, "she will be of my age and I of hers, and eventually my children will be older than I. I cannot love, nor marry, nor live; my moral torment is insufferable. It is best to terminate it at once."

As the speediest means of ending my life, I set out in the capacity of a volunteer with the soldiers sent by the viceroy against the Indians. But though I always fought in the posts of greatest danger, the bullets and arrows of the enemy respected me. I could not achieve death.

After peace was made with the savages, I, with some others of my companions, remained in the forest devoting our time to hunting. Among those simple people my adventures, knowledge, and great experience soon earned for me the nick-name of "Yhokero Oytcho," which means "The Great Liar."

For twenty years I remained in these forests, accumulating during that time, almost without effort, a very large amount of money. But to me this great wealth possessed no value. There was only one thing which offered me any consolation, and which still linked me to my old life; this was the habit I had retained of smoking the old and grimy pipe of my Gussurrandi home.

Digitized by Google

Wearied at length by this savage life, I separated from my good companions of the forest and repaired to New York, with the intention of laying my case before the most learned doctors of the country, explaining as much as I could of Juan Manuel's apparatus and submitting, if necessary, to a new injection. I was a hundred and forty-one years old when I presented myself before the eminent physician, R. Clark Maxwell.

He, on hearing the object of my consultation, put on a strange face; examined my body, my papers, my recollections of so many years, felt the old scar on my neck, and had me make a drawing of the apparatus of the Empiric; then he shrugged his shoulders, elevated his eyebrows, pursed up his lips, stuck out his tongue, and concluded by telling me to "call again to-morrow."

I called the next day and submitted to a new examination by several other doctors whom Maxwell had called in. Then I placed myself under their care for twenty days, while they experimented upon me with various kinds of diet, bled me, and submitted the blood to analysis and countless proofs, and finally took me before a sort of medical congress, whose members, after a heated discussion, decided that I was insane, my papers recollections, and my entire history but the product of a diseased imagination, and also declared Dr. Clark Maxwell, who espoused my cause, of unsound mind. This conclusion was arrived at by means of the ballot-box.

On reaching my hotel, I found the doctor's bill. This seemed to be the only subject upon which they were unanimous; they valued their services at £5,000. After paying them religiously I found myself worse off than before the consultation, my condition weakened, my abnormal existence without remedy, and my purse considerably lightened.

I took passage again for Spain, convinced that the poor Empiric knew more than all the doctors, and determined to realise the dream of my life, to die in my own land, at my old farmhouse.

As soon as I landed, two police agents arrested me and conducted me to gaol. It seems that a travelling companion of mine, seemingly an honest man, and to whom I had loaned some money during the trip, informed the captain of the vessel that I was a notorious thief fleeing to Spain with the funds of a great American association. I protested and gave proofs before the tribunal of my innocence, but as I could produce no witnesses, and as they found me possessed of a large sum of money, justice closed her eyes, or rather opened them too much, for I was thrown into a cell, and the court began to pile up sealed documents bearing upon my case.

They would not listen to me, but sent out to all parts of the country for information concerning me; and meanwhile I remained in prison for a long—a very long—time.

At last it happened to occur to someone to order an inspection of the prisons. The gaoler, supposing me a madman or a very dangerous criminal, had placed double doors upon my cell, and served me through a hole in the lower panel. When the door was opened he fell back with a cry of alarm. He had imprisoned a man of thirty years, tall, ruddy, and with a full beard, and now found a youth of eighteen or twenty, with scarcely a hair on his face, clad in the loosely-fitting rags of an old suit of clothes. I was again taken before the tribunal, and learnt that I had been confined for eighteen years, and that every penny of my money had been expended by justice in ascertaining the truth.

The result of the investigation was that I was not myself; that the prisoner of the thousands had escaped, leaving me in his place. The gaoler was declared an accomplice of the substitution and imprisoned, leaving me at liberty, after vain endeavours to ascertain who I was.

Thus it was that on foot, almost begging alms, I returned to the place of my birth. I inquired, without telling who I was, for my sons; they showed me my grandsons, already married. After seeing my house and orchard, and all the places made dear by the remembrance of past pleasures, filled with a profound sadness, I fled as if ashamed. Had I told who I was, no one would have believed me; they would have imprisoned me or sent me to a mad-house, even my own descendants.

I returned to Madrid, and for eleven years was a servant, match-seller, news-boy, boot-black, and I do not know how many other things. During this time I continued writing my memoirs and smoking my old clay pipe. My intelligence remained, and still is, clear; but each day I write worse, and believe I will end by being unable to form a letter. In 1863 I was seven years old, or it might be a hundred and sixty-three. To-day I am six, have been reduced to less than half my total height, my second teeth have fallen out and been replaced by my first or infantile set, and my head is covered with beautiful auburn hair. My power of understanding is being annihilated, together with my strength and childish tendencies.

Walking, walking, and suffering greatly, I have returned to my native land. I say that I am an orphan and poor, and they give me alms at every house. Yet, even though a beggar, it is consoling to live beside the house where one was born. . . . . (Here the manuscript is very illegible, and further on, in letters scarcely legible, it says): It is impossible for me to hold the pen or write one letter beside another. I do not know what will become of me; I only beg that some day, when I am found and am unable to speak or eat, that I may be carried to my house of Gussurrandi, because I wish to die in it.

JOSÉ ANTON.

While I read the women had risen terrified, making signs of wonder and terror, and crossing themselves often. As I finished they exclaimed in a chorus: "Blessed St. Barbara! It is impossible to believe that! Impossible!"

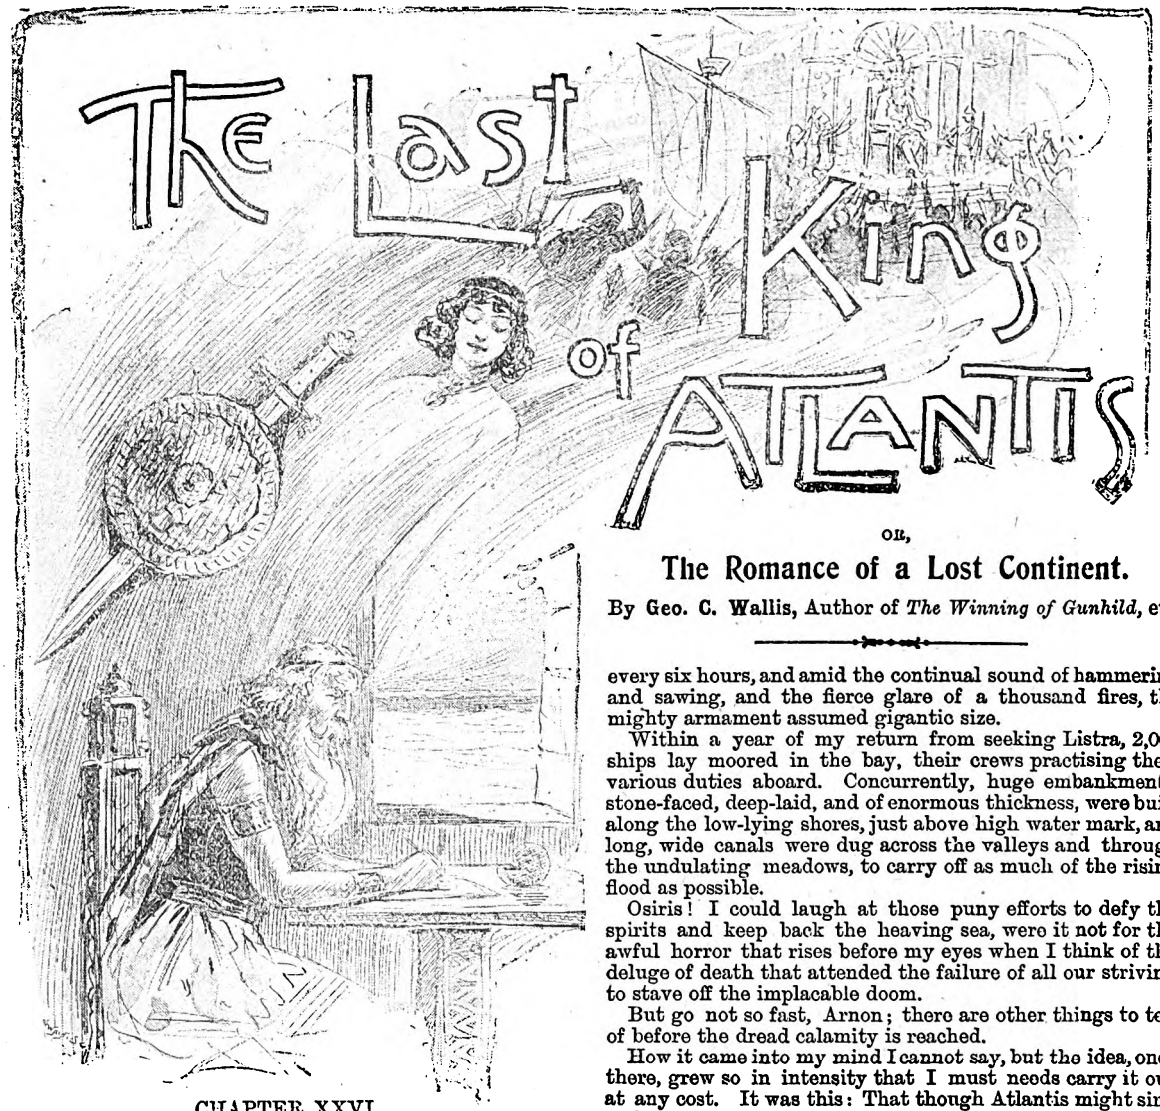
Gussurrandi consulted me as to what he should do in the matter.

"Nothing," I said. "Quiet the women and forget all about it."

All the women dreamt that night that the Empiric Juan Manuel, completely intoxicated, had fastened his apparatus on their throats.

OSMUND WARDE.

Digitized by Google



OR,

The Romance of a Lost Continent.

By Geo. C. Wallis, Author of The Winning of Gunhild, etc.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE FATE OF THE FLEET.

I was not back at Kronos long before I knew the extent of the sea's uprising. From north and south, and east and west, came word of the fearful damage. Harbours, villages, towns, harvest fields, and cane brakes, all round the coast, were now beneath the breakers that curled, a hundred thousand strong, upon the daily lessening shores. In places the earth cracked, with one part falling faster than the rest, and great convulsions shook the land, overturning buildings and trees, and reducing many towns to heaps of shapeless ruin.

The terror of the people grew greater week by week, and month by month, and but for the hope that I held out to them in the huge fleet I was preparing, all law would have been at an end, and riot, and plunder, and madness, would have reigned supreme.

As it was, I ruled a little longer. A king with a staunch army and a great fleet, but the king of a daily diminishing domain.

Day and night, without cessation, the building of ships went on, fresh bands of workers relieving the tired artisans every six hours, and amid the continual sound of hammering and sawing, and the fierce glare of a thousand fires, the mighty armament assumed gigantic size.

Within a year of my return from seeking Listra, 2,000 ships lay moored in the bay, their crews practising their various duties aboard. Concurrently, huge embankments, stone-faced, deep-laid, and of enormous thickness, were built along the low-lying shores, just above high water mark, and long, wide canals were dug across the valleys and through the undulating meadows, to carry off as much of the rising flood as possible.

Osiris! I could laugh at those puny efforts to defy the spirits and keep back the heaving sea, were it not for the awful horror that rises before my eyes when I think of the deluge of death that attended the failure of all our striving to stave off the implacable doom.

But go not so fast, Arnon; there are other things to tell of before the dread calamity is reached.

How it came into my mind I cannot say, but the idea, once there, grew so in intensity that I must needs carry it out at any cost. It was this: That though Atlantis might sink under the waters altogether, the highest parts would not be very far beneath the surface, and some lasting monument erected at the highest part would serve to denote its position, and keep up its memory among the nations.

And where, thought I, was a better place to build this monument than in Kronos, where the land had scarcely sunk at all? and what could I build better than a massive, cemented, stone tower, wide-spreading at its base, and tapering slowly as it rose to the sky?

My thought grew into action, and from a vacant space near the city uprose the giant tower, the mightiest work of man that ever cast a shadow on Atlantis. Round after round of the huge, curved stones was laid down, the foundation going deep into the earth, and each rising ring sloping slowly towards a summit that made men dizzy to imagine.

Storey by storey it grew, graceful in its shapely massiveness, the workers toiling at it with loving hands, raising the last memorial of their nation's place, and each stone in it was the height of a man, and the height of each stone in it was the height of a man and the length and thickness that of two.

Digitized by Google

Temples, palaces, and great columnal arches, hitherto considered lofty, sank into insignificance as my splendid structure rose, and when the twentieth floor was reached, the top being yet wide enough to place my palace on, the very pyramids seemed dwarfed to little mounds compared with it.

Another year passed and still it grew, and even then the top would hold a cariole, circling round. And still the fleet increased, and still the sea gained on the land steadily, relentlessly, and little earthquakes shook the shores, driving the people inland till they crowded upon each other and food became scarce and disease broke out amongst them.

Some took ship without command, and left their country to seek a safer one, going where they pleased, and I knew not nor cared, and amongst these deserters, these traitors, went Nayrahn the soldier, he whom I first met before beleaguered Miropis.

In his secret heart I believe he had ever detested me, and when I gave Atris command of the army in preference to him he grumbled mightily, only ceasing when warned that 'tis a dangerous thing to rouse the ire of monarchs. So he went, taking one of my swiftest ships, the Lord Dison, who had been living at Saitè, going with him.

This news was told me by Valdo, who augured no good from the coming together of such birds of ill omen. However, I was not troubled, and said that it was well they had gone and that the land was best rid of such ingratiates as they.

'Twere needless to put down here the tale of the anxious days and restless nights of that time of dread suspense and accumulating woe, of the riots that were suppressed in blood, of the touching tributes of affection from my loyal subjects, of the devastating march of the devouring element that mocked at all our barriers and overflowed our rivers and canals, of the testing of the newly-built vessels and the loss of many by theft until I kept all ships within the Bay of Kronos, and guarded every hour; of the mutinies of the black slaves, and of the increasing scarcity of food.

It would only harrow my heart needlessly to tell of these in detail, and I would fain pass on to that awful night of doom when all our hopes were shattered, and the order that remained in Atlantis was turned at one swift stroke to frightful chaos, and the once magnificent city to a smoking, shapeless wreck.

Well I remember that eve, for we had but just returned, Briseis and I, from the peace of our rural retreat to the busy life of the city; from the calm quiet of unfettered freedom to the wearying constraint of royal pomp and the terrible anxiety of facing the ever-looming danger.

But the brief respite was well worth having, and in that fair estate, as yet untouched by the overcrowding press of population and not unsettled by the spreading panic, we could have lived for aye, deeming that sin was not, and that Nature never wore an evil face.

And now I deemed it time to put forth to sea with my mighty fleet, and search out some foreign land whereon to settle our unaccommodated thousands.

The night before the day for sailing came, and every ship anchored in the bay was manned, provisioned, and munitioned for the sea. At the first stroke on the great gong in the Temple of Life, at the first trumpet peal from the palace top, at the first red streak of dawn, the soldiers and the chosen emigrants were to move down to the bay, to embark and be placed in their proper quarters, and on board the Ravager I was to lead forth the mightiest armament that ever cut the waters of the Western sea.

So thought I, with comfortable pride, as, the day's work done, the preparations finished, and the people loudly jubilant, I retired to rest and sank to sleep at the side of my loving mate.

Such restful sleep was mine that night when I laid my weary head upon my pillow, and nothing was further from my thought than disaster and death. Till near midnight I slept undisturbed, when Briseis woke me, asking in a startled voice:

"What noise was that, husband?"

"What was't like?" I said drowsily. "A drunken brawler passing the palace, or a storm on the sea?"

"'Twas neither," answered Briseis. "But hark—there it is again; louder and nearer."

I listened, though carelessly, for my eyelids were heavy and my senses dulled, and hearing only a low, booming sound, as of thunder a long way off, I turned over and shut my eyes again, muttering that if the noise was aught amiss it had better stay till morning, when I would attend to it.

But Briseis shook me violently in her fear ere I was well settled for another snooze, and of my own accord I sat up, wakened and awed by a fearful crashing roar that made the solid walls of the palace tremble, and caused the very air to quiver. As its echo died away, and we sat there in the darkness, listening, with strained nerves and beating hearts and hands clasped together, there came a long, dull rumble, a heavy, rolling noise, as of the swift passing of ten thousand thousand carioles over a hollow space, followed by the rattle and crash of falling masonry, the angry surging of the sea, the piercing shriek of a fierce gale, cries of pain and terror from all directions, and a great glare of light that streamed through the casement ten times brighter than the noonday sun.

Then the darkness came again, silent and dense, for a moment, and thereafter filled with strange ear-splitting noises and fitful gleams of ruddy radiance, which latter vanished quickly as they came.

"'Tis an earth-shake, and I know not what besides," I said to Briseis, as she trembled in my grasp, "and lest we would be buried in the ruins of the palace, it were better that we stir from here. I will take you and the children into the deep rock cellars under the basement floor; there you and your maids will be safe till the throes are past."

"And what of yourself, Arnon?" she asked, as I took them through the tottering passages and down the shaking stairs, heedless of the panic-stricken rushings to and fro of the terrified servants and slaves. "What of yourself, whose life is dearer to me than my own?"

"I go to seek Valdo and Atris," I answered, "and to bear a man's part in the work that is before us. Where danger is, there Arnon will be found; but fear not, for your sweet sake I shall take heed how I go."

Deep in the subterranean caverns I left them, together with a throng of white-faced maids and ladies of the palace, and then, snatching up a light cloak, and girding "Sunderer" more securely to my belt, I quitted the rocking edifice, and set forth towards the fair garden where stood the house of Atris.

It was with difficulty that I got along at all, for the streets were cumbered with heaps of loosened masonry, with here and there a human form protruding from them, while ever and anon the ground shook like the deck of a stricken ship.

Stately houses, massive arches, graceful columns, gorgeous temples, airy pleasure-bridges, swayed and fell in the great earth-storm with deafening crash, a dun pall overhung the fire-flushed sky, and the mighty monumental tower that loomed so tall and vast above the scene of wreckage, quivered like an aspen in dusky air, and over all a grey, soft ash was falling, gently as the snow, thickening in the streets till the tread of the frightened thousands, surging hither and thither, was well-nigh inaudible, and collecting on the crumbling ruins and on all who scrambled through them.

I looked towards the harbour eastwards, and saw that the light proceeded from a round, conical hill, which belched forth flame and ash and streams of liquid fire that poured down its blackened sides with ruddy glow, crackling and sparkling as they came.

Digitized by Google

The fierce eternal fires that burn below had forced their way through the sinking earth, and in the space of a few hours had thrown up the low mound, and was scattering death in all directions.

By Amun! how the lava rivers poured in glowing torrents down its sloping sides; how the heated liquid hissed and steamed where it met the sea; how thick and heavily fell the flakes of scorching ash, white and grey, darkening the air and choking the crowded streets.

But I hurried on after one swift glance had shown the horror that impended on the stately city, and using "Sunderer" to good effect to clear my way—for none stayed to question if I were king in that dread hour—held on through the dismally oppressive murk until I came to the house I sought. Therefrom emerged Atris as my foot was on the lowest step before the door, his hair dishevelled, his dress but half completed, and a wild look of anguish and despair upon his face. After him came Valdo, walking slow and sad, but calm even then, and carrying two swords.

"What hath befallen now, my captain?" I cried.

"Tell him, Valdo," said he, turning aside. "I was never ready of tongue, and now less ready than my custom."

"The ways of the Spirits are strange," said my Chief Minister. "In the great shock that hath laid low so much of the city, the rear of the house fell in, as thou wouldst see an it were clearer, and of those who have escaped are Atris and myself; of those who have perished are Izitla, his wife, and Phrena, their only child."

"Thy sorrow is great," I said, gently laying my hand upon my general's shoulder, and thinking of Viol and my first Didron, "but I have known the same loss—nay, felt the same grief here in this very garden—and I have lived to be happy even after that. There is work to do to-night, Atris, for all who can keep a clear head and a steady hand. Your King requires you."

"So be it," he said, taking one of the blades which Valdo carried; "now all that I loved is gone I can but die in my duty. Where go we, and what to do? To stay the pouring forth of yonder flaming fire?"

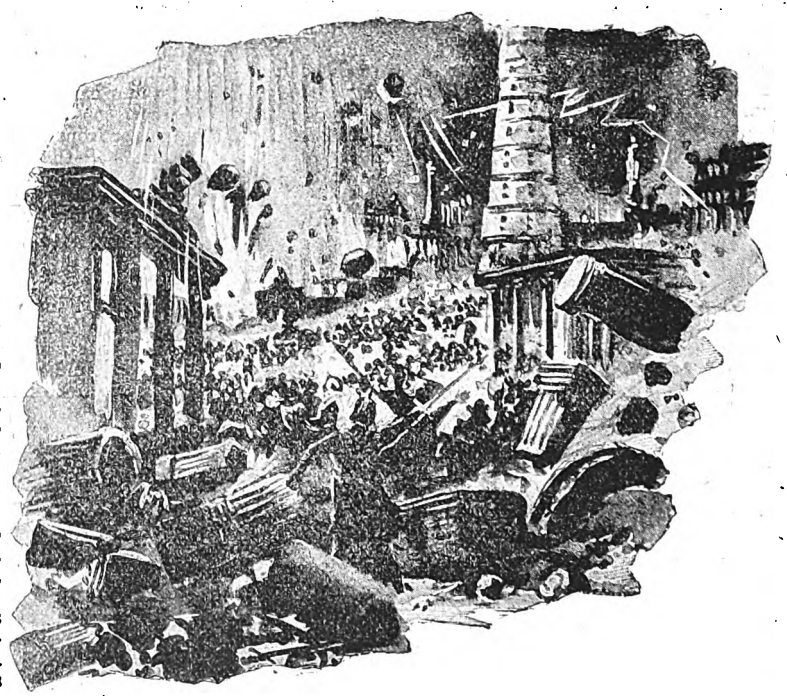
"Now you speak as a man, my Atris," I said, "though 'tis no human hand can stay that blazing beacon of disaster. 'Tis the ships we must essay to save, so that a way of escape may be left. We shall be buried fathoms deep under this deadly shower of dust unless we stir ourselves. Follow me, nor stand on any ceremony on the way!"

Forthwith we sallied out into the streets and turned our footsteps harbourwards. As we went I told them how I had secured the safety of my household, and that our first concern must be to find the Ravager, and keep guard at the harbour mouth lest any of the crews of the vessels should put away to sea regardless of their countrymen and women penned up in the death-bound city.

Even more difficult than it had been when I left the palace was it now to make progress, for the fast falling ash and warm dust, intermingled with nobs of flaming scoriæ, lay deep upon the ground, hiding many obstacles and pitfalls on the way.

The air was suffocatingly hot and oppressive, and, but for the flashing, ruddy gleams from the burning hill, we should inevitably have been lost in the dreadful gloom.

At last we reached the harbour-side, where the mighty fleet lay at anchor, tossing on the bosom of the agitated sea, whose very waves were crusted over with the powdery downfall. The decks and spars were grey-mantled with blinding, thickening shower, and some of the vessels had cut or broken their chains, and were standing out for the offing.



A dun pall overhung the fire-flushed sky.

"On board the Ravager!" I cried hoarsely, "and let us stop this mutiny at its beginning. Ho! Orlanis! bring her further in."

My Admiral obeyed, and as soon as her bow touched the quay, which was already crowded with the terror-stricken citizens, we three sprang aboard and headed the good ship for the harbour-mouth, the oars dipping fast and low into the muddy-looking sea; and ramming a couple of the miscreants as we went, we drew her up at the narrow entrance and there let down our anchors.

The other vessels, their crews having noted our action, held back on their cables, and the budding revolt was nipped ere it had time to develop. Yet it had been better had I let it take its course, for then some few of those strong new ships might have been saved from the general wreck that followed so swiftly the earth shiver and the bursting of the volcano from the ground.

I was speaking to Valdo, saying how hard a task would be ours to pull ashore in the boat and instil some method into the hurry and scurry of the witless populace—if it were wise to make the attempt—when the falling mist of dust and ash lightened, lifted, and then ceased altogether, blown far inland by a strong sea breeze that whistled through our rigging ominously, and yet with welcome freshness. The ships strained at their anchors, the sky cleared, brightening with the flush of a mellow dawn, and the fire-streaked smoke-cloud from the burning hill trailed out northward over the plain, leaving the city, with all its horror, open to the gathering light of day.

But what was that moaning sound vibrating on the rising gale? and what portended the death-like silence that succeeded, the sudden heaviness of the refreshed air, that heaped up banks of billowy clouds in the south? What meant that line of white on the surface of the sea, just below the skyline—a fringe of foam higher than the tallest of our masts, its curling top fretted by fierce forked lightnings, which showed as plainly as a silver pattern on a sombre shroud against the pitchy blackness that followed in its wake?

Digitized by Google

Full well we guessed its import, and foresaw the ravage it would work upon that crowded fleet. After one heart-thrill of terror and dismay—surely to be condoned—I regained my wonted temper, and clutching the lee rail, gave my orders to the crew:

"Cut cables and ship oars!" I cried. "Put her stern south and keep her there, and every man hold on for his life!"

Atris and Valdo, with a couple of brawny sailors, seized the helm and swung her half-round, the rowers pulled in their blades, and with bated breath each one waited for the coming of the great wave. For a space the dull, heavy silence lasted, the great wall of boiling water foaming nearer and nearer to the shore, and the cloud and the lightning-shattered darkness keeping closely in its rear.

Now it was hanging over us like a liquid mountain range, tipped with overwhelming snows, about to fall upon us, and I drew my breath deeply, looking shoreward and thinking of those I had left beneath the falling palace, and clutched the wooden stanchion upon which I leaned till the timber cracked in my iron grasp and the blood came to my face.

Then, with a blinding flash, a deafening roar, and a mighty shock, the surging wave was on us, its inshore edge catching our stern squarely, shivering our rudder and masts as though they were only dry branches of pine, and hurling the good ship forward and landward straight and swift as a stone from a sling.

Next moment the towering billow curled and fell with the splash and roar of a thousand cataracts, crushing the first line of the ships into a fearful wreck. But now we were beyond these, tearing onward with approachless speed, our keen iron ram shearing off the helms and oars of a dozen good vessels as we went.

Now we struck a large barque fairly amidships, and held our breath, clinging to our supports with frantic energy, as the sharp iron point tore its way through planks and crosstrees, splitting the vessel in twain, and the Ravager passed on. With a cry of horror from the doomed crew, which rang dismally in our ears, the stricken ship broke up, and plunged headlong downwards into the seething foam.

Soon the mighty wall of water rose below our stern again, bearing on its roaring, lightning-jagged crest the fragments of a hundred ships torn from their anchorage and sucked into the air by the force of the great wave's fury.

Just and only just in time, we were dashed against the stone-built quay, where the ram, driven like a wedge into an open space in the masonry, held us firmly as the stone itself.

Then it seemed that a deluge of boiling water passed over us, nearly taking our breath in its passing, that following it came an awful crowd of blistering steam, mingled with a rain of scorching dust, that the surging flood pouring into the burning hill, put out the fire for a moment, and next that a dense pall of smoke and ash overhung the city, blotting out the dull red glow of the rising sun.

And in the midst of the tempest of death, even through all the din of the wreckage and the hissing of the volcano, our ears caught the sound of the returning rushing waters, and, half-blinded, half-scorched as we were, the deluge passed over us once more, this time retreating seaward and quenching the fire for the last time.

And then, as though we had not had enough of horror, the great bay and its projecting promontories sank from beneath us with a sudden motion; the storm-lashed water, the black, fiery hill, and the whole of that mighty fleet vanishing from our sight in a gloomy, unfathomable gulf, our solitary vessel alone remaining, overhanging the abyss with a terrible unsteadiness. If the ram had broken or the stone-work given way, the Ravager and all on board must inevitably have been swallowed up with the others in that dread, black chasm.

Into the yawning abyss.

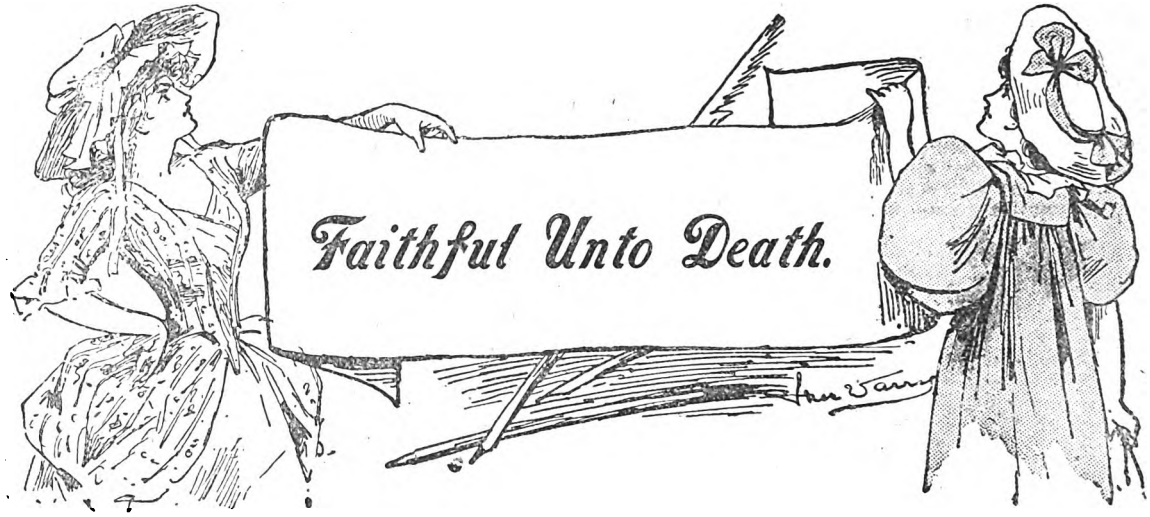
Down, down, into the yawning abyss, the churned-up waters poured with reverberating roar; down, down, into the darkness, and just as we heard the stonework cracking and our timbers creaking with ominous sound, the flood rose up in the seething space where the fleet and the arms of the bay had been.

Through the driving murk our straining eyes caught sight of the dashing waves beneath, and then the staunch iron ram broke off short under the terrible stress, and the helmless, mastless, battered Ravager dropped like a stone into the raging sea!

(To be continued).

That charming serial story by Miss Winifred Graham, which ran through SHORT STORIES a few months ago, entitled "WHEN THE BIRDS BEGIN TO SING," may now be obtained from this office in book form for 3s. 6d. It makes an elegant gift book.

Digitized by Google



Faithful Unto Death.

"GOOD-BYE, Len."

"Take care of yourself, old fellow."

"Let's hear from you when you get home."

"Don't forget us."

"No danger of that, boys, and if any of you ever come to old Richmond, remember I live there."

The speaker is a young man, hardly thirty, and as he sits in the "buckboard," taking leave of the little crowd of men who have assembled to bid him good-bye, his handsome face and well-knit form are such as to attract attention at once.

After an absence of years, Len Hawley is going home. Out of the little frontier mining-town many another comrade has gone just as he is going—never to return. Many another who, day after day, had dreamt of going as he now is going, lay resting under the sod in the mountains around, whose crests are just beginning to be gilded with the rays of the early summer sun.

"Well, everything is on board, José, and you can drive round and pick up Mr. Dunsmier and his wife, and then turn yourself loose."

It is the stage agent who speaks, giving his last commands to the driver.

As the team of four half-broken broncos swings into the street, the young man's face burns at the words he has heard: and, in the embarrassment they cause him, he almost forgets to respond to the farewells shouted after him. He feels almost like jumping from the "buckboard" and rejoining the comrades he has left.

José stops his team at a house in front of which are already waiting a man of his own age, and a woman some years younger.

The man has the trunk placed to his satisfaction in the "buckboard," and then with his companion takes the hinder of the two seats.

With a crack of the whip, José turns his team into the road, and the weekly mail between Prescott and San Diego has begun its six hundred miles of travel over mountains and across deserts, to meet the steamers of the Pacific.

Two, at least, of the passengers—Len Hawley and Mrs. Dunsmier—are thinking how unfortunate is the coincidence that has thrown them together to make this long journey in company. As for Mr. Dunsmier, he merely thinks how unfortunate he is to be forced to make it at all.

In the past, when Mrs. Dunsmier was simply Mamie, the admitted belle of the little frontier settlement, she and Len Hawley had been lovers. That was before the man who now sat beside her had come into her life.

As for Dunsmier himself, Hawley had never liked him. There were very few who did. Selfish, overbearing, and unscrupulous, Dunsmier loved money as he loved nothing else on earth. To him it was a god, to be deified and worshipped above all else.

It was his boast that with money anything could be obtained, and when he had first begun to visit Mamie Manning, during her engagement to Hawley, his arrogant display of wealth, as well as his ill-concealed contempt of those of less means, had incensed Hawley so much that the quarrel that broke the engagement ensued, and Mamie had been pleased to charge it to his jealousy.

After that, it was easy for her to defend Dunsmier; and then the drifting apart had commenced, until she stood at the altar as Dunsmier's bride.

From that day Hawley had determined to leave the country. He had gone for the last time to look at the house which, during their engagement, Mamie and he had planned, and of which they had superintended the building.

As he went from room to room, he thought of the many times they had gone through them together, planning for the future, and dreaming dreams that were never to be realised.

For the last time he had locked the door, and, taking the key from it, had cast it from him. That had been months ago, and the house still stood vacant. The "buckboard" passed it in the early morning.

The mountains have been left behind, and the road is now in the valleys where the Spanish bayonet, the flat green leaves of the prickly pear, and the sage-brush have taken the place of the pines and the oaks.

The travellers have only stopped twice—to change horses and to eat the noonday lunch. The sun has passed the meridian, and is beginning to sink towards the west. The occasional cracking of José's whip and the muffled fall of the horses' feet in the heavy dust as they trot along, are the only sounds which break the stillness of the desert.

Digitized by Google

Heat, and thirst, and silence. Everything is parched and brown, and the yellow earth, where it is not covered by sand or dust, is baked and cracked waiting for the winter rains that are yet months away. Even the rocks, rough and jagged pieces of lava, are black as if burnt with the heat.

The three passengers sit in silence, longing for the next station, Camp Date Creek, more than ten miles away.

It will, at least, be a relief to reach it, if only to refill the canteens that have become so warm.

Suddenly José rises to his feet, and looks long and earnestly to the left, where half-a-dozen clouds of dust are in the air.

He drops to his seat and says simply, "Indios."

Then he stops the horses, and, handing the reins to Hawley, jumps down. Drawing his knife, he steps to the back of the waggon, where the heavy trunk, placed there in the morning by Dunsmier, is lashed. As he is about to cut the ropes that tie it to the "buckboard," Dunsmier divines his intentions, and turns on him fiercely.

"No, no, you mustn't throw that off! There's bullion in it," he says, and, leaning over, he catches José's hand to prevent him from cutting the ropes that hold it.

"Los Indios son Apachés!" (The Indians are Apachés!) says José, his face growing paler as he notes how rapidly they are approaching while the "buckboard" delays.

"I can't help it; but you mustn't lose my trunk," said Dunsmier. "Can't you make him understand?—I can't speak Spanish," he asks, in a pleading voice, turning to Hawley.

It is the first time they have spoken since before the marriage, and, eyeing him contemptuously, Hawley interprets into Spanish what he has said; and José, thinking that he, too, is asking for the preservation of the trunk, leaves it, and, jumping into the waggon, takes the reins once more into his hands, and begins to ply the whip.

Hawley looks to see that his rifle is in order, and as he does so, he glances at the pale faces of the husband and wife behind him. As for himself, he is indifferent.

Dunsmier has begun to throw into the road the mail-bags. His wife looks at him as if to urge him to cut loose the trunk, but remains silent, as if afraid to ask it.

"He would sacrifice even her to save his gold," Hawley thinks bitterly.

The horses jump under the lash. They, too, have scented the danger, and seem to know that the race is one of life and death. The smooth, straight road stretches far ahead towards where it begins to climb the narrow pass through which it crosses the mountains.

It is at that point that the Indians are trying to intercept them. The cruel rawhide quirts, with which they are cutting their horses, seem to be always in the air, while the long, black hair of each streams out far behind.

They are slowly gaining.

Hawley raises his rifle, and fires at an Indian in the leading group.

A little puff of dust marks where the bullet strikes the ground to the left. No use to waste cartridges firing from the "buckboard." One can only wait until all hope of escape by flight is gone, and then fight until death comes. In fight is their only hope.

José has dropped from the seat to his knees, and leans far over the dashboard, that he may reach the farther with his whip. It whistles through the air as it falls on the flanks of the leaders and wheelers, leaving, wherever it falls, great welts that show plainly through the dust and foam that cover the horses! It cuts the thin, delicate nostrils of the wheelers, and raises ridges on the flanks of the leaders, while he shouts at them with fierce Spanish curses.

No wonder the horses grow wild with pain and fear, and dash madly on.

It is only a question of time before they are overtaken, unless something intervenes to save them. A broken trace, a cracked spring—and then a few shots, a rush by the Indians, and all would be over; the next passer-by would find their mutilated bodies lying in the road, amid the rifled trunks and mail-bags.

No one speaks.

They are almost at the point where the narrow road begins to climb the mountain pass.

Behind them, less than a mile away, come the Apachés, their horses flecked with foam.

As soon as the "buckboard" begins to ascend the mountains, it will be madness to drive as they have driven on the plains. To do so might throw them into the cañon hundreds of feet below, or break the vehicle against the boulders that line the roadside.

Already José is getting his horses in hand, as if to check their speed. Here the Indians have the advantage, and their sure-footed mustangs, unhampered by harness or waggon, will soon overtake the "buckboard."

There is one chance. Hawley, whose face is white and stern, says, facing Dunsmier and his wife:

"Dunsmier, from the top of the mountain it is hardly three miles into the next station, Camp Date Creek, and you and I, by getting out here, can keep back the Apachés until the waggon gets away. If we only hold them back for ten minutes it will be enough, for by that time the waggon can reach the top of the mountain, and then there will be no chance for the Indians to overtake it."

As he faces Dunsmier, for the first time for months he again looks into the eyes of the woman he has loved. How blue they appear in the white, pale face. They look pleadingly into his, and his heart is filled with pity for this woman who sits there in silence, with death so near.

Her eyes never leave his face, as if longing for him to speak, if only to pardon the past. All the old love comes back to him, and he feels as if he would give his life to take her again in his arms.

As he thinks it can never be, he puts the thought from him, and in its stead comes the pain that she has brought to him.

"Can't we escape without?" asks Dunsmier, his lips ashen with fear.

"No," answers Hawley, with bitter contempt, and a new hatred, born of the man's cowardice, in his heart; "it is the only chance for your wife, and we had better do it right ahead, where the climbing begins, and where we can get in among the boulders."

"Couldn't one do it? I should be willing to pay anything if——" Dunsmier ceased abruptly, as he caught the stern look in Hawley's eyes.

"You coward! Are you going to come with me or not?" asks Hawley, as he rises in his seat, rifle in hand.

Digitized by Google

The horses, under the close rein that José is drawing, have slightly slackened their speed, for they are already in the pass.

"Yes—yes, of course I will go with you," comes from the white lips of Dunsmier.

Hawley reaches within his breast, and taking from it a purse, hands it to the woman.

"Mamie, this is all I have," he says simply; "see that my mother gets it. You know her address."

Mrs. Dunsmier stretches out her hand as if to prevent him from leaving the "Buckboard."

There are tears in her eyes as they meet his, and her voice trembles as she implores him not to throw his life away for her sake.

Almost before she can frame the words, he leaps from the waggon into the road.

In an instant he gathers himself together, and looks towards the "Buckboard."

Dunsmier is still seated in it, holding his wife as if to prevent her jumping from it. A wave of exultation seems to pass over Hawley as he sees this man, who was to have stood by him in facing the Apachés while his wife escaped, thus leave him to his fate.

For an instant the "Buckboard" almost stops, as if in response to some command from the woman; while Dunsmier, who seems beside himself with fear, has taken from the driver's hand the whip, and is striving to lash the horses into greater speed.

Hawley smiles to himself bitterly.

He can yet overtake the "Buckboard," or, easier still, he can hide among the boulders and brushwood that line the cañon from the Apaches, and after they have passed, easily make his escape. Better to let all end here.

She would escape, and would know that is was to him she owed her life.

He took off his hat, and threw it into the air, as a signal for José to drive on. He does not even look where it falls. He will never need it again, he thinks, as he crouches behind a boulder.

He raises his rifle, and fires at the foremost of the Indians who are galloping into the cañon.

In an instant they slip from their horses, and after firing a few shots at him, begin to climb the mountain side.

This is what he expected. They will climb the mountain side, and probably shoot him in the back from above; but before they can do so and remount their horses, the "Buckboard" and its passengers will be beyond pursuit.

He had feared that they would rush in on him, and after a few shots all would have been over with him, and his life would have been thrown away in vain. It was for this he had wanted Dunsmier to come with him. Two might do what one could not.

Enraged at the escape of the "Buckboard," through the delay he has caused them, the Indians fire volley after volley at him, until the cañon echoes so with reports that he cannot tell from which direction the shots are coming. He looks up towards the summit to see if any of his enemies are above him, and, as he does so, he catches a glimpse of the "Buckboard," with a woman's white face looking downwards. An instant and it is gone. Thank Heaven! He knows they are on the mesa now, and she is safe!

A straight level road is before the waggon, and at its end they can see, against the dark side of the mountains beyond, a cluster of adobe buildings, with a flag floating high in the air over the parade ground. The horses are again running as if mad, with the stingings of the whip that seems to be for ever falling.

The shots in the cañon die away in the distance.

A mile is passed, and then another.

Already the wild race had been noticed at the post, and, while they are still a couple of hundred yards away, the ringing notes of the bugle are sounding above the hard breathing of the horses and the rattling of the "Buckboard;" for, to the old soldier in command, such driving means that there is succour needed.

As the "Buckboard" passes the sentinel, a few words explain all; and, while the foam-covered team still stand trembling from their wild race, a troop of cavalry dashes by at a gallop to the rescue of the man who is facing such odds in the cañon.

The woman who has come in with the "Buckboard" watches the blue-coated men with staring eyes.

The husband approaches her, and places his hand upon her arm, as if to lead her into one of the houses, out of the sun.

She shakes his hand off, without looking at him.

The few women in the post gather round, and urge her to compose herself, but she does not seem to heed them. She can only stand and watch the cloud of dust which marks the progress of the cavalry.

They have crossed the mesa, and, as they disappear from the horizon beyond, she knows that if the Indians are still there, the cañon will soon be filled with the smoke and fire of the cavalry carbines.

An ambulance, in which is seated a hospital steward, approaches where she is standing, to receive orders from the commander of the post. When she hears that it, with its escort, is to follow the troop of cavalry, to bring back the dead and wounded, despite all that can be done, she takes a seat in it. When it returns, she is clasping to her breast the form of the man who had stayed behind in the cañon.

As the ambulance stops, a little crowd gathers round it, and looks into it curiously.

"He was shot to pieces, and dead before we got there," the sergeant explains.

H. ABBON.

DO NOT FORGET

THAT THE Prize Competitions

ANNOUNCED IN THE

Christmas Number of

SHORT * STORIES

WILL REMAIN OPEN UNTIL

Monday, January 4th, 1897.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at "PEARSON'S WEEKLY" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

RED WHITE & BLUE

FRENCH COFFEE.

Delicious for Breakfast or After Dinner.

In making, use rather less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary Coffee.

SOLD EVERYWHERE.

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to the

PEARSON POTTERY Co., Hanley

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 Pieces for £1 1s.

100 Pieces for £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery. The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful. Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

ADVERTISERS should write for particulars of Special Positions.

JOLLY'S 'DUCHESS' PILLS.

POSITIVE CURE FOR ANÆMIA.

A box containing 60 doses post free on receipt of 2/6. Address—

BRITISH DRUGGISTS LTD., 219. Oxford Street. LONDON, W.

MOUSTACHES

HEAVY AND HANDSOME, SPEEDILY PRODUCED.

BALD PATCHES Eradicated by Using ESAULINE.

Testimonials Daily. POST FREE (secretly packed) in British Isles, 1/6, 3/-, and 5/- from

S. S. KNOWLES & CO., 30, NEWGATE STREET, E.C.

BLUSHING.

Particulars of a self-treatment for a permanent cure, as prescribed by eminent physicians of the U.S.A., forwarded free to all sufferers on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. B. F. FIELD, 15, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London, W.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5, Sept. 1, £5, Oct. 1, £5, Nov. 2, £6. Dec. 1, £6.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.: 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

A SUM of from 10s. to 20s. per week offered for spare time to either sex, everywhere; work can be done evenings.—Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 92A, Aldersgate Street, London.

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free. Address L. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

CORPULENCY CURED

By a simple inexpensive self-treatment, effecting a rapid and permanent reduction without change in diet. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. G. A. BOYD, 14, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London.

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full, perfect, natural Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. Highly approved and recommended by the Medical Profession. For testimonials, press opinions, and free particulars, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20

See Illus. Guide and Catalogue 259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

BLACKHEADS

or "Maggots," Pimples, Blotches, etc., immediately and permanently removed by my Skin Cleansing Lotion, "CUTISOLINE." Never fails. Hundreds of testimonials. Post free with directions, 1/6, 3/- and 5/-. AUSTIN LENNOX, Skin Specialist, 1, Shoe Lane, Fleet Street, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

STRONG ENGLISH WORDS.

When a person says "I suffered excruciating pain," he expresses a fact in the strongest words afforded by the English language. The word "excruciating" comes from crux, a cross, and signifies an intensity of agony comparable only to that endured by one who undergoes the barbarous punishment of crucifixion. There are some diseases which, for a time, cause pain of this acute and formidable nature. To find a relief for it, when possible, is at once the impulse of humanity and the studious desire of science. Two brief examples may indicate what success is attending the effort to both comfort and cure cases of this kind.

"Nearly all my life," writes an intelligent woman, "I have borne the burden of what appeared to be incurable illness. I always felt heavy, weary, and tired. My appetite was poor, and after eating I had a cruel pain at my chest and between the shoulders. Frequently the pain was so intense that I was impelled to loose my clothing and walk about the room. My nerves were disordered and impressible, and I was, consequently, easily disquieted and upset. My sleep was habitually bad, and I seemed none the better for spending a night in bed. Eating but little my strength waned of necessity, and I came to be very weak. For a long time I got about feebly and with difficulty.

"In August, 1887, I had an attack of rheumatic gout, which gave me the most harrowing experience of my life. The complaint took its usual course and refused to yield to the ordinary treatment. Through the partial failure of the liver and kidneys dropsy set in, and my legs and feet became puffed and swollen. I suffered excruciating pain and was confined to my bed for thirteen weeks. Remedies of every description were tried, but to little purpose.

"My brother, visiting me one day, said he had been cured of an attack of dropsy by a medicine called Mother Seigel's Syrup. I got a bottle from Mr. Hewett, the chemist, in Seven Sisters Road, and after taking it felt a trifle easier. I continued taking it, and soon the pain and swelling abated. I could eat without pain or inconvenience, and by a few weeks' further use of the Syrup I was not only free from any local ailment, but felt better than I ever did in my life before. Since then I have enjoyed continuous good health, taking a dose of Mother Seigel's Syrup occasionally for some transient indisposition. You are at liberty to publish my letter. (Signed) (Mrs.) Elizabeth Rogers, 42, Plevna Road, South Tottenham, London, September 13th, 1895."

"In January, 1892," writes another, "I had an attack of influenza, and was confined to my bed for eighteen weeks thereafter. Subsequently I was very weak, and could get up no strength. What little food I forced down (having no appetite) gave me excruciating pain, so that I was afraid to eat. I came to be exceedingly weak and had frequent attacks of dizziness. I was worn almost to a skeleton, and none thought I would recover.

"In June, 1892, Mr. Smith, a friend of ours, recommended me to try Mother Seigel's Syrup, which I at once procured of Mr. George Coombs, the chemist in Hucknall. After taking it for only one week I felt greatly benefited. I could eat better, and food ageeed with me. Continuing with the Syrup I grew stronger and stronger, and soon felt even better than before I was attacked by the influenza. You are free to print this statement if you wish to do so. (Signed) (Mrs.) Ruth Halliday, 44, High Street, Hucknall Torkard, Nottingham, March 19th, 1895."

Intense pain may or may not indicate urgent danger to life, but it is hard to bear, and very exhausting just the same. In cases of rheumatic gout (Mrs. Rogers) the pain is caused by a poisonous acid in the tissues, originally produced by the decomposition of food in the stomach—indigestion or dyspepsia. The same poison acting on the liver and kidneys creates the other symptoms mentioned. In the case of Mrs. Halliday the ailment was dyspepsia, which in the first place invited influenza, and then remained to torment her.

It is best and easiest to prevent pain by using Mother Seigel's Syrup immediately when the slightest illness appears.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

O. 419. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 9TH, 1897. [ONE PENNY.

AH! THE MILDNESS OF THE SEASON HAS DONE THIS.

100,000 Ladies' Luxuriously Handsome, Rich Dark Brown

POSSUM FUR NECKLETS

Life Imitation, Natural Head combined; a most elegant and soft fur, quite equalling in anything offered at 15/6 each, and for durability not to be surpassed. Similar to illustration.

"SHORT STORIES" SPECIAL NECKLET COUPON. 9/1/97.
eceipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods bove (post free this week only) to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. returned in full if not satisfied. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

POST FREE 4/6 WORTH TREBLE.

Cheques and P.O.'s payable to—
F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, dsley Road, Leeds. Telegraphic Address: "ECLIPSE, LEEDS." Telephone No. 948.

1897 LAMATION. "OH, YES! REVENUES FROM ECONOMY ARE ENORMOUS."

OUR NEW VENTURE.—Yes, Two different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright.)

THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (CHANCERY DIVISION), HODGSON VEBB BROTHERS.—On the 18th day of July, 1890, his lordship, Justice Chitty, granted an interim injunction, restraining Messrs. Webb hers, of Hackney Wick, from infringing Mr. Fredk. Hodgson's Trade k, "Eclipse," No. 93,774 (Leeds).

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ECLIPSE" CARPETS (Regd.)

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. We will forward direct from the looms to any address on receipt of amount, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, in our New (Reg.) Waterlily and Persian designs, the largest ever sold at the price, suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool.

Sale Price 3/6 Each.

ousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost able above prices. An "Eclipse" Rug sent with Carpet 1/- extra.

SPECIAL OFFER.

wo Carpets and Two Rugs 8/-, or Four Carpets and Four Rugs 15/6.

.—When this Design (registered) is wanted in Carpets or Hearthrugs, as above, kindly quote No. 268,493.

PRODIGIOUS SALE OF THE "PRUDENTIAL"

REVERSIBLE CARPETS

(Registered).

Reversible, woven throughout with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in 12 sizes only. These carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine on one side the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian, and on the reverse the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

REDUCED SALE PRICE.

Size.	Each.		Size.	Each.
6ft. by 9ft.	4/9	REDUCED SALE PRICE.	9ft. by 15ft.	12/6
7½ft. by 9ft.	5/11		12ft. by 12ft.	12/9
9ft. by 9ft.	7/6		12ft. by 13½ft.	14/6
9ft. by 10½ft.	8/6		12ft. by 15ft.	15/9
9ft. by 12ft.	9/6		12ft. by 18ft.	19/6
10½ft. by 12ft	11/6		12ft. by 21ft.	22/6

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

A Reversible Prudential "Hearthrug (Regd.), to match above Carpets, sent for 1/6 extra, size 2yd. long and 1yd. wide. Special Offer, Three Hearthrugs for 4/3, or Six for 8s., or Twelve for 15/6 sterling value.

P.S.—When this Design is wanted in Hearthrug or Carpet, as shown above, kindly quote Registered No. 268,496.

We Rely upon Spontaneous Repeat Orders from our Clients for the Maintenance of our Trade, Established nearly a Quarter of a Century.
orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON. 9/1/97.
n receipt of this Coupon and P.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee o send any goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.
Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

F. HODGSON & SON, WOODSLEY RD., LEEDS.

Manufacturers, Importers and Merchants.

Telegraphic Address: "ECLIPSE, LEEDS." National Telephone No. 948.
N.B.—Foreign Orders executed and packed free, and shipped at lowest rates.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

ADVERTISERS should write for particulars of Special Positions.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS COCOA.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

WITH FULL NATURAL FLAVOUR.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. H. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

January 9, 1897.

No. 3.

S.S. S.S.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 3.

Jan. 9, 1897.

NEWSAGENTS

S.S. S.S.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ¼lb., 10d.; ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; 2lb., 4s. 4d.; including tin and postage.

MRS. CONYERS,

KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

JOLLY'S 'DUCHESS' PILLS.

POSITIVE CURE FOR ANÆMIA.

A box containing 60 doses post free on receipt of 2/6. Address—

BRITISH DRUGGISTS LTD.,

219, Oxford Street, LONDON, W.

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free. Address L. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

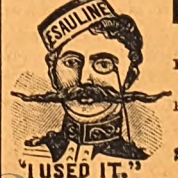
THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.



MOUSTACHES

HEAVY AND HANDSOME, SPEEDILY PRODUCED.

BALD PATCHES Eradicated by Using ESAULINE.

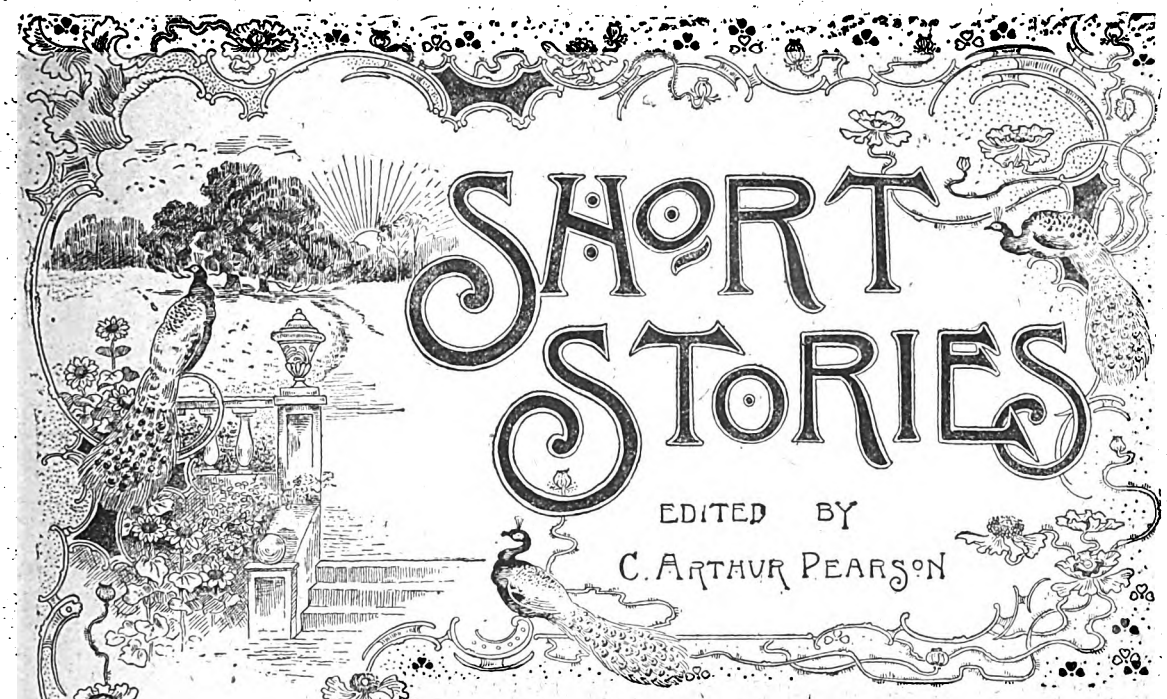
Testimonials Daily. POST FREE (secretly packed) to British Isles, 1/6, 3/-, and 5/- from

S. S. KNOWLES & CO.,

30, NEWGATE STREET, E.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.



No. 419.] For the Week ending January 9th, 1897. [1D.

A FEAST OF FICTION

A COPPER COIN.

FOUR nights in succession I saw the same scene depicted in a dream, and to a man who very seldom indulges in such luxuries, I may as well admit it upset me more than I relished. In the oft-repeated dream I saw a woman lying in bed, her arms stretched full out at right angles to the body. She was asleep. I could just distinguish that she was young and of surpassing beauty, when a dark visaged individual with a Vandyke beard would come on the scene in that mysterious manner characters have in dreams, and deliberately stab the woman. So realistic was the whole scene that I could not only see the blood spurt, but actually feel drops splash against my face.

At the time I write about I was just beginning to make a name for myself as a criminal lawyer, and was busy working up a rather intricate case. I naturally tried to dispel all thoughts of the ugly dream, and attempted to cheat myself into the belief that it was overwork and a disordered liver; but, try as I would, I could not make headway with my work, and on the fifth day was plodding away at business that ought to have been done, but had got delayed owing to my inability to grasp the pros and cons. Determined to conquer the morbid sensation, and work off arrears, I stayed at the office somewhat later than usual. I dismissed my two clerks and gave instructions to the commissionaire who came on duty at six o'clock, that I was not in to anyone.

Between half-past six and seven this man tapped quietly at the outer office door. I went to see who was there, rather ruffled in temper, too.

"There's a young lady downstairs, sir, says she saw you were in your office, and would like to see you on most urgent business. She says she's called several times to-day, but your clerk always said you were out."

I remembered that Joynson had told me about some lady having called, and not being in a position to turn up my nose at clients, I told the commissionaire to show her up.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Although I have gained a good position, I always have said that my physical powers were predominant, but I was more than thankful that I happened to be seated as my client was shown in, else I'm certain I would have collapsed, for she was no other than the victim of my dream.

Mechanically I pointed to a chair, and then leaned over the papers strewed on my desk, to gain a minute's respite to pull myself together.

"You wished to consult me about some urgent matter, I think," I eventually managed to remark.

"Yes, I must apologise for coming so late, but I called twice before, and my case is urgent."

"Don't mention it, I regret being out and giving you so much trouble. Will you explain your case, and no doubt I can help you."

"I am an artist's model—not through choice, but for bread-and-butter. About three weeks ago I answered an advertisement that said a sculptor required a model. After two interviews, terms were arranged, and an agreement drawn up. I have posed eight times altogether, the last time was a fortnight ago yesterday. I have declined to go to his studio again because of his behaviour, and he now threatens me."

"What is the sculptor's name and address?"

"Anton Barittz—his place is 18, Vandor Street. He has the whole house from the first floor up. His studio is on the top flight."

"Quite so. Now, what was the nature of the agreement? Did you get a copy of it?"

"No, but it was to the effect that I was to pose so many times, partly draped, for a sovereign each, and twelve times without the drapery for two pounds each. I have posed six times draped and twice without, but absolutely decline to go there again."

"Has he paid you each time, or does he owe you anything?"

"He always paid me as I was leaving."

"And now, tell me, what is the nature of the threat he holds over you?"

"He says that if I don't fulfil my contract his work will be spoilt, and he will kill me; and a foreign-looking man follows me about wherever I go, and I am frightened."

"Ah! Well, if you will leave me your card, I will communicate with you. I don't think he will molest you after receiving the letter I shall send him to-night."

I was so relieved at her going that I didn't even look for her name on the card for some time, but when I did, saw printed thereon:

"Anton Barittz, 18, Vandor Street."

I wrote to the gentleman, stirring him up, but had to do so carefully, not having the lady's name. I got no reply, nor did I receive any communication from the artist's model, and as the days went by, and the dreams no longer disturbed me, the whole matter gradually faded from my recollection. It was only a temporary forgetfulness, for a couple of weeks later I heard the newsboys calling out:

"Horrible murder of an artist in Vandor Street."

I invested in one of the halfpenny evening papers that gloat over the morbid details of a murder, and read that Barittz had been murdered while lying in bed—stabbed through the heart.

Everybody knows that dreams are supposed to work out exactly contrary; it was only natural, therefore, I should at once conclude that the mild, persecuted model had committed the crime. It was no business of mine, however, and I kept my own counsel, but never remember taking such an interest in a murder as I did in this one. The police, despite all their efforts, were completely at sea. Nothing like the vestige of a clue could they get. Even the knife or dagger with which the crime was perpetrated had been removed. The servants were all out at the time, and the whole affair was shrouded in mystery.

Occasionally I thought of telling the police about the visit of the model, but on second thoughts I decided not to, as if anyone were arrested and charged with the crime I would in all probability have either to defend or prosecute. One thing, however, a mere curiosity perhaps, but I could not resist going to see the murdered man. I felt convinced in my mind that I would find in him the dark-visaged, Vandyke-bearded man of my dreams. I had no difficulty in getting access to the chamber of death, but to my astonishment, almost dismay, the dead man's features bore no resemblance to the man of my dreams. He was fair, at least for a foreigner, and wore a long, silky, brown beard, as unlike my imaginative creation as could be.

On my return to the office, my clerk informed me that a gentleman was waiting to see me—his name was Franco Barittz, brother of the murdered man I had just seen.

I cannot say that I was much surprised to find my visitor the real murderer of my dream, and every nerve of my body quivered with excitement as I acknowledged his bow.

"I am, as no doubt your clerk has told you, brother to the M. Barittz who was murdered the day before yesterday—and I have called upon you to ask your aid."

He spoke perfect English, and if my life had depended on my correct answer, I couldn't have told to what nationality he belonged.

"I'm afraid the police can give you more assistance, monsieur, than I possibly can—at present at any rate," I cautiously replied.

"Ah, but the police are such dolts—and I hear that Mr. Lawrence is spoken of as a remarkably shrewd man in criminal matters."

I smiled at the forced compliment, wondering when the real object of the visit would be made known, and what nature it might take.

"I have already made many discoveries," M. Barittz continued. "First of all, I learnt that some lady, an artist's model, had visited you here late in the evening. That she had complained of receiving insults from my brother, and of being threatened and followed, or in some way molested. Now, Mr. Lawrence, the whole of that is false. This Miss Rose Mayton never entered my brother's house, nor did she receive any communication from him. As a matter of fact, family matters have occupied his time so much lately that he has practically neglected his art altogether."

"Then why should the lady come to me with that story—what benefit could she derive from making such a statement?"

"We will find that out in time. In the meanwhile, I have two very sharp detectives of my own working on the case, and I hourly expect to hear that they have traced this model, and that brings me to the object of my visit. Will you tell me the address the lady gave you?"

"That is more than I can, no matter how anxious I might be to tell you, because instead of leaving a card of her own, she left me one of your brother's."

Digitized by Google

I noticed just the least twinge of the muscles of his mouth as I gave him the last bit of information, but took care not to let him have any suspicion that I had noticed it; but from his reserved manner afterwards, and his persistent twisting of the conversation to commonplaces, I gathered that he doubted me. Promising to call next day he left me, after offering both a fee and profuse thanks and apologies.

My own work was fated to interruptions that day, for I had no sooner got comfortably settled than another visitor was announced.

"Who is it this time?" I asked rather petulantly.

"Ex-sergeant Banner, sir; says it is most important."

"Well, Banner, have you taken to work again?"

"Yes, sir, and the rummest job I was ever on."

"Ah?"

"Yes, sir, it's this artist murder in Vandor Street. A tall, dark chap, with a pointed beard, comes to me the other night an' says: 'I'm the brother of that murdered chap in Vandor Street; I believe he was killed by a woman who is an artist's model.' He gave me the particulars and finished up by saying: 'Find that woman for me and I'll give you a hundred pounds.'"

"A good offer, Banner."

"You bet I was on it at once, sir, but now if you please, I'm being shadowed myself; and an hour ago a chap puts this note into my hands."

He gave me a scrap of paper upon which was written:

"Content yourself with doing the work you will be paid for."

"What have you been doing, Banner?"

"Well, sir, you know that when you're on a case you must look into everything, and leave nothing to chance. Now I don't like the face of that man Barittz, and seeing him last night talking in Oxford Circus with a tall woman in a dark veil, I got suspicious, and shadowed him, and overheard a little of their conversation. I heard him tell the woman that he would do for that girl as soon as he found her, and she replied about getting something first. I didn't hear any more because some fellow came and jostled up against me—I suppose he was a spy in Barittz's employ."

"Pity you didn't shadow the woman."

"I did, Mr. Lawrence, and she went into the house in Vandor Street."

"It's developing into quite a mysterious case, Banner, and I think it might almost pay you better to watch the principal movers in this little drama, than keep at a search I'm afraid will, or might, be futile."

"Don't you think that woman exists, sir?"

"Oh, yes, but I think they have a reason for sending you on a wild-goose chase. Leave the finding of this model to me, you keep an eye on Barittz, I'll supply the necessary funds. You might also find out what you can about the occupants of 18, Vandor Street."

I gave Banner a blank cheque, in case of emergencies, and he departed, no doubt determined to do or die, but I verily believe when he left me he hadn't an idea which way to turn. I felt convinced, however, that whatever was to be found out, Banner was the man to succeed. He had been one of the smartest men in the Criminal Investigation Department, and only but for his health breaking down, which necessitated his retiring, would have risen high in the force. For one thing, he looked a born fool, and as innocent as any country yokel, and he was a splendid linguist.

Three weeks went by and I neither saw nor heard anything of Banner—indeed the whole case seemed to have died, the evening papers couldn't get enough to make a paragraph of, and I dare say those who did think of the case at all, shrugged their shoulders and sagely remarked that it was only another instance where the police were beaten.

The first intimation I received informing me that the case was still somebody's business was a peculiarly worded telegram, from Charing Cross office.

"British ensign will be hoisted at three o'clock promptly."

I knew it was from Banner, and surely enough at three o'clock he was duly announced.

"Well!" I exclaimed as that worthy entered my room, "you have been wandering all over the globe, I should think."

"I've been to Paris, Hamburg, Moscow and Petersburg, sir, thanks to your foresight in giving me that cheque."

"Do you know, Banner, it never occurred to me to find out whether you had used it or not, but I have been very busy." Which was quite true.

"The night after I left you, Mr Lawrence, I was giving some instructions to my pal when out comes Barittz with a bag and rug, jumps into a hansom and drives off. There wasn't another cab about, and I felt real wild. I ran into Cromwell Road, hailed a cab from the stand and told him to just let her hum to Victoria."

"Why Victoria; did you hear the destination?"

"No, sir, but it was nearly half-past seven, and I knew the continental train left Victoria at 8.50. Sure enough his nibs was there. The next question was money—then disguise. I had about six shillings in my pocket and it was then a few minutes past eight."

"Rather awkward, Banner! What did you do?"

"Well, sir, I'll admit I felt somewhat in a hole, but I meant going by the train, money or no money. I knew the fare to Paris was 18s. 7d. I then remembered that I knew a man who kept a small inn at Newhaven. I ran to the booking office, found the fare was 4s. 8½d., and of course the rest was simple. I got my pal to rig me out both with toggery and funds. I kept a watchful eye on Barittz in Paris, but it was in Hamburg where I learned all about him. Of course, I don't know for certain, but I'm almost sure that he is an emissary of some Nihilist or Socialistic society, carrying gems of information about, principally through the medium of pieces of sculpture. One item of importance I did find out, and that was that Barittz never had a brother."

"Then I wonder who the murdered man was and why he was killed?"

"My idea is, sir, that he found out something about Barittz, and he, on the principle that 'dead men tell no tales,' put an end to him."

"As likely as not."

"Well, sir, I'm off to see what's been going on while I've been away. I'll come back and report."

About an hour afterwards he returned.

"We've found the artist's model, sir, and so has Barittz; at least my man says he saw one of his spies hurrying off towards Vandor Street as soon as he was certain of the girl."

"And what do you propose, Banner?"

"If we're sharp, sir, we might get there first and hide in the room and hear all that passes between 'em. The lady is willing, sir, so long as we promise that no harm shall come to her."

Banner and I immediately left for the house of Miss Mayton, and were lucky enough to arrive first. We had hardly spoken ten words, however, before a sharp knocking at the door announced the arrival of Barittz.

Digitized by Google

Banner hid behind a screen, and I got myself concealed beneath the heavy folds of some curtains, close to the sofa, upon which Miss Mayton was reclining.

"Ha, ha! my fair traitress, I've found you at last, have I?" savagely remarked Barittz as he bounced into the room.

"I am certainly here, and have been for some weeks. What is it you want this time?"

"You know what it is I want, you she-devil, and I mean to have it or kill you here as you lie."

"That wouldn't save your life, M. Barittz."

"No, but I could die calmer and more contented if I killed you first."

"Supposing I told you that I hadn't got this little bauble you make such a fuss over, what then?"

"I should say mademoiselle lied. Listen, you took that little copper coin—the insignia of my position—not knowing its value; already one man has been executed by the League for not having it, and unless I produce it to-morrow night in Hamburg, I shall be assassinated, too. Now, what did I do to you? Merely tried to kiss you. Many a woman in your humble position would have felt honoured by such an attention from an artist like me. You, however, in your stupidity, struggled and fought, and while doing so detached a trinket from my watch-guard. I didn't miss it at first, but when I did I appealed to you, feeling sure that you had it; I say I appealed to you to give it to me. I even offered you a large sum of money for it. You pretended you had not got it. Then you ran away and hid, and despite the efforts of the spies I put on to trace you, I failed to hear of your whereabouts until now. I ought to have given M. Carnac the symbol of office the day before the murder, but as I had not got it. I couldn't. He was executed in my house by order of the Nihilist committee for disobeying orders. That is one murder on your soul. Do you want to have another?"

The woman sat upon the sofa, and as she spoke looked radiantly beautiful.

"You lie, M. Barittz. I saw you stab that man while he was asleep."

"Sacré! Then you were in my house were you, you canaille of an English spy. You shall never spy on me again—die like a dog!"

From where I peeped behind the curtains, I could just see the bright gleam of some steel instrument poised ere descending on the helpless woman, when I heard a sharp ping—and the next second felt something wet splash against my face. Banner had shot the man dead.

The Russian police, when acquainted with the facts, informed me that Carnac was a spy in their employ, and that they had made every arrangement for capturing Barittz on his next visit to the Continent.

My dream was realised after all, but I never anticipated that those four nightmares would be the means of my finding the loveliest and dearest woman on earth for a wife.

C. ENGLAND COWAN.

NOW

is the time to commence collecting coupons in the £400 Coupon Competition. It is considered the proper thing to turn over a new leaf in the history of one's life on New Year's Day, if you want to move with the times, and should like to point out that in doing so this year you have the words ONE HUNDRED POUNDS FOR YOU writ large on the top of the page. If you throw away the chance it is your own fault, we be to blame. The coupons appear in Short Stories, in Pearson's Weekly, and in Home Notes every week, and will continue to do so throughout the year 1897. Inveigle your friends into becoming subscribers to these three papers, and get them to give you the coupons. Don't discouraged because you can't get together as many as you think you ought to have. If you don't get one of the big sums you stand a good chance for one of the hundreds of valuable consolation prizes going to the senders of the next largest batches. Of course, the whole thing is a big advertising scheme. You help us, and we pay you well. That's the

WE

SHAN'T

BE

LONG

and the short of it. So get to work at once. £100 to the collector of the largest number of coupons from Short Stories and Pearson's Weekly together; £100 to ditto, ditto, from Home Notes; £100 to the newsagent who collects the largest number of NEWSAGENTS' coupons from Short Stories, and Pearson's Weekly and £100 to ditto, ditto from Home Notes.

A NEW VOLUME OF

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE

COMMENCES WITH THE

January Number, published on Friday, January 1st, 1897. Price 6d. Nett.

Among the Contents are the following Articles and Stories:

A Prince of Swindlers. GUY BOOTHBY.
Illustrated by E. F. SKINNER.

The Thames Police. E. A. DU PLAT.
Illustrated with drawings and photographs.

Tales of the High Seas. CONAN DOYLE.
(COMPLETE STORY.)
No. I.—THE GOVERNOR OF ST. KITT'S.
Illustrated by WARWICK GOBLE.

Which is the Cleverest County? J. HOLT SCHOOLING.
Illustrated with diagrams by the Author.

How the Proceedings of Parliament are Recorded. A. A. TAYLOR.
Illustrated with photographs.

Queen of the Jesters. MAX PEMBERTON.
(COMPLETE STORY.)
No. I.—THE HUNGER OF FERDINAND DAUBERVAL.
Illustrated by H. PIFFARD.

Captains Courageous. RUDYARD KIPLING.
CHAPTERS III. AND IV.
Illustrated by F. T. JANE and I. W. TABER.

Is Palmistry Dependable? ROBERT MACHRAY.
Illustrated with photographs.

Mrs. Malleson's Rival. LOUIS BECKE.
(COMPLETE STORY.)
Illustrated by FRANK FELLER.

Whitby Jet. PHILIP HEMERY.
Illustrated with photographs and sketches.

The Native Soldiery of India. E. LE BRETON MARTIN.
Illustrated by C. CLARK.

Digitized by Google

THE room was a large and magnificently appointed one in the palace of Gatsclinia. An immense fire burned in the elegant porcelain stove—it was almost red hot—a table littered with pamphlets and papers, also a couple of arm-chairs were drawn up before it; two men stood there, one old, but alert, stern, uncompromising, General Sergius Kalitzin, chief of the Imperial Military Police of Russia. The other, young, handsome, bearded, resolute, Alexander, the Tsar.

The Ruler held in his hand a pen, and presently he sat down and dipped it in the ink. He wrote rapidly some twenty lines and handed them to the General—this is an Imperial method not uncommon of replying to communications of a certain nature.

Kalitzin took it and read, his face darkening with excited blood as he did so, his brows contracting, his lips quivering, his powerful hand shaking.

"Your Majesty!" cried he under his breath, "I implore of you, for the sake of the Empire, your father's sacred memory, your oath, your religion, do not venture on such enterprises!"

Alexander remained silent, merely shaking his head with a smile and pointing to the slip of paper containing his autocratic instructions.

"But, sire, I implore pardon!" The old man bent his knee to the young one. "If you persist in these investigations yourself, death, death is positive. I tell you, as I have just rehearsed to you, the Nihilists are a power we must dread; we must crush, stamp out, burn, torture, strangle, for it is strong, and these of whom I have told you are keen as daggers. They have sworn; they are sharp; they have taken the oath, and if your Majesty persists in the course here outlined, I, the chief of the Military Police of the Empire, confess to you that I may prove of no avail."

The Tsar again smiled as he extended his hand to raise the General, at the same moment taking from him the slip of paper, lighting it at the fire, and holding it until it crumbled into a feathery nothing.

Kalitzin rose and bowed; he knew that the secret orders—so secret as not even to be spoken lest the very walls should possess ears, and always burned lest trace of them might fall into treacherous fingers—must be obeyed, yet there was trouble, and even sorrow in his countenance as he quitted the presence of his Imperial master, and hastened to give directions in connection with the Sovereign's proposed visit to Paris, for which place he set out on the following morning. Kalitzin went also; in these days he was never more than three feet distant from the Tsar, with eyes watchful as the hungry tiger's, and a scent for danger as acute.

Once arrived in the French capital, it would seem that the precautions for the Russian safety were redoubled, and amid all that hubbub of fêtes, shows, pageants, balls, exhibitions and reviews, there stalked grimly the living, breathing, palpitating purpose of the followers of Prince Krapotkine, the determination to kill the Tsar.

Who was to do it?

General Kalitzin knew, he and three others; one, the person who was to do it; another, the accomplice; the third, the victim himself; these were all, and yet Alexander smiled on and went about apparently in unconcern.

When a man is guarded as he was, it is not hard to smile with unconcern.

To-night he sat in the superbly decorated box prepared for him at the Opera. Calvé was singing Carmen, but with a motion of weariness he leaned back, and concealing a yawn, withdrew behind the shadow of the silken curtain.

With a languid hand he picked up his lorgnette and surveyed the house. Glancing to the right, round the circle of boxes, his gaze was suddenly arrested as the gaze of a man is arrested but once in the course of his life.

Digitized by Google

By the sight of a woman's face.

This woman was dressed like a Spanish woman in a Velasquez portrait, in clinging robes of dull browns and fawns, a little cap of the same hues sat on top of her head; her hair was dull yellow, and it was worn in a curious tangled mass with wing-like loops over her ears; her arms, in their tightly-puffed sleeves, were very long and slender, and she held them crossed innocence-fashion on her breast between them On the glint of bare ivory-flesh shining pallid next the velvet of her bodice, hung, on a magnificent golden chain bestudded with topazes, an aggressively large and exquisitely painted miniature of the Tsar of Russia. The woman's face was far from beautiful; far more than beautiful; it possessed that divinity of difference from all the other women's faces Alexander had ever seen which made it for him the most extraordinary bewitching and alluring face in the world. She was pale with a radiant pallor, features a bit Tartaric, straight yet flat full lips, pink as coral, eyes under thick, light eyebrows shining like the topazes that blinked on her bosom.

She looked like a moth, a strange note of wildness subdued her and held her prisoner, fluttering maybe in irked enforcement amid this sea of other tame women in their blue and green and red and yellow and white, and multitudinous rainbow fallals.

Her companion, she had but one, was a man, or a boy —it was difficult to determine which—a being at any rate of the liveliest temperament, with jet black curls worn clustering around his bright vermilion painted cheeks; evening clothes, it is true, but with much savagery in the way of a scarlet satin cravat, jewelled pins, chains, rings, and a bracelet of wrought iron, delicate as a girl's bauble, encircled with a pigmy watch, set in diamonds between its links.

This fat, white, braceleted hand was raised most of the time holding an opera-glass, which, at the moment that the Tsar had levelled his and caught glimpses of the moth-like girl, the painted boy handed to her, whispering:

"Take the glasses and look at him well."

She took it, and the rays of light from the electric globes above them in the centre of the ceiling became entangled in these two glasses, held by the Tsar of Russia and the moth-like girl; a spark as of lightning's fire was emitted by the contact, and both the man and the woman dropped their arms as if struck by some power stronger than either of them.

Alexander of Russia sat bolt upright now, with no more languidness in look or mien, without removing his eyes from the woman's face, he motioned with his hand that Kalitzin should approach him.

"Who is that, Kalitzin?" asked the young man in a bewildered voice, "that girl yonder in the third box to the right, all ivory and yellow and brown, with something like tiger's eyes shining round a picture on her breast. Find out for me, if you please."

General Kalitzin paused a second before he either bowed or replied to his Sovereign; a strange hesitancy was in his manner, something between fear and irresolution.

But an instant, however, and then he inclined profoundly and ventured to glance at the Tsar with an expression of interrogative curiosity on his wrinkled face.

Alexander felt it, and without turning his head he deigned to answer the unasked question with a sigh and an imperious inflation, briefly thus:

"She attracts me."

"God forbid!" exclaimed the old soldier under his breath, and with such a terrible fervour that the Ruler half-turned in his seat with something like a frown.

"Your Majesty," whispered Kalitzin with a shudder, "that is she."

"Yes; that is she," murmured Alexander half to himself, as once again his gaze is riveted on the face of the moth-like girl.

"That is she."

It is what every man, however humble or mighty, says to himself one time in his career.

Kalitzin looked at his master, his face betraying as he looked a sense of horror, anxiety, and consternation.

"Your Majesty," he continued, "that woman is the woman I told you of before we quitted Russia, to whose lot it fell, when lots were drawn, to be the assassin of your Majesty; she glories in the fate; she is here in Paris masquerading as a Russian patriotic aristocrat, so as to watch you and strike her blow at the most convenient moment; she wears ostentatiously on her bosom a miniature of your Majesty; the watchword between her and her accomplice, that red-cheeked boy who poses as her brother, is: 'When the Tsar is Crowned.' Your Majesty, now, now, now, that I am able this night to reveal to you the details of the dangers which encompass your person, I implore of you, cut short your stay in this accursed Paris. Let us begone to-morrow, nay, this very night! for nowhere—and it is I who say it—is your Majesty safe except in Petersburg." Kalitzin's voice trembled with suppressed emotion as he spoke.

The Tsar turned again half-way towards him, his countenance, notwithstanding the thick beard and moustache, was ashy pale, his eyes widened and staring.

"Her brother?" was what he said.

"God knows! most likely her lover, if such women have hearts," returned the amazed soldier impatiently. "Petro Petrovitch, one of my most trusted men, came to me this morning with the information I have just imparted to your Majesty; at three this afternoon his dead body was found in the Seine, at St. Cloud!"

Kalitzin stares at his royal master in blank astonishment, for on the Tsar's face there is not a trace of even interest as to the fate of Petro Petrovitch, and his eyes are again fastened on the moth-like girl. They are like snakes; their holes are invisible to mortal vision, their fangs are deadly, the poison they use is undiscoverable the devil himself is their aide-de-camp. "Oh, your Majesty, permit me—and forgive me for the persistency—permit me to issue your command to the suite for a secret departure from Paris this night; a diplomatic feature is easily arranged for your going; one has not too much to dread from the displeasure of a Republic." Kalitzin's large hand grasps the arms of the Ruler's chair like a vice.

"What is her name?" asks Alexander, in a curious, hushed voice.

"She goes by the name of Princess Kara Chreptovitch," is the response.

"And she lives?"

"At number 28, Cours la Reine."

"And you know nothing more than you have said?"

Kalitzin shakes his hoary head.

"Nothing as yet; we shall have to spill a man's blood each day in sacrifice to their diabolical methods in order to find out."

"She has baffled you, then?" remarks the Ruler.

"I confess it," returns the old man. "All I know I have told your Majesty; those two wretches yonder laugh in derision when the words: 'When the Tsar is crowned' reach their ears; and they and every one of the three millions—yes, your Majesty, three millions—of Nihilists scattered over your dominions and over the world, laugh in scorn when they read those words, when they hear those words now burning on the lips of the civilised globe; they swear that the coronation shall never take place; they swear that yonder fiend, with your image blazing on her breast, will strike you dead."

Digitized by Google

"Ah—h!"

It is something between a gasp and a sigh that parts the Tsar's lips as at last, his eyes still fixed, as were hers on him, on the moth-like girl, he says:

"Kalitzin, you may issue orders for a secret departure from Paris to-night, immediately on our reaching the hotel after the opera."

"Your Majesty, thank God!" The tears almost glisten in the old soldier's eyes.

"Once in Russia, once in Petersburg, far from that wretches' den, Geneva, and I am master of the situation, safe sure. But not here, not here, within range of that ivory-looking woman."

Alexander gives a dismissing nod.

During the last act he sits, still watching the moth-like girl, and now, too, the painted boy.

* * * *

By two o'clock, that is about three hours after the last notes of Carmen had died out in the opera-house of Paris, five carriages and several horsemen, twelve soldiers of the Russian Imperial Guard, twenty gens-d'armes and a miscellaneous following of grooms, servants and luggage quitted the Hotel Continental for the Gare du Nord.

By the time the cavalcade, which aroused not the slightest interest in the few revelers, street-sweepers, and early market-men whom it encountered, had reached the railway station, the dim film of violet irridescence, humid harbinger of the dawn, stole up the horizon, crept across the rim, curled in the tops of the chestnut flowers, wakened the birds, drew the scent from the earth and grass on the Cours la Reine, that matchless avenue, and at last, violet melting into golden arms of risen sun, night marrying with day, the Hymen-torch of their nuptials struck the gilded cupola of the Invalides, and kissed the sky into rosy joy at birth of yesterday's to-morrow.

At one of the windows of number twenty-eight, a white hand opened the lattice, disclosing the moth-like girl standing in her night apparel, breathing in the pungent air of the unsullied morning; the lace at her bosom fluttered back with the breeze, revealing the golden chain, another miniature of the Tsar; her dull locks were pushed behind her little ears and fell forlornly in two rough braids to her knees; she put her hand up and shaded her eyes from the glint of fierce coppery light which struck them from the dome of the Invalides; she bent listening, for a sharp sound, as of the click of a cane on the pavement, attracted her; she leaned to look out, and beheld the painted boy coming glibly in the porte-cochère. Then she withdrew, and pulled a dressing-gown of red cloth over her white one, pinned up her braids and glided to the door of the room, opened it, and, meeting him on the landing, drew him in with anxious and imperious gestures.

She looked like a moth.

"Well, my princess!" cried he, with a fawn's grin on his fat face as he ran his plump fingers through his well-oiled curls and cast the yellow béret on the sofa.

"Hast no word for me after my absence? no welcome?"

"Liof Mouravief, I have told thee a million times I will have no words or thoughts for thee or any other man until this human vampire"—the moth-girl holds up the Tsar's miniature as she speaks—"lies dead by this hand. What hast thou found out since I parted from thee at the opera-house? I am in a fever of impatience; time hangs heavy on my hands until I can set the trap and catch the Imperial ermine. Oh, now that I have seen him, gazed upon his flesh and bone, my nerve is steadier for the deed, my heart happier, my whole being the more intensely, irrevocably absorbed in the fulfilment of my oath."

The moth-like girl standing in her night apparel.

The moth-like girl is pacing up and down the room, her hand is clenched on the Tsar's miniature as to cause the gems encrusting the frame to cut into her tender fingers. She pauses under the chandelier; the candles are still lighted, albeit spluttering to their end; she raises her arms above her head, her eyes uplifted as she goes on:

"Oh, my Russia, my Russia, my frozen, bitten, whipped, oppressed country! bleeding and sweating at every pore with the thin blood of starved, tortured men, women and children; howling with the million cracked, parched throats that choke in the mines of Siberia; with the million backs breaking back into mother earth under the sting of the lash that goads you because you have dared raise voice against the despot who sits upon a throne of gold; my people shrieking with your more than million tongues to me, to all of us, to save, to rescue, to avenge you; I would stick spurs of steel red hot into my very heart did I now not quiver with impatience for the moment when I may enmesh, crush, kill the tyrant whose hand is against and never for you!"

She has dropped upon her knees, still holding the Tsar's portrait up before her.

The painted boy looks at her, shrugs his shoulders, sighs, and then, crossing to the open window, he closes it sharply, blows out the dying candles, lights fresh ones, picks up a sponge, wets it with Colonge and water and washes the rouge off his face; he also removes his curls, so black and loving, leaving himself thereafter a man, pale, golden-haired, sombre, with eyes of blue fire, devouring in speechless greediness the beauty of the moth-like girl.

He approaches her now, and lays his hand upon her head.

She shakes off his touch, and in a harsh voice she cries out:

"Liof Mouravief, I tell thee no man shall touch me until I have accomplished my mission. What news have you? Where sups he to-night? How soon wilt thou snap the pretty bracelet on my wrist? How soon may I set the watch in motion and throw it—away? Tell me?"

Liof Mouravief turns moodily off.

"Alexander and his suite quitted Paris two hours ago; their——"

"What! and the deed not yet done!"

"Their destination Petersburg. The information brought them by that wretch Petrovitch—by-the-way, he is dead—has set them agog. Kalitzin's eyes were upon us."

"Us! and has he found ways to discover that I am aught save the Princess Chreptovitch?"

"He has; while you were staring at the Tsar last night the Tsar was staring at you, and no doubt Kalitzin at his elbow was identifying you for his master's benefit."

The girl pauses.

"Well, what of it? We will never come in contact. If he has returned to Russia we can do the same; our passports are unimpeachable; our credentials perfect; and, by the living God"—she again holds up the miniature—"I swear that if these eyes once again behold the tyrant they shall not quit their gaze till his are sightless in death.

"Liof!" she whispers, "we have wasted too much time already; do you make the preparation for our departure on to-morrow night, and before I live another hour without it, give me the bracelet, here, clasp it on my arm, let me eat, sleep, move, knowing that the little dainty bomb, light as a diamond, easily thrown as a flower, is where I can reach it, use it at a second's warning."

Liof shook his head angrily; he loved this woman and was biding his time to make her his wife.

"I will keep it until the time comes," he says sternly; "that is part of my duty."

"You will give it to me now," she says, gritting her white fox teeth together, and adding, with that celestial smile upon her face, which such women have: "If you love me, as I am sure you do."

He transferred the death-dealing bauble to her wrist, blessing fate for the chance to finger that adorable white arm.

That evening the Princess Kara Chreptovitch received as usual on Thursdays. A great crowd of clever people were always to be found in her salon last winter, you will easily remember if you chanced to have been then in Paris; personages, many of them in the social, literary, art and dramatic worlds, others to fill in; clever men and women, too, but indistinctive, each glad to be there in the house of the original Princess, who was so enthusiastic in her patriotic devotion to her Tsar.

She stood there now, her yellow hair once more looped

Digitized by Google

in those strange little wings, and sprayed and woven into meshy mosses at the back; a little coronet of topazes glimmered on top of it, and she was dressed in the national sarafan, the loose, square-necked, sleeveless gown of yellow satin worn over a full-sleeved yellow caltin chemise, thin woven yellow sandals on her feet and long yellow gloves on her hands; the miniature of the Tsar shone on her bosom, and the painted boy, posing cheerily as her brother, flitted near her.

There was music, something half barbaric, sensuous, sweet, sounding out from the rear of the ante-room; everyone was chattering with much laughter and gaiety, when the servant entered and approached Kara Chreptovitch with a card and a great heavy heap of purple sweetness on his salver.

She took the card, and the scent of the violets greeted her as if one with the lusciousness of the music.

She read the name.

"Alexis Tzof," and beneath was written: "A fellow-countryman, a stranger, a sympathiser, begs the honour of permission to pay his respects to the Princess Kara Chreptovitch."

In an instant the painted boy was beside her; he had read the card, thrown it in the fire, the flame of suspicion which is the familiar of such people leaping to his face, and the violets went after the card, he standing between Kara and the fire, not to be surprised if an explosion should follow.

But none did.

Nothing worse occurred than that the stranger, possibly tired of waiting in the ante-room, now entered the salon, and made his way directly to the hostess.

Alexis Tzof was a young man noticeable above others, not on account of his height, which was great, or the splendour of his physique, or the perfection of his toilette, or his beauty, but for his atmosphere, which was unique, commanding, demanding and obtaining pre-eminence wherever he was. He was fair, with a face as smooth as a girl's and as strong as a lion's whelp, beautiful white teeth and eyes of tourmaline; they rested with an expression most caressing upon Kara's face, and instantly she felt a shiver of curious thrillingness pass over her; he bent his head, took her hand in his large, strong, white one, raised it to his lips—as he did so the rays from a cat's-eye which he wore upon his finger met those of the diamonds surrounding the Princess's portrait of the Tsar—the flash seemed electric—it smote Kara and half blinded her; she stood nerveless, passive, resistless, while the newcomer, well-watched by Liof Mouravief, spoke.

What did he say?

Such things as all women love to hear. That unseen he had gazed upon her, followed her, shadowed her, unable to obtain presentation, he had at last in desperation resolved to this means of gaining her acquaintance; that he was amply prepared to satisfy her and her brother as to his identity and qualifications and so forth and so on.

Kara Chreptovitch listened as one listens in dreams that are sweet, dreading the awakening; thereafter all the evening her guests float before her as misty creatures, films dwarfed into nonentities by this surpassing being so full of strength, possessiveness, power, newness.

The painted boy was uneasy and alert; he thought he detected beneath all this paraphernalia a secret emissary of Kalitzin's, and he was very wary.

As one by one finally almost the last of the company were leaving, he contrived to convey as much to Kara.

She started, rubbing her eyes as a child disturbed in its refreshing sleep.

The last person has now quitted the salon except Tzof; he too was at the door, but he turned with a quick and gallant motion and was beside Kara; the painted boy, keen for mischief, had his hand on his pistol in his little pocket, while the stranger spoke.

"Excellent, sir," Tzof said quietly, while a faint smile of amusement played upon his full red lips, "delay a little; I assure you with me you will have no use for your weapon."

The painted boy still held it fast, however; conspirators are firm believers in the universality of conspiracies.

"Madame," with a profound inclination before the Princess, "I have noted both here and everywhere that I have had the honour to behold you, that you wear the portrait of the man they call the Tsar of Russia," an inflection a trifle sad, a trifle supercilious strokes the ears of his two listeners.

"Madame, I have of late been in Geneva;" his voice lowers to a mere whisper as he glanced round cautiously, for at the mention of that Swiss city both Kara and Liof could not forbear a start of bewilderment and apprehension.

"There," continued Tzof, "where you frequented not

Kara Chreptovitch listened as one listens in dreams.

Digitized by Google

Falling on his knees before her.

long since, I, too, have been familiar. I mean in the small shops of Serge Prost in the Rue Sturm."

The eyes of Kara and Liof dart against each other like the play of criss-cross lightning.

"The words you have heard I, too, have listened to." Now his tones sunk even lower, and articulation is scarcely more than mere breathing.

"When the Tsar is crowned," murmurs Alexis Tzof, fixing his peculiar orbs on the face of Kara Chreptovitch.

The painted boy takes his hand from his pocket.

The Princess shudders as her glance is dissolved in his, absorbed by his, shudders with the perfect heretofore unknown bliss of actual vital, divine loving.

And the three sat there with close-drawn curtains late into the night, even until once more the dawn pricks all the east with rose and quenches the stars and reawakens the world to its new round of labour and sweat.

* * * *

It had been planned by the Princess and Liof Mouravief to quit Paris for Petersburg the night following the Tsar's sudden departure; it has been told how anxious was Kara Chreptovitch to go, to place herself at once within reach of her intended victim.

Very well; but they did not quit Paris. So often does it happen that the desire of yesterday burns out in the flames of to-day's fire.

The painted boy was for departure.

The Princess made excuse of not being well; he stared; she was unresponsive, languid, indolent, lying at length on her lounge, full of absent-mindedness, with lowered lids.

Alexis Tzof came again that evening, and while she should have been journeying post-haste to the frontier, she languished amid warmth, downy cushions at her feet and head, listening to the music of his voice.

The painted boy played the piano until he was tired, and then he went out in the little garden and smoked, peeping in at the windows in jealous rage at these two, complacent, quiet content, if for no other reason than that they had at last met, where it now appeared to them that they must have been waiting to meet since the world began.

What did they speak of?

Naught but themselves, naught but that supreme theme which Adam and Eve, making primal awakening in one another's arms, found sweeter than any other ever to be mentioned again.

This went on for a fortnight.

Always the Petersburg journey put off; always Alexis Tzof each day and evening too. Always the painted boy a little dull, but watchful and patient till now.

He raged up and down in front of her, his light eyes swimming in tears of anger and passion.

"I tell you it must stop. I will not have it; you are betrothed to me; you are bound by a sacred vow to end the tyrant. You! once most eager to plunge the knife, to throw the little bomb there on your wrist. You! forsooth must linger on fêting and pleasuring here in Paris. Why? Because a tall man is become your hero, your slave and your master, both in one. Kara, if you do not come at once to Petersburg I will kill your lover and denounce you to the leaders at Geneva."

Lashed into a fine fury, the painted boy in his little yellow béret and his evening clothes—for it was now nine o'clock, and guests as usual were expected in the Princess's salon—dashed up and down, smashing a few cups and saucers en route.

Kara looked at him; how impotent, how silly he was;

Digitized by Google

she shrugged her shoulders and united the iron bracelet round her arm with a smile. At last she said:

"I promise you, as the tyrant, within forty hours from to-morrow either he or I will be no more." She sighs, for Alexis Tzof has stolen all the tang and smart and bitter out of her oath. Yet she knows it must be kept.

"And me! me! What of me?" almost shrieks the painted boy at her ear.

"You!" the Princess stares at him. "You can do nothing, be nothing, say nothing, until this bracelet has done its work. Run away," she says lightly, "and play the piano and compose yourself; I hear footsteps."

The guests came; they ate and made merry.

The guests went, all save Alexis Tzof.

Kara Chreptovitch stood leaning against the marble statue of Aphrodite, her hands were clasped in front of her, her arms so encircling the portrait of the Tsar. She was looking down; she trembled; she knew that the wonderful divine moment of life had come; she knew that unspeakable joy stepped across her threshold, entering in, and giving her new birth as Tzof drew near to her.

"Kara," he whispered, "Kara, beloved one, it is something with you as it is with me, is it not? Speak, sweet love, and say to me that thou lovest me one tithe as well as I love thee? Oh, 'tis not love, my worshipped lady," cries he, falling on his knees before her and reaching up to clasp her slender waist. "It is idolatry; for thee I would throw away a world; for thee I would resign all that men crave; for thee honour, life, kingdoms, principalities; all weigh as nothing. Speak to me, my dove, one word!"

"I love thee—but my oath, my mission too long have tarried; this night must see me on the way to Petersburgh to fulfil my destiny."

"And thou canst talk of destinies when this moment makes our destinies one! Beloved, dost thou think I will allow thee to separate from me, risk thyself, who dost now belong to me?" Tzof holds the moth-like girl close to his breast with both arms about her, his eyes fixed upon her face in unutterable tenderness.

A sound comes up through the silent house; it is the creak of the painted boy's boots; the Princess breaks her bonds, stands wildly like some hunted wild thing, beaten by cruel dogs into a last unavailing court; the boots of the painted boy creak nearer.

"Oh!" cries she. "Away from me; tempt me no more, or I cannot withstand. My oath must be kept. Alexis Tzof, if I accomplish my mission and live, then I am thine own; if not, farewell."

Tzof approaches her.

"Then," he says simply, standing in the flicker of the firelight, his hand on her shoulder, "keep your oath now, this moment, for I am Alexander, the Tsar."

Smitten, blinded, stunned, she cowers at the base of the statue of Aphrodite, no whiter than she.

"Thou!" she murmurs, creeping slowly to him. "Thou!" And the music in her voice is of heaven, so touching, so tender, as she draws down his beardless face to her bosom and strokes and caresses it with cold, trembling little fingers.

"I, even I," he says, holding her to his heart.

"And I have now had thy image on my heart for eighteen long months and not to know thee when I saw thee bare of beard." All these few moments she is caressing his face, his throat, his hands.

The boots of Liof Mouravief now creak on the staircase.

The moth-like girl rises.

She drags herself the whole length of the very long room. Alexis Tzof crosses down to the other end to meet the painted boy.

He meets him.

Neither sees the woman.

She wrests the iron bracelet from her wrist, and snatching the bomb, light as a blossom, from its jewelled socket, she raises her arm and drops it, snapping, at her own feet.

A sharp report, a dull thud, two weak woman's hands clasped on the portrait of the Tsar on her bosom.

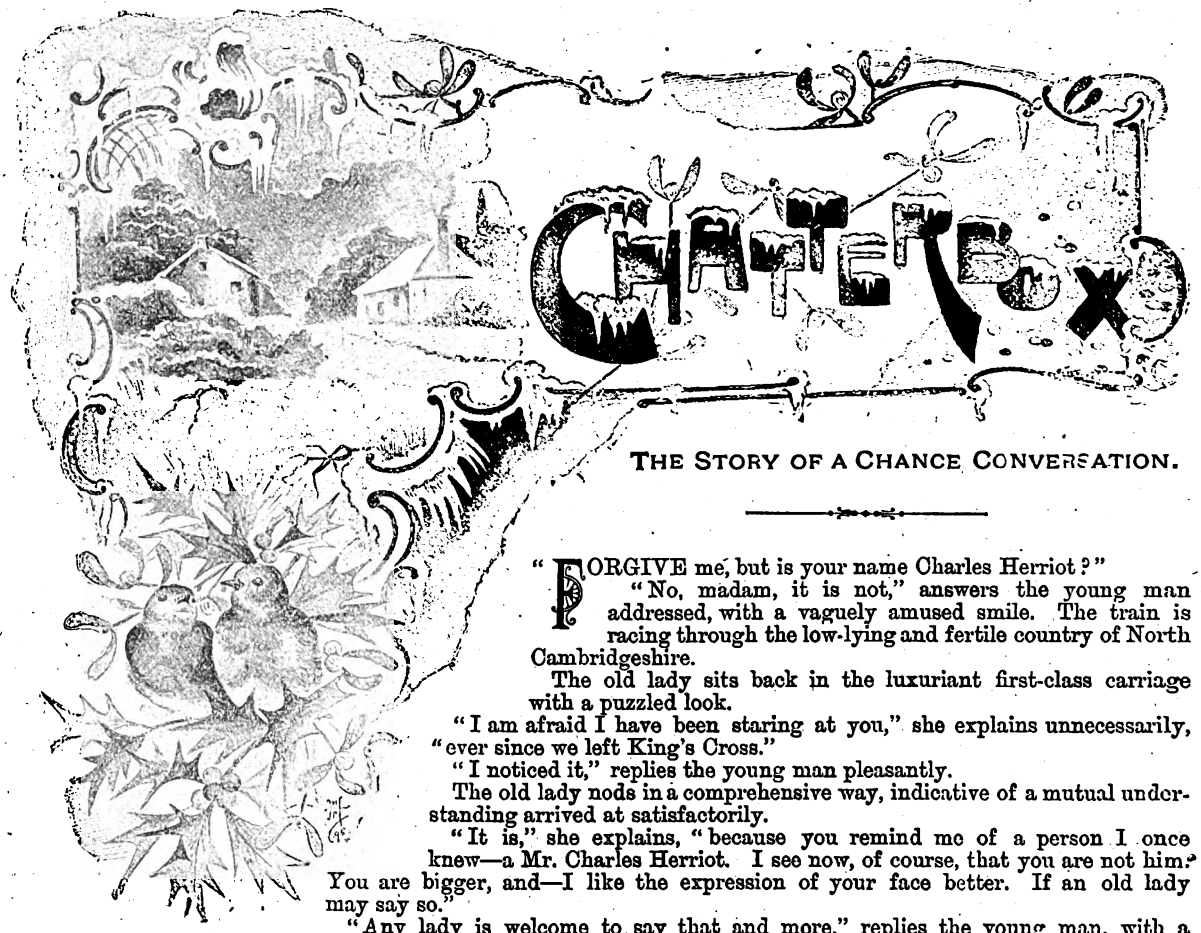
Death lay between the two men who knelt at either side of Kara Chreptovitch.

"When the Tsar is crowned," mutters Liof Mouravief, turning over the miniature and reading the five words so engraved on it, and then beginning to weep and pray.

But Alexander the Tsar said nothing, only raised her, and laid her on the sofa, and kissed her on the mouth, and went out of her house, and back to his own country and to his own people.

FRANCES AYMAR MATHEWS.

Digitized by Google



THE STORY OF A CHANCE CONVERSATION.

"FORGIVE me, but is your name Charles Herriot?"

"No, madam, it is not," answers the young man addressed, with a vaguely amused smile. The train is racing through the low-lying and fertile country of North Cambridgeshire.

The old lady sits back in the luxuriant first-class carriage with a puzzled look.

"I am afraid I have been staring at you," she explains unnecessarily, "ever since we left King's Cross."

"I noticed it," replies the young man pleasantly.

The old lady nods in a comprehensive way, indicative of a mutual understanding arrived at satisfactorily.

"It is," she explains, "because you remind me of a person I once knew—a Mr. Charles Herriot. I see now, of course, that you are not him. You are bigger, and—I like the expression of your face better. If an old lady may say so."

"Any lady is welcome to say that and more," replies the young man, with a twinkle in his melancholy eyes. He folds his newspaper and courageously battles with an air of resignation, which, nevertheless, is quite obvious. No more of Pearson's Magazine for him, he reflects.

"I am very glad it is only a resemblance. Dear me, what a pace this train is going at! I hope the engine-driver is sober. I am glad you are not Charles Herriot, because I do not approve of him. He is a young man I dislike intensely. A young man whom, if I were a man instead of an old woman, I should want to kick."

"If I can be of any use to you——" begins the young man, and is interrupted by a laugh which is wonderfully silvery still, despite the silver hair.

"No thank you. I dare say that fate will do it for me. He has retired from the precincts of my life—for ever, I hope. He never did me any harm. Why is that engine-driver whistling so annoyingly? Do you think he sees a train in front?"

"I hope not."

"No, he never did me any harm, but he spoiled the life of the dearest girl I know, just to gratify his own vanity. Oh, the vanity of you men!"

The young man has opened the paper again. He is studying the heading of the article on palmistry with a vague smile.

"He was rich—disgustingly rich—and I suppose he fell in love with the dear girl according to his lights. She refused him. I admire her spirit still when I think of it, for she had everyone against her. Even her own mother, the very person who ought to have saved her from him. Oh, some women are horrid! Have you a mother?"

"Yes."

"I am glad to hear of it. I am a very old woman, so you need not be afraid of my curiosity. I never repeat anything—never gossip—never, never. That whistle again! I am glad your mother is still alive. She must be proud of you. Respect her. I always tell young men that. I should like to warn young women—against their own mothers. But it wouldn't do. I never make mischief. I know a great deal about my neighbours. But I am a well—a perfect well."

The young man is looking up from his newspaper. The twinkle is in his naturally melancholy eyes again.

"I was telling you about Charles Herriot—wasn't I?"

Digitized by Google

"Yes."

The melancholy eyes drop suddenly to the magazine again.

"Well, he could not get her by fair means, so he tried—the other thing. He engaged the mother—horrid woman—on his side. He persecuted poor Edith till her life was a burden to her. He did mean things. He spread reports that they were engaged. A 'cad,' I call him. Did you say anything?"

"No; I only coughed."

"But you have no business to cough. What can your mother be thinking of? Now, you take my advice and buy some black currant lozenges, or perhaps it's stomach?"

"Perhaps!" admits the young man gravely.

"Well, you know, there was somebody else all the time—the poor girl was breaking her heart for him. I know it; she told me. I cannot remember his name now. Reginald—Reginald somebody or other. The great booby believed what he heard, and never moved a finger. The girl could not go and tell him that she loved him—or it was some idiotic idea of honour—not spoiling sport, or whatever they call it. Men are so stupid. So he went away—to the Cape, or somewhere. It was only the day before yesterday I saw her, poor girl. She looked quite old—it was four years ago—but very sweet and pretty. She is living with her horrid mother in town. The train is going to stop, isn't it? I hope they will get another engine-driver."

"I hope so," says the young man gravely.

"Oh!" goes on the chatterbox, "I remember now who he was. His name was Herriot, too—Reginald Herriott—his younger brother. What station is this?"

"Peterboro'."

"But you are not going to get out?"

"Yes," answers the young man gravely, collecting his possessions; "I am. I am going back to town from here—by the next train."

"I am sorry," says the old lady graciously. "We were having such a pleasant journey. But perhaps we may meet again."

"I hope so," says the young man from the platform.

"Oh, the train is going. Good-bye. Come and see me in London; my name is Faneuil—Lady Faneuil."

"And mine is Reginald Herriot. Good-bye."

"Oh!"

MADGE MORRIS.

Key to Jumble Story No. 24. See page 62.

1	91	52	36	101	20	65	37	121
2	71	49	13	78	109	77	116	98
3	83	47	105	58	106	23	114	122
4	84	96	99	17	119	34	73	81
11	62	12	48	57	15	117	97	88
31	19	79	16	102	72	33	112	74
25	40	29	100	44	111	94	110	5
14	69	32	63	21	115	41	103	6
18	24	9	68	51	64	27	95	30
43	66	10	42	53	86	118	59	55
54	26	75	50	107	60	87	76
70	92	93	90	108	80	104	113
85	45	61	35	28	7	39	120
22	46	82	38	89	8	67	56

OWING to the Christmas Holidays, this number of Short Stories goes to press before the result of Jumble Story No. 25 is known. The names of the winners will appear next week.

Whose Hand?

A £10 Prize.

In the New Year's number of PEARSON'S MAGAZINE, now on sale, appears a most interesting article, in which are delineated by an expert palmist.

NINE TYPICAL HANDS

George Alexander, Sir Walter Besant, Mrs. Patrick Campbell, a Typical Criminal, the Lord Chief Justice, Dr. Parker, G. R. Sims, W. T. Stead, and Sir Evelyn Wood have been good enough to allow us to take photographs of their hands, and from these photographs the palmist made her delineations.

The process was this: Photographs of (say) Mr. George Alexander's hand were taken in four or more different positions, and forwarded to the palmist, who "read" the photographs without having any idea as to the ownership of the hands. The same method was pursued in each case.

Thus, altogether, we had collected forty or fifty hand-photographs. Fifteen of these were selected haphazard and embodied in the heading of the article. We now ask you to say to whom each of these hands belongs, and we offer a cheque for £10 to the first person who is successful in this task.

Competitors have the following information to guide them:

(1.) Each of the fifteen hands depicted in the heading belongs to one of the nine persons above mentioned.

(2.) The palmist's readings and a hand of each of the nine persons is reproduced in the article.

From the lines and other features of these nine hands, and the palmist's readings, an accurate idea of the characteristics of the various hands can be obtained, and it will thus be possible to distinguish the ownership of each hand. An outlined numbered diagram is reproduced herewith.

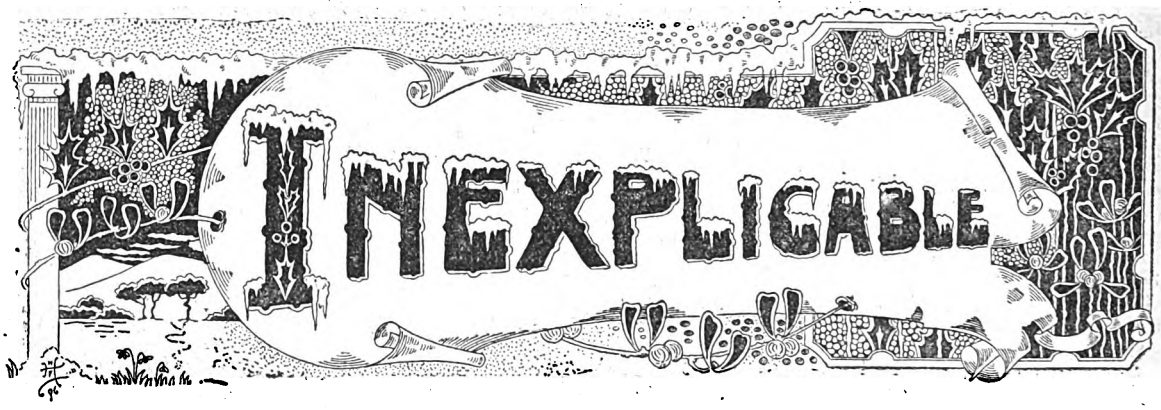
Competitors are requested to write on a sheet of paper their name and address, and the numbers one to fifteen down the left-hand side of the sheet, and opposite each number the name of the person who is, in their opinion, the owner of the corresponding hand.

- - Buy a copy of PEARSON'S MAGAZINE with all - - haste and set your wits to work.

The first person sending the correct - - solution takes the £10. - - - - -

The diagram at the head of this notice must accompany each attempt.

Digitized by Google



IN an interval of a busy professional life, I sit down to record a series of remarkable events.

Remarkable they unquestionably were in themselves, but more especially so from the manner in which they came within my experience. Though the part I played in connection with them was, from the first to last, little more than that of a spectator, yet it will, I think, be granted that there was something strange, something inexplicable, in the manner in which that part was again and again thrust upon me, and always, it would appear, to qualify me for helping to bring about a certain result.

In the month of December, many years ago, I came up to London to spend my Christmas. I was but nineteen, and had never set foot in the great city before. My desire to see it was intense, and to gratify this, a friend—Jack Halford we will call him—had asked me to share the grimy hospitality of Barnard's Inn during pantomime time.

"You must not expect to live luxuriously, or to fare sumptuously," he had written. "The inn of Barnard is severe as to lodgment, and scaly as to catering. It is congenial to the tastes of the Eremite rather than to those of the Sybarite; but lendeth itself not unkindly to him who would 'see life.' Come up on the 23rd. By that time I shall have returned from a few day's idling in Kent, for which I am now preparing."

Acting literally on the terms of my friend's invitation, I started from Derbyshire on the 23rd, and arrived in town, cold, hungry, and wretched, long after dark that night. Knowing nothing of London, I took a cab, and drove direct to Barnard's Inn. On my arrival a porter confronted me, and I asked for my friend.

"Out of town. Down in Kent."

That was his answer. "But he expected me," I urged. "I could, of course, get admission to his rooms?"

The porter shook his head. He had not the keys. The laundress was at home—no doubt a-bed. He had received no orders to admit anybody to Mr. Halford's chambers; in fact, it would be more than his place was worth to do so.

Eventually he consented to take charge of my luggage, and, on his advice, I set out in search of a hotel where I might get a bed for the night.

There were plenty of hotels in Holborn; but as the street was agreeably bright and lively for the hour, I thought I would walk a little and take my choice of them. Perhaps I was not without some faint hope that I might encounter Halford, who I felt little doubt would return that night. At all events, I wandered away, got out of the main streets, grew bewildered, and eventually asked my way of a man who turned out to be the boots of what he described as a most respectable inn, one of the oldest in London, where, he assured me, I could receive every accommodation.

The house was unquestionably old. It had also a dingy and forlorn aspect; but I was hungry and tired, and glad to avail myself of supper, with the prospect of a bed to follow. So I allowed myself to be enticed into the place, and along a dark passage, into a wretched hole of a room at the back, which had the sole merit of being unoccupied.

It had a floor that shelved down towards the great fireplace, wide and draughty, and a low ceiling, shelving also, and threatening to fall, in spite of the two huge beams which sustained it. A century of smokers had contributed to the indescribable odour that pervaded it.

Two candles in frames burned against the walls, and there was probably an idea that the room benefited from a lamp in the passage, which could be dimly descried through certain panes of ground-glass in the room door, which bore the legend "Coffee Room"—quite as a matter of fancy, seeing that coffee had obviously never been drunk there within the memory of living man.

A poor supper, a glass of something hot, and to bed—to bed in a close, stuffy back room, with a look-out comprising the back windows of a row of houses stretching away further than I could see. Never had I seen so villainous a room.

Tired as I was, sleep seemed impossible; but I threw myself on the hard bed in the hope that it might at least give me rest. In that hope I put out the light; but no sooner had I done so than my brain, warmed into activity by the glass I had taken, began to exert itself in distressing speculations. What, I asked myself, was the character of the house into which I had ventured so imprudently? Was I safe? Should I be robbed, ill-treated, murdered?

For a time I rendered myself utterly miserable through these fears and misgivings. Then I began to laugh them down, to attribute my unpleasant impressions to an ignorance of town life; and so by degrees I grew calm and inert, and sleep came upon me unawares. I closed my eyelids and sank into the most refreshing of slumbers.

From this blissful unconsciousness I was startled by a scream. Jumping up, I looked about me. All dark, all silent; yet I heard it most distinctly—a shrill, piercing scream, as if from the lips of someone in mortal agony. At first my impression was that I was not alone, but finding all was silent about me, I rushed to the window, raised the blind, and looked out.

Digitized by Google

At the instant I did so, my eyes encountered a frightful sight. There was a light in one of the opposite windows, and the light shone through the white blind. It shone with sufficient brilliancy to throw upon the blind the shadows of two figures. One figure was that of a woman staggering back, with long, down-loosened hair, the other, that of a man who was rushing upon the woman with a long knife, clutched like a dagger in his hand. As I gazed the knife descended, the woman fell, there was, or I fancied there was, an audible moan, then the light was extinguished suddenly, as if it had fallen or been trampled under foot, and there was nothing to distinguish that window from any other in the row.

I waited. Standing there shivering in the dark, I waited for what might happen next. For half-an-hour at least I remained at the window, but without anything further occurring. The light did not reappear. Whatever the result of the blow I had seen dealt, it had clearly aroused no one; and, though not without misgivings that I had witnessed an assassination, I at length returned to bed, and finally sank again into troubled slumber.

Late in the morning heavy steps on the stairs awoke me. Almost immediately the incident of the shadow on the blind recurred to me with intense vividness. I could see the knife, the falling woman, and the man, whose face had been so distinctly outlined that I could almost have identified his features, while I could with certainty declare that he wore a sort of forage-cap, with a projecting peak standing out straight from the forehead.

Full of this impression, I darted to the window and looked out. Unfortunately I looked in vain. There were many windows in the row of houses, all alike, and nearly all had the blinds down. The consequence was that I could not even tell in which I had witnessed the deed of the previous night.

This uncertainty had one effect; with the impetuousity of youth, I burned to communicate what I had witnessed; but I felt that it was hardly likely I should meet with such credit when I could not even point out the house in which what I described had happened. People would, not unnaturally, conclude that I had been dreaming.

With this impression I descended to the miserable room in which I had dined over-night, and ordered breakfast. Several persons were present, each engaged on his morning meal, and I looked from one to the other in the firm conviction that presently some allusion to a murder in the neighbourhood would greet my ears. In this I was disappointed; all were silent. So I imitated their example, held my peace, and breakfasted as best I might.

The meal was over, and I sat propping my chin in the hollow of one hand, and staring vacantly at the glazed door, with the lamp still burning in the passage outside it, when I suddenly involuntarily started and cried. The cause was simply this: as I looked I saw the shadow of a face cast by the lamp on the ground-glass! It was the face of someone stealing noiselessly along the passage, and to my amazement I recognised it as the same face I had beheld over-night—the face of the man who had dealt the blow! I could swear to the features, and, still more, I could not be mistaken in the identity of the peaked cap.

Acting solely on impulse, I darted out of the room, and made my way along the passage; but, in place of the assassin of whom I was in pursuit, encountered only the waiter who had attended to my wants in the coffee-room. He was an old, ill-favoured man in greasy black, and with a wisp of dirty linen about his neck to match the napkin over his arm.

At sight of me he thrust out his arms.

"No you don't!" he exclaimed aggressively,

"What do you mean?" I demanded. "Who is the man who has just quitted this passage?"

"Man!" he ejaculated. "Oh, yes! I dare say; we've heard that before. That's a stale game, that is!"

I expressed my astonishment and inability to comprehend his meaning. Of that, however, he did not leave me long in doubt.

"Oh, we understand," he remarked injuriously. "You ain't the fust by long chalks as 'ave tried on that game, comin' here without a bit or mossel of luggage! gettin' of your supper, bed, and breakfast, and then all of a sudden there's a man passin' the winder, or there's a 'pintment in the City, or a somethink or another, and off you goes! And we may hook for the bill, we may. Oh yes; we know! Not this time. Not if we're aweer of it!"

The effect of this imputation of swindling motives so overwhelmed me that I had not a word to offer in explanation or defence. I simply paid my bill and quitted the house, which, as I saw on emerging into the street, was called the "Green Posts."

Hastening off to Barnard's Inn, I had the satisfaction of finding that Halford had returned, and was full of apologies for the inconvenience he had caused me. Later in the day I confided to him the adventure in which his absence had involved me. He listened; but attached no great importance to what I had seen.

"Stabbings and things of that sort are constantly happening in London," he said. "There isn't a night without its dozen murders. However, I know the "Green Posts," up Gray's Inn Road way, and we'll go this evening and see if you can find the house where this happened."

This suggestion entirely jumped into my views, and after dinner we set out. found the house I had slept at, and the street adjoining it. And, indeed, it would have been strange had we not found the latter, for it was full of people in the utmost state of excitement. There were, moreover, fire-engines in it, others were momentarily arriving, and a great glare of flame irradiated the sky. A house was on fire, and I had a conviction that it was the very house in which I had seen the murderous deed perpetrated. I was for giving information to the authorities, but Halford dissuaded me.

"Doubtless the body of the woman is consumed," he said; "the house having in all probability been fired with that object. You would only bring yourself into unenviable notoriety for no purpose."

So I remained silent, though the fire intensified my suspicions that I had witnessed the perpetration of a cowardly murder.

* * * * *

Years passed away. Halford had risen in his profession, but still hung to his gloomy stronghold in Barnard's Inn. I had spent many a jovial hour there in those halcyon days which prelude the stern realities of medical life, the days sacred to that most joyous of human pursuits—the walking of hospitals! I had succeeded to my father's practice, and lived in the old house, in the quiet old Derbyshire market town, which our family had inherited for two hundred years.

One night, on returning from a long professional round, I received a letter in a woman's hand, entreating me to come up to London without loss of time. Halford, the writer said, was ill—she feared dying. The letter bore a signature, but I could only decipher "Joanna"; the rest was a mere blur.

Digitized by Google

The next night found me at Barnard's Inn. My coming had been eagerly looked for, the porter told me, and, in confirmation of this, I was received at the door of Jack's chambers by a young woman, who, on seeing me, uttered an exclamation of gratitude, and thanked me again and again for my kindness in coming.

"I have the pleasure of addressing Joanna?" I inquired.

She blushed, and dropped her eyelids in acquiescence. She had darkly-fringed lids, and tears like dewdrops glistened on the fringes. A pretty, sweet-faced woman altogether was Joanna; one whom it was impossible not to admire, and it might have been easy to love to distraction.

After admitting that I was right in calling her Joanna, she said no more of herself, but, drawing me aside, explained what had happened to Halford. "It was very mysterious," she said, shuddering as she spoke, "but while coming home from a friend's a few nights before, he had been shot at and severely wounded."

"Shot at!" I ejaculated with genuine surprise. "Attacked—robbed—I suppose?"

"No. Simply shot at from a doorway; the man, seeing him fall, ran away."

"And where was this?"

"In Red Lion Square."

"Strange! The object must have been robbery."

She shook her head, and was then seized with so violent a tremour that she had to clutch at a chair to save herself. Then she further informed me that the effect of the shot had been very serious, from a difficulty in extracting the ball, which had, however, been happily accomplished that morning. Since then there had been a slight improvement.

I found my friend ill, very ill; but did not despair of his life. He was quite insensible, and remained so some days. During that time I stayed in town; in fact, I protracted my stay long enough to satisfy myself that he was out of danger. My companion in the sick-room was Joanna, whose intelligence I found to equal her beauty. We talked much of Jack, and I saw that she was devoted to him; but she did not say a word about herself, or the relations between them, and the subject was so delicate that I dared not question her upon it. One singular observation, and one only, she let slip; it was to the effect that it was hard he should suffer all this for her sake.

That phrase struck me at the time, and haunted me, both on my homeward journey and long afterwards. What did it mean?

In a month or so, Jack had recovered sufficiently to write and thank me for coming up to him; but he made no allusion to the attack, which had been attended with consequences so serious, and, more singular still, there was no word of Joanna, from one end of the letter to the other.

To those engaged in professional duties, time flies. So three or four years might have gone by before the incident with which I opened this narrative was suddenly and strikingly recalled to my memory.

I had gone to France for a few weeks' change, and was travelling between Amiens and Paris, on the then newly-opened railway, when at one of the sharp curves in the line our train ran off the rails. Several of the carriages were overturned, and one was smashed to atoms. In that one carriage several persons were riding, and all were more or less injured. The severest sufferer was an Englishman—Jasper Nuttall—as I gathered from his card-case; for immediately on learning what had happened, I went to his assistance.

The man was very much shaken; two of his ribs were broken, and he had received some internal injury which caused blood to flow from his mouth. His own conviction was that he would not recover, and his horror of death was childish in its exaggeration. For this, however, I soon learnt there was a cause. After binding me by a solemn oath not to divulge what I was about to hear while he lived, he intrusted me with a confession of a most serious nature. This was the substance of it.

The name that he bore was not his true name, he said; what that was did not matter, as he had not used it for many years. The occasion of his abandoning it was this: He had spent his early life as a midshipman in the Royal Navy, and while on shore, during a month's leave, he had been introduced to a young lady, who, though eighteen years of age, was still at a boarding-school at Canterbury, her parents having died while she was an infant. A fierce, consuming passion for this beautiful girl took possession of him; but she did not encourage his advances, her heart being already given to another, who was secretly paying her his addresses.

Such, however, was the Jasper's ardour that he gave her no peace, and followed her up with such indiscretion that the school authorities discovered the connection, and talked of expulsion.

Terrified at this threat—fearing also that by what had happened becoming known she should compromise herself with her lover beyond forgiveness—the girl, in a foolish moment, consented to elope with Jasper Nuttall; and in a few days they were privately married. But, directly the ceremony was performed, the girl repented of her rash act, and, seizing an opportunity, ran away from the husband of an hour.

Exasperated beyond measure, the narrator proceeded, he followed his wife up to London; he ascertained, after awhile, that she was in hiding in a low lodging in a questionable neighbourhood; he found out also that she had written to her old lover, to what effect he knew not; and on the night of making these discoveries he went to the house she was concealed in, found a means of entrance, and suddenly presented himself before the terrified woman, who caught up a table-knife to defend herself with. This he snatched from her, and, maddened with drink, passion, and jealousy, he, on her irritating him, by a refusal to explain or go elsewhere with him, plunged it into her heart. That done, he left the house as secretly as he had entered it, but did not quit the neighbourhood.

All that night and the succeeding day he loitered about to see what would happen, expecting every moment to be seized and denounced as a murderer. But all that day passed, and nothing happened. At nightfall, an idea took possession of his maddened brain. He determined to fire the house in which he had committed the murder, so as to hide all traces of his crime.

"And this hideous purpose you carried into execution," I interrupted. "I remember it perfectly."

"You remember?" he asked aghast.

"Certainly; I saw the murder committed."

So astounded was the poor wretch at these words—so astounded and overcome with mingled pain and terror—that he fainted. In that state he was removed to a cottage in the neighbourhood; and when the train was ready to carry those of us able to travel on to Paris, I left him, with the firm impression that his eyes would never open again in this world.

Digitized by Google

* * * * *

The fact that this revelation should have been made to me—to me of all human beings—impressed me so strongly, that on my return to England I wrote to Jack Halford, giving him an account of what had happened, as far as I felt myself justified in doing so; dwelling on the singularity of our old mystery being cleared up after so many years; and adding that, now the unhappy wretch was dead and gone, it was well that his secret should die with him.

To this I received an immediate reply, expressing surprise, and asking whether the name of the dead man was not Jasper Nuttall. My astonishment at the question was great; but I had no reason to withhold the information from my old friend, and I answered in the affirmative.

For at least three months after I heard no more of Jack; then he wrote, informing me that he was about to give up the old chambers and the old life; to tear himself from the blandishments of the Inn of Barnard, and to take unto himself a partner in life's transport and tribulations. The lady's name, he informed me, was Joanna Hilders, orphan daughter of the late Captain Hilders, a lady whom I would recollect having met at the inn some years ago.

At last, then, the murder was out; Joanna was to be his wife. I certainly resented not having been taken into their confidence before; but an invitation to the wedding made amends (though I was unable to accept it), and I was not sorry to know that dear Jack was at last comfortably married and settled.

The next Christmas, Mr. and Mrs. Jack, as we called them, came down to Derbyshire on a visit, and so pleasant did this prove that the experiment was tried on the following Christmas. Mrs. Jack was, as I have intimated, a pretty, lovable woman, and I often wondered where he had met with her. It leaked out that he had known her some years; and that was about all I was able to learn.

During this second visit the weather was fine, and we rode out most days. On the afternoon preceding Christmas Eve we took a long drive, and, while going through a lane bordered with trees, a trifling but rather singular incident occurred.

The lady suddenly cried out: "Oh, Jack! Jack!" and pointed in the direction in which she was looking, her face being of intense alarm.

Jack inquired what was the matter, and she in reply whispered in his ear.

Thereupon he looked serious; but instantly shook off the feeling, and said, with a smile: "Joanna is constantly fancying likenesses in strangers to people we have met. Did you observe anything peculiar in the stranger under the tree we last passed?"

I had not even observed a stranger; I said so, and there the matter dropped.

That evening we sat round the fire in our old-fashioned living-room. The lamp was not lit, but the piled logs sent out a strong glare, and it was pleasant, in the flickering uncertain light, to see the stars shine through the windows, and to listen to the ringing of distant church-bells, borne in fitful gusts on the breeze.

Suddenly we were all startled by a crash. One of the casement windows had been burst in, and, looking round, I saw a man leap into the room. He was ragged in his dress, with shock hair, a white face, and fiercely-burning eyes. Staggering forward, he threw up his arms, and uttered a wild shriek.

"My wife!" he screamed; "give me my dead wife!"

In uttering these words he rushed toward Halford, but on his way stumbled against the table in the middle of the room and fell forward over it, his bare arms thrown out wildly, and his head striking on the mahogany with a sharp sound.

Both Halford and his wife startled up; but the latter, with a sacred and terrified look, dropped back into her chair.

"Jasper," she ejaculated in a tone of horror, and sank back insensible.

I caught at the name to which she had given utterance, as stepping to the table I clutched at the intruder's long hair and turned his face to the light. It presented a terrible aspect. The eyes were bright, but wild; the mouth was working convulsively.

I had little difficulty in deciding that it was the face of a maniac; but still less difficulty in recognising it as that of Jasper Nuttall, whom I had left for dead after the accident on the line between Amiens and Paris.

While I was in the act of making this discovery, there were voices and footsteps without, and several strange faces looked in at the window. They were keepers from the county lunatic asylum, in search of an escaped patient. At the sound of their voices, the wretched being before me sprang from the table, beat out wildly at the air, uttered gurgling and inarticulate sounds, and then, to our inexpressible horror, fell backwards—dead.

Rapidly all this had passed, there had been time enough for me to see, as in a flash, the connecting link between the incidents of years—between my first London experience, as above recorded, and the horror I had just witnessed. Intuitively I perceived, what I had never of course for an instant suspected, that Joanna was the object of Jasper Nuttall's affection, the girl whom he had made his wife. But he had taken her life and destroyed her body in the flames of the burning house? True, he believed that; but was it so? had the wound he had inflicted proved mortal, or had it not?

Under pretence of facilitating her restoration, I stepped up, and with a pair of scissors divided the cord that fastened Joanna's bodice. As I expected, her bosom presented traces of a stab—a deep, fiery scar.

Halford's quick eye noticed that I saw this, and that it had a significance for me. On this he—when the body of the unfortunate man had been removed by the keepers—tendered an explanation which spared me further conjecture.

His avowal was to this effect: He was Jasper Nuttall's rival, and was down at Canterbury, waiting an opportunity to see Joanna on the day of my first visit to his chambers. Although he then failed to see her, he received her letter apprising him of the false step she had taken, and imploring his forgiveness. Hence he little imagined that she was in danger; less still, of course, that it was against her I had seen a murderous hand raised, or that it was her body we suspected to have perished in the flames of the burning house. Heavens! the very idea would have driven him frantic. Fortunately, the wound inflicted had not proved mortal. The knife did not enter her heart, but passed between the two lobes of the lungs; and the people of the lodging-house, discovering what had happened in time, the unhappy girl was removed to a hospital, so that Nuttall's second criminal act, that of firing the house, was perpetrated in vain.

Digitized by Google

After the fire Jasper Nuttall disappeared, and for years Joanna remained in concealment, watched over by Halford, though estranged from him by her fatal marriage. No doubt the murderer, as he supposed himself to be, spent the interval at sea; but that he nursed the deadliest hatred of his rival in his heart was pretty well proved by the attempt at length made on Halford's life, for neither he nor Joanna ever doubted that it was Jasper Nuttall, who—probably—during a temporary stay in England—fired the shot which so nearly ended my friend's life.

All the while Nuttall lived Joanna's position was a most painful one; but on Halford's receiving my account of the railway accident, and the discovery it had led to, with the conclusion I had hastily jumped at, that the man was dead, he had formally proposed to his old love, and their marriage followed as a thing of course. What wonder, then, that Joanna should have been overcome with terror when that night she saw her first husband standing alive before her!

My hasty conclusion as to the impossibility of the man's surviving had, of course, done all the mischief. He had survived, but his health was shattered, and his brain, always weak and excitable, had given way, and his friends in England had placed him in the Derbyshire Asylum, from which he had that day contrived to escape.

Poor wretch! we pitied him sincerely. Jack's tender heart was moved at his miserable end, and perhaps the least touch of self-reproach prompted the tears Joanna shed at the memory of one who had loved her as deeply as he had wronged her.

For my own part, while I felt for him, I was strongly impressed by the singular bearing one upon another of the links in this strange chain of events, extending over so many years. It seemed a mere accident that I was ever concerned in the matter at all; yet but for that accident Halford and Joanna might never have been united, and Nuttall would probably have died in the asylum, his death unknown to those who from uncertainty about his fate, and terror at his probable reappearance, might have gone down to their graves nursing a hopeless and fruitless passion. The problem of their lives was happily destined to be worked out to a more blissful solution.

H. M. S.

A CHRISTMAS EPISODE.

N the evening of the twenty-fourth day of December, Mr. Herrington Seymour rang the door bell of the residence of his head book-keeper, thus making the one hundred and thirtieth time he had so heralded himself since calling to inquire as to the physical condition of the said head book-keeper on the fifteenth day of July preceding.

Not that the health of the head book-keeper longer required this attention, for he had, in fact, been back at his desk since the early part of September; but, although the illness which had laid him low was a thing of the past, the daughter who had been his nurse-in-chief was still a present fact, and it was into her presence Mr. Seymour was ushered this same evening of December the twenty-fourth.

"Now, don't interrupt!" said Miss Bland hastily, hardly glancing up from the bit of paper on which she was pencilling; "I have purchased nineteen Christmas presents out of £2 10s., and I am trying to find if I have anything left for postage on one yet to be sent."

Mr. Seymour accordingly sat down and studied the even parting of that portion of Miss Bland's head which was presented to him as she returned to her figuring—not the least delightful part of the intercourse with his head book-keeper's daughter being the refreshing and altogether novel fashion in which she ordered him about.

"Poppet and I went Christmas shopping together, with all of our money in one purse," Miss Bland presently deigned to explain—the said Poppet being otherwise known to Miss Bland's friends as her youngest brother Paul—"and after adding three times, I find that I owe Poppet fourpence, which I do not possess to pay him, and must go further in debt for that postage. Where is Poppet, did you ask? He and Tom and Louis have gone to the entertainment St. John's is giving to the choir-boys, and will not get back until after the midnight service, and Elizabeth is finishing off a last bit of Christmas work, and father, having vowed he would give no presents this year, and, as usual, repenting at the last moment, has gone out and is doubtless paying double for everything because it is the eleventh hour."

In his heart, Mr. Seymour blessed the occasion which thus removed the family of Miss Bland, for, there being something of a superfluity of motherless little Blands, it was inconveniently difficult to find opportunities wherein to enjoy this chosen representative of the family apart from the importunities of a Poppet or a Louis or a Tom.

Yet, from the moment when Miss Bland had met him at the door and reported on her father's then somewhat desperate condition, Mr. Herrington Seymour had done little else but seek for just these same rare and coveted opportunities.

"Tom and Louis, being blessed with the gift of saving, have their choir money, you see," continued Miss Bland, "and Elizabeth always reaps a small fortune with her painting at Christmas; but Poppet and I, being the spendthrifts, are always in debt, and never have anything unless the others take pity and lend us."

Digitized by Google

Mr. Seymour, content that she should talk on indefinitely, if only he were privileged to watch the colour coming and going on her smooth cheek, the parting, the curving, the smile, the droop of her lips which changed with every mood, the fluttering of her quick hands, started a little absent-mindedly when he found her pausing and looking towards him expectantly, and made some totally irrelevant remark about the amount of needless trouble and hollow farce attendant on the modern Christmas.

"You know I cannot bear to hear things like that," declared Miss Bland, a rush of colour to her cheeks, a frown between her straight brows. "Christmas is a blessed time, if people would only let it be so, and be influenced by it, and breathe in the good-will and fellowship around them, and——" she checked herself sharply, meeting the amused smile in his eyes at her little outbreak, and sprang up, and, turning her back on him, pretended to be occupied in choosing a sprig from a mass of holly piled on a chair. But, nevertheless, there must have been more than the mere contemplation of the holly on her mind, for, when she did turn, her eyes, which steadily avoided his searching and pursuant gaze, were so bright as to suggest the sparkling therein of unshed tears.

"What?" said he, with just a touch of the masterful in his tones.

"Nothing," came from Miss Bland with more than a touch of defiance in hers.

"But you promised," insisted the other, again a little absently, seeing how fascinating was that tremendous little quiver of her lips, "you promised you would be frank with me always."

Miss Bland assumed an attitude at once resentful and distant, and her accents were iciness itself. "The truth is, I do not see why I ever allow myself to show any feeling even bordering on things deep or real, before you. You never fail to meet it with something cynical, or a smile of amused scepticism, if nothing more, and—and then——"

"And then?" repeated Mr. Seymour, as she stopped, leaning towards her with an aggravating show of breathless interest in his manner.

"Why, then we had better turn to something practical before we fuss," declared Miss Bland, with a crushing change of manner, having finally arranged the holly in a vase to her satisfaction. "So we will go to work and tie and label all my presents for my family and get them disposed of before they return."

"But that is not at all that you promised, or what I came prepared to do," argued Mr. Seymour in tones quite injured and reproachful.

Miss Bland's charming colour deepened and spread down her cheeks, and crept along and under the soft curves of her chin and down her throat. "But I did not promise, you only assumed that I would," she said.

"But if I honestly interpreted it as a promise and hold it as such?" said he, following her to the mantel where she had retreated.

"You had no right to."

"But then, you see, I did. It was perfectly natural I should, I am sure you will allow. I remark that I have had no satisfaction or pleasure out of the so-called festive season of Christmas since I was a small boy. You tell me that with my opportunities I ought to be ashamed to say so. I demand to know my opportunities. You remark on my having fewer friends and fewer relations to tax me than has the average human being at Christmas, and declare that there is a whole cityful of poor who will doubtless go Christmasless, and draw the most alluring pictures of the satisfaction and pleasure of bestowing one's superfluity upon this tasteless populace. And not only converted, but quite fascinated by the alluring way you picture it, and knowing myself to be unable to gracefully descend upon the unexpectant poor alone, I proposed your accompanying me in the rôle of the beneficent fairy, or at least to teach me how to impersonate the patron saint properly. And you allow me to go away resting on the assurance that you will, and to come to-night so prepared——"

"I did not promise——"

"But you would have, if Poppet had not come in—and interrupted."

"No, I would not!"

Mr. Seymour sat down with some dejection. "Of course, there is no more to be said then," he remarked, and proceeded to talk about the weather.

Miss Bland looked uneasy. She agreed with him that the weather was all he claimed, ideal, typical, proper for the season, but there was a dissatisfied, half-hearted manner about the way she allowed it, strolling at the same time about the parlour restlessly, and finally, on reaching the door, going out with some sudden abruptness.

Left to himself, Mr. Seymour fell to gazing in the fire, leaning forward, elbow on knee, and, despite the greyness about his temples and the hints about his strong, clean-shaven face that youth had sometime ago departed, there was a depth of feeling in the smile just then about his mouth, a hint of suppression in his manner, that made him seem not so much older than the young girl over whose wilful vagaries he was smiling, as he really was.

When Miss Bland returned, a moment later, she had on jacket, hat and gloves, and her furs—collar and muff—were in her hand. "I went to get ready, you know," she explained.

"Yes," said the other, avoiding comment with the wisdom of experience, and sought his overcoat in the hall.

But she was obviously nervous and embarrassed as they started out. "It seems queer," she began, "and I am afraid audacious for me to have suggested such a thing to you. In—in theory I did mean it, of course, in a joking way, but—but in practice to have actually told you you ought to spend your money——" she stopped, with a tragic little sweep of her hands, and it took him all the rest of the 'bus ride to get her back to anything like her usual self-possessed and bright, unconscious self.

"And even now that we are out," she began again, as they left the 'bus and reached the thronged and gaily lighted pavement, "what are we out to do?"

As the whole affair had sprung from her suggestion, it was more than generous of him not to remind her of that now. "Considering the nature of the expedition," he rejoined promptly, "I should say we had better begin to look for that cityful of poor, and if I were impersonating the beneficent fairy, there is no question I would feel I had a beginning right here before me," and he nodded toward an adjacent recess in an unoccupied doorway of a gaily decorated toy shop.

"It's Joey!" cried Miss Bland, following his glance and halting as she recognised the carrier of coal, the shoveler of snow, the general outdoor help and dependent of her own household.

Digitized by Google

The ups and down of childhood, as embodied in the varying lengths of the persons of Joey's small brothers and sisters, turned at this utterance of the eldest Mulligan's name, and broke, as by consent, into a unanimous smile as the bright countenance of Miss Bland was recognised.

"We're buying our Christmas," explained the offspring of the house of Mulligan with one voice, the embarrassed elder brother excepted. "Joey, he tipped us all round, he did," and every little Mulligan forthwith removed a red little fist from a protecting pocket or shawl, and opened it in witness of Joey's generosity.

"Three pennies a-piece, except Lobelia, and hers is a sixpence, cause her jaw is swelled."

Lobelia, of the swollen jaw, as it proved, embarrassed by the possession of her wealth, was still undecided whether to sink her sixpence entire in the purchase of a flannel monkey which walked down a red ladder on its hands, or to divide it, and sink half in a red balloon and the other half in toffee. It was for this decision to be reached before entering the toy-shop that the party had halted and were now standing shifting from foot to foot in the frosty air, and hoarsely breathing out volumes of hoary breath to keep its noses warm.

"I say for the toffee," voted the smallest of the Mulligans.

"Joe Kelly, he's all fer his stomick," retorted Lobelia scornfully; "he's already spent part of his fer nuts, and, anyhow, May ain't settled herself a'tween a box of paints and buns."

May's small voice being lifted in protest that she had long ago decided in favour of the paints, and forthwith calling on little Mike to witness that fact, Joey, with his freckled face a-flame, hoped Miss Bland would understand, "seein' that the children were that excited over Christmas, there wasn't any makin' them behave or mind their manners!"

"And I dare say," began Miss Bland's companion, in an aside apparently meant to be secret and confidential, however audible to the others, "I dare say they would be even more excited if they knew this is not the real Miss Bland at all, but a Beneficent Christmas Fairy——"

The little Mulligans stared.

"——who can change coppers into silver in the twinkling of an eye."

The little Mulligans gasped.

"So that if each of these small people should drop their money into this purse and we then should snap it shut and hand it to her, every single penny will turn to silver in her hands;" and the grave and serious-faced gentleman forthwith solemnly presented an open pocket-book to the gaping and astonished company.

The fist of every little Mulligan closed tight on the instant and sought its pocket, that is, of all but Lobelia, in whom the possession of larger wealth had created a speculative recklessness that led her to drop her all into the open purse.

Yet no sooner had the pocket-book changed hands and, true to the serious-faced gentleman's prophecy, Lobelia's sixpence had emerged swollen into five times its former size and value, than every penny in the crowd rained into this Fortunatus, while even Joey stared, open-mouthed.

And when, under the supervision of the Beneficent Fairy, the family of Mulligans had ended its Christmas shopping, it fairly staggered under its accumulated load, while from the basket, forming speechless Joey's portion, there peeped forth purchases such as promised to stock the Mulligan larder with a profusion hitherto unknown.

Then, when the little Mulligans were hoisted into a passing tram and sent rejoicing on their way, the Beneficent Christmas Fairy turned to her escort with a rapturous little catch in her voice: "It—it was lovely." she said, "but—but it was all you; I never could have done it in that lovely way—never!"

"No?" returned the other, with all the accustomed scepticism; then, with another note, and that of deep tenderness, somewhere mixed in it, "but your turn to be generous will come later."

Whereat, either because of the tone or the emphasis, which seemed to convey something subtle and hidden in the meaning, the Beneficent Fairy froze instantly, and haughtily commanded that the passing crowds be scanned for further subjects for munificence.

Nor was there pressing need for a microscopic study of the throng that tramped the streets and jostled and pushed their way along the noisy, busy thoroughfares. The Beneficent Fairy and her escort had purposely avoided the highway and sought the side streets, where shops and pavements were the more likely to be patronised by the class they had in mind. And even at the first fruit stall of one such street they turned into, an opportunity awaited in the person of a small representative of the Christmasless poor, clothed in an out-at-elbows, dingy dress and much wistfulness, and eyeing with unexpected eagerness the pyramids of Christmas fruits and wares piled up before her.

"Mary Jane!" The swarthy woman, turning back, impatient at her delay, called her. Mary Jane of the wistful countenance moved not, but stood and watched the crowning pyramidal glories vanish into a gigantic paper bag, and gazed from them to the tall gentleman and the pretty lady, all smiles, and brightness and furs and warmth and comfort, by his side, who were pointing out a wealth of nuts and dates and figs to follow oranges, bananas, apples, into that yawning cavity. And when, with a merry word from the pretty lady, Mary Jane found in her arms that weight of tropical richness, she, lacking that grace of manner belonging to the Mary Janes of the upper world, only gasped, but it was noticed that in the eyes of the swarthy woman was swimming something shining and wet, as she took Mary Jane quite gently by the hand and walked away.

Then in at the fair strolled the Beneficent Christmas Fairy and her Bearer of the Purse, into that vast heterogeneous collections of second and third rate wares, where, for a third more than its honest value, one can purchase anything.

And here, amid the Christmas wares and decorations the Beneficent Fairy found herself quite in her element, and, aided and abetted by the ever-watchful Bearer of the Purse, found herself introducing red-cheeked dolls into empty, wistful childish arms, and slipping knives with a reckless multiplicity of blades into small boys' grimy, yet to the last, sceptical fingers, and carrying a pale-faced, hungry brood from under its paler-faced mother's wing and seating them in the lunch-room, and feasting them to their hungry little stomachs' full content. During which occupation on the Beneficent Fairy's part, the Bearer of the Purse stole the pale-faced mother's basket from her arm, and leaving her to be coaxed by the Fairy's wiles into the taking of a cup of coffee, swelled its pitiful pennies' worth of groceries into pounds, its feeble promise of Christmas cheer into a heavy reality of plenty. Then the Bearer of the Purse stealing away, with the Beneficent Fairy clinging to his arm with an unconscious confidence that thrilled him, they left the brood choking over its pie, the mother over her tears, and brought up behind a much be-whiskered old man in fur cap and mittens, who could not withhold his perplexed confidences five seconds before the tender smiling ingratiating advances of the Beneficent Fairy.

Digitized by Google

"It was the children, to be sure, Lisa's, his only daughter's children; he was out buying Christmas gifts for Lisa and Katie and Carl, and the baby, William Joseph, named after himself. Here was the little red waggon for Carl, and the lunch basket for Katie, and the doll for Little Lisa, but at William Joseph he hesitated perplexed. It must be more than this small rattle for William Joseph, named after himself; and then too, Lisa—Lisa was a good daughter, and it was on his mind to choose a present for Lisa, too."

And when the Beneficent Fairy had suggested a warm and tasteful and not over dear white woolly cap for William Joseph, and a pretty glass preserve dish for Lisa, and had slipped a fascinating woolly sheep that said "Ba-a," into his hand, and begged he would take that also to William Joseph, she and the Bearer of the Purse departed, and the dear old man was left beaming, still hunting for the words to best tell what his feelings were.

And, because it was just round the corner from the Fair, the two went through the market house, gay with cedar and tissue paper garlands, and stopped by a stall and managed to hear the most of a little old woman's perturbed confidences to the pork gentleman.

How she had started out to buy a few sausages for her old man's Christmas breakfast, as well as a bit of something at Miss Farmer's request, for Miss Farmer's crippled Jamie's Christmas dinner, Miss Farmer being the lady who rented the top back room, next to her own, and buttonho'ed for the shops for a living, and not able, at all, to be after losing even the bit of change, which, along with her own, it seemed, had just been taken from the little old woman's pocket.

And when, at the instigation of the Bearer of the Purse, the Beneficent Fairy had whispered some words of comfort under the rusty old bonnet, and had pressed more than the price of several breakfasts of pork sausages into the numb and ungloved old hand, both the little old women and the Beneficent Fairy were trying to smile at each other through their tears, while the Bearer of the Purse and the Pork Gentleman made up a basket for crippled Jamie's Christmas dinner, to which the Beef Gentleman in the next stall and the Vegetable Lady, and even the Fish, Game and Poultry Gentleman, overhearing the story, contributed.

And when they left the brightly-lighted shops and turned into the less frequented side-streets, the love in his nature overcame his discretion, and, bending down, he kissed her cheeks. Burning with wrath and scorn and defiance, she walked on and left him to follow, until, overtaking her where the street grew dark and silent and altogether deserted, he found she was crying again, and caught her by the hand, and she broke down altogether and confessed she loved him dearly, truly, had loved him always, and that the fault, the blame, was all his, for not having made her say so before!

And in time, with never a thought from either to take a tram now, the two reached the square shadowed by the towers and steeple of St. John's and—through the swirling snow, now coming down thick and fast—called to the head book-keeper, also bound for the midnight service at St. John's.

And the head book-keeper, peering in his near-sighted way several moments before he recognised them, let Kate take his hand and hang to his arm and make him confess, like the guileless gentleman that he was, that he had paid two and even three times too much for everything, even according to her prophecy.

Nor dreamed the dear, unworldly, short-sighted soul that Kate's companion had never loosed his hold of her hand on the other side, nor yet that that gentleman, drawing her to him as the head book-keeper went into the vestibule, had kissed her then and there in the deserted porchway of St. John's.

All of which blindness to his own interest—seeing that to him the worldly gain would be nothing to the losing of his Kate's companionship and tender ministrations and admonishments—possibly explains why this gentleman had and probably would stop at being a head book-keeper—for ever.

And, within the church, as suddenly the midnight gloom and silence burst into light and music and rejoicing, the voice of Poppet—Poppet, the torment, the tease, the darling of the head book-keeper's household; the pride, the joy, the glory of St. John's choir—the voice of Poppet rose high above the swelling organ tones, and soared and thrilled even to the deepest depths the hearts of the congregation.

"For yonder breaks a new and glorious morn. Fall on your knees! O hear the angels' voices! O night divine, O night when Christ was born! Fall on your knees! O hear the angels' voices! O night divine! O night when Christ was born! O night divine, O night divine!"

And kneeling by her, her hand behind the sheltering pew clasped in his, one of that congregation whispered after Poppet, deeply, reverently, to the woman by his side:

"O night, O night divine!"

GEO. MADDEN MARTEN.

* The Village Orchestra. *

FOR Choirs, Mothers' Meetings, Bands, High School Concerts, Village Clubs, and all other purveyors or distributors of musical entertainment, the January number of MELODY contains in the shape of a most delightful Polka-March, with special accompaniments for Violin, 'Cello, Flute, Clarionet, Cornet, Mandoline, and Banjo.

A GIANT SURPRISE

NO BAND SHOULD BE WITHOUT IT.

Songs, Pianoforte and Violin solos and duets, and Waltzes, all expressly composed for MELODY, combine with this orchestral work to form one of the best numbers of this popular musical magazine.

PRICE SIXPENCE. NOW ON SALE.

Digitized by Google

THE QUEEN AGAINST OWEN

BY

Allen Upward

Author of "Secrets of the Courts of Europe," "The Prince of Balkistan," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

ELEANOR MARGARET OWEN is charged with the murder of her benefactress, Ann Lewis. Charles Prescott, who has known Eleanor since a child, holds the brief for the prosecution. His friend, George Tressamer, is in love with Eleanor, and holds the brief for her defence. The prosecution is vigorously pressed by Mr. Lewis, deceased's nephew. The case comes on at the Mynyddshire Assizes.

CHAPTER V.

THE CASE FOR THE CROWN.

"MAY it please your Lordship,

"Gentlemen of the jury, I am merely repeating a commonplace when I say that I rise to address you under a very heavy sense of responsibility. As you have heard, the prisoner at the bar is charged with the crime of wilful murder. It is now my duty, acting on behalf of the Crown, to tell you how that crime was committed, according to the view which I have to ask you to take; and to bring before you the witnesses whose evidence, if you believe it, goes to establish the guilt of the accused."

Thus Mr. Prescott. It was the third day of the assizes. On the Tuesday afternoon, after a true bill had been found, Mr. Justice Buller had announced that he should set apart this day for the trial of the great case. The court had opened at ten o'clock. It was crammed to suffocation. The intensest excitement, whetted by the interval of delay, reigned supreme. All eyes were strained towards the dock as the words were uttered:

"Put up Eleanor Margaret Owen."

Another moment and she stood before them. Clothed in black from head to foot, pale as a lily, and trembling in every limb, she sank upon the chair behind her, and covered her face with her hands.

A great throb of sympathy shook the court. Sobs were heard. The most prejudiced of those who had bandied her name about for the past few weeks felt a dim sense of shame. Only a few out of all those present were unmoved: the judge, schooled to conceal all trace of emotion, nay, schooled to stifle it as it rose; the jury, too overcome by the duty thrust upon them to be just then alive to what was happening; the counsel on both sides, who, for different reasons, forbore as long as they could from looking at the dock.

She was beautiful. All the suffering she had gone through had not been able to affect that, unless to render her beauty more spiritual and delicate. Her hair of that light glistening brown which is best known as golden; her drooping eyes of deepest blue; her wide, square forehead, unshaded by that device of ugliness, the artificial fringe of hair; the full, open lips; the rounded chin—every mark of a certain order of loveliness was there.

And she wore no veil. Some of the women present condemned her for that. The matron of the prison had besought her to use one. Her answer was decisive. She had never put a veil on since childhood, and she would not wear one now. She would not shrink beneath a false charge. She would show her face to them all.

She spoke bravely; but she had not realised all that was before her. And when she came up the dark, winding stairs from the underground cells, and found herself in that—Great God! Was it some crowded theatre, or a solemn court of justice?—her physical strength gave way, and she scarce knew what happened for some moments.

Then her will asserted itself again. She stood up. She faced the judge, the jury, the crowded bar, the fashionable dames in the gallery, and showed no more signs of fear. Her name was called, the hideous accusation was made. She answered it out loud. Her counsel, dreading another scene like that already recorded, had bent across the table and warned the clerk of arraigns beforehand of what the plea would be. The jury was sworn, including in their number the two onlookers whose remarks on the previous day had been so suddenly cut short. The last formula had been recited by the clerk.

Digitized by Google

"Gentlemen of the jury, the prisoner at the bar stands indicted for that she did wilfully murder one Ann Elizabeth Lewis. To that she has pleaded that she is not guilty. Now, you are to try the issue, and to say whether she is guilty or not."

And now the counsel for the prosecution had begun his speech.

"Two years ago the prisoner was left an orphan by the death of her father, the Rector of Porthstone. She went to live in the house of a lady who had known her from a child, and who lived in the same place. With that lady she remained down to the 1st of last June, and it is that lady with whose murder she now stands charged.

"Miss Lewis, the deceased, may be described as eccentric. She was in the habit for some years before her death of making very large purchases of jewels——"

"I beg your pardon." It was the counsel for the prisoner who rose to his feet and interrupted. "My lord, I am sorry to interrupt my learned friend at this early stage, but may I ask him if he has any evidence that the prisoner knew of the existence of these jewels? If not, my lord, I submit he is not entitled to refer to them at all."

The Judge: "What do you say, Mr. Prescott?"

"My lord, I am entirely in your lordship's hands. This is the first time it has been suggested to me that the fact of the deceased's having this jewellery was not a matter of common knowledge in the household. I, therefore, can't say at this stage whether I shall be able to distinctly fix the prisoner with such knowledge."

The Judge: "Of course, you mean to bring this in as motive?"

She stood up.

Mr. Prescott: "Yes, my lord."

The Judge: "It is a very important matter. If the jury were satisfied that the prisoner did not know of these purchases, and if there were no other motive suggested, it might have a very great effect on their minds." (At this point the jury tried to look as if something were having a great effect on their minds, and did not altogether succeed.) "Perhaps you had better not say anything about the jewels now. You will have another opportunity after you see what your evidence is."

Mr. Prescott: "If your lordship pleases. Well, then, gentlemen, I will come at once to the night when this crime was committed."

Here Mr. Pollard was observed to write something on a slip of paper and hand it to his leader. Mr. Prescott stopped to glance at it, and then went on:

"I may, however, mention one thing before leaving the question of motive, and it is this. I shall be able to prove to you that the deceased on one occasion, in the presence of a witness, made some promise or offer to the prisoner as to remembering her in her will. It is, of course, for you to say what weight you will attach to that circumstance."

Here the jury tried to look as if they knew what weight to attach to it, and again utterly failed.

"On the first of June, a nephew of Miss Lewis's, and her only surviving relative, as I am instructed, and who will be called before you, arrived at Porthstone. He had just returned from Australia, and went to see his relative. He dined there, and spent the evening. At 10 o'clock he came away to his hotel and at once retired to bed.

"The deceased lady had also retired to her room, and from the evidence there can be no doubt that she undressed and got into bed. She was last seen alive a few minutes after ten. The murder was discovered the next morning at nine. Between those hours the crime must have been committed.

"The female servants followed their mistress. At half-past ten the butler fastened the front door. He will describe the fastenings to you, and he will also tell you of a peculiarity in the latch, about which I shall have something to say presently."

The counsel then went on to detail the events narrated in his brief, only throwing in an observation now and then as he went along. When he had described the evidence of the removal of the body by the window he said:

"And now we come to one of the difficulties in the case. If the prisoner lowered the body out of the window in the first instance, why did she afterwards return to the house, and take a second journey, carrying a burden of some kind? I am hardly at liberty, after what has fallen from his lordship, to suggest to you that this second exit was in order to remove something which the murderer wanted to steal, something with the object of stealing which she committed the graver crime. But, gentlemen, there is another explanation, a terrible way of accounting for that second journey, so terrible and horrible that I wish it were not my bounden duty to put it before you. And it is this:

"Only a portion of the victim's body has been recovered. That portion is a hand. Now, in the absence of anything to make us think that the cutting off of the hand was a solitary mutilation, we are forced to the probable conclusion that whoever killed this poor woman mutilated her in a very dreadful manner. It is possible, therefore, that after lowering one portion of her victim's remains through the bedroom window, she returned upstairs to bring down some other part or parts of the body."

As the counsel with evident reluctance brought out these horrible points, a shudder ran through the court. The prisoner had borne it all with tolerable firmness up to now, but she was completely overcome by this part of the speech, and cowered down into her chair, again concealing her emotions by putting her hands before her face.

If Mr. Prescott had any idea of making the jury revolt at the thought of associating such shocking brutalities with the prisoner, his speech produced the very opposite effect to what he intended. The jury saw in it nothing but the natural reluctance of a man at making such a charge, overborne by the counsel's conviction of the prisoner's guilt. Their faces assumed an aspect of stony horror as they turned their eyes upon the shrinking girl. A slight frown crossed Tressamer's countenance, followed by a look of contempt.

Digitized by Google

"The second difficulty in the case," resumed Prescott, "is as to the latchkey. As I have explained, there were only three keys in existence, so far as the prosecution have been able to discover. These will all be produced before you. One was found in the pocket of the deceased's dress, the other was never out of the possession of the witness, Simons, the third was on the prisoner's person when she was arrested. One of these keys, therefore, must have been used in the latch that night, and must have been used with such carelessness or ignorance—it is for you to say which" —again the jury tried to look as if they were prepared to say which, and again they broke down—"that the latch was raised too high, and stuck. Now, here I must draw your attention to a very important circumstance. The person who entered the house last, whether the prisoner or anyone else, and who fastened up the front-door as it was found by the witness, Lucy Jones, the following morning, that person must, for some reason or other, have failed to notice the condition of the latch. She, if we assume it was the prisoner, must be supposed to have been so agitated from some cause that she failed to notice what she was doing when she raised the latch with her key, and failed again to notice how the latch was caught when she proceeded to fasten the door inside.

"Gentlemen, it is for you to ask yourselves whether a reasonable explanation, an explanation that will justify you in coming to an adverse verdict in this case, is furnished by the suggestion that the prisoner's mind was excited by the crime she had just committed to such an extent as to deprive her of the power of observing these things."

At this point Mr. F. J. Pollard began to be aware that his leader was not pressing the case very vigorously. He looked round at his brother in the solicitors' seat behind. That gentleman looked extremely angry. He had noticed something curious in his counsel's manner from the first. He now leant over and whispered to his brother:

"What's the matter with Prescott? I can't make him out. He talks as if he were the judge summing up, instead of the counsel for the prosecution."

Mr. Pollard, the barrister, shrugged his shoulders and bit his lip. He could do nothing. It was not for him to offer advice to his leader. A man of Mr. Prescott's standing was not likely to tolerate any interference from a young fellow just called.

But the offended proceeded to cap his misdeeds by a new suggestion, which had never occurred to either of the Pollards. It had been noted down long ago by Tressamer, though.

"The third difficulty in this case, gentlemen, is one which has doubtless been present to your minds all the time I have been speaking."

This time the jury made a desperate effort to conceal their astonishment, and to look as if they perfectly well knew what was coming. But no one was deceived.

"I refer to the disposal of the body. On this point we have exactly two pieces of evidence. A young woman like the prisoner was seen walking in the direction of Newton Bay, about midnight, by the witness, Evan Thomas. On the following afternoon the severed hand was discovered on the beach of Newton Bay by a visitor.

"How did it get there? It is for you to say. On behalf of the Crown, it is my duty to suggest to you that the prisoner in the dock may have carried the result of her crime to that distant spot, in several journeys, on one of which she happened to be seen. I must put it to you that piece by piece she accomplished her revolting task, and that she sought to hide the traces of her guilt in the sea. If you think that a rational and likely course of circumstances, no doubt you will say so.

"Gentlemen, I have done. I trust I have not detained you at undue length over this case, which must strike you as one of the most grave and difficult that could well come before a court of justice. I shall now, with the assistance of my learned friend, put the evidence before you. If you are left in any doubt after hearing it, and, after hearing the prisoner's defence, if you feel that there are mysteries in the case which have not been properly explained, and difficulties which have not been fully met, then you will, I feel sure, be only too glad to acquit the prisoner of this dreadful charge. But, if, on the other hand, you are fully and entirely satisfied, if you feel no doubt whatever—of course, I mean no reasonable doubt—you will, I am equally sure, do your painful duty by returning a verdict of guilty."

The barrister sat down, and his junior, who had listened impatiently to the close of the speech, at once started up, and called out:

"John Lewis!"

And now, for the first time, Charles Prescott ventured to look towards the dock. After the first involuntary glance at Eleanor's entrance, he had steadily kept his eyes averted. During the whole of his address, which took up nearly an hour, he never once looked round. He was afraid to trust himself. That one brief glance had revived the memories of old with an added force which almost overwhelmed him.

Yet he was not what would be called an emotional man. His was one of those natures which maintain a seeming coldness under all circumstances, but which often conceal in their depths a strength of passion and devotion compared to which the fiery outbreaks of others are mere "sound and fury, signifying nothing." And now this hidden force was stirred. It held him in its grasp, and his whole being shook and quivered to its centre.

Not love at first sight, for he had seen her before. Yet love, awakening suddenly as he looked upon her in the full bloom of opening womanhood, surrounded by a halo of suffering, and peril, and mystery, the fated victim of an accusation which he would not believe and could not disprove. This it was that overpowered him; this it was that led to that feeble, halting advocacy which surprised all who heard it. They could not recognise the keen, trenchant Prescott, who had made such a name for himself on the circuit. The Pollards were the only ones there who resented it, but they were by no means the only ones to be puzzled at the change.

But Prescott did not easily give way to his feelings. The sense of duty was sufficiently strong in him to keep him from absolute abandonment of his cause. He had gone faithfully through the case, and he was now preparing to take his part in examining the witnesses. Pride and professional training asserted themselves, and he stood firm.

At this moment, however, and when he was suffering most acutely, one of those happy accidents which men call good fortune or Providence, according to their dispositions, came to his aid. A solicitor's clerk came hurriedly into the court and made his way to the barrister's side. An unforeseen event had occurred. A case in the other court which had been expected to last all day had suddenly come to a settlement by agreement between the parties. The next case on the list was one in which Mr. Prescott was engaged, and engaged by himself, and his immediate presence was called for. Breathing an ejaculation of thankfulness, he got up and quickly withdrew, leaving young Pollard to manage the witnesses as best he could.

The judge looked annoyed, and the solicitor, Pollard, somewhat dismayed at this sudden disappearance of the leader for the Crown. But young Pollard himself was only too pleased. At last he was to have his chance. He was eft captain of the ship. If all went well he might hope to get through the evidence and have the concluding speech in Prescott's absence. And his satisfaction was shared by Tressamer. Tressamer knew his man. For the first time that morning a look of satisfaction crossed his face, and he settled his wig firmly on his head as he prepared to encounter the moving spirit of the prosecution.

Digitized by Google

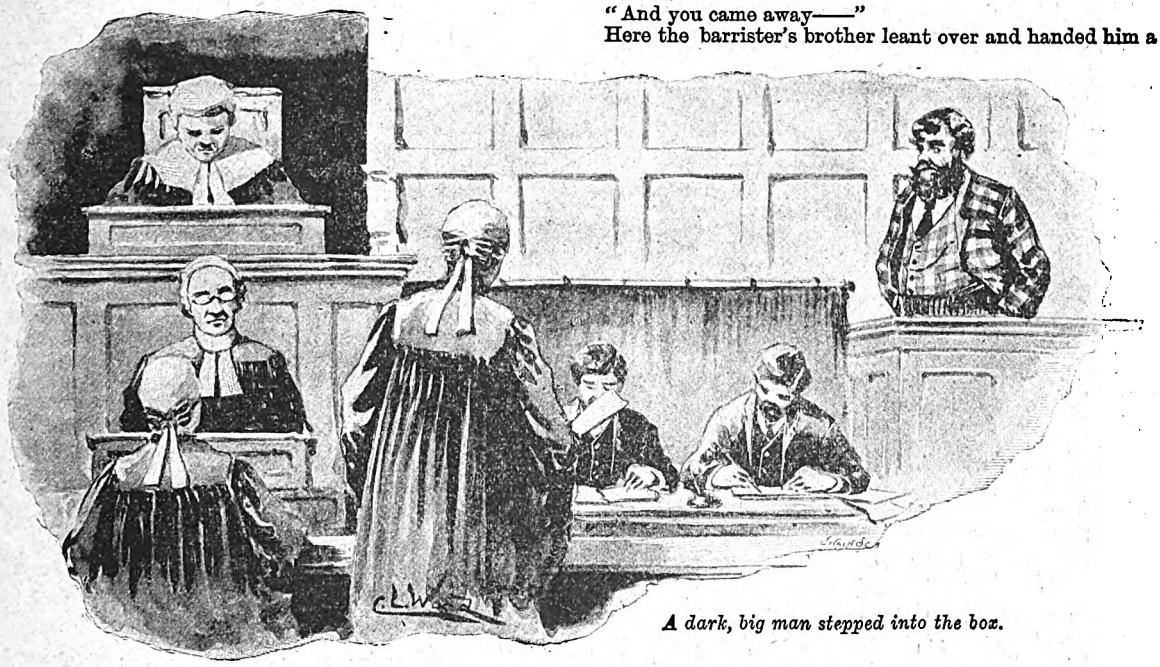
And Eleanor? She did not altogether understand what had happened. But she saw that the man who had put the case against her so mildly had now gone out of it altogether, and her heart gave a great beat of joy for the first time since she had parted with George Tressamer, two days before the memorable 1st of June.



A dark, big man stepped into the box.

CHAPTER VI.

THE WITNESSES.

"JOHN LEWIS!"

A dark, big man stepped into the box, frowning heavily around him. The oath was administered, and then Mr. Pollard commenced in the approved style.

"Your name is John Lewis, and you are now living at 'The Shrubbery,' Porthstone?"

"Yes."

"That's where the murder was committed?" interrupted the judge.

"Yes, my lord. The witness inherited it under Miss Lewis's will."

The Judge: "Have you lived there ever since?"

Witness: "Yes, my lord."

The Judge (after a pause, during which Mr. Pollard waits impatiently): "Go on, Mr. Pollard. What are you keeping us for?"

Mr. Pollard: "I beg your lordship's pardon." To witness: "You are the nephew of the deceased, and have just returned from Australia?"

"Yes; I came back to my aunt."

"After making some money out there, I believe?"

"I object!"

This interruption, it need not be said, came from Tressamer. He had risen to his feet, and put on that scowl of scornful indignation with which an experienced counsel knows how to daunt a young beginner and make him feel he has committed himself.

"My lord, my friend cannot prove that, and if he could, it cannot possibly be evidence against the prisoner. It is a most improper question."

The judge looked a little puzzled.

"It is irrelevant," he said, "and I won't allow it if you object. In a case like this we can't be too strict, of course."

Mr. Pollard began to realise that greatness has its snares as well as its triumphs. He tried to get back on to the track.

"You went to see the deceased on the first of June?"

"I did."

"And you came away——"

Here the barrister's brother leant over and handed him a slip of paper. He took it and read it, turned red, and, trying to appear as if he had not been prompted, put the question contained in the slip of paper:

"Was anything said about the jewels?"

The judge stared. Tressamer started to his feet in a transport of fury.

"My lord, my friend is deliberately leading the witness. In a case of murder it is disgraceful!"

"I agree with you, Mr. Tressamer. Don't answer that question, sir."

Thus the judge. Poor young Pollard turned as red as the judge's robe, and stammered out some apology. His brother mentally swore at him, and every solicitor in court resolved never to give him another brief.

"Go on, Mr. Pollard; you mustn't keep us waiting."

The wretched young man gave a last look at his brief, and closed the examination.

"And you left about ten o'clock?"

("Leading again!" ejaculated his opponent.)

"Yes. My lord, may I say——"

"No!" snapped the judge. "Say nothing unless you're asked."

The witness looked angry, and frowned savagely at his counsel. But the latter had now sat down, and the cross-examination was about to begin.

Tressamer had been studying the witness, with a view of ascertaining his weak point. This was evidently his temper.

Digitized by Google

Accordingly, he avoided irritating him till he had obtained as much as he could from him. He began:

"Had you any other relatives living besides Miss Lewis?"

The witness was thoroughly thrown out. He could not see what was coming. In a sullen voice he responded:

"Yes, I've a sister in the North."

"Did you go to see her before your aunt?"

"No. My lord, may I explain?"

The Judge: "You had better confine yourself to the questions now; you will have an opportunity of explaining afterwards."

"You went straight to your aunt. Was she pleased to see you?"

"Yes, she seemed very pleased."

"And yet she let you stay at a hotel?"

"That was only for the first night. It was arranged that I was to occupy a bedroom in her house afterwards."

"Oh!"

Type cannot do justice to the peculiar intonation with which the barrister uttered this exclamation. The whole court was aroused to suspect something beneath the surface. Then he turned round to the jury with a mysterious expression, and slowly repeated the answer:

"It was arranged that you were to occupy a room in her house after that night?"

The jury roused themselves for a grand effort, and succeeded in imparting a distinct air of suspicion to their countenances.

At last Mr. Lewis's temper came into play. He cried out:

"Yes; and if I had been there on the first night I might have prevented this murder."

"Silence, sir!" said the judge.

And now Tressamer brought out the question for which he had been preparing the way all along:

"When this arrangement was made about your living in the house, did your aunt (remember you are on your oath, sir!)—did she happen—to—furnish—you—with—a LATCHKEY?"

The effect was electrical. He had brought out the last words of the question slowly, one by one, and then he suddenly hurled the final word at the witness like a weapon.

John Lewis instantly realised the situation. The question was tantamount to an accusation. The whole court took it in that sense, and gazed at him in deadly earnestness. He turned livid. For a moment he could hardly bring his lips to frame a syllable. At length he recovered his self-command, and thundered out:

"No, sir. May Heaven strike me dead if she did!"

The fierce earnestness of his denial produced a revulsion of feeling in the court. The jury felt that the counsel had been guilty of unfairness in making such a charge so suddenly, and, as it seemed, with such absence of grounds.

The judge was annoyed, too. Sir Daniel Buller hated sensationalism. In fact, he did not like anything which threw his own dignity into the shade. He liked to feel that he was in the star part, and that everybody else in court was merely playing up to his grand effects. He, therefore, refrained from rebuking the witness, and from this stage he showed himself less favourable to the counsel for the defence.

But Tressamer had anticipated something of this sort, and he had a card in reserve. He went on with his cross-examination as if nothing had happened.

"You gave the prisoner into custody, I think?"

"I did."

"You made up your mind that she was guilty, I suppose, without much thinking?"

"I thought there was absolute proof of it."

"That's what I mean. You were anxious that she should be convicted, were you not?"

"I was anxious that she should be tried. I thought it my duty to see that this crime was punished."

"By the conviction of the prisoner?"

"If she were guilty."

"But you felt sure she was guilty? You were the one to accuse her, you know."

Mr. Lewis was getting irritated again. He made no answer to this suggestion, and the barrister forbore to press it, contenting himself with a meaning glance at the jury.

"You were represented at the inquest, were you not, by Messrs. Pollard?"

"Yes."

"The gentlemen who are now conducting this prosecution—nominally—on behalf of the Crown?"

And with this parting shot he resumed his seat.

Young Pollard instantly rose.

"My lord, the witness was anxious to explain one of his answers to my learned friend. Would your lordship allow him to do so now?"

"Yes, yes," was his lordship's answer.

The witness instantly took advantage of the permission.

"I wished to say, my lord, that the reason why I went first to see my aunt, instead of going to my sister's, was because she had befriended me when I was young. She furnished the money to start me with in Australia, and I felt it only right, in common gratitude, to come straight and thank her on my return."

Another revulsion of feeling swept over the court. The effect of Tressamer's last suggestion was obliterated. Lewis was once more in favour.

Pollard had scored. His brother twitched him by the gown from behind as a hint to sit down. But the unfortunate young man must needs try and improve on his lucky shot. He summoned up a very tragic demeanour, and put the fatal question:

"And is there the smallest ground for suggesting that you were near the house or out of your hotel after ten that night?"

The witness showed confusion. Instead of answering in the prompt, decided style he had hitherto shown, he hesitated for some seconds, and then said with visible embarrassment:

"No, there is none."

Pollard hastily sat down. The rules which govern the production of evidence did not permit Tressamer to put a further question to the witness, but he was skilful enough to do what accomplished the same result. He called across the barristers' table, in a perfectly audible voice:

"Is anyone from the hotel here, Mr. Pollard?"

"Not that I know of," was the sullen answer.

And now it was the judge's turn, and he proceeded to put to the witness that question which was in the mind of every person in court, but which neither of the counsel had dared to put, each fearing the answer might be unfavourable to himself.

"Tell me, Mr. Lewis, had you any special reason—don't tell me what your reasons were—but had you any reason, apart from what you were told by others, for accusing the prisoner of this murder?"

"I had, my lord."

"Did that reason arise in your mind as a consequence of anything which you saw the prisoner do, or which took place in her presence?"

"Not exactly, my lord. My aunt said to me—— "

The judge swiftly raised his hand with a forbidding gesture, and pursed up his lips.

"That will do. You can go."

Mr. Lewis retired, and the jury were left to wonder what the mysterious reason could be, the result on most of their minds being far more unfavourable to the prisoner than if the rules of evidence had allowed the witness to speak freely.

Digitized by Google

(To be continued.)

OR,

The Romance of a Lost Continent.

By Geo. C. Wallis, Author of The Winning of Gunhild, etc.

CHAPTER XXVII.

The Days of Desolation.

I never thought to see the light again when the waters closed over me as the helpless vessel clove them in her headlong fall, but she was a good ship, soundly built, and ballasted with loving care, and ere my breath was altogether gone, she bore up to the surface with a buoyant spring, shook the water from her deck with deep disdain, and righting, lay tossing heavily on the slowly subsiding waves.

One half of her crew was gone, but Valdo and Atris were left me, together with Orlanis, and it was not long before we got the oars out and to work, gained the broken quay, made the Ravager fast thereto, and set foot on the shore.

The terror-maddened thousands who had sought refuge by the sea had now fled back into the streets and houses of the ruined, grey-clad city, and were wandering aimlessly about the pavements, or crouching in deadly fear in holes and corners of the mighty buildings which still raised some framework to the smiling sky.

Drawing our swords—for we knew that the lawless and the robbers would now be reaping their grim harvest—my three officers and I, leaving the sailors to guard the vessel, set our faces towards the crumbled ruin that had once been the palace, anxiety for my loved ones quickening my steps and burning into my brain as I went, till I scarce knew how I got along over the damp, muddy, crowded, wreck-strewn streets.

The faithful three kept at my heels, however, Atris and Orlanis silent, and Valdo grumbling at my carelessness, till, through the maze of ruin, we came to the palace.

The great sea-wave had not reached so far as that by nearly a stone's cast, and so, when with the help of a score of willing hands gathered on the spot, the fallen stones were dragged away from the underground entrance, the white, scared prisoners came forth unharmed, but almost speechless with terror.

The ladies and their maids for the most part fainted or burst into tears of joy; but Briseis, though her cheeks had a death-like pallor, came and put her hand in mine without a word of her own distress, while Didron and Vesta, child-like, seized my tunic and essayed to pull me two ways at once, till I was fain to pick them up and bear them on my shoulders, laughing at their prattle the while, though there was no laughter in my heart.

Said Briseis, when I told her how the great fleet was destroyed, and how the Ravager alone was saved to us:

"Whither go ye now, husband, to house ourselves, our children, and our friends? There is no large house left standing, and the people seem gone mad with fear."

"'Tis a hard question, dear one," I said. "I would have taken you aboard the ship, but that the craft is helmless and battered, and needs weeks of repair before she will be seaworthy. It may be best to take the cariole and seek shelter inland. Perchance the ruin has not gone far."

"The horses are dead in their stables, King," said an attendant who overheard my speech, "and the royal carriages are crushed under the ruins of their shelter! Also, the streets are impassable, save by men on foot."

"May a thousand curses rest on these doings!" I cried in desperation; "would the gods have us to live homeless like the beasts of the field?"

"If it seemeth well to you, King," said Penares, a young officer in the Royal Guard, "I would advise that you make yonder tower your palace till order is restored," and he pointed with his spear towards the mighty monumental column on the outskirts of the city.

It had withstood the great convulsion's fiercest shock, and now loomed grey and grim above the scene of universal desolation, seeming all the greater now that the highest edifices of the city were humbled to heaps of shapeless wreck.

"Well thought and said, Penares," I answered. "Thither we will go, and that as soon as may be, for there are stores of food, and it is now past noon. You, Penares, with these fifty of the Guards, shall protect us on our way. As to our ladies, we who are strong must carry them this tiresome journey."

"An we be not too heavy," said Briseis, smiling, as I set down the children, and picked her up in my arms.

"Some burdens are so precious that the bearer feels no weight," I replied, as I bore my sweet load on. Behind came Valdo, bearing Didron, and Atris with Vesta on his shoulder, and several nobles and soldiers carrying their wives or love-maids or their little ones, while in front and in the rear, the guard marched with levelled spears and drawn swords.

We made but slow progress through the choked streets, and awful and sad were the sights that met our gaze as we wended painfully on.

Families, or sole survivors of families, sat or wandered disconsolate about the ruins of their houses; priests kept watch with keen daggers over the buried treasure of their fallen temples; soldiers stood on sentry at their appointed places, heedless of what had happened around; and hundreds of homeless, friendless outcasts, listlessly or with terror-haunted looks, ran stumbling hither, thither, everywhither, as though seeking what they had lost, throughout the great city.

Bands of armed robbers, and strong ruffians single-handed, prowled about the streets in all directions, taking tribute of all and sundry whom they could overpower. It was the harvest of the murderer and the thief, and right well did they labour at the task of reaping the fruits thereof! No person, no place, was sacred to the violaters, and but that they stood in awe of the Royal Guard, the King himself would have had no respect from them.

And in the midst of the sights and sounds of disaster and violence we heard the mocking refrain of ribald songs, and saw Wantonness stalking abroad with unblushing face.

So we hurried on past crumbling houses, broken columns, shattered arches, splintered marble glaring white and cold amid the grosser wreck, temples richly carved and painted fallen to the dust, stone walls thrown flat upon the ground, great drifts of ash piled up in heaps by fierce wind-eddies, and human beings dead and dying, or outcast, homeless, friendless by the hundred-score; past all these evidences of the dreadful night, till we came to where the ways were fairly passable by gentle feet, and there our fair ones bade us set them down to walk, so that our arms might gain a rest, and, little loth, we did so, for, despite our protestations, a burning ache began to seize our shoulder-joints, and our strides grew short and shaky.

Here, in the city's outskirts, the damage was not so great, save for the thronging crowds through which we slowly made our way.

"Come, let us hasten!" I said to Briseis, seizing her roughly by the arm; "these are not sounds fit for the ears of a fair queen. Let us not linger! As for these besotted wretches, who make merry in the day of a city's death and have no better use to which to put the gain they have taken from the common folk, Penares shall do with them as he will!"

I was about to give command in my anger that the revellers and all such be slain in their cups, and their houses pulled about their ears, when from a street on the left came melody of another kind, strong and clear in the noisy air, at which the crowd hushed, and all men stopped and turned to look and listen. Clear and strong in the air resounded the loud, full tones from a hundred throats:

Cease your revels; death is nigh!
Cast your pallid looks on high.
Ask not wherefore, ask not why,
But nerve yourselves to die—to die!

Pray the gods to close your eyes,
All ye people who are wise:
Wisdom only, courage brings,
That scorns at weak and foolish things.

The dizzy summit of the column.

Nearer came the song and the singers, nearer and nearer, till we saw the people give back as for a royal progress, and down the widening space between the throngs came a company of a hundred priests, proceeding from the direction of the half-ruined Temple of the Three Spirits; Unim, the Priest of Truth, Kalen, the Priest of Love, and Neolyn, the Priest of Life, walking in the van, and every priest in the stern-faced company wearing his robes of office, and scattering handfuls of the Passport Pieces as they passed along with slow and measured tread. The song went on, sounding strangely solemn in the midst of the sudden calm:

Cease your weepings, cease your wails;
Hide the soft cheek when it pales;
Cease not praying, though it stales—
Death comes to all and never fails!

Count your days and count your years;
Mind the blood-tie that endears
Heart to heart and soul to soul—
Short is all life, and Death its goal!

The little band of stern-faced men, moving thus unarmed through a crowd of outcasts half maddened by loss and fear, slowly passed the place where I stood with Briseis clinging to me, and the fifty soldiers of the guard, with a score of other loyal subjects ringed around us, and not even for the royal presence, which priests are so ready to acknowledge, did they pause or cease their awful chant, but went on as though I had never been:

Digitized by Google

Throng the temples, 'plore the Three—
Rulers of the land and sea—
To make the seeming bitter, sweet;
To smooth the path for flying feet.

Ask that he—dread Amaranth—
God of Death—in this ill month
Will veil his face in shades of night,
And make your heavy burden light.

They passed, and the song grew fainter, and they marched along and were lost to view, but still we listened and clearly heard another strain of the priestly warning:

Cease your revels, night is nigh!
Cease your tears, cease now to sigh!
Cease not praying, ye who fear!
Hope is yonder: Death is here!

Now all thought of punishing the tipsy revellers, whose levity had roused my ire, vanished, and I gave no command, even when one of the gay young nobles, with a leman on his arm, and a great amphora spilling hillside wine as he came, in his hand, staggered to the door of his mansion, and after drinking deeply, blasphemed the priests, the gods, and the people, for disturbing his pleasure.

I had stopped to reflect, and Briseis had whispered words of mercy in my ear, and I had no heart to add to the general ruin. But when the maddened crowd, incensed at the profligate's disdain of their distress, surged round his house like an angry sea, and tore him from his own door, and his leman with him, and trampled them out of all shape underneath a multitude of avenging feet, I also held my hand, saying to my Queen:

"Come; we have tarried here too long. Let us be going."

Soon we reached the open space outside the city bounds, and, pressing on through the flying throng, who sought refuge on the plain, gained the foot of the mighty tower, and, unlocking the brazen doors, entered, tired, hungry, and thirsty, but safe at last.

The huge vault between the great foundation walls was used as a public granary, and an ample supply of water poured always into a marble bath in the centre of the floor, conveyed in earthen pipes laid underground from the distant hills; so we felt no fear of immediate privation, and, setting twenty sentries round the walls, with orders to let none but ladies and soldiers of the guard enter, I and Valdo, with Penares, ascended the steep and winding stair to the dizzy summit of the column.

I was weary, and faint for want of food, but could not rest till from that commanding height I had gained a view of the extent of the night's destruction.

What I saw put the desire of food from me, so that when I went down again I ate but little, and that grudgingly, as one compelled against his will.

The afternoon was well advanced and the sun's slanting rays fell full upon a vast expanse of fallen masonry, relieved and broken here and there by skeleton walls—through which the light streamed strangely—standing gaunt and grim above the wreck, amongst which moved a restless throng of houseless wanderers.

In some places dull flame and blue smoke rose from the ruins, and over all was the greyness of the fallen dust, and the confused murmur of many voices. Nearer to the tower, where the shock had been less severe, sounds of riotous mirth and the clash of arms came up to where we stood and gazed, while once, borne on a turn of the breeze, there trembled in the air a fragment of the priests' song:

Count your days and count your years;
Mind the blood-tie that endears
Heart to heart and soul to soul—
Short is all life, and Death its goal!

Beyond the city the sea tossed sullenly, its foremost surges breaking on the shattered inshore edge of the submerged bay, and in a curving line well-nigh encompassing the stricken town within its briny arms.

But it was not to the south, nor to the east, nor west, where many leagues of land had sunk beneath the rolling tide, that we looked at longest and with most dismay. It was to the north, where a level plain with forest-clad hills rising in the distance should have met our gaze, that we saw the sight that blanched our cheeks and filled us with a nameless fear.

The hills were gone, and in their place and nearer still upon the plain we caught the silvery glint of sunlight playing on the surface of the sea!

Incredulous, we looked again, straining our weary eyes upon the distance, but our first glimpse was a true one, and following the gleaming line of water we could trace it without a single break to the ocean on east and west, nor saw we any land rising from it, even in the north. Valdo first found voice in the silent awe in which we stood, staring with moistened eyes; saying, with a touch of his old dogged recklessness:

"So the prophecy that was told concerning the death of the Sleeper is true, and the day of Atlantis' end is here! Let it be thus: we who are men and know how to meet adversity like soldiers will stay here, defying the doom to the last, and dying, when the time comes, as men who have seen death too often to be affrighted at his shape!"

Penares swore a round oath that come what might, he cared not, so that he could die at the last with a blade in his hand and a foe before him; but I answered—grown wiser with sorrow and years:

"Our end comes how and when it will, my warriors, and not as we would wish, and 'tis more manly to take greater thought for the lives of others than for our own entrance to the shadows. For the sake of the fair ones whom we have brought across the city, it will be well if we can fly from here while yet there is time. We must secure the Ravager, and have her put to rights, and with as many as she will hold, put forth to sea."

"You are right, King," said Valdo, stroking his beard thoughtfully, "but it maketh me no less bitter 'gainst womankind to know that they may yet be the death of us, for if we wait until the ship is ready for them, as well as we rough men, a new calamity may happen."

"With them, I will sail hence," I replied, "without them, I stay here, though I die in a common grave like the unrecognisable thousands buried under yonder ruins."

They said no more, but following me, descended the tedious stair. I knew Valdo of old, and knew his fulminations against the gentler sex to be a besetting habit more than a real callousness, else I had been deeply grieved.

Need I tell of the days of misery that fast succeeded one another? Of the nights made hideous with the glare and roar of incendiary fires, the wild carousing of the drunken mobs, the shrieks of agony from the hundreds of those of gentler birth, who fell a prey to the howling horde of ruffians who ruled supreme in the city? Of the days spent in ceaseless watch and ward, and often in fighting, to keep the rebels from our gates, lest they should seize our stores of food and put us to death? I need not.

'Twill be enough to say that the horror-stricken thousands of the once stately city had lost all sense of loyalty or order and, led by the most daring spirits, had armed themselves as best they could, robbed and pillaged right and left, put to the sword all the nobles on whom they could lay hands, and then, intoxicated with success and the brief enjoyment of the luxuries taken from the great houses, had given way to the wildest excesses of riot and lawlessness.

The killing of the young and dissolute noble, which I had witnessed, was, so to speak, first blood to the restless, homeless bands, and thereafter 'twas in vain for the priests to go amongst them in endeavour to allay the mad tumult.

For two days we who watched from the upper stories saw the dignified procession wending its way through the stony avenues, and heard snatches of their warning song.

Digitized by Google

but on the third day neither saw nor heard a sign of them, and on the fourth, Kalen, the Priest of Love, crawled to our gates, wounded and alone—as many a noble and soldier and woman had done before—and, nearly at the last gasp, was taken in.

"I alone am left of the priests of the city," was all he said.

We had then three hundred well-armed men within our walls, as well as two hundred women and children, and felt no fear of holding the place against the violence of the undisciplined hordes in the city, who were fast relapsing into barbarism.

But on the fourth day the water in the basin ran brackish as the sea, and we knew that the pipes from the distant hills were broken by the land subsidence, and the ocean water had entered.

That we were now on a sea-girt isle, cut off from what was left of Atlantis—if, indeed, any was left—the rebels knew as well as we, for from the column top we had seen messengers come in from the plain with the dreadful news, the panic with which it was received, the sending out of other messengers northward to make sure, their return with sobered faces, and the frenzy of despair with which their report was greeted.

But the ignorant masses had no thought of anything save swift pleasure and mad riot, and the smoking city, its ruins thronged now with thousands of the country people driven south by the advancing sea, was plunged into a still deeper and more savage saturnalia.

So we dared not venture out to the three wells nearest us lest our number should be reduced, and in the end, after enduring a foretaste of the tortures of thirst till some of our weakest died, we dug a well, wide and deep, down into the earth beneath the basin, having first removed the latter and stopped up the earthen pipes, and thus secured a good supply of the precious fluid.

To make our store of food last as long as possible, I had our little party numbered and the amount of grain and other edibles measured to the smallest portion, to each man and woman giving an equal share daily, and a lesser equal share to each child, myself and my own family being no exception to the rule, and found that with strict stinting of our stomachs we could hold our post for the space of five months.

"By which time," I said to Atris, "it may be that the rebel fever will have worn itself out, and the people will have come to reason."

"Ah, ye Spirits! Well was it for me, then, that Kalen, the Priest of Love, was no finder-out of the secrets of the future! Well, altogether well!

Before the second month had passed, the stores of food in the sea-girt land were nearly all consumed, for much provision had gone down in the ill-fated fleet, along with some thousands of sailors, and hunger stared the famished hordes of ragged beings in the face.

They rioted still more, fought with each other for scraps of offal 'mid the ruins, gnawed the bark of trees out on the lessening plain, ate the putrid flesh of dogs and horses, and at the last, famine and pestilence swept through their ranks, slaying them by hundreds at a time, till only a miserable company of emaciated forms crept round the tower; weak, but fierce and cunning, and still too many for us to venture out.

For some reasons we could have been happy while we lived in that tower of refuge, for we suffered and hoped and thought in common, there being no envy nor malice amongst us, no lords and no servitors, each doing his best for the good of all, each threatened by the same danger and eating the same food.

I bade them cease all ceremony in addressing me, though that they found hard, and, had we been ignorant of the chaos outside, we should have lived as a happy family.

But when we daily, hourly, heard the sound of revel or of riot, or the wail of anguish or lamentation at the ravage of the pestilence, or marked that line of water in the north ever creeping nearer, and the shore-line of the harbour sinking more and more, our hearts were sad and sore.

And when the breath of the fell disease swept over the land, and the odour from the unburied dead was wafted to us on the air continuously, till many of us sickened and died, the smile fled from our faces and the jest remained unuttered on our lips.

And when my darling Vesta fell beneath the foul blight and was summoned by Amarunth to the Shadows, and we bore her outside the walls one night and buried her with the Passport Piece between her little fingers, Briseis and I found the cup of our sorrow full to overflowing.

Let me pass on.

(To be continued.)

POST-CARD COMPETITION.—2.

NEW SERIES.

A PRIZE of two guineas is offered for the best anagram on the words, "Short Stories is best." Post-cards only, please. Date of closing, Monday, January 11th.

Result of Jumbled Story Competition, No. 24.

See page 45.

THE first prize of £5 goes to Mr. Claude B. Lemon, 22, Stanley Crescent, Kensington Park, W.

Prizes of £1 each have been sent to Mr. W. H. Fitz-Gerald, 9, Ondine Road, East Dulwich, S.E.; Miss N. Marshal, Reed Vale, Teignmouth, S. Devon; Miss M. E. Spencer, 8, Bettridge Road, Fulham, S.W.; and Mr. J. Burton, 102, Glenparke Road, Forest Gate, E.; and Mr. E. Beardsley, 31, Ponsonby Place, Westminster, S.W.

None of our Irish readers have succeeded in correctly solving this Jumbled Story.

Jumbled Story Competition.—27.

ON page 64 appears a story, each line of which is numbered. The lines are all in their wrong position, and the prizes mentioned below are offered to those who write on a sheet of paper the numbers of the lines in the order most nearly correct. The title is jumbled up, and should be correctly given and pasted on the paper containing the effort

The conditions are jumbled in the following paragraph as an example. The correct order of the lines is given in line 10.

1 SHORT STORIES on or before Monday,
2 awarded to the readers whose solutions first
3 JUMBLED STORY.
4 Four Prizes—one of £5 and three of £1 each—are
5 January 11th, and envelopes must be marked
6 correct. In the event of a tie, the prizes will be
7 reach this office.
8 All attempts to be delivered at the offices of 9 offered to the readers whose keys are most nearly 10 4—9—6—2—7—8—1—5—3—12—11—13—10.
11 a sheet of paper the figures in the order they
12 Competitors in doing the story should write on
13 believe to be correct, thus:

£2 is offered to the first of the readers living in Ireland who succeeds in forwarding the correct, or most nearly correct, solution.

Digitized by Google

CURIOUS EFFECTS IN THE TREATMENT OF CORPULENCY.

THE old-fashioned methods of curing obesity were based upon the adoption of a sort of starvation dietary. Would any reader now believe that by the new orthodox treatment a stout patient can take almost double his usual quantity of food, and yet decrease one or two pounds of fat daily for a time? This is very singular, and directly hostile to previous opinions held by medical authorities, yet it is a fact. The author of the comparatively new system in question explains that the person under treatment is restored to a healthier state in the small space of twenty-four hours, having lost probably 2lb. of superfluous deposit, the organs display great activity, and more food is required. By standing on a weighing machine the proof of reduction is incontrovertibly shown daily. In serious cases a pound to ten pound weekly loss is registered until the person approaches his or her normal weight, then the diminution becomes less pronounced, the muscles firmer, the brain more active, less sleep is desired, and finally a cure is effected. Compiled reprints of medical and other journals, and interesting particulars, including the book, entitled "Corpulency, and the Cure" (256 pages), containing the "recipe," which is quite harmless, can be obtained post free from Mr. Russell, of Woburn House, 27, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., by inclosing two penny stamps.—Dublin Weekly Freeman.

A POSITIVE REMEDY FOR CORPULENCE.

Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. We have recently received a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled, "Corpulency, and the Cure" (256 pages), and is a cheap issue (only twopence), published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. Our space will not do justice to this book; send for it yourself. It appears that Mr. Russell has submitted all kinds of proofs to the English Press. The editor of the Tablet, the Catholic organ, writes: "Mr. Russell does not give us the slighest loophole for a doubt as to the value of his cure, for in the most straightforward and matter-of-fact manner he submitted some hundreds of original and unsolicited testimonial letters for our perusal, and offered us plenty more if required. To assist him to make this remedy known, we think we cannot do better than publish quotations from some of the letters submitted. The first one, a marchioness, writes from Madrid—'My son, Count ——, has reduced his weight in twenty-two days 16 kilos = i.e., 34lb.' Another writes—'So far (six weeks from the commencement of following your system) I have lost fully two stone in weight.' The next (a lady) writes—'I am just half the size.' A fourth—'I find it is successful in my case. I have lost 8lb. in weight since I commenced (two weeks).' Another writes—'A reduction of 18lb. in a month is a great success.' A lady from Bournemouth writes—'I feel much better, have less difficulty in breathing, and can walk about.' Again, a lady says—'It reduced me considerably, not only in the body, but all over.'" The author is very positive. He says—"Step on a weighing machine on Monday morning and again on Tuesday, and I guarantee that you have lost 2lb. in weight without the slighest harm, and vast improvement in health through ridding the system of unhealthy accumulations." — Cork Herald.

1/2 A MILLION 7/6 FULL DRESS LENGTHS TO BE CLEARED AT 6S

BLACK, NAVY, GREY, AND SEVERAL CHARMING SHOT EFFECTS

Patterns of the above, also SALE PRICE LIST, Post Free.

CLEARANCE PRICES quoted for Dress Goods, Mantlings, Suitings, Flannels, Flannelette, Calico, Shirtings, Blankets, Quilts, Sheets, Towels, Gloves, Corsets, Stockings, Handkerchiefs, Umbrellas, etc.

TREMENDOUS REDUCTIONS IN EVERY DEPARTMENT.

FIRST ORDER OPENED MONDAYS, WEDNESDAYS, AND FRIDAYS SENT FREE AND CASH RETURNED.

Send to-day for Sale Price List and list of Lucky Winners.

REMNANT BUNDLES (containing 12 yards), in long lengths—Dress Serge 12/-, Calico 3/6, Flannelette 4/6, Union Shirting 7/9, Flannel 8/9.

LUTAS LEATHLEY & Co., Dept. 130, ARMLEY, LEEDS

TOOTH-ACHE
CURED INSTANTLY BY
BUNTER'S NERVINE
Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.
Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.
PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.
Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.
Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.
PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.
Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5, Sept. 1, £5, Oct. 1, £5, Nov. 2, £6, Dec 1, £6.
OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.
We have not a dissatisfied Client.
DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS,
5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and
11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

HAIR DESTROYED. On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 26, Belvedere Rd., Lambeth, London.

DEAFNESS CURED.
On receipt of stamped envelope, a lady who cured herself of Deafness and Noises in the Head, after fifteen years of suffering, will send to all afflicted free particulars of the Remedy, which is simple, safe, sure and inexpensive. Address—Mrs. C. E. AUSTIN, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

CORPULENCY CURED By a simple inexpensive self-treatment, effecting a rapid and permanent reduction without change in diet. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. G. A. BOYD, 14, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London.

BLUSHING.
Particulars of a self-treatment for a permanent cure, as prescribed by eminent physicians of the U.S.A., forwarded free to all sufferers on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. B. F. FIELD, 15, York Buildings Charing Cross, London, W.

THE GREAT COUGH REMEDY, BRONCHONIA.
A Marvellous Remedy for Coughs, whether arising from Consumption, Bronchitis, or Asthma. Its efficacy is testified to by Eminent Physicians. Of all Chemists, 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per bottle. Post free, 2s. 9d., 4s. 9d., and 11s. 6d.—J. HOWARD & Co., 20 and 21, Queenhithe, LONDON, E.C. One Trial will prove its Efficacy.

Digitized by Google

JUMBLED STORY No. 27.] [See Page 62.

THE LIE W. CAUTIL TOLD

Once upon a time a little white cloud left its girl, while she listened tearfully. She clung to him, and the sun, for he thought that it might spoil her blue sky.

The man walked to the railway station and from the station, and soon left the country village and placid lakes.

The man was talking long and earnestly to the girl. Then he walked on towards the station.

Then the man kissed her again, and, taking his way she turned a corner, and the cloud was not sobbing. Was it possible that he shook her off just there was a half-sneer on his lips.

When he had finished his story the woman tapped soundly.

And this interested the little cloud more than one before."

"I will follow him," he said; "and see what he saw deep valleys. He crossed rushing rivers fascinating, so wondrously beautiful.

That night, as the little cloud looked on the basket.

He crossed the mighty ocean.

At this the little cloud sighed heavily.

Which, when one comes to think of it, was not so far behind.

When at last the journey came to an end, and the wench was feeding the geese with grain from a distant view with great, unseeing eyes.

"Bah! how cold and miserable," he said.

Somehow he felt that already he hated that man. The man was telling the woman of his country feet.

He passed over mountain tops. Far below him away over the city.

"Oh," he cried, "this is quite ideal. Dear me, I left them sitting there together, and sailed swiftly in his little life had the cloud seen a creature so rolled down her sleeves.

"Why can't she understand?" the man muttered. In the farm the cows waited to be milked. The geese, and cows, and more, a charming country clapped them joyously, and sailed away across the great houses, he noticed a man and woman sitting very surprising.

The girl ran forward when she saw him, and walked down the road. The little cloud followed him lightly on his arm.

Then the farm gate clicked behind her, and she disappeared long ago. I declare I have never seen geese cackled for their food.

The little cloud heard him, and noticed now that a letter that the postman had given her. Her face remained very quiet and still as the train drew out a trifle impatiently? The little cloud was not sure.

"These country girls always take one so seriously."

He listened carefully to what they were saying.

A girl was standing at the gate of a farm reading adventures that morning.

Tired of all this grandeur, the little cloud found me in this wonderful world?"

He looked at the woman at his side. Never before anything he had ever seen before.

When the country girl had finished feeding the mischief he's up to."

"What shall I find," he cried, "that will interest our woman's hearts."

The girl remained very still, staring out to the arms of the country girl.

And the little cloud dissolved away into tears, with a gun under his arm awaiting her.

By the time the morning sun had risen in the geese, she put a large hat on her tumbled hair, and that it came from the man who had deserted her.

"Ah, you men," she said, "how you play with fresh complexion. When she had walked a little remained behind in the country.

The man replied tenderly, kissing the woman's corner, and waved his hand to the poor country English village. There were farmhouses, and clever thing. When he thought that no one would really thought that milkmaids with white arms had gun under his arm, strode away. He turned at the little cloud came out from the steam and looked very surprised to see a man in a shooting-jacket, threw her arms round his neck, while he kissed her cautiously, taking care to place himself between her parent's side, and unfurling its tiny, fleecy wings, to the ground. Instinctively the little cloud knew to the station, and hid himself in a volume of thick play with, others to win. The little cloud, disgusted, was very pale. The letter fluttered from her hand hand as he spoke, that some hearts were made to notice him he flapped his little wings and came down entered a train. Then the little cloud did a very smoke that the engine was giving out. Then he round him, he wished very much that he had out on a balcony, gazing up towards him. He looked again, and then—why then he saw that the man was the man he had seen that morning in the which fell, very softly, as drops of rain, at the girls' it a positive relief when he discovered beneath him nothing more interesting than a tiny, old-fashioned sky, he found himself over the little country village.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

RED WHITE & BLUE

FRENCH COFFEE.

Delicious for Breakfast or After Dinner.

In making, use rather less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary Coffee.

SOLD EVERYWHERE.

FRILLED BUTTER MUSLIN.

FOR ARTISTIC HOME DECORATION.

White, Cream, Ecru, and 12 Art Shades. CURTAINS, frilled two sides and bottom, 3yd. long, 58in. wide, 6/9 per pair; 3½yd., 7/9 per pair. May also be had by the yard, 58in. wide, frilled both sides, 11½d. per yard. Sample Book of Plain & Figured Muslins sent on approval. ROLLER-BLINDS, edged with Lace or Fringe, from 5/6. Sample Book of Materials on approval. CRETONNES, TAPESTRIES, PLUSHETTES, ART SERGES, etc. Patterns on approval. Table Covers, Cushion Squares and Mantel Borders. Picture Book of Lace Curtains, Lace Blinds, Post Free.

H. GORRINGE & CO., 20A DEPT., NOTTINGHAM.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 27, Strand, London.

BLACKHEADS or "Maggots," Pimples, Blotches, etc., immediately and permanently removed by my Skin Cleansing Lotion, "CUTISOLINE." Never fails. Hundreds of testimonials. Post free with directions, 1/6, 3/- and 5/-. AUSTIN LENNOX, Skin Specialist, 1, Shoe Lane, Fleet Street, LONDON.

HAIR DESTROYED permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F.T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue 259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, Mrs. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

All Wool Under-clothing.

HAWICK HOSIERY is the BEST.

Lamb's Wool Shirts and Pants, 3/6 each.
Men's Socks, 1/6 each.
Ladies' Stockings, 1/6 and 2/- each.
CARRIAGE PAID.

THE TEVIOT TWEED CO., HAWICK, N.B.

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery. The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

UNIQUE TESTIMONY.

WINDSOR CASTLE

Windsor, May 9/95.

The late Colonel G. J. IVEY writes: "I can conscientiously state that 'KOKO for the Hair' has performed all you say. I have found it most efficacious, and shall certainly recommend it to all my friends."

"I WAS QUITE BALD."

"ARUNDEL LODGE,
"PUTNEY, July 3/96.

"To the Koko-Maricopas Co. Ltd., 11, Gray's Inn Road, London.

"Gentlemen,—I am now convinced that, without exception, 'KOKO' is the best preparation possible for restoring hair. I was quite bald on the front, top, and back of my head, and I have now a fine crop of hair. I am strongly of opinion that if the Duke of Cambridge, the Prince of Wales and his good brother knew your 'KOKO' they would use it. You are at perfect liberty to make whatever use you think proper of this communication, and I am ready and willing to answer any question from anyone upon the subject.

"Yours respectfully,
"J. EDGHILL COLES.

"P.S.—I inclose my Photo, just taken, and I consider it a marvellous recovery of my hair, especially as I am over 60 years of age."

JOHN STRANGE WINTER,

The Popular Authoress, of "Bootles' Baby," etc., says: "Most decidedly use 'KOKO.' It will stop your hair from falling off. I happen to know, because I have tried it myself. It is a nice clean stuff, too, not sticky or greasy."

ROYAL ORDER.

"Dec. 20/95.

"I beg you to send by return six bottles of Koko. It is for H.R.H.

Princess Victoria

of Schaumburg Lippe."
(Granddaughter of our Queen, and Sister to the German Emperor.)

"KOKO"

Eradicates scurf and dandruff, promotes growth of the hair, prevents hair falling, and is undoubtedly the best dressing for the hair. It is perfectly colourless and contains no poisonous substances or grease.

1/-, 2/6, and 4/6, of all Chemists, etc.

KOKO MARICOPAS Co. Ltd., 11, GRAY'S INN ROAD, LONDON, W.C.

STORIES SHORT AND STORIES TALL. STORIES FOR ONE AND STORIES FOR ALL.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 420. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 16TH, 1897. [ONE PENNY.

"Cadbury's represents the standard of highest purity at present attainable."
—THE LANCET.

"The Typical Cocoa of English Manufacture—Absolutely Pure."
—THE ANALYST.

CADBURY'S
COCOA
Absolutely Pure, therefore Best.

In DRINKING COCOA, care should be taken to have the pure article only, as many so-called "pure" cocoas contain added matter, which is not only unnecessary, but often positively harmful. CADBURY'S is a perfectly safe and reliable Cocoa, containing the full nourishing properties of the cocoa bean, without any foreign admixture whatsoever. As a sustaining, strength-giving beverage, and a nourishing food, CADBURY'S COCOA fulfils every requirement. "HEALTH" says: "CADBURY'S COCOA has in a remarkable degree those natural elements of sustenance that give the system endurance and hardihood, with a steady action that makes it a most acceptable and reliable beverage."

Digitized by Google

"SHORT STORIES" best suit the mood of this eager, restless age, so

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES,

Ready-made and to measure, may be briefly and simply set down as.

"ABSOLUTELY the BEST VALUE in the WORLD."

MODEL 583 is one of the latest up-to-date designs made in that ideal fabric, The John Noble Cheviot Serge. It has a smart well-cut Bodice, with the back shaped to the figure and the front pleated at the waist.

10/6. There is a pretty Yoke Collar, and the whole is very daintily trimmed. The Skirt is a full, wide, tailor-made design. Price, for complete Costume, only 10/6; safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

SKIRT ONLY, as sketched, 5/6; carriage 6d. extra.

SIZES IN STOCK fit figures 34in., 36in., and 38in. round bust, under arms; skirts being 38in., 40in. and 42in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

COLOURS. — Black, Brown, Navy, Myrtle, Bronze-Green, Ruby, Cinnamon, Electric Blue, Fawn, Grey, and Petunia.

John Noble's Knockabout Frocks,

With long full sleeves, saddle top, and pocket.
Sizes 21 24 27 30 33 36 39 42 45in.
Prices 1/6 2/- 2/6 3/- 3/6 4/- 4/6 5/- 5/6
Sent Carriage Paid 4½d. extra.

"AN IDEAL SCHOOL OR HOLIDAY GARMENT FOR GIRLS."

AN UP-TO-DATE FASHION VOLUME, containing numerous choice designs of Ladies' and Children's Costumes, sent, together with Patterns, post free on application. PLEASE MENTION "SHORT STORIES."

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TOO STOUT

If you require a reliable remedy for the relief of superfluous fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills. No starvation required; you may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5lb. to 7lb. weekly. They are a harmless vegetable preparation; successful in the most stubborn cases, and improve health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, tasteless, and highly recommended. Prices, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., post free, plain wrapper. PROFESSOR F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 26, Belvedere Rd., Lambeth, London.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
January 16, 1897.
No. 4.
S.S. S.S.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 4.
Jan. 16, 1897.
NEWSAGENTS
S.S. S.S.

MOUSTACHES

HEAVY AND HANDSOME, SPEEDILY PRODUCED.

BALD PATCHES Eradicated by Using ESAULINE.

Testimonials Daily.

POST FREE (secretly packed) in British Isles,

1/6, 3/-, and 5/- from

S. S. KNOWLES & CO., 30, NEWGATE STREET, E.C.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5, Sept. 1, £5, Oct. 1, £5, Nov. 2, £6. Dec 1, £6. Jan. 2 1897, £6.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

CORPULENCY CURED

By a simple inexpensive self-treatment, effecting a rapid and permanent reduction without change in diet. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. G. A. BOYD, 14, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London.

BLUSHING.

Particulars of a self-treatment for a permanent cure, as prescribed by eminent physicians of the U.S.A., forwarded free to all sufferers on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. B. F. FIELD, 15, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London, W.

All Wool Underclothing.

HAWICK HOSIERY is the BEST.

Lamb's Wool Shirts and Pants, 3/6 each.
Men's Socks, 1/6 each.
Ladies' Stockings, 1/6 and 2/- each.
CARRIAGE PAID.

THE TEVIOT TWEED CO., HAWICK, N.B.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

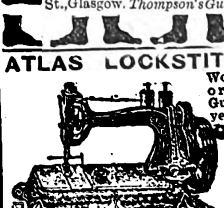
BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay.
Saves Extraction.
Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

WHY SUFFER FROM CORNS, BUNIONS, OR ENLARGED TOE-JOINTS, when a packet of Thompson's Celebrated French Corn Plasters will cure you? It is thin as silk, and can be worn with tightest boot. Post free for 14 stamps from M. F. THOMPSON, Homœpathic Chemist, 17, Gordon St., Glasgow. Thompson's Guide to Health post free

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188n, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

SHORT STORIES

No. 420.] [ONE PENNY.

EDITED BY

C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

For the Week ending January 16th, 1897.

ROMANCE

LOVE

ADVENTURE

WAR

HUMOUR

PATHOS

THE SHADOW OF THE GUILLOTINE.

"ROLAND, they are coming. Hark! I hear the voices, the clatter of the pikes and guns. Oh! Roland, my husband!"

"Hush! Yvonne; be brave."

His wife clung to him, weeping, as he tried to soothe her.

Lights approached the house, and the noise without grew louder till it culminated in a furious knocking at the door below.

"In the name of the Republic!" cried a voice.

Footsteps ascended the stairs, the door was flung open, and the room filled with the fierce, red-capped soldiers of Lebon. One stepped forward. "Citizen Mauricière, you are arrested."

Yvonne gave a cry of agony. At Arras, in the year 2 of the Republic, arrest meant death.

"Courage, dear," whispered Roland. Then aloud, he asked: "What is my crime?"

"Harbouring rebels."

"Or that my father has escaped you?"

"You are an aristocrat."

"I am a Republican."

"You are a Suspect."

Roland smiled disdainfully and resigned himself to his fate.

"Then all is said," he replied. "I am ready."

Yvonne clung to him still, but he gently unclasped her hands and kissed her. The soldiers closed round him, and he was gone.

His wife stood dazed. Gone! to the prison; and from the prison to the guillotine was but a short journey that the feet of some condemned traversed every day. Gone! and she was alone. No, not quite alone. Her child, sleeping on a couch by the window, had wakened at the noise of the trampling and the voices, and now began to stir and cry. Yvonne fell on her knees beside him—there was still her boy left to her, to guard and protect.

The little one put his soft hand up to her face, wetting it with the hot tears, and laughed. She clasped him in her arms and covered him with kisses hot and fervent. But the curly head turned away rebelliously and the dimpled hands tried to push away the mother's face. Something else had attracted him. Yvonne looked up to see what had taken his attention, and then suddenly released the child, who slid from the couch and ran tottering across to the centre of the room, where stood a tall, white-haired man clad in the ragged, discoloured dress of a Republican soldier.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Yvonne shrank back at the sight of the uniform, but the man took the boy in his arms, and, advancing, tenderly drew her to him.

"My poor, poor girl," he said.

"Father!"

"I saw him taken, my child; I came to warn him, but too late."

Yvonne looked round fearfully and pushed the shutters closer.

"They may return," she said. "Are you safe?"

"Yes, for a time, and my life is precious now or I should not be in this dress," he replied bitterly. "Listen, my child, this is no time for tears and sorrowing. We must act if we are to save Roland."

"Save Roland! Can we—can you save——? Oh, it is useless. Do not raise my hopes, father. Can you, of all people, think that Lebon has mercy?"

"He? No. But Robespierre will sell a life for a life. It is I, the Marquis de la Mauricière, they want. I escaped them, so Roland was marked down. He suffers for his father's loyalty; shall his father be less loyal to him than to the cause? My life is useless to the young king; Robespierre will buy it with Roland's freedom."

"Ah, no!"

But the father continued resolutely: "My child, I can trust no one but you, and I must not be taken, for my life is my son's. You must go to Paris, see Robespierre, plead with him. If that fails—denounce me; and when he gives you Roland's pardon, you shall tell him where I am hiding."

"No, no! I cannot betray you; Roland would curse me; my child would learn to loathe me. Do not ask me to do this. See, I am brave and can bear the agony of parting with my husband. He himself will die an honourable man. I shall bring up my child, my little Roland, to reverence him; do not ask him to live in shame, and me to be the betrayer of his father."

The old man's eyes shone with unshed tears, his stern lip trembled, but he drew himself up imperiously.

"I command it," he said. "I am still the head of the family; will you rebel against me, as this canaille has rebelled against its King? I alone am answerable for my son's arrest, and if I would save him, will you refuse to do my bidding?"

Yvonne hesitated still. "Do not ask me," she sobbed.

A great tear rolled down the old man's bronzed cheek. Almost pleadingly he stretched out his hand.

"Will you not let me save my son, my Roland? Will you, his wife, not help me? Think, think if this child, your little Roland, were in danger, would you not give up your life for him?"

Yvonne involuntarily caught her baby from her father's arms and pressed it to her bosom. The answer was there.

"Then you will go to Paris?"

"Yes," she murmured between her sobs. "May God and Roland forgive me. I will go."

* * * * *

"A woman?"

"A woman, citizen."

Robespierre trembled. He was a coward, and but nine days before Cecile Renault had perished for her attempt on his life. Marat was but one year dead by the knife of Charlotte Corday.

"Her name?" he asked harshly.

"Yvonne Mauricière, from Arras."

"I will see her;" and the Dictator's thin, dry hand was laid on the pistol beside him.

Yvonne, pale and trembling, entered and advanced to the table.

"Back there! Stand back, citoyenne. What is your business?"

"Ah, Citizen Robespierre, to plead for a life."

"You are from Arras, a Royalist town. It is useless."

"But Roland, my husband, is not a rebel. He is a good Republican. Hear me, monsieur."

"Eh?"

"Citizen. Hear me; he is guilty of no crime. He merely gave a little bread to a priest, who——"

"Priests! The worst of rebels. It is enough; he feeds the enemies of France—he feeds the guillotine." Robespierre answered with a convulsive smile.

"But is it a crime to be punished with death? Think, citizen, a little bread to a starving man. And we can pay if need be, any fine—anything. Oh! not death!"

"It is decreed."

"Mercy, mercy!"

Robespierre twitched his head impatiently. Yvonne had thrown herself on her knees, and the tears streamed down her cheeks.

"Ah, then it was false," she cried despairingly.

"What was?"

"They told me that you were once merciful and pitiful. That in our very town once you would not sentence even a criminal to death, and now—now——"

"Now it is for France, and these are traitors. Come, come, citoyenne, I have no time; the Convention waits."

"No, no, one moment, monsieur—stay. Your heart is a stone; you are ice; you will not give me my husband's liberty—I will buy it then."

"Justice is not bought," croaked the Dictator, folding his hands and pressing one into the other nervously.

"But if I denounce to you an enemy; one you have long sought?"

"His name?"

"The Marquis de la Mauricière."

Robespierre looked at her keenly. The only sign he made was a contraction of the lips and a deeper breath. Before he spoke again, he carefully brushed from the shoulder of his blue coat some powder that had fallen from his hair.

"And your husband's name is Mauricière," he said coldly.

"He is Roland's father."

"Then Lebon did well. These Royalist families must be stamped out."

"But my husband is a Republican."

"Bah! Where is this traitor now?"

"First, my husband's pardon."

Robespierre fixed his eyes upon the table in silence. At length he spoke, and his voice was softened; the Northern dialect sounded as musical as before it had been harsh.

"Citoyenne, you are a good patriot. The Republic, stern to rebels, can reward her daughters. You have denounced a traitor; France will give you a life in return. Let but your denunciation be complete. Where is the rebel hiding?"

"His son's pardon first."

"It is granted, citoyenne. A patriot of Arras has a double claim on Robespierre. Is he in Arras?"

"Pardon, citizen."

"Eh, speak."

"I would have the order for Roland's release."

"I have given you my word."

Digitized by Google

"My husband's life must not depend on a word, Citizen Robespierre."

"Bah! you—well, well, you shall have it."

The Dictator took his pen—that pen that had given the guillotine so many victims. "Thermidor 3th," he murmured, and wrote; then, folding the pardon, he passed it to Yvonne, who thrust it in her dress eagerly.

"Now, citoyenne."

She drew forth a slip of paper and handed it to him. Robespierre read, nodding his head.

"You are a good citoyenne," he said, "and shall convey the warrant for the rebel's arrest with that for his son's release."

Once more he wrote. "Give me the pardon again," he said, looking up.

Yvonne hesitated, trembling.

"Tut! it is only that you may not destroy the one and carry the other safely."

She gave it to him, and he added a line more to it, placed both documents under cover, and sealed the packet with the seal of the Republic, One and Indivisible.

"If that seal is broken," he cried harshly, "the pardon is useless. Go!"

Heart throbbing, face pale, she left the room without a word, and the Dictator, with a cold, mirthless smile on his face, hurried to his place in the Convention.

* * * * *

The road from Paris to Arras is over a hundred miles of flat country. A test of endurance for a good horseman with relays of horses, but for a woman who had already covered the ground and was almost fainting from fatigue and anxiety, it was a task almost hopeless. But Yvonne rode for her husband's life. In Paris, by the greatest of good fortune, she had purchased a fresh horse; her own was too spent for use without a day's rest, and that rest she dared not make. A horse could go no farther—the woman, half mad with fear, strung to the utmost tension, conquered over-wrought nature and would go on till she reached the goal or till she dropped dead from the saddle.

But it was slow journeying—too slow for the prize at stake—and yet without constant halts, she knew she could not accomplish her task. Three days passed and still she was only at Amiens—reeling in the saddle and but half-conscious. Twice she fell fainting by the roadside, but twice, bruised and cut, she mounted again, desperate, when sense returned.

On—on till she should fall to rise no more. On—on! Twenty miles now, only twenty; and the early morning sun shone through the mist, over the trodden corn and the charred cottages of Picardy. Nature seemed to strive for her. The cold breezes of morning cooled her hot, throbbing forehead. The birds sang of hope, could she have heard their songs through the rushing and ringing noises in her ears. Even the road grew smoother and straighter, till as the mists cleared she saw in the distance—the citadel of Arras. Ten miles more; but, even within sight of the town she sank on the horse's neck—felt everything slipping away from her—her eyes grew heavier and the dull pain behind them greater, till it blinded her. If she should fail almost at the gates!

She heard the rippling of a stream to her right and feebly drew rein. It was her only hope, and she slid from the saddle with a last effort and, crawling to the brook, plunged in. The shock of the sudden coldness revived her, and as she dashed the water over her head, her eyes cleared. It gave her the temporary strength and relief she so needed. If that strength lasted but one hour it mattered not then if death came.

As she climbed to the saddle again, the water dripping from her hair and clothes, she looked back along the white road. A single figure was in sight—a horseman, spurring furiously, feathers and sash flying, the sun-gleam on his scabbard. Yvonne gave a cry and urged her horse to the gallop. There was danger to her in this hurried rider, and she convulsively clutched at the precious paper in her breast, for might not his mission be to delay her and seize the pardon—to prevent it ever reaching Arras?

It was for a life, and mile after mile they raced—the citadel growing bigger and plainer till the houses could be clearly seen, and the crowds gathering in the streets.

The red skeleton of the guillotine; the soldiers; the line of tarr-headed, red-smocked prisoners; the thronging multitude—all come into view as she passes through the gates, and hark! the Ca Ira! the death melody with which Lebon ushers his victims into the eternal silence!

She screams and waves the pardon on high. Her voice is powerless and dies in a harsh whisper. One sees her and shouts to the executioner; a yell goes up from the crowd. Lebon, the butcher, deliberately turns his back on her, and waves his sword for the doomed to ascend the scaffold faster. Faster! Oh, God! are there not enough to die! And there, see! Roland, her husband, fourth in the rank, and the great axe rushes down on the neck of the first.

She dashes into the crowd. "A pardon, a pardon!" Lebon takes it with a scowl, but Yvonne sees only the upturned face of her beloved.

The seal is broken; one glance, and Lebon gives to a soldier the warrant for the arrest. He looks at the other paper and suddenly his face clears, and he laughs a fierce laugh. "Proceed," he cries to the executioner, and throws the pardon back; "it is unsigned."

With an awful look of horror on her face Yvonne sees the truth. Her sufferings, her hopes, her almost superhuman toils have been in vain, and she falls into the outstretched arms of a citizen.

The crowd mutters; the Ca Ira! rises triumphantly. The axe grates and falls with a thud. Another head for the basket! Thud! Roland steps upon the planks, and with a look of anguish, turns to take a last farewell of his wife.

Another clatter of hoofs, and another rider—his feathers and sash fluttering.

"Stop," he cries between his laboured breaths. "Stop, in the name of the Convention. Robespierre is dead!"

Silence; and then a shout of joy from the multitude. France is tired of blood.

"'Tis false," shouts Lebon furiously. "Mount there—mount the ladder. Scélérat! on with the work. The drums, strike up; the drums!"

"It is true. Robespierre, St. Just, Couthon, Henriot—their heads are under the guillotine."

A cry of ferocious joy—a terrible cry—arises from the crowd and Lebon turns pale and wavers.

His power is gone, and even under his eyes the citizens, rushing to the prisoners, set them free and bear them off in triumph.

The Reign of Terror is over.

WALTER ROTHWELL.

Digitized by Google

THE THREE MURDERS.

I.

WITH their bundles of linen on their heads or under their arms, their wooden shoes clattering against the broken stones on the road, beneath the soft rays of the rising sun, the women were going to the washing-ground, in groups of five or six, chatting light-heartedly, or singing as they passed by the last houses of the village of Kersaint.

The oldest woman, little and thin, with grey hair under her white head-dress, her eyes brightly sparkling from a face which bore traces of the ravages of the wind and sea, cried: "What chatterboxes! We will see presently whether you work as hard with your hands as you do with your tongues."

Still laughing, one of the young girls retorted, a malicious smile curling the corners of her mouth:

"Ah! Aunt Naïe, we will do as much as your daughter, who has not even come with us."

A ponderous-looking woman with a heavy jaw interjected: "She is, of course, still asleep, your daughter Haude, frightened of spoiling her fair complexion!"

But the old woman replied:

"If you only knew! The poor child was up and at work before any of you, seeing that every morning she has first of all to take the milk to M. Gurguy, and as you know, she goes straight from there to the stream where we shall find her."

The girl who had spoken before exclaimed:

"As for the poor lonely gentleman who came, nearly a year ago, to live among the ruins of the castle like the owls, I have ceased to wonder about him. Probably he has had a visitation. He makes me frightened! Whenever I meet him I cross myself and say a 'pater' or an 'ave,' it is more prudent!"

Naïe shrugged her shoulders.

"Idle gossip! Visitation indeed! There is more sense in him alone than in all of you put together, I can tell you. A good and brave young man, and not at all proud, as more than one of the fishermen at Port Sall knows well. Did he not relieve the orphans and widow of Baptiste Sauter who was drowned this winter? If he has no friend in his own class it is because he prefers people like us. This is nothing to what my husband, Jean-Marie Le Floc'h, says of him. He declares there is no one more learned in the world than M. Gurguy. He is always with his books and his writing, taking notes and describing lots of things one sees in the stones which show what happened in our country long ago."

"Why does he bury himself like a beast in this nest of adders of Trémayan, and not live as everyone else in the town of Kersaint like a Christian?" interrupted one of the washerwomen. Her neighbour added:

"I should die of fright among those old stones which can scarcely hold together, and which are certainly visited at night by evil spirits which one feels but cannot see. I shiver at the mere thought of it! Good heavens! If he is not their friend it is a wonder he is not frightened out of his wits exposing himself to these uncanny visitations!"

The old woman smiled, shaking her head.

"He is no more afraid of the invisible than the visible. You only need to see him out at sea in a great storm to understand that he is as courageous as any of our own men. I wager that to-day, in spite of this north-westerly gale, he is out with Le Floc'h to help him haul in the nets and tighten the ropes."

She glanced along the shore on which, as far as one could see, the foam of the waves shone white under the slanting rays of the sun, while one heard the regular booming of the big rollers dashing themselves against the rocks which are to be found along the extreme north-west coast of France, where the Channel meets the ocean.

Having passed the last house in the village, the women, turning to the right, took the road with a high bank at one side, leading to the sandy shore and skirting the forest which rises in front of the ancient fortification of the old feudal Castle of Trémayan. A large flock of ravens passed squalling above the women, looking downwards and disappearing behind the turning of the road.

"The breath of Death, which I thought I felt myself," exclaimed one young girl, throwing herself backwards with such a movement that the whole group for a moment stood still.

Naïe asked uneasily:

"None of them pecked you, Marie Anne?"

"Oh, no, thank goodness!" replied the young girl. She made at the same time an instinctive and protecting sign of the cross, for she knew the Breton superstition that anyone struck by the beak of a raven will die shortly.

Looking at the square keep of the castle, of which the imposing mass with its granite walls, in the thickness of which was the winding staircase forming the means of communication between the four storeys, rose towering above the general ruin of the other parts, another exclaimed:

"Look! I have never seen so many. What is the matter? Why are they so excited? And see, see, these are going in the same direction as the others."

The whole stretch of blue sky around the washerwomen was dotted with them, and their sinister "Crou, crou, crou," drowned the sound of the waves.

After a moment's hesitation and alarm the group of women continued their way on the words of Naïe Le Floc'h:

"It will not do to let these birds of ill-omen prevent us going to our work. Haude will make us all ashamed of being so late."

She listened for a moment at the side of the stream. Then running to catch up the others, she exclaimed:

"I believe I can hear her at work, if I am not deceived by all this noise."

They had begun to sing again when the youngest and gayest of the party, who was walking a little in front, turned to look at her companions:

"I can see Haude, she is already there by the stream, but if you think she stops her work—Ha! ha! ha!"

The others came forward confusedly, curious, and Naïe grumbled:

"What! What does she say, this impudent girl?"

The girl replied:

"She is lying full length in the long grass, asleep! Ah, well! one may be sure she has to make up for rising so much earlier than we did. But she does not seem to be disturbed by the noise the ravens are making just above her."

Digitized by Google

At some little distance one could see the stream in its bed of reeds and rustling grasses, making a patch of blue in the midst of the last green which still resisted the mellowing touch of autumn. Quite close to the washing-ground the form of a woman lay outstretched.

The old woman muttered, hastening her steps:

"Is it possible? Such a good girl usually! I must go to her!"

But one of the young girls, surprised that Haude was not awakened by their approach and the noise of the birds, faltered:

"Perhaps something is the matter. She may be ill."

Secretly uneasy Naïe demanded:

"Ill! What do you mean?"

She called:

"Haude! Haude!"

The large flock of ravens, disturbed by the sudden invasion, continued to circle overhead, and to chatter even more loudly than ever; and as the old woman hurried towards the stream, three or four were flying nearly at her feet between the tall grasses bending over the water.

A large flock of ravens passed above the women.

She uttered an agonised cry.

"Mon Dieu! My daughter! What is the matter with her?"

The others had hastened up to her, and the girl who a moment ago was chaffing, now terrified, pointed to the young girl's heart.

"Blood!"

Louder than the breaking of the sea on the sandy shore, wilder than the dismal cawing of the birds of ill-omen hovering in the air, a terrible lamentation arose, echoing and re-echoing amongst the old crumbling walls, and filling the valley with sounds of woe.

"Lord! Lord! They have killed my child, my daughter, my beloved treasure. Dead! Dead! Haude, my dearie. Oh!"

Kneeling in the damp grass, Naïe Le Floc'h tried to raise between her shrivelled hands the limp head with the cold, blue lips, pale, dim eyes, and dishevelled hair half hidden under the trembling reeds.

The wound in the throat was so deep that the head was nearly severed from the body, and there was no hope of restoring life. She lay stretched out a little on the right side, her arms thrown out in front of her. A bundle of linen lay at a little distance, as if the poor girl had been surprised as she was preparing to wash and, throwing her bundle down, had tried to escape.

Terrified, the women did not dare to stir, pressing round their dead friend, finding no words of consolation for the mother whose broken-hearted weeping rose and fell to the accompaniment of the roaring waves, and the sepulchral chorus of ravens.

II.

IN the autumn of the preceding year, when the tourists and bathers were leaving the country one after another, an antiquated old cab with its decrepit driver drove up to "la Grande Maison," the only hostelry in Plondalmezéau, a town to the north of Brest. The solitary traveller who alighted from this venerable vehicle, at least a hundred years old, a tall, pale young man, with black hair, took a room on the second floor of the hotel, announcing that he had come to explore the surrounding country, and wrote his name in the visitors' book as M. Gurguy.

He talked little, never received letters or visitors, only showing himself at meal times, when he displayed most abstemious and sober habits. He never joined in the ordinary conversation of the visitors at the table d'hôte, but was for ever seeking information about the curiosities and antiquities of that and the neighbouring cantons.

Always driven by the same old coachman, he visited successively all the picturesque and interesting places for miles round, looking for some traces of the famous capital of a colony of the Ossisonicus, the legendary

Digitized by Google

Tolente. It was in vain, no vestige showed itself to indicate the site of the maritime city, pillaged and destroyed, we are told, by the Normans more than a thousand years ago.

He rambled over heaths, fields, and beaches, searching for those mysterious stones in which the country abounds, and which refuse so obstinately to tell their secret to the wise.

Nothing that he saw seemed to satisfy his curiosity, till suddenly, after an excursion to the coast of Port Sall and Kersaint, he returned completely transformed, with a radiant look in his eyes, and announced his definite departure on the morrow.

At an early hour he left in his usual cab with his luggage, taking the road to Port Sall—Kersaint.

At the Maison Blanche, where the roads branch off, he left the road to Port Sall on his right, climbing the little hill to Kersaint, which he drove through without stopping, and went direct to the ruined Castle of Trémayan.

To the astonishment of his coachman and the peasants, who, out of curiosity, had come from the neighbouring cottages, he had his bags carried to the ruined keep, and showed every intention of making his abode there, installing himself in a small hollow more like the nest of an owl than the dwelling of a human being.

With the assistance of the workman and the help of beams and planks he made his room habitable. His only furniture consisted of an iron bed, a table of white wood, some chairs, and a few table utensils. The opening towards the sea he could close with a shutter when he desired. He arranged for a neighbour to prepare his meals and look after his primitive household.

At first all the village was alarmed at this odd fancy, then, little by little, as the newcomer wronged or harmed nobody, the first surprise passed away, and they became accustomed to see him going and coming, usually silent, sometimes questioning one and another in the Breton language, which he knew very well, always absorbed in the customs, the legends, and the antiquities of the place.

He began to make friends with the fishermen of Port Sall, showing an ardent passion for the sea, venturing far by himself on the dangerous and troubled waters in a boat he had bought.

It was on the occasion of buying this boat that he got to know Jean-Marie Le Floc'h, and he soon began to look for him in preference to the other sailors.

One morning, not finding the fisherman at the usual rendezvous, and learning that he was laid up at home in his cottage at Kersaint, he went there to see if he could help him.

The door was opened by a young girl with fair hair and blue eyes, who appeared to be much astonished.

"Who are you?" he asked with interest.

A gruff, loud voice answered from within:

"It is my daughter, M. Gurguy, the only one left to us, Haude Le Floc'h, at your service."

And the fisherman, lying on his bed, continued groaning:

"This confounded rheumatism has laid me up on my beam ends, completely shipwrecked. Oh! ah! The chills one takes in our miserable calling to be sure!"

But the visitor only looked at the young girl, repeating: "Haude."

A voice explained from behind him:

"Haude is her Christian name, after St. Haude, whose tomb was formerly in our church at Laudunvez."

Just then Naïe Le Floc'h came upon the scene, dragging a cow at the end of a rope, and examining with curiosity the stranger of whom her husband had so often spoken, but whom she did not know.

She offered him a glass of new milk, and as, after drinking it, he complimented her on its richness, she proposed to send him some every morning by her daughter. The young man accepted the offer and went away musing, saying to himself under his breath the strangely charming name:

"Haude."

III.

AFTER this it was the custom of the Le Floc'hs to send their daughter every morning with the milk for the breakfast of the dweller in the castle.

However early she came, the young girl always found Gurguy seated before his table, covered with books and papers, working.

He would greet her cheerfully.

"Good-morning, little Haude."

And she would go away with a song on her lips as light-heartedly as a lark.

When she became accustomed to him she would talk to him. Very much surprised by his enthusiastic study of books and by his idea of living in such a weird place, one day she summoned up her courage to say: "Do you know that I need a great deal of courage to come here when the sun has scarcely risen? None of the country people would come a step."

"Why?" he asked.

She exclaimed:

"Why! Good heavens, the very name of this castle is cursed."

"The name?"

"Certainly. Trémayan means three murders."

This morning the merry face of Gurguy had suddenly changed, and he now said, frowning:

"Three murders! What nonsense!"

Haude insisted in a dull and trembling voice, as if she were afraid of arousing the ghosts of the slain:

"There were, we are told, many others, and if the ravens could only speak they could tell——"

She dared not finish.

He seemed so strange; his eyes had an odd light in them. Passing his hand across his forehead, then scattering his papers all over the table, he said nervously:

"Three murders! There was that of the daughter of Galon, then that of the steward killed by his master. Two, only two! The books, the stones, the ruins, nothing tell of more. But there must be reason for the name! There must be——"

He clenched his fists, a strange fury seemed to possess him, he added quickly:

"What folly! Go, go, leave me to my work!"

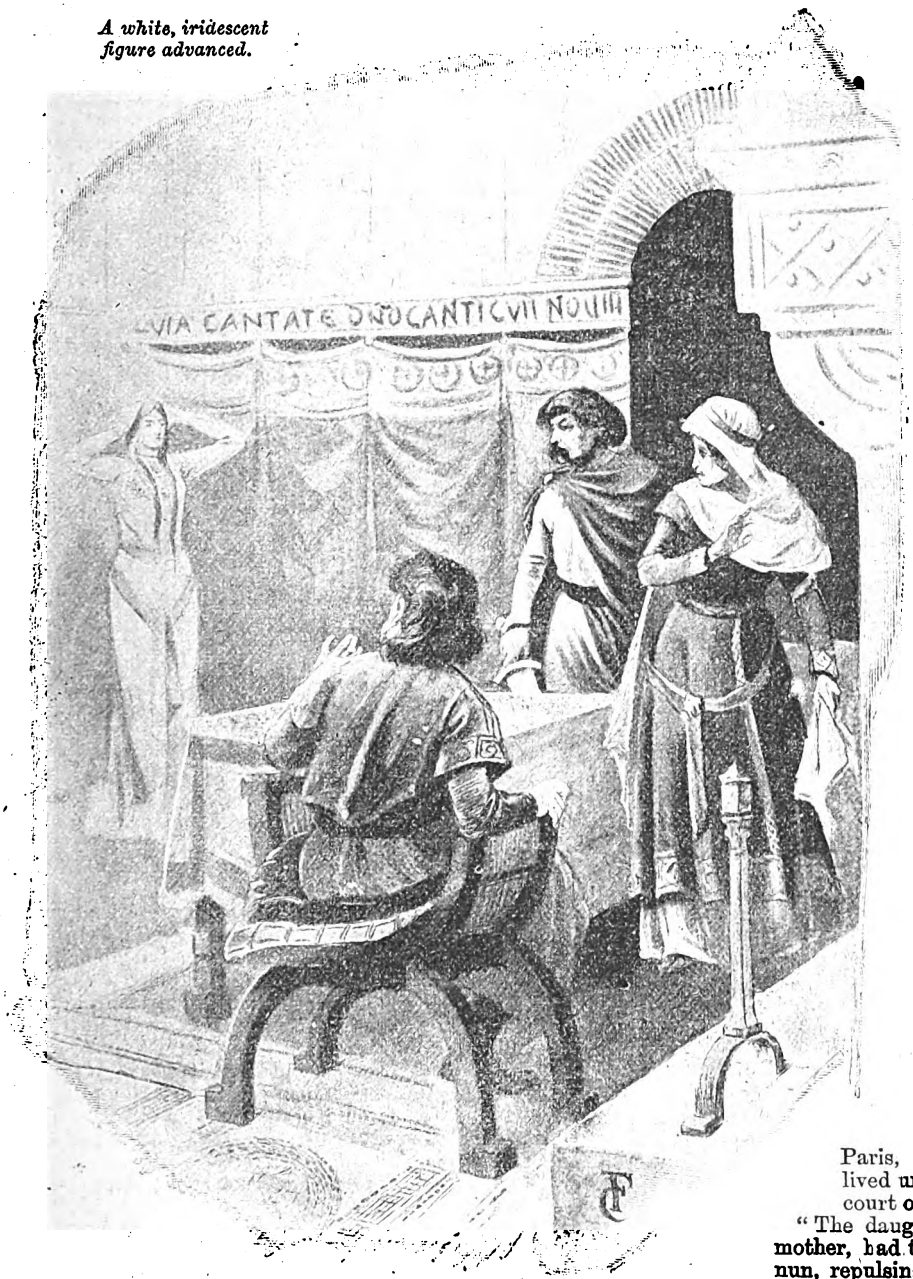
Already he had resumed his seat by the table, and was devouring with his eyes the pile of books and papers heaped up under his hands.

Haude went away, frightened a little at these words she did not understand, but she dared not tell the people anything of this little incident, and continued to take the milk regularly.

Meanwhile she saw what no one else noticed, that his temper, at first sweet and equable, became day by day more melancholy and sad, and that he became more absorbed in his studies, as if carried away by gloomy preoccupation. His cheerful "good-day" had now a mournful intonation.

He had never renewed the conversation on the dismal

Digitized by Google



A white, iridescent figure advanced.

name of the old feudal mansion, but from his looks at times, and in his irritation of manner, the young girl understood that he was constantly thinking of it, and that it worried and haunted him.

Thus one day as she was leaving he asked:

"Do you know what happened in this castle in the very old times?"

She answered simply:

"I do not even know who owned it!"

He replied:

"You are quite ignorant of the history of your patroness, St. Haude! Would you like me to tell it you?"

Seeing him beginning to regain his old cheerfulness, she consented, and he told her the tragic event which happened fourteen centuries ago, in the reign of Childebert I.

* * *

"Long ago in the year 545, in the black month of November, the granite arches of the castle on the bay of Port Sall were under the sway of Galon, the rich and powerful Breton lord, who, in spite of his white hair and beard, had brought back from the Pagan island of Great Britain a new wife, Gwinufride, corrupted by the faith of Mayou and Pélage the celebrated Celtic heresiarch.

"He seemed to have forgotten his dead wife, the sweet Florence, daughter of Honorius, Prince of Brest, by whom he had had two children, a daughter, the fair Haude——"

"Like me, my name!" interrupted the girl in surprise.

He continued without appearing to have heard:

"A son, Gurguy."

"Like you," said she again.

But the narrator remained impassive, and proceeded with his story.

"Month had succeeded month since the marriage which caused the unhappiness of Galon's children. At the end of eight years the son, not caring to remain longer at home, went to Brest to see his grandfather Honorius, and from there to Paris, where for twelve years he lived unknown to his friends in the court of the King of France.

"The daughter, ill-treated by her stepmother, had taken the veil and become a nun, repulsing all the lords who sought her hand in marriage; banished to a farmhouse, she lived like the humblest of servants.

"With the gloomy November night came the storm. The sea howled like a famished wolf. The waves, driven by the wind, flung their spray against the stones of the castle.

"Galon and Gwinufride sat alone, silent, listening to the foreboding sounds without. The step-mother, shivering, threw anxious glances towards the door.

"Suddenly the heavy fastener opened, and Gurguy appeared, excited, haggard, his sword covered with blood in his hand, his eyes turned with glaring stare upon Gwinufride, who remained seated, a horrible fear at her heart, while Galon sprang up terrified at the startling sight he saw.

Digitized by Google

"'I struck her thinking that she was guilty. I killed her! Haude, my sister! Pity me! She was a saint!'

"He had barely finished before a mysterious light appeared in the darkest corner of the vast room with its massive pillars, and a white iridescent figure advanced. It was Haude, holding in her hands her head with its fair tresses, which she put on her body, so that only a purple line round her neck showed.

"With a voice that seemed to come from another world, she denounced Gwinufride as the true cause of her death. She said that her step-mother had deceived Gurguy, who had just returned from the French Court, and assured him that his sister had dishonoured her name. The unhappy man had pursued her, charged her with the crime, and struck her down before she could utter a word of protest.

"She had been permitted to return to reveal the crime, to punish the guilty, and to tell the murderer that to expiate the assassination he must go to the holy patriarch of Léon, the Bishop of Pol.

"With threats and curses on her lips, Gwinufride bounded from her seat, leaving Galon terrified in his armchair, but already the hand of death was upon her—a thunderbolt shot through the wall, dashing her to the floor, where she expired, vainly calling Pélage to her assistance.

"The luminous apparition disappeared.

"The next day they buried the unfortunate Haude with great pomp and honour in the church of Laudunvez, and Gurguy went to Occismor to confess.

"The expiation inflicted was a fast of forty days and forty nights, which Gurguy spent in a hut of leaves which he constructed in the middle of the forest adjoining the town of Laude-Tenok, until a raven brought him white bread.

"Then, understanding this to be a sign of pardon from Heaven, he went again to Pol, whom he found surrounded by his canons. On his entrance, a flame crowned the head of Gurguy, and the holy bishop of Léon, changing the defiled name of the murderer to that of Fauguy (Flaming fire), sent him to his monastery on the island of Batz, where he became the mitred abbot and founded the Abbey of St. Matthieu-fin-de Terre."

He ceased speaking, but the young girl, amazed, still listened, believing that he would show her the actual figures that he had so vividly depicted.

He concluded in a sepulchral tone:

"That was the first murder."

She left him, at once fearful and charmed, and for a long time the sweet image of her patron saint pursued her, hovering above her, so clear, so bright, so life-like that the least flutter of a sea-mew or gull made her suddenly lift her head as if she had felt the wings of the holy martyr caressing her.

Some days afterwards, when she was again with Gurguy, she said in a broken and hesitating voice, which was quite new to her, as she noticed his wild and restless look:

"You have not yet told me about the second murder."

An involuntary movement of defiance made her step backwards. He burst out quickly:

"It was done by one of the owners of this same castle whose wife was persecuted by a disloyal steward. But this lord killed himself in a tragic manner after wreaking his vengeance on the steward."

An exclamation of terror escaped her as she murmured:

"Perhaps that is why there are always so many ravens here."

Gurguy, lost in thought, answered:

"Ravens? Perhaps."

He seemed preoccupied, and she heard him repeat a great many times without understanding his words:

"Trémayan. Three murders! The third? Perhaps it is that which Taupry du Chastel committed when on the bridge of Montereau, his battleaxe split open the skull of Jean, the terrible Duge of Burgoyne, for delivering to King Charles VII. the tyrannical guardianship of this great feudatory."

Each time she saw him she found him more changed, looking more and more troubled. He would throw his books far from him angrily, uttering invariably the same words:

"Nothing! Always nothing! Trémayan!"

IV.

GREAT black clouds scurried from the north-west, veiling the sun which had shone in the early hours of the day, and the terrible waves dashed with wild roaring upon a thousand rocks, when the mayor and the doctor from Plondalmzéau came in all haste to the little stream beside the Castle of Trémayan.

Already there was a crowd of fishermen and peasants, gaping with horror at the corpse beside which the kneeling Naïe Le Floc'h sobbed, and conjectures as to the perpetrator of this atrocious crime passed from one to another.

While the gendarmes kept back the crowd, the doctor examined the dreadful wound. At length he said:

"Death took place four hours ago."

The mayor, pointing out the position of the arms and shoulders, observed:

"They say she tried to escape; and look, the head is nearly detached from the trunk."

Certainly the assassin was a man of exceptional strength. That would help to identify him. On the other hand, it was impossible to tell what weapon had been used to accomplish the murder. Was it a knife, a bill-hook, or a scythe? They could find nothing in the neighbourhood of the stream.

A gendarme volunteered:

"If we were in Africa I should say it was a blow of the yataghan. I have seen many of my comrades settled thus. But again, it would have needed an Arab wrist to strike such a blow."

As he was complaisantly explaining to those around him about the blade of which he spoke, one of the peasants said:

"Stop! It would be like the sabre in the room of the gentleman at the Castle."

A washerwoman added:

"It is true that poor Haude took his milk to him every morning."

But Naïe, raising her tear-stained face, cried:

"Good gracious! It is quite certain that he would never wish to do her harm!"

She was explaining that he was seldom seen except on the sea with her husband at Port Sall, when a gruff voice was heard above the noise crying:

"Haude! My daughter!"

And the father came on the scene mad with grief, his arms raised in a gesture of despair, while the stupefied women whispered:

"Le Floc'h has left his nets; can one believe it?"

Digitized by Google

There was another outburst of despair when the unhappy man found himself in the presence of death, and in fierce, angry tones he asked:

"What scoundrel has done this? I will do the same to him!"

He opened his knife and stared round him with bloodshot eyes. They were obliged to reason with him a long time before they could obtain any information.

Certainly he had not gone to sea. He was too good a sailor to venture with such a wind threatening, but he had not been able to prevent Gurguy embarking alone as usual in spite of the strong swell. He was a madman or a fool to risk it. At present he was out there in the open sea.

His frightened eyes gazed at the tumultuous waves, and the angry clouds which were making day into night, a night of shipwreck, terror, and sorrow.

"This time he is lost!" decided a fisherman, after vainly trying to distinguish a sail.

Again all attention was concentrated on the little group weeping in their grief, in the centre of which was the corpse.

They had reascended the road leading to the beach, and gone some way in the direction of Kersaint, when a child of twelve years, coming from the ruins, said in a stifled voice to one of his comrades:

"There is blood in the gentleman's room at the Castle."

The mayor had heard. He laid his hand on the boy's shoulder, asking:

"What is that you say?"

The child explained that after the peasant spoke of the stranger's sabre, he had had the curiosity to go to see it, knowing that M. Gurguy was on the sea. Hoisting himself up to the loop-hole, of which the shutter had not been closed, he had seen the weapon and the blood.

The doctor said emphatically:

"We must go to see. We cannot wait for the magistrate. He will not arrive before the nightfall."

Leaving the disconsolate procession to go on to the Le Floc'hs' house, the mayor, the doctor, and the sergeant, went to the keep above which the weird cawing of the ravens still sounded.

As soon as the door was forced, they saw that the child had been right. On the white sheet of the bed there were large red stains, and across was thrown the yatagan wet with blood.

The chief gendarme said:

"You see I was right about the weapon." The mayor concluded: "Gurguy was certainly the

There was a crowd of fishermen and peasants.

Digitized by Google

assassin. It is strange. The mother herself seemed to defend him."

But the doctor who had gone up to the table showed a paper on which were some lines recently written; he read aloud:

"Gurguy went to look for Haude, and having found her near a stream washing some apparel called her by name. She, not recognising him after his long absence, and not knowing why he called, left her washing and fled.

"Putting his hand on his sword he pursued and caught her, striking her on the neck so that he cut off her head."

A red smear as if a blood-stained hand had touched the paper terminated this fatal message.

They all gazed at him bewildered.

The doctor looked at the other papers and the open and closed books lying in disorder on the table; they were books relating to the antiquities of the country, historical studies—more particularly those concerning the Castle of Trémayan and its different possessors. There on the leaf of a book, conspicuous in big letters were the words:

"Trémayan—The Three Murders."

"Ah! that is it!" finished the doctor. "But he is mad, this Gurguy."

Little by little he constructed the drama, divining what had passed in the stranger's mind who must have imagined himself descended from the ancient lords, because of his name, which was that of the original owner.

Without doubt the meeting with the young daughter of Le Floc'h, whose name was Haude, had turned his brain.

Traces of this monomania were found in some lines showing a debate which Gurguy must have had with himself, a struggle against the growing invasion of murderous thoughts.

The task of the Court of Brest would be singularly simple. It was only necessary to leave the room as they found it, and to seize the culprit. The chief gendarme gave the signal to his men, one was placed to guard the door, and another sent to Port Sall.

* * * * *

The same evening when the magistrate arrived at Kersaint, some fisherman discovered on the shore facing the Castle of Trémayan, not far from the stream, a corpse much bruised by the rugged edges of the rocks. It was that of Gurguy, drowned according to the prophecies of the sailors.

Had he voluntarily sought death in a moment of consciousness, of lucidity, to expiate the murder of Haude le Floc'h, or was he simply a victim to his own imprudence? No one could ever know. His books and papers were carefully examined and only confirmed the first diagnosis of the doctor, but could give no information as to his standing in the world.

Without parents, family and friends, unknown to all, the unfortunate man was buried in a disused corner of the cemetery under the name of Gurguy, which was perhaps not his. Only the black ravens remained the faithful watchers in the ruins of the Castle of the Three Murders.

J. TOUDOUZE.

Digitized by Google

A SEPARATION.

THE room which I inhabited at that time in Via Bagutta was really higher up than was needful. I told myself so four times a day, when I ascended the one hundred and twelve steps that separated me from the level of the throng in the street, but because when one had reached the top there was to be enjoyed a magnificent panorama of roofs and chimney-tops, I stayed there. Besides, in the course of four months I had made the acquaintance of all my neighbours: and usually among the neighbours of a bachelor there is someone that he would be sorry to miss.

It was there that I knew the oddest wedded pair that can be imagined. To say Signor Sulpicio and Signora Coneetta were one, is not a metaphor; for between them they hardly had as much flesh and bones as an ordinary well-set-up individual. But their united ages were a decade more than a century and a half. And if Signora Coneetta had taken the freak to stand upon her husband's head, she would have bumped the ceiling. Now, the rooms in that house are three metres and a half in height—eleven feet eight inches, by the English measure.

Whoever has solved these arithmetical problems will have before him, I should think, the precise likeness of these old persons, and sees them, as I do in my mind's eye, long, meagre, gaunt, with white heads, faces seamed by wrinkles, with sunken, gleaming eyes.

They had shared their joys and sorrows, bed and board for sixty years; and had gazed into each other's eyes until the two faces had grown alike, and but for their noses, they might have been supposed to be brother and sister. But those noses had persisted in remaining the antithesis of each other: that of the husband was hooked like an eagle's beak, and seemed to keep watch upon all that went into his mouth.

Signora Coneetta's nose turned up, as if prudently withdrawing in order not to embarrass the good mouthfuls. The comparison is not mine; they invented it themselves, at the wane of the honeymoon, in a moment of anger over a dish that tasted of smoke. It was the first cloud in their azure, an ugly cloud that rose from the dish to their noses, and then passed into their habits of feeling. They ended by believing themselves totally incompatible.

Coneetta spoke of returning to her parents, and Sulpicio was willing that she should do so, but as they were on the wedding journey the matter was deferred. But the fatal word had been spoken—a separation. The day after, Sulpicio recalled the morning discourse which his father-in-law had addressed to him; remembered how he had sworn to make his bride happy, a crowd of tender memories, of sage reflection, impelled him to induce Coneetta to remain under the conjugal roof.

On her part, Coneetta, as judicious a young woman as ever was, had called to mind her mamma's counsels, the "Yes" spoken at the altar, the envy of her friends who remained spinsters; she thought of the grief of her family, the secret joy and false pity of the other girls—and concluded that on the whole Sulpicio was not so bad, and that it was all the fault of that unlucky dish. Then the pair smiled, clasped hands and exchanged the kiss of peace. But there was a tacit understanding that they took each other on trial. That trial, having weathered a thousand tempests, had lasted for sixty years.

Now and then the neighbours were startled by a shrill scream. "That is Coneetta!" they said. And Coneetta it was. She had a way—when she had launched at her domestic tyrant all the charming epithets accumulated in her verbal researches of the past sixty years, without conquering the forces of his vocabulary—she had a way, then, of giving one final shriek. People ran to the scene and found that old Sulpicio had sought safety in flight down the stairs while Coneetta flung at him from the landing one last descriptive adjective.

The first cares to the injured were lavished on Coneetta; and we had learnt that these must consist in letting her talk until her wrath had evaporated. Woe to any who should pity her or tell her that her husband was not the right sort; for when her anger seemed spent, it would blaze up like a lucifer match, to protest that she wished to marry him and would keep to him; that what her Sulpicio was nobody could know but herself; nobody need teach her to read in his heart, she knew all about him, these many years, and he was worth all the rest of mankind put together.

When the storm was over, and the landing deserted, she would peer out from her room, look about her, her head shaking under its big black silk cap, slip down to the next floor, and knock at the door of Signora Nina, a young widow who lived with an infirm uncle who was a friend of Sulpicio. Coneetta knew that her man was very fond of his friend's young neice; and she not only was not jealous but begged the aid of Nina as a peacemaker. About the same time the fugitive husband would return stealthily into the house, climb the stairs, and invade, panting, my apartment. He knew that Coneetta loved me like a son, that a word from me would influence her, and trusted to me to restore domestic tranquility.

Digitized by Google

My part as mediator was not difficult, and I do not think that Signora Nina had a harder task. As soon as Coneetta saw me, before I spoke a word of my embassy, she would press my hands between her knotty ones, and, mutely shaking her head and raising her eyes to the ceiling, express to me her sorrow for what had happened, her readiness to return to her wifely duty, her gratitude for my good offices. In fact the pair could not live apart; they loved as they always had loved, in warlike guise, but as greatly as mortals may.

When the repentant Sulpicio appeared in the doorway, with a careless and indifferent air, not wishing to show emotion in my presence, Coneetta would remember some stitch in time that would save nine, and begin to rummage in her pockets for her thimble and needlecase. Then I slipped through the door, or looked out of the window, or took up a book. Sulpicio would draw near to Coneetta—Coneetta would turn a little towards Sulpicio; I could see with the tail of my eye their trembling hands clasp each other, their faces near together, lit by smiles, a few tears run down their furrowed cheeks. Finally, they embraced fervently, and I continued to look in another direction, and talk about the weather, thinking within myself that those tears and smiles were altogether worthy of the springtime of life and a pair of rosy faces.

Once, however, the squall was so terrific, that before the two ships entered together into the safe harbour of domestic concord it took several hours and much diplomacy. The word separation had been pronounced by each, and neither would be the first to unsay it. Unluckily for their well-wishers, the husband and wife had gone out of the house, and by different doors. The servant, a semi-idiotic girl, understood nothing except that master and mistress were both out. I seated myself by the chimney corner to await their return. It was a glorious winter's day. My thoughts were rather amusing; I was trying to guess which of the pair would come home first. Which? Coneetta, no doubt. Just then I heard the frou-frou of a gown; I rose, turned, and found myself face to face with Signora Nina, the young widow of the first floor.

The signora appeared surprised to see me, and was quite embarrassed, all the more because, having entered with her accustomed familiarity, she wished not to have the air of committing an indiscretion; and she looked round to see whether someone would come and let me know, indirectly, that she was using her right of entrée. Meanwhile I bowed to her, and was about to speak. She forestalled me. "Signora Coneetta is not at home?"

"Nor Signor Sulpicio. I am waiting for one or the other of them."

"And I was looking for one or the other. I will come again later."

But the knowledge that both were away from the house seemed to disquiet her, and she did not move.

"If you would like to wait here, I will come another time," said I.

"Thanks—you probably are come in order to——"

"For the same reason——"

I invited her to take my place at the fireside; yet when she was seated there, I did not leave the room. Signora Nina did not know me, but I knew Signora Nina very well. Often, from my window above hers, I had noted the colour of her hair and vainly hoped for the opportunity to learn the colour of her eyes. Now the white little hands that I had seen beating a tattoo on the window-sill were playing with the tongs of the domestic hearth; I saw clearly the face that had been a mystery to me. Ah, the Signora Nina was beautiful, or at all events she pleased me very much.

She saw that I remained standing, and made me a courteous sign to be seated: we waited in silence for some minutes; no one came. Little by little, that silence weighed upon us; she spoke to me of Sulpicio, and I spoke to her of Coneetta. When she learnt that I was mediator between the old couple, she smiled slightly. What a charming smile!

"Such a pity," she said, "to live sixty years together without coming to a good understanding!"

"These are surface agitations," I observed. "They are really fond of each other."

She made a little grimace, and was silent. After a while she said: "What time is it?"

"Four o'clock."

"It is late. I must go. I will come back again."

"It really wants thirteen minutes to four."

Signora Nina smiled and did not go away. I did not know why, but my heart was full of joy-bells ringing.

Then entered Sulpicio and Coneetta, hand in hand.

"Is peace made?" Signora Nina and I questioned with our eyes.

"It is," the eyes of the old pair responded.

"I came to pay my respects to you," said the widow to Coneetta, "but it is late and I ought to go."

Coneetta replied with great good humour: "All the better that Signor Carlo was here to keep you company."

At this my heart beat harder, and I perceived that the widow blushed. She went away; I departed very soon after.

All day long I thought of Signora Nina: I dreamt of her all night; the next day I passed the forenoon at the window in order to see her, and had the good fortune to exchange a good-morning with her; during the next month I never failed to go at the same hour to the window, and always with the same happy result. One day I ventured to smile at her, the next day she deigned to smile on me—and five months and one week later, we were married.

We were happy. We lived in a pretty little house sufficiently far from the madding crowd; our windows were not overlooked by inconvenient neighbours; the rooms were sunny, and our new furniture gleamed in the light. Nina's old uncle had absolutely refused—as he phrased it—to set us up in housekeeping with his many infirmities, and had gone to live with a sister of his in the country. We were content to be alone; our rooms were decorated in pink, and filled with visions not less rosy. Nina had such grace of manner, such a sweet smile, a look so serene, a voice all music, and a certain way of placing her hands on my shoulders that meant "I love you"—that I could have spent whole hours in contemplation of her. She had a single defect: that of slamming the doors when she passed from one room to another. Often, startled from my fantasies by the bang of a door, I should have yielded to an impulse of irritation if her rosy face had not at once appeared before me.

And it must be admitted that I was a model husband to Nina. I never left her alone, or at least as little as my business allowed; I never contradicted her; I anticipated her wishes, never spoke an unkind word to her; I did a thousand childish things to amuse her. I had, however, one slight defect: I was horribly absent-minded; sometimes, absorbed in some foolish fantasy, I failed to answer her smile or her speech.

There came a day when I was unusually abstracted, and she banged a door louder than common. An "Oh!" escaped me; she heard, and I regretted it. But in vain. Another time, Nina caught me in a brown study; she walked on tiptoe and was very careful to make no noise in shutting the door. The clangour of the forge of Vulcan would not have caused me to leap quicker from my chair. I ran after her, embraced her—and we had a great laugh together. But the ice was broken; we had mutually admitted one thought; we were not perfection.

However hard she tried, Nina could not correct herself; only when she slammed a door, she took on a certain air, half contrite, half mischievous, that made her more beautiful. As for me, it was in vain that, caught with my wits a wool-gathering, I shook my head and stared—I became neither wiser nor handsomer.

Our honeymoon had lasted many months, unclouded. Then came a day, a day of July, when the sun glared and the heat was cruel. She asserts that she began the quarrel, asking me what I was thinking about with my head in the clouds. But it was I who gave the first offence in the form of a very little swear word apropos of a door. One mild sarcasm led to another, and soon I was sulky and Nina in tears. Another occasion ended in the same way, the next time the thing went further.

"This life is unbearable," she said.

"Indeed?" said I teasingly.

"Indeed! Ah, indeed! Oh, I knew that you were tired of me. It is almost a year that we have been married."

"Ten months," I replied.

"Which has seemed like ten years to you! Our happiness has lasted too long! Oh, how unfortunate I am! You will end by hating me, if you don't do so already—and I—I shall come to hate you!"

I wanted to catch her up in my arms and run about the room with her and her wrath—a precious armful—until she should cry "enough"; I wanted to fall on my knees before her and say my little prayers for her forgiveness—all sorts of things that an indulgent husband could think of, in order to make her smile. I glanced at her; she turned her shoulders to me; I took a step towards her and she ran into another room—and I, in a pet, descended the stairs, remorseful before accomplishing my fell revenge. I took a turn round the square, not being able to go far away, and keeping in view the little home where had been my happiness. I thought of Sulpicio and Coneetta; and told myself that there was nobody to act as peacemaker between my wife and me, and that we would not have stood it if there were.

I reflected: "This is the first time—who knows if it will be the last! I must go back to her, comfort her, and tell her that we never must do so again. But how will she receive me? What wouldn't I give to be sure that she will reply to my words with a good kiss! Then we would weep and laugh over the affair together, and never speak of it any more."

All these reflections brought me several times as far as the threshold of our house, and as often I withdrew; at last I succeeded in overcoming the spell, sprang through the doorway, ran upstairs four steps at once, and in an instant was face to face with Nina, who had come to meet me on the landing. She hid her face between her hands and did not speak to me. I put an arm about her and led her into the parlour; I made her sit upon my knee and gently took her hands away from my eyes, laid my cheek against hers, and begged her forgiveness. But instead of pardoning me, she burst afresh into sobs, threw her arms round my neck, and buried her face on my shoulder. My heart beat hard; Nina's actions were expressive of misfortune. What happened during my absence? After many questions and caresses and, on her part, a great sob:

"She is dead!" said Nina.

"Who?"

"Coneetta, poor Coneetta!" My wife was silent for a moment; then raising her head, she added: "Their separation has taken place."

"Who has told you about it?"

"A friend who came to see me; poor Coneetta passed away yesterday, very suddenly."

"And Sulpicio?"

"He is in despair; he does not speak a word; he seems dazed."

"I must go and look him up."

"Oh, my dear, go as soon as possible."

I went. The heart of the old man had not been able to resist the oppression of solitude; and at night, a few hours after his companion had been carried away, he laid himself down in his widowed bed with the certainty that he should never see the morning.

His dead face appeared to smile at me, and to tell me that not even death had separated them. I went home with sadness in my heart, a gentle sadness that did me good, I did not like to tell my wife the news, and was glad when someone else told it to her, in my presence. As soon as we were alone she clasped me in her arms as though she were afraid.

"Carlo!"

"Nina!"

She raised her eyes as if to read my thought, and slowly murmured these words:

"That will be the way with us, will it not?"

I. FARINA.

RESULT OF JUMBLED STORY COMPETITION.—No. 25.

THE first prize of £5 goes to Mr. Bernard Parry, 2, Sterndale Road, West Kensington.

The following receive £1 each: Mr. R. A. McWhirter, 32, Wake Street, Plymouth; Miss Britt, 32, Kensington Court Mansions, W.; Mr. A. S. Holland, 68, Longridge Road, Earl's Court, W.

£2 goes to Mr. M. E. Burne, The Mall, Sligo, Ireland.

Key to Jumble Story.—No. 25.

1	40	110	11	81	117	85	122	82
51	80	79	9	43	12	55	103	48
46	31	83	96	58	105	62	5	76
45	17	39	65	116	101	119	106	113
47	35	114	42	73	37	75	107	71
32	6	15	120	20	111	13	89	118
3	8	21	77	56	112	90	44	64
38	59	57	25	91	95	49	98	53
28	36	30	86	115	87	104	72	2
67	102	84	16	54	88	92	74	14
4	33	19	70	60	41	97	108
50	109	29	22	94	66	61	10
68	34	26	23	121	93	7	78
69	24	27	63	100	99	18	52

Digitized by Google

By ALLEN UPWARD, Author of "Secrets of the Courts of Europe," "The Prince of Balkistan," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

ELEANOR MARGARET OWEN is charged with the murder of her benefactress, Ann Lewis. Charles Prescott, who has known Eleanor since a child, holds the brief for the prosecution. His friend, George Tressamer, is in love with Eleanor, and holds the brief for her defence. The prosecution is vigorously pressed by John Lewis, deceased's nephew. The case comes on at the Mynyddshire Assizes. The result of the cross examination of Lewis by Tressamer is that public suspicion, which, for a time, rested on Lewis, is completely removed.

CHAPTER VI. (continued).

THE next witness was the butler, John Simons, who deposed to having fastened up the door at half-past ten on the night in question, and to having found the latch stuck on the following day. He further described the finding of the blood-stains on the bedroom door-handle. His cross-examination was listened to with interest.

"Has it ever occurred to you, yourself, to accidentally raise the latch too far in the same way?"

"Oh, yes, I've often done it, sir."

"Were you out on the evening of the first of June?"

The butler, a good-natured-looking man, with a pleasant smile, but whose mind was evidently rather unhinged by the position he found himself in, looked bewildered at this, and rather frightened. The barrister hastened to reassure him.

"What I mean is this. If you had been out some time during the evening, before half-past ten, would it not have been possible for you to have accidentally left the latch in this position?"

The witness looked relieved, and hastened to answer.

"Yes, of course, I might have."

Tressamer turned round to the jury to see if they appreciated his point. Then he resumed.

"You have known Miss Owen for some time, I think. Tell me, have you ever noticed that she was liable to nervous headaches?"

"I have heard her say she had a headache."

"What was the last time you heard her say so?"

The witness looked puzzled, and seemed to be trying to remember.

"Perhaps I can help you," said the barrister. "About this very time, now, just before this happened?"

"Ah, yes, sir, now you remind me, I remember. When she didn't come down that morning, I said to Rebecca: 'Very likely she's had another bad night.'"

"Another bad night? Then she was liable to insomnia?"

The witness stared.

"I beg your pardon. I mean, she sometimes did suffer from want of sleep?"

"She sometimes had bad nights, sir."

"Exactly. And you remembered she had been having them just before this?"

"Well, no, sir; I can't say as I do remember that."

The barrister frowned impatiently.

"Well, tell me this," he said: "do you know what she was in the habit of doing on these occasions, when she couldn't get to sleep?"

"No, sir."

"Did you ever hear of her going out for a walk at night?"

The whole court was eagerly following this cross-examination, as the defence now began to be visible. But the answer of the witness fell like lead:

"No."

Tressamer looked deeply disappointed. He had been baffled just where he had evidently built upon success.

He only put one more question.

"You had a good many opportunities of seeing your mistress and Miss Owen together. Did they always seem to you to be on friendly, affectionate terms?"

"Yes, sir, always."

"Thank you."

This finished the butler's evidence, as Mr. Pollard wisely abstained from any re-examination.

He next proceeded to call the parlour-maid, Rebecca Rees.

A pretty, vain, pert-looking girl stepped into the box, and took hold of the Testament.

"Take off your glove," said the clerk.

She did so with some difficulty, as the thing had about half-a-dozen buttons to unfasten. Then she was sworn and proceeded to tell her story.

In a shrill voice, which visibly irritated the judge, she went on, and described how she had gone to bed, how she awoke at midnight and heard a sound proceeding from below.

"What was the nature of the sound?" asked the counsel who was examining her.

"It was a groan," was the reply, "like as if somebody was being hurt."

The prisoner's counsel here hurriedly turned over the pages of his brief till he came to a certain place, where he made a note in the margin.

"What did you hear next?"

"I heard the prisoner going downstairs."

The Judge: "What do you mean? Could you see her?"

Witness: "No, sir, I heard her."

Mr. Pollard: "She means she recognised the footsteps, my lord."

The Judge: "Don't interrupt me, please." (To witness) "Young woman, be careful. That is not the way to give evidence, as you know perfectly well. You musn't tell us that you heard the prisoner. You heard footsteps, that's all." (A pause.) "Now, Mr. Pollard, you can go on."

Mr. Pollard: "Did you recognise the footsteps?"

His lordship frowned and shrugged his shoulders.

Witness: "I thought it was Miss Owen."

Mr. Pollard: "Well, now tell us what you did."

The girl proceeded to describe how she had got up and gone down to the front-door.

"How was it fastened?" was the next question.

"It was on the latch. The bolts were drawn back, and it wasn't locked or yet chained."

"Did you see whether the latch was up or down?"

"I object."

Mr. Tressamer had risen in a fresh burst of indignation.

"My lord, my friend has distinctly suggested the answer to the witness. I object to her being allowed to say anything about the latch after such a question as that."

"I didn't intend to lead her, my lord," said Pollard.

The judge hesitated for awhile between his natural desire to hear the answer and his fear that the witness was not wholly impartial. Perhaps a slight prejudice against Tressamer's hectoring manner had something to do with his decision.

"You should have asked her whether she had noticed anything about the latch," he said at length. "Did you?" he added, turning to the witness.

"It was down, sir," she returned, answering Pollard's question rather than the judge's.

The importance of the answer was chiefly in its disposing of Tressamer's suggestion that the butler might have forced the latch up. He turned round to the jury, and assumed the air of one who is being unfairly treated. But of course he could not help their seeing that the prosecution had scored a point.

Rebecca's evidence was continued till she came to where she heard footsteps ascending the stairs.

"How long was this afterwards?" asked Pollard.

"About ten minutes."

"Did you recognise those footsteps?"

"No, I didn't notice them; but I think they must have been Miss Owen's, or else I should have noticed the difference."

Tressamer ground his teeth. He was afraid to interrupt again, for fear of the effect on the minds of the jury. They are apt to think a man is losing when he interrupts too often.

"What happened next?"

"She went into the bedroom below."

"What bedroom?"

"Her own, I suppose, or Miss Lewis's."

"You couldn't tell which?"

"No."

"Well, and how long was the person, whoever it was, inside?"

"About a quarter of an hour, I should think. I thought she had come in for good, and gone to bed."

The Judge (suddenly looking up from his notes): "Look here, don't let me have to stop you again, or I shall do something you won't like. It's not for you to tell us what you thought. Confine yourself to answering the questions."

Mr. Pollard (thinking the judge has finished): "And then what did you——"

The Judge (superbly indifferent to Mr. Pollard): "Do you realise that you are giving evidence in a court of justice? You must be extremely careful—extremely careful." (A long pause; Mr. Pollard afraid to begin again.) "Well, do you ask her anything more?"

Mr. Pollard: "I beg your lordship's pardon. If your lordship pleases." (To witness): "After the quarter of an hour, did you hear anything more?"

Witness (now thoroughly frightened): "Yes."

"What did you hear?"

"I heard her come out."

At this point the judge threw down his pen, and threw himself back in his chair. Mr. Pollard hastened to take off the edge of his lordship's wrath by reprimanding the witness himself.

"You mustn't tell us that. You don't know it was the prisoner. What was it you actually heard?"

The girl now felt and looked ready to resort to tears. She really did not know what answer was safe, and prudently adopted a strictly non-committal form.

"I heard a noise below."

"What was the noise like?"

"Like someone going downstairs."

"Well, why didn't you say that? You heard footsteps going down?"

"Yes."

The judge took up his pen again and took down the answer.

"And did you notice the footsteps this time?"

"Yes; they were——"

"Stop! Not so fast. Answer my questions."

Mr. Pollard was by this time a little less nervous than the witness. He was really utterly at a loss how to frame his next question without incurring Tressamer's wrath or the rebuke of the Bench. At last he blurted out:

"Was there anything different about the footsteps this time?"

Tressamer opened his mouth, but the judge was before him this time:

"Don't answer. Really, Mr. Pollard, you are as bad as the witness. You know you ought not to put a question like that." Then, seeing that the poor young man was quite unequal to extracting the desired evidence, his lordship quietly took over the examination himself:

"Did you notice the footsteps this time when they were going downstairs?"

"Yes, sir—my lord."

"Did anything strike you about them?"

"Yes, my lord."

"What?"

"They were heavier, sir, and thumpy."

"Had you ever heard anything like it before? I mean, did they or did they not sound familiar in spite of this heaviness?"

"No, my lord; I don't remember."

"Did you go downstairs again?"

"No, sir."

The judge turned round to the jury with complacency, and smiled as if to say: "You see, gentlemen, how it can be done by one who knows how." Then he asked the counsel:

"Now, Mr. Pollard, do you want anything more from this witness?"

"No, my lord, thank you."

He sat down, feeling considerably the worse for his experience, and Tressamer got up.

He looked severely at the young woman for some seconds, and then suddenly asked her:

"Why do you dislike Miss Owen?"

At once the court was all ears. It was one of those strokes of brilliant advocacy which few men care to venture on. It was dangerous, but in the present case it was completely successful. The witness lost countenance, stammered, and with difficulty got out a lame denial.

"I don't dislike her particular."

"Do you like her?"

"No."

"Did you ever have any complaint against her when you were her servant?" (He intentionally chose a phrase calculated to irritate.)

"I wasn't her servant," was the angry reply. "I should be very sorry to be."

"I thought so. Tell me, you said to my learned friend that the first sound you heard on this night was like somebody being hurt, didn't you?"

"Yes, sir."

"When did you discover that?"

"When did I discover that?"

"Yes, woman; don't echo me like that. You know what I mean."

"I thought so at the time."

"What!" The barrister assumed an expression of amazement.

"I thought so all along."

"Then why didn't you say so all along? When you were before the magistrates, did you say anything about somebody being hurt?"

"Yes, I think so."

"You think so! Remember you are on your oath, please, and that I have a copy before me of what you actually did say before the magistrates. When you were before them, did you say a syllable about a sound as if somebody were being hurt?"

"I don't know whether I did or not."

"I thought so. Did you tell the magistrate that you thought it was the sound of someone in troubled sleep?" Here the barrister read from his brief.

"Yes, sir."

"And that you thought"—here he turned over the page at which he was looking and glanced at the top of the next, so as to give the impression that he was still reading her exact words—"that the sound came from Miss Owen's room?"

The witness fell into the trap.

"I dare say I did," she answered.

The judge was equally taken in. He had read the depositions, but had not remembered their contents clearly enough to check the barrister. Tressamer went to another point.

Taking out his watch, he said:

"I want to test your notion of ten minutes. Will you turn round, with your back to the clock, and tell me when one minute has passed, after I have said the word 'Now.'"

All the jurymen and most of the other persons in court took out their watches to check this experiment. The girl turned round, and Tressamer gave the word "Now!"

"Tick—tick—tick—tick—tick——"

"Now!" said the witness, turning quickly round.

A general smile passed over the court.

"Seventeen seconds exactly, my lord," observed Tressamer. "The witness's ten minutes may therefore be put down as three. You have told his lordship that the last set of footsteps you heard sounded heavy when they went downstairs. Will you swear that they did not sound equally heavy coming up?"

"I didn't notice."

"I didn't ask you if you had noticed. Don't try and shirk my question, please. Will you pledge your oath that they weren't equally heavy coming upstairs?"

"No, I won't swear it."

"Have you any reason, except your dislike of the prisoner, for suggesting that those footsteps were hers?"

The judge interposed.

"Really, Mr. Tressamer, you mustn't put it like that. She says that she didn't dislike the prisoner, and you must take her answer. I allow great latitude to counsel in your situation, but you must treat the witness fairly."

"As your lordship pleases."

Tressamer sat down, rather glad to leave his question unanswered, as the effect thereby produced on the jury's mind would be better than if the witness had had a chance of offering her grounds for suspicion.

"Lucy Griffiths."

This was the housemaid, and her evidence contained nothing of importance. In cross-examination she admitted that she had detected no likeness between the descending footsteps heard by her and Miss Owen's. In fact, she had at first thought they sounded like a man's.

The next witness was the fisherman, who stated to Mr. Pollard that he had met a female about midnight on the eventful first of June, whom he at the time believed to be the prisoner. He thought so still.

His cross-examination elicited two facts: first, that he had once met Miss Owen at the same late hour before; secondly, that he had met other persons going in the same direction the same night, at or about the same time.

Tressamer chose to emphasise this point.

"Could you tell those gentlemen," he said, indicating the jury, who instantly tried to look as if they had been attending, and had not long ago given up the task in despair, "what the other people were like whom you saw?"

"Well, one of them was a man."

"Come, that's something; but it's not much. Can't you tell us what sort of a man? Was he tall?"

The jury instantly looked at Lewis.

"No; I didn't notice as how he was particular tall. Middlin' short, I should say."

"About my height?"

"Yes; about that. Summat about your size."

Tressamer laughed, and a smile went round the court at the serious way in which the witness gave his answer.

"Well, who else did you see?"

"I see another man afore then."

"Ah! Was he tall?"

"Why, yes; I think he was."

The jury again looked at Lewis. But that gentleman's face revealed no emotion, except a sort of sullen wrath which had overhung it ever since his last appearance in the witness-box.

At last, when all the other witnesses had been disposed of, the policeman was called and gave the usual routine evidence.

Mr. Pollard was rash enough to ask him:

"Who came to the station to inform the police?"

But his opponent at once objected, and the judge ruled the question out. Mr. Lewis's indignant declaration, therefore, which Prescott had struck out of his brief with such prompt disdain, fared equally ill in court, and was not allowed to get to the ear of the judge or jury.

At last the evidence was gone through, and then the prosecuting counsel stood up and made the final announcement.

"That is the case for the Crown, my lord."

"I will adjourn for half-an-hour," observed the judge, getting on his feet.

The whole court rose with him, and in a few minutes the entire place was empty.

CHAPTER VII.

HALF-AN-HOUR.

SCRAMBLING, rushing, hurrying, squeezing, talking, laughing, and sighing, the great throng poured out of the building and dispersed down the streets of Abertaff. One topic was on every tongue. The fate of the prisoner was the sole thing discussed. They weighed the evidence, they repeated it, they distorted it. Some were violently in favour of the prisoner, and considered half the witnesses to be committing perjury. Others were violently against her, and could not see, so they professed, a shadow of doubt in in the case from first to last. Others, again, in complete doubt as to how the case would end, wisely declined to commit themselves till they had heard more of the defence.

Then, again, these parties were subdivided into groups. There was the ignorant group, who knew nothing about the case, and went about asking questions of their wiser neighbours. There was the mysterious group, who suspected many things, but said nothing, contenting themselves with shaking their heads in corners, and suggesting that not half the real motives of the parties to the affair had come out at all. And there was the well-informed group of those who had watched the whole thing from first to last, and knew more, far more, about it than the counsel on either side, or the criminal either, for that matter.

And they were not churlish in bestowing their information, either. There were the Lewisite partisans, who knew exactly the value of the jewels to a halfpennny, and how they were kept in a box under the bed, and how the prisoner had carried them off by stealth, and buried them somewhere in the sands of Newton Bay. Some of these, the more charitably disposed, could go even farther than this. They explained how it was that the prisoner had never meant to commit the murder at all, but simply to steal the jewels, but had been interrupted in the act by the unexpected waking of the deceased woman. They grew impressive as they pictured the elder woman suddenly roused from sleep by the midnight robber, and the emotions of that robber detected in the act of guilt. They could tell you how she started back in terror, and then, realising that ruin was upon her, succumbed to temporary frenzy, and with the weapon which she had brought to open the jewel-chest, dealt the fatal blow to her unhappy victim.

Roused from sleep by the midnight robber.

Others, less lenient in their views, had obtained quite different details. They could relate numerous previous attempts of the prisoner on the life of her benefactress. They knew how she had sought to introduce poison into her food, from which she was only saved by a miraculous chance, which caused her to be summoned from the table just as she was about to taste the fatal dish. Also, how she had on one occasion led her victim along the cliff with the well-formed purpose of pushing her over the edge; only the curate happened to come along and meet them, and accompanied them till the opportunity was gone.

The Owenite section, on the other hand, had their account, equally authentic, and, if possible, more minute and graphic than the other. They would tell you more about their villain, Lewis, than he himself could possibly have remembered. They took you back to his childhood. They started you with the well-known story of his beating his little sister, the sister in the North, whom he had refused to go and see. They explained the causes which led to his expulsion from school after school. They tracked him to Australia, and unearthed dark secrets in his life out there which would have made the bushranger Kelly reject him from his historic gang. Finally, they brought him back to England, a ruined desperado, intent on getting at his relative's wealth by fair means or foul. The robbery of her jewels was only part of his scheme. By killing her he obtained the whole of her wealth at once. Then a victim became necessary—a stalking horse to mislead the minions of justice, and whose punishment would insure his own safety. He was thus a double murderer.

So the tongues wagged. Meanwhile, the object of these rumours had made his way round in a towering passion to the seat from which his solicitor was trying to get away.

"What does this mean?" he cried, as soon as he got near enough to speak without being heard by others. "Are you playing me false? Where is Mr. Prescott?"

"He was called away into the other court," said Mr. James Pollard, the barrister's brother, who was a partner with his father in the Porthstone firm.

"He ought not to have gone. Your brother managed the case wretchedly. I wasn't allowed to say the most important thing of all."

"My brother did the best he could. No one could dream that Prescott would desert us like this. I shall never give him another brief, I promise you."

By this time they had got outside the door of the court-house. They turned towards a hotel close by, where a general luncheon was put on the table for the convenience of people having business in the assize-courts. The civil court had risen a few minutes before the other, and the place was crowded with solicitors, witnesses, jurymen, and the general public.

"Look here, Mr. Pollard," Lewis said, as they fought their way into the room, "I could have proved that about the jewels up to the hilt if I had been allowed. Why, my aunt was speaking to me about them that very night, and she said Miss Owen knew of them."

"And why on earth didn't you tell me all this before?" retorted the solicitor.

"I thought I had."

"Thought you had! Goodness me! that's just like you laymen. You keep back the chief points in a case, and then you're angry with us because we don't guess them by instinct. Why didn't you tell the judge this when he was examining you?"

"Because it wasn't said in the prisoner's presence."

"Pooh! Why, it was evidence of motive. But there, it's no good trying to explain the law of evidence to you. If anything's gone wrong, you have yourself to thank for it—a good deal, that's all. What will you take?"

And they fell to on the refreshments before them.

Meanwhile the barristers, whose self-imposed code forbade them to enter a public hotel room in a town where the assizes were being held, had straggled off, some to the County Club, and others to the common-room reserved for their especial use in the chief hotel of the place.

Among the latter was Tressamer, who found Prescott awaiting him anxiously, and trying, with poor success, to get through the wing of a fowl. He (Prescott) looked pale and dejected; but Tressamer rushed into the place in a state of exaggerated buoyancy, and called for a bottle of champagne.

"George, how goes it?" cried his friend.

"All went merry as a marriage-bell," returned the other. "Have no fear; keep up your heart, old man. Leave it to me; I'll get her off. Much obliged to you for going away, though. Young Pollard did come some croppers, I can tell you. Buller's against us, of course, on the evidence; but what do I care? I'll get the jury, see if I don't. I'll make a speech this afternoon the like of which hasn't often been heard in this dead-and-alive hole. Lewis, beware! Here's confusion to the guilty, and safety to the innocent!"

He had rattled on in a jerky, excited, nervous manner, and he wound up by drinking off nearly a tumblerful of champagne. Prescott could hardly make him out. He feared the strain of the last few weeks was unhinging his friend's mind.

"Gently," he said, remonstrating; "you must keep cool, or you will spoil everything. Beware of old Buller. When he is giving you the most rope, he is getting ready to come down on you most heavily at the end. I think you'll find it a weak jury. They will do pretty well as the judge tells them."

Tressamer rushed into the place.

"Don't you be afraid, Charlie," retorted the other in the same unnaturally careless strain; "it's my case, and I know how to manage it. I've sworn to save her, and, by God! I'll do it, if I have to declare I did the thing myself! By Jove, didn't I touch up that scoundrel in the witness-box, though? You saw me, Beltrope?"

He called to another barrister, who had been present in court the whole morning.

"Yes, I know," answered Beltrope; "but you'd better be awfully careful, Tressamer. So far as I could see, your line of defence is that Lewis must have done it. Now, unless you're prepared with some very strong evidence against him, you'd far better change that tack before it's too late. You'll have old Buller dead against you, as Prescott says, and, I dare say, the jury too. Whatever you do, don't leave it in such a way that they must convict one or the other."

"Rubbish! You don't understand," replied Tressamer. "Wait till you've heard my speech, that's all. Well, I must be off." He drank some more champagne. "I want to have a wash just to cool my head."

And he darted out of the room to go upstairs. The other barristers looked at each other and exchanged meaning glances. They did not like to say much out loud before Prescott, who was known to be Tressamer's friend; but they whispered together, and the tenor of their whispers was precisely that of Prescott's own reflections.

So anxious did Prescott feel, that he at last resolved to bare his own feelings to his friend in the hope of thereby sobering him. He accordingly went up to his bedroom, where he found him with his head in a basin of water, and addressed him in very grave accents:

"George, you must listen to me. You have told me that you love Eleanor Owen, and, I suppose, as she has you to defend her, that she returns your love. Now, I have a confession to make to you. I love her, too."

"What! You, Charles!"

"Yes. You know I saw something of her as a child. I was fond of her then, I recollect. But to-day, when I saw her, so beautiful, so innocent, in that dreadful place, I found another feeling overmastering me. Oh, do not be afraid! She shall never know it. I shall not try to take her from you. I am not the sort of man to rob his friend. But, George, let me say this to you: that if anything—oh, the thought is horrible!—if any miscarriage of justice should occur, I shall blame you. I shall never forgive you if she comes to harm through your means. Be careful. Oh, great Heaven, man, do your best, your very best! It is the crisis of our lives—of all our lives. Beware how you fail to prove yourself worthy of your trust." And without waiting for an answer he turned away, and hastened back to his own work in the Nisi Prius Court.

In spite of the confident opinions expressed by the barristers, the judge's mind was less firmly settled than they supposed. Sir Daniel Buller was in the judges' private room at the court-house, sharing a dish of cutlets with Sir John Wiseman. Of course, they were discussing the case.

"I tell you what it is, Wiseman," the first judge was saying, "there is something in this case that hasn't come out yet. So far, there has been absolutely no real defence."

"You know, if that man who's defending her—what's his name: Tressamer?—thinks he's going to get off by attacking Lewis, he makes a mistake. I shall go for him if he tries it on."

"Most improper—most improper," assented Sir John. "I don't know what the Bar's coming to, I don't indeed! These young men are throwing over all the old traditions. The judges will really have to do something."

"You see, Lewis has acted a perfectly natural and straightforward part. He was bound to do what he did."

"I suppose you'll sum up for a conviction, then?" questioned the other judge, as he rose and put on his wig.

"No, I shan't," said Sir Daniel, helping his brother on with the purple-coloured garment which is worn in presiding over the civil court. "I shall just leave it to the jury. I don't feel a bit satisfied, and I'm very glad, for once in my life, that I have got a jury to take the decision off my shoulders."

And with these words he drew his own scarlet gown around him, and, grasping a small square piece of silk in his left hand, strode back to his seat in court.

At his entrance the whole assemblage rose, including the prisoner, who had been brought back a minute before. Then a start of horror ran through them, and Eleanor's calmness for a moment gave way in a faint gasp. For the object which the judge had just laid on the desk beside him was—the Black Cap.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

A STORY WITHOUT WORDS.—AN OFFER OF £10.

BELOW are given six sketches in their proper order. £5 is offered to the reader who sends us the most appropriate wording to go under each sketch, the whole to form a story descriptive of the illustrations, and £1 will be given to each of the senders of the next best five attempts. These competitions will alternate with the Jumbled Story competitions, at all events for a short time.

It is not necessary for competitors to have any literary ability. If you have a good idea, surely there should be no difficulty in putting it down in words. The whole of the story is limited to one hundred words, which may be distributed under the sketches according to the judgment of the competitor.

All that you have to do is to put down the number of the sketch, write alongside it the wording that you think most appropriate, inclose your attempt in an envelope (which should be marked "Picture Story"), and forward it to this office before Monday, January 18th.

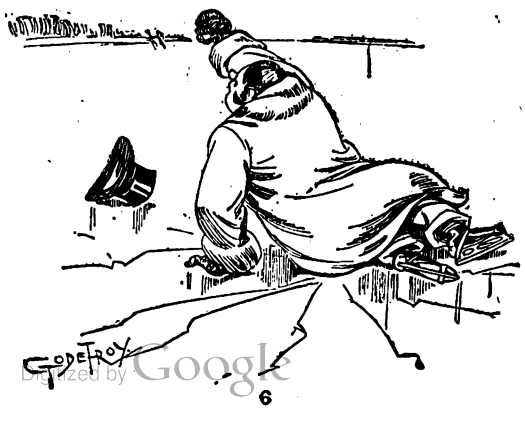
1

2

3

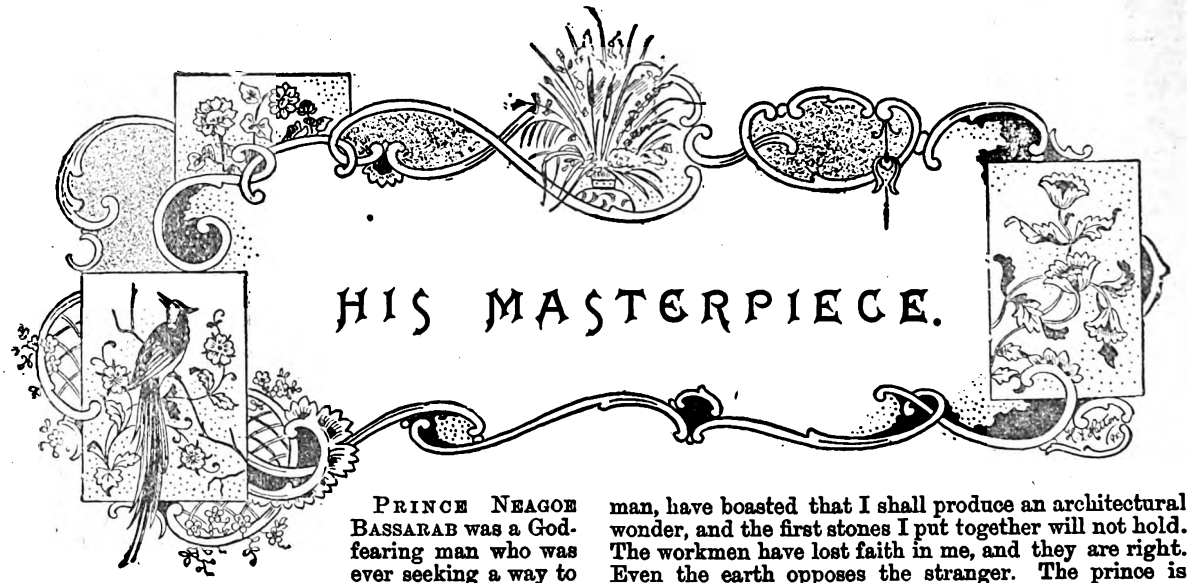
4

5



6

Digitized by Google



HIS MASTERPIECE.

PRINCE NEAGOE BASSARAB was a God-fearing man who was ever seeking a way to display his piety. He had built the churches of St. George, and the Metropolitan in Tergovischta, and the wondrously beautiful cloisters of Cosia and Tismana, the latter upon a rocky peak from which a cataract fell, and yet he deemed that he had not done enough. He longed to erect at Curtea de Argisch a church like no other in the world. He sent far and near for architects noted for their skill and originality to undertake the work.

Among them was a man named Manola. Some say that he came from Macedonia; others, that he was a Spaniard. He promised the prince to delight his eyes with a structure that in its harmonious union of Byzantine, Arabic and Persian architecture should be of unsurpassed loveliness. He chose the labourers that seemed to him most skilful, and began his work with infinite joy and zest, for he felt that his power was ripe, and that he was master of his art. But it was as if some evil spirit opposed him. No matter how deep the foundations were laid streams of water would gush forth, loosen the soil, and displace the stones. Daily they found the sand, but recently removed, had drifted back, and daily the walls had to be torn down and built anew. And when Manola, after working and thinking all day, left the place at evening with moist forehead and puckered brows, he knew in what condition he should find it on the morrow.

The labourers began to murmur, and were loth to work, saying that the spot was accursed and that a church would never be erected there. Manola had as much trouble with the grumbling men as with the refractory ground. Many a long night would he toss to and fro upon his bed in painful thought, then spring up and shed bitter tears. His sweet young wife, Anna, would also rise and gaze at him anxiously with her large, doe-like eyes.

"Tell me your thoughts, beloved. It makes me sad when you suffer and say nothing to me."

Manola drew her to his side, stroked her little hand, and bent his glance upon the ground, while she sought to read his sorrow from his countenance..

"I have been too arrogant. I, an alien and unknown man, have boasted that I shall produce an architectural wonder, and the first stones I put together will not hold. The workmen have lost faith in me, and they are right. Even the earth opposes the stranger. The prince is wasting his money, and 'tis said that he has angrily intimated as much. From every side enemies and envious people spring up who reproach the prince for having trusted me. I have won only shame where I hoped for fame. I know that it is childish, Anna, but sometimes I am infected with the belief of the people that the spot is bewitched."

Heavy sighs escaped his bosom, and he stared before him like one whose brain is in torment.

"Oh, what can I do? What can I suggest?" cried the young wife.

"You!" said Manola bitterly. "What can you, frail child, do where we men with wisdom and strong arms are helpless?"

He sprang up and strode restlessly up and down the small room like a caged lion the whole night. And so for many nights. Anna burned many a taper before the Virgin to win her aid, but in vain. The work did not advance. Manola became gloomier every day, until the labourers began to fear him. At last one of them mustered the courage to say:

"Master, there is an old superstition in our country, that has often proved true. If a building will not stand, a living person must be placed at the foundation, then will it last for eternity."

The workmen surrounded Manola, eagerly awaiting his reply to this daring speech. He stared at them, and the veins upon his temples swelled.

"And whom would you place there?" he finally asked.

The men glanced at one another.

"It must be one who knows nothing of it," they answered.

"But whom?"

"Master, at noon our wives, sisters, and daughters come to bring us food. Let it be one of them."

"And who will offer his?" asked Manola looking at them with the flaming eyes that they had learnt to fear.

They were silent.

"Well, who?" he queried again.

"The first who comes," came at last timidly from the circle.

Digitized by Google

"Well," cried Manola, "then swear!" He raised his hand. "Then swear: The first who comes, no matter whose wife, sister, or daughter she may be, shall without delay or murmur be immured!"

"We swear!" whispered the men.

The sun seemed to mount so rapidly to the zenith that day, and many an eye glanced first towards heaven then into the distance. Not a word was spoken. The men's hearts trembled.

Manola had long stood with downcast eyes, brooding darkly. Now he looked up, and felt his blood congealing. There through the sunshine came a slender form in snow-white raiment; from her dark hair there floated a filmy veil; upon her shoulder she bore a pitcher. within her hand, a basket. 'Twas Anna, his young wife.

"Oh, Heaven!" he prayed, "hast Thou wholly forsaken me? Thou hast indeed punished my arrogance. Release me from my oath! I cannot do this thing! Bid me not sacrifice my young wife, all that I can call my own in this strange land, my happiness, my life! Send a tempest that she may come no further!"

As he stood upon the scaffold and prayed, he felt that all eyes were turned coldly upon him, and he knew that he would be made to keep his oath.

Then the heavens darkened. From greenish-black clouds came peals of sullen thunder and vivid sheets of lightning. There was a roaring and quaking as though the world was in its death struggle. A wind arose that bowed the mightiest trees and stripped them of their foliage. The men knelt and made the sign of the cross, but the young wife came calmly on, heeding not the tempest. She saw Manola's figure upon the scaffold outlined against the black, lightning-streaked sky, and she hastened her steps towards him.

"Heaven!" pleaded he, "now she has reached the brook, cause it to overflow that she may not cross it!"

And see, a rain descends as if the firmament had opened and every cloud had poured its contents upon the earth. Anna came nearer. And the brook swelled and foamed wildly. Not even a horse could swim across it. For a moment the whole landscape was hidden by the veil of rain. Manola clutched a beam and strove to pierce the vapour with his eager glance. Then all was still; the sun shone forth, and look! Anna has taken off her shoes, tucked up her gown, and is wading through the roaring flood. Manola stood motionless. His lips were white beneath his dark moustache as the men who gazed dumbly up at him could see.

The young wife was now but a few steps away, and she nodded and smiled to him who stood aloft, and in whose dark eyes lay the thought: "I had rather the stream had swallowed you than you should suffer this agony!" He descended the scaffold, took from her the basket and pitcher, and chided her laughingly for coming out in such weather. She noted a faint quiver in his voice, and asked if the work were spoiled again.

"Come down and see for yourself what was ruined over night. We are no farther now than we were yesterday evening."

She went down and viewed with troubled face the pools of water. the heaved-up earth, the displaced stones. Meanwhile Manola gave a signal and the masons began their work.

"Oh," said Anna, "I am in the way here. You must help me, husband, it is so high." And blushingly she extended her hand. He took it not.

"Stay down there a little longer, sweetheart. You can then see how quickly the men work. Besides, they have a fancy that the glance of your lovely eyes will make the wall stronger."

The stones had reached her knees. She looked on smilingly. Now they were up to her waist.

"Manola," she cried, "now you must lift me, for I cannot get out of here by myself."

"Yes, my love, when it is time. Just one more moment."

"Manola! The stones crush me. Manola!"

"Soon, soon it will be finished," and with his own hand he laid stone upon stone, and urged the men to work faster.

"Manola, the stones hurt me. Let them not build any more."

But he answered not.

"Manola, let them not cover my mouth and eyes! I am so frightened. Manola, where are you? Why don't you speak? Oh, jest not so cruelly! It will cost me my life! Manola! Manola!"

Just then they laid the last stone over the pretty young head. But the master made them work on and on. Noonday was long past, but no one thought of food. Naught was heard save impatient calls for brick and lime.

Lower sank the sun, yet higher rose the wall. The master swung his trowel with feverish hand and bent forward whenever the cry, "Manola!" came fainter and fainter from below. At last the workmen threw down their tools and declared they would not raise another stone. Night fell. Manola went not home. Like a ghost he wandered to and fro upon the scaffold which reared its black rafters to heaven against the moonlit landscape. Then he strode through the fields, but a spell

£100 is offered to the reader who collects the greatest number of coupons from Short Stories and Pearson's Weekly. Another £100 to the reader who collects from Home Notes. Another £100 to the newsagent who collects from Short Stories and Pearson's Weekly. Another £100 to the newsagent who collects from Home Notes.

Readers must not collect newsagents' coupons, and they should lump Short Stories and P.W. coupons together. Home Notes coupons are to be collected separately.

£100 FOR A WEEK'S WORK.

Hundreds of Consolation Prizes will be given.

No Coupons are to be sent to us until January 1st, 1898.

Digitized by Google

seemed to draw him back to the building-place. He did not want to listen, yet he did so, and heard her still calling. There, silvery, cool, and still, flowed the Argesch. Surely its waters ought to wash away the sounds that tortured him so. He disrobed and stepped into the river, holding his head long beneath its dimpled waves. The water hushed the sounds. But scarcely had he ascended the bank ere he heard the calling again.

Months passed. The church with its five domes and richly decorated walls began to be a marvel of beauty. Then the work thereon ceased, for there was no money at hand. Manola raged. One passion yet lived in him, ambition, the consuming ambition to which he had sacrificed everything. No money!

Prince Neagoe assembled his councillors and asked them to levy additional taxes. But they shook their heads and said the country could bear no more. And was that structure, the glory of his reign, the ornament of his kingdom, to remain unfinished?

Just then the door opened and there entered in all her grandeur and loveliness the Princess Despina, robed in white satin, a mantle of blue brocade, edged with rich sable, clasped round her snowy throat. Over it rippled her soft brown hair almost to her feet. Upon her head was a cap of sable, from which to-day the diamonds were missing. No bracelets, necklets, or earrings were visible, but a silken veil fell like a spider's web over her slender form. In her hands she bore a casket containing all her jewels, which she emptied before the prince. "Take these and complete the church, else shall they be bedewed with the tears of women whose children are suffering from want." And she was gone ere the astonished men could reply.

The church was finished. Rightly was it called a wonderful structure. Each stone was carved and painted to represent a flower upon a golden ground, and no blossom was like another. The domes, the crosses, and the chains which held the crosses in place gleamed with gold—like the sun itself. Around the roof were golden doves that held tiny bells in their bills, and every zephyr made these peal with marvellous sweetness.

But Prince Neagoe, who so ardently wished to see the church completed, and his faithful Despina who had given all her possessions for it, had long closed their eyes upon the world, and their successor, Radu, was a cruel man.

All the scaffolds were removed except one small ladder by which the Prince ascended to the roof to view closely every detail of the superb work. Manola listened silently to the praise bestowed upon him. Even the cheers of the admiring multitude brought no smile to his face. His eyes burnt and glistened from nights of wakefulness and feverish thoughts. Prince Radu had seen everything.

"Well, Manola," said he at last, "would you pledge yourself to build a second church like this?"

"Certainly," answered the master. "The second should be a thousand times more beautiful. Now I realise my power." His face lighted up as he saw in his mind his next splendid work.

"In order that that shall not happen," said the Prince, "you shall abide up here, my excellent master. Your men shall destroy the ladder as soon as I descend. I would not part the master from his work."

Manola stood speechless upon the shining roof. From the vast multitude that a few moments ago shouted his praises arose no word of remonstrance. No hand was raised to rescue him. On the contrary they began to mutter: "The Prince is right. The master is in league with the devil. He walled up his wife with his own hand. He deserves the punishment."

Even his own workmen said: "We would not have done it. He forced us to take an oath. He helped wall herin, the poor woman. And she cried to him so piteously. He is a cruel, wicked man. Has he given us a kind word since that day? And it is to us that he owes the completion of this building. Let him starve up there. He deserves nothing better."

Not one pleaded for him. All gazed up with abhorrence at the man who had begun his great work in sin that would now be punished with death. But he stood with folded arms and saw the ladder removed; saw the people follow the prince who mocked him as he left the place.

He stood thus when night fell, and thought of his whole life; his boundless ambition to which he had sacrificed his happiness, his love, the only being in this wide, unfriendly world that he could call his own. Then there seemed to ring faintly from below the voice of his beautiful wife: "Manola! Manola!" Still the same sound that had haunted him so many nights and robbed him of sleep.

The night was sultry and there was no dew; like a flaming disc the sun rose and poured glowing rays upon the golden roof. All around the grass withered. Over the marsh hung a bluish, ghostly light. The Argesch seemed to have ceased to flow. Not even a gnat stirred in the hot air. Hunger began to gnaw, and thirst parched the lips and throat. The next night there was again no dew. Not the slightest moisture lay upon the roof. A marble stillness was upon everything.

On the second day Manola's brain grew giddier and giddier, and he heard Anna's voice louder and clearer calling him as she did in life, and as if she would appear before him the next moment.

Another long night during which his mind was darkened by fever. He tottered to and fro upon the roof, and wherever he looked he beheld Anna beckoning to him.

At dawn a soft wind arose, and all the bells began to peal. To the starving man they sounded like the voice of his wife. He reeled to the roof's edge, and with the cry: "I'm coming! yes, I am coming to you!" cast himself off. Where he fell there sprang up a fountain, but the water was salty, like endlessly flowing tears.

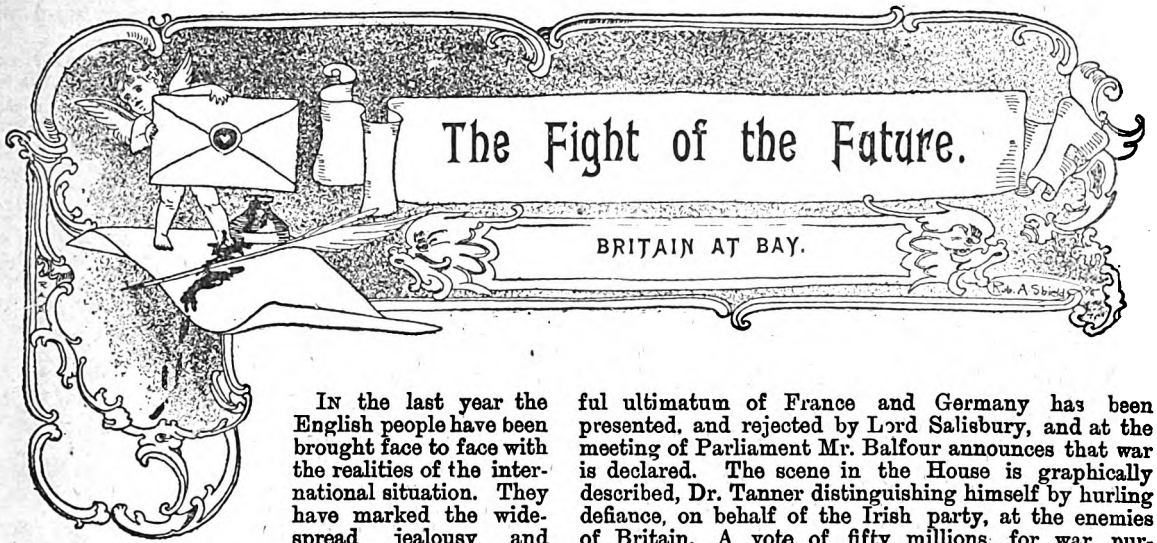
Fred Potter.

GET YOUR WIFE TO SIGN THIS.

Permit.

This is to certify that I....., the legally wedded wife of....., in consideration of his purchasing for me a copy of Home Notes, do hereby permit him to go where he pleases, and to drink what, and when he pleases. I furthermore authorise him to carry and use a latch-key, and to have and enjoy all the privileges and immunities usually conferred by the latch-key aforesaid. I want him to enjoy life while he is with us, as he will be a long time dead.

Digitized by Google



IN the last year the English people have been brought face to face with the realities of the international situation. They have marked the widespread jealousy and suspicion of Great Britain entertained abroad, and they have had to reckon up the possibilities and the consequences of a combination of the whole of Europe in arms against her. The present is therefore the "psychological moment" for a revival of those stories of the Great War to Come, several of which were published a few years ago; and Mr. Louis Tracy has shown his journalistic acumen by compiling another on the same subject. His spirited book on "The Final War" is one of the most exciting ever read.

In it he makes Great Britain confront the world in arms; and if the defect of his narrative is that he takes a view rather couleur de rose of the victorious progress of the British arms, his remarkable grasp of detail and strategic ingenuity enable him to put before us such a vivid and moving picture of a European war by land and sea that the interest of the reader is enchained from first to last.

We begin with a cloudless sky. A ball is being held at the British Embassy in Paris; everything is tranquil, peaceful, serene, to the public and outward view. The Ambassador and one or two attachés have had their suspicions that something was "in the air." But it is only when the official representatives of France and Germany make excuses for a hurried departure that the Ambassador makes up his mind that his apprehensions are right, and sends an aide-de-camp post-haste to catch a train to Italy in order to send a secret message to the Mediterranean fleet.

Meanwhile, at Versailles, there is a meeting of M. Faure, General Caprivi, M. Hanotaux, and Count Holbach, with General Gourko representing Russia. Their plan is unfolded. On the morrow war is to be declared against Great Britain by France and Germany. Preparations have been made for months past to invade England, and everything is in readiness to take the British Government napping and to smash the British Empire at one blow. Canada is to fall to France. East Africa to Germany, and the other colonies to be divided; while England is to be governed by a military council. Russia claims India and Turkey as the price of non-interference, while Germany demands Belgium and offers to give Alsace-Lorraine to France.

Next day all England is in commotion. The shameful ultimatum of France and Germany has been presented, and rejected by Lord Salisbury, and at the meeting of Parliament Mr. Balfour announces that war is declared. The scene in the House is graphically described, Dr. Tanner distinguishing himself by hurling defiance, on behalf of the Irish party, at the enemies of Britain. A vote of fifty millions for war purposes is passed, and a Council of National Safety, composed of the leaders of both parties, including Mr. Gladstone, is appointed.

Meanwhile every British cable has been cut by the enemy and England is really "isolated," the cables with the United States alone remaining intact. But the news spreads at once through the country of the imminent danger, and all is enthusiasm and indignation. At five o'clock that afternoon, May 3rd, 1898—that is Mr. Tracy's date—a vast fleet, with transports carrying 150,000 men is sighted off Worthing, but Lord Wolseley's measures have been taken with all speed.

The South-coast railways had engaged to deliver 20,000 men by nine o'clock, and fifty Maxims were to be on the sea-front by 7.30 p m.; while Lord Charles Beresford, in command of the Channel Squadron, was steaming hard for Spithead and would arrive at eleven.

But meanwhile the enemy are trying to land. This is the opportunity for local patriotism and discipline. The Mayor of Worthing, at the head of the local volunteers, occupies the shore and performs prodigies of valour. One landing-party is repulsed, though at great cost, and another; and resistance is effectually prolonged until the troops from Aldershot dash up under Sir Evelyn Wood and compel the boats to seek the shelter of the war-ships' guns.

Worthing is bombarded, but the shore of England is still safe. At ten o'clock another and fiercer attempt is made to land; but before it can be successful a sudden outburst of big guns from the sea, a series of tremendous crashings and explosions, and a rapid diversion of the search-lights towards the south causes an immediate cessation of firing from both sides; the British fleet has arrived upon the scene.

The Channel Squadron consists of only nine battleships, for all the most powerful ships in the navy are in the Mediterranean, in China, in North America, Australasia, and the Cape; and it has to face a fleet of thirty-six armour-clads—an appalling disproportion. But Lord Charles Beresford's object is first and foremost to destroy the transports and so save the land army, and his orders are to risk everything for that.

Aided by the surprise with which they come to the attack, the British fleet does frightful havoc. It is the fiercest fight in history. In a few minutes the transports and their human freight and munitions of war are swept away into the deep waters of the Channel; and while the English fleet is utterly destroyed, it is accompanied by seventeen of the enemy's battle-ships, while the rest are so crippled that they have to steam as best they can away. Many extraordinary deeds of valour are done, and Lord Charles Beresford just manages to run the Magnificent ashore and save her from sinking.

Digitized by Google

This defeat of the Armada puts England into a wild ferment of joy and enthusiastic loyalty. The first-class army reserve has been called out, and the militia and

It was imperative, now that England is invading France, that enough ships should get safely through the Straits and away to Brest to resist any such movement by sea. Sir Michael Culme-Seymour has a fleet of seventeen battle-ships and cruisers, while the allied fleet has eighteen battle-ships alone and twenty-one cruisers. But the British Admiral has Gibraltar at his back, with its hundred-ton gun; and he manœuvres so that the enemy's battle-ships are compelled to come within its range. The colossal cannon sinks four ironclads and then bursts, but by that time so much damage has been done to Amiral de Monthier's fleet that he surrenders.

In England a great army has been organised. A pro-volunteers are mobilised. Ireland, Scotland, and Wales rise like one man. It is promptly announced that two expeditionary forces are to be landed on the shores of France and Germany. The Duke of Connaught and the Duke of York take their places with the expeditionary army; Lord Roberts commanding the attack on France and Sir Evelyn Wood against Germany.

It is the fiercest fight in history.

Meanwhile events have happened in the Mediterranean. A brave lieutenant from Malta has got ahead of the French and German ships which were proceeding viâ the Suez Canal to occupy Aden and Perim; he dashes off on a torpedo-boat and blows up the Canal; while Sir Michael Culme-Seymour, with the fleet, waits at Gibraltar for the French and German battle-ships, which are moving out of the Mediterranean to join the attack on the British coasts.

clamation is made laying stress on the necessity of answering the attack made by France and Germany. They had tried to destroy the Empire, and danger would not be over until they had been taught a lesson by the occupation of Paris or Berlin, or both. But France and Germany could put six million men in the field; Great Britain has only half a million.

Another half million of volunteers are called for, and a reserve of three millions for reinforcements, Sir Redvers Buller being charged with the work of mobilisation. And simultaneously Lord Roberts and the Duke of York take the field against France, beginning with the capture of Havre; and Sir Evelyn Wood and the Duke of Connaught, supported by a fleet under Sir Nowell Salmon, make for the Kiel Canal with the secret object of occupying Strahlsund.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Tracy describes both operations with great spirit; the capture of Havre, and the occupation of Strahlsund are successfully effected after some brilliant fighting. The result is that the active aid of Russia has to be sought, and the Tsar is induced to join the alliance and to send a fleet against Britain.

An unexpected consequence follows. The United States has been divided in opinion about the war, and the President had announced, though rather against the sympathies of the nation and of Wall Street, which inclined to England's side, that strict neutrality would be observed. Admiral Mahan is sent with a fleet to protect American commerce.

Admiral Mahan was personally all on the side of Great Britain, and he thought that the American people were the same; and when he meets Admiral Erskine with the North American squadron in mid-Atlantic, and hears that there is a possibility of Russia joining the coalition, he makes up his mind that his next instructions must be to join Great Britain if Russia sides against her. On he sails for Cardiff; and while the American ships are in port the Russian fleet also heaves to and sends an ultimatum to the mayor.

At such a crisis it does not suit Admiral Mahan's book to wait for a reversal of his present orders from his Government. The gallant American warns the Russian Admiral that he wants time to secure the safety of the American ships in harbour; and this notice being received with neglect, he promptly fights the Russian fleet and beats them out to sea; when they surrender unwittingly to Admiral Erskine, who is just arriving with battered ships after a successful but disastrous engagement with an allied fleet in the Atlantic.

Mahan is angrily remonstrated with by Mr. Bayard, the U.S.A. Minister for intervening; but a telegram from Washington announcing an American declaration of war against Russia and the allies, promptly put matters right. Henceforth the United States vie with Great Britain in prosecuting the war, and great feats of swift organisation, beating all records, are accomplished by American officers and men; America sends a large force to Strahlsund under General Miles, and the two countries hail with fervour the Anglo-Saxon alliance. England responds at once by drinking "corpse revivers" instead of the usual whisky-and-soda.

The further conduct of the campaigns in Germany and France must be read in Mr. Tracy's book. But this is not all that Great Britain can do. From India another great army is led against Russia. The expedition is excitingly described; the battle in Afghanistan in which the Russian Central Asian army is defeated, and the subsequent march on Moscow, being the occasion of some very vivid writing, with many incidents of heroism and pathos. The attack on Russia is assisted by a revolution within the empire on the part of the Nihilists, by which the Romanoff dynasty is overthrown. Eventually the British and American arms are victorious. Paris is taken, and the German Emperor accepts terms dictated by the Prince of Wales.

Some of the best hits of the book concern the German Emperor, whose little weaknesses, for lecturing on all subjects and for telegraphing when a chance offers, are cleverly taken off. Perhaps the neatest hit of all is the way in which Mr. Tracy makes Dr. Jameson bring off another raid and take the Emperor prisoner, thus settling an old score. A heap of other well-known men are also brought on the scene, and characteristic speeches put into the mouth of each. And as if the military interest of the narrative were not sufficient, two love-stories meander through it, connected with two of the bravest of the British fighting-men. Indeed, so full of incident is the book, and so lively in style, that once taken up, it is very hard to put down until it is finished.—From the St. James' s Gazette.

THE ESPOUSALS.

When the little Princess Othilde came into the world, the sight of her provoked unanimous cries of admiration and surprise; of admiration because she was indeed the sweetest, loveliest thing imaginable, and of surprise because she was hardly as large as the closed fist of a child!

As she lay there in her cradle no wider than your hand and no longer than your finger, you would have taken her for a humming bird, still featherless, in its snug little nest. The King and Queen never wearied of admiring her little legs and rosy feet not too large for a doll's stocking, her tiny body resembling a white mouse, and her face that the petal of a daisy could have hidden.

To be sure they were not a little alarmed at her diminutive size, and their royal dignity was somewhat ruffled at the thought of having given birth to the smallest dwarf ever seen, but they hoped their daughter would grow without losing any of her attractiveness.

They were sorely disappointed in their expectations.

While she retained all the airy grace you might wish to see, the tiny Princess grew so slowly that at the age of five she was no taller than a blade of grass—and she had to stand on tiptoe to pluck a violet, while playing on the lawns in the park.

Learned physicians were sent for and the costliest presents promised them if they could only make Othilde grow a few inches. They held mysterious consultations—crossed their hands on their fat bodies—winked knowingly from behind their glasses, invented nasty drugs that poor little Othilde had to swallow, and miraculous salves with which she was to be rubbed night and day. But all to no purpose whatever. Othilde continued to be the loveliest little dwarf, and when she played and romped with her favourite dog, as large as a new-born kitten, she could pass between its fore-legs without stooping.

The King and Queen, greatly perplexed, applied to the fairies, with whom they had ever been on excellent terms, and who hastened to the rescue: some reclining in litters of cloth of gold fringed with diamonds and rubies, borne by African slaves—others in chariots of the purest crystal drawn by four milk-white unicorns with manes of fire—while some found it more convenient to enter through the windows or down the chimneys in the shape of beautiful birds of paradise or of swift martins with purple wings. As soon as they touched the palace floor, however, they changed into lovely ladies dressed in silk and satin. One after the other they touched Othilde with their wands, took her up in their hands—for she was no heavier than a good-sized lark—kissed her, breathed on her hair, made strange signs over her, and muttered all-powerful words of magic.

Digitized by Google

Alas! the charms of the fairies proved as useless as the drugs of the learned men! At sixteen the Princess was still so small that one morning she chanced to be caught in a trap for nightingales, that had been set in the park.

The courtiers, whose interest it always is to cheer up their sovereigns for the reason that good humour tends to liberality, did their best to console the King and Queen. They declared that nothing was more ridiculous than a large stature, and that all tall persons were nothing but deformities. As for themselves, they said, why, they would have been enchanted to be half a foot tall—but Nature sets apart such favours for royal families alone! On seeing some tall fellow pass by they never failed to burst out laughing so as to please their sovereigns. The ladies-in-waiting of one accord gave up wearing high heels, which were then in fashion, so that the Princess might appear less diminutive beside them, and the chamberlains adopted the habit of never approaching the throne except on their knees.

This ingenious flattery did not always succeed in consoling the King and Queen. They often felt inclined to weep when they kissed their tiny speck of a daughter and hardly dared to touch her with the tips of their lips for fear of swallowing her up. And they kept back their tears, trembling, lest the mite should get soaked and die of a cold! As for Othilde she seemed not in the least distressed about her size, and took the greatest pleasure in admiring her small self in a hand-mirror made out of a single rather large diamond.

But habit wears out the most painful afflictions, and the King and Queen lost their sadness somewhat, and would doubtless have resolved not to grieve more in such a hopeless case—if something had not happened to renew their sorrow. The young Emperor of Sirinagor had heard so many accounts of the Princess's wonderful beauty that he fell deeply in love with her and dispatched certain ambassadors to ask her in marriage. You know that Fame, with the hundred trumpets, willingly flatters royal persons, and in this instance had divulged Othilde's charm and beauty without mentioning her size. The embarrassment that such a demand produced at the royal court can easily be imagined. It was out of the question to marry this dainty doll—no larger than a bird—to a prince of usual stature.

But the young Emperor's suit was the more preposterous as he was himself of an enormous height—being far more beautiful than any living prince, and taller than any giant. When he was born it had been impossible to find a cradle large enough to hold the huge baby, and they were obliged to stretch him out on some carpets in the throne room. At the age of three he had to stoop somewhat in hunting for birds' eggs on the topmost branch of oak. His parents, like those of little Othilde, had consulted doctors and fairies, but to no avail, for he had grown on and on in an excessive manner. When his subjects celebrated a victory and erected triumphal arches for their young prince, he was compelled to alight from his horse to pass under them, and no matter how high they might be, he never failed to strike the frontals with his helmet, on which was fastened a silver bird with outstretched wings.

Naturally, the King and Queen declared to the disappointed ambassadors that such a match was the most impossible thing in the world. But the young Emperor, who possessed a very fiery and warlike temperament, was by no means satisfied with the reply—he flatly refused to listen to reason—and the confession of Othilde's small size seemed to him an absurb excuse, invented to contradict his wishes. He put on his helmet in great wrath, making the silver wings tremble, and swore that he would avenge himself of such an insult by putting the entire country to fire and sword. He acted accordingly. Terrible battles were fought, towns were sacked, and whole nations were slaughtered.

Finally the King and Queen understood that they too would perish as well as their entire kingdom if they did not come to an understanding with the gigantic conqueror who was rapidly striding over burning forests and villages! They hastened therefore to offer him peace and solemnly promised to give him their daughter in marriage. A day was appointed for the meeting of the two lovers—it had to take place in the park for the conqueror would never have been able to stand up in the palace halls.

"Well," he said; "I do not see the Princess—will she not be here soon?"

"Look down at your feet," answered the King. And there she was, sure enough, hardly any higher than the flower-beds—so tiny and so fair in her dress of gold, her brow sparkling with gems! She appeared smaller still by the side of the magnificent young Emperor, whose armour gleamed and shone in the sunbeams.

"Alas!" he sighed—for he was much distressed at discovering her down there at his feet, so lovely and so tiny.

"Alas!" said the little Princess, for she too was very sad on seeing him up there so far off—so handsome and so tall! And they had tears—she in her uplifted eyes, he in his downcast eyes. But even as they looked at each other she was growing taller and taller and he was rapidly shrinking. Love, more powerful than the fairies, had united them. Presently they were almost of the same height, and their hands touched—like two lovely roses on one stem.

JESSIE ROGERS.

POST-CARD COMPETITION, No. 8 (New Series).

TWO GUINEAS will be given to the person who states on the back of a post-card the best reason why he should have it. All attempts to reach this office by Monday, January 18th, 1897.

Digitized by Google

OR,

The Romance of a Lost Continent.

By Geo. C. Wallis, Author of The Winning of Gunhild, etc.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE END OF ATLANTIS.

I HAVE said that we purposed repairing the Ravager and, in her, quitting this luckless land. It was easy to propose and lay our plans, but not so easy to accomplish them. Penares, with fifty men, made an effort to reach the ship and tell our plight to the seventy sailors left on board: and after a day's striving, was compelled to return with only half his band.

Once I set out, with two hundred of the oldest and best-trained warriors in our little garrison, and we fought our way for half the distance with almost superhuman energy. There, however, we were stopped by huge barricades piled across the tortuous way, and the incessant attacks of the swarming mob of madmen, till, weary and hopeless, we had perforce to retreat, leaving some eighty of our friends upon the scene of combat. It grieved me sorely to draw blade anew on my own countrymen, yet there was no help for it, so lost were they to all sense of order.

When I tried to talk with them they answered only with defiant yells of rage, and when in our pity we gave the starving multitude a portion of the food from our store, they fought so fiercely with each other for it that more was wasted and more of them died in the savage struggle than gained a morsel of the boon.

From the tower top we could see the sailors busily repairing the vessel, and fearing that they would put to sea without us—knowing that she was victualled for a long cruise—we made signals to them, after the failure of the sallies, both by day and night, at last attracting their attention and making it understood by the signs all seamen are familiar with, who we were and how we were placed.

At the end of the second month her masts were fixed and a new helm in place, and Orlanis and I looked at her from the distance with fury in our hearts to think that so good a ship lay there and we could not get aboard.

My admiral bore it so ill that one night, when all save the sentries slept, he woke me, praying that I let him try to creep through the city in the shades, and reach the vessel. I could only give consent, and but that I could not leave my wife and Didron lightly, would have gone with him.

As he passed out he was joined by Atris—who had grown dark and silent as the grave since the night of fear—and together they two stole into the outer darkness, threading their way with caution through the slumbering town. They met with little difficulty on their journey, being only two, and moving always in the shadow, and just as the daylight shone upon the column top, we received and answered the signal that told of their success.

Meantime, keeping pace with the famine and pestilence, and our misery and despair, the sea drew in upon the land relentlessly on all sides, lessening the shelving margin of the doomed country until the northern shore was within a half-day's journey, and the southern portion of the city, including the harbour, and the house and garden where Briseis had once lived, lay a fathom deep under the plashing surf, and the tide rose and fell amid the ruins of deserted dwellings.

Storms were frequent, long-lasting, and fierce, in those days of desolation; therefore, you may imagine the sudden chill of fear which smote me when going, as was my custom, to signal with the crew of the ship, I saw that it was gone!

The night had been wild and dark, the shrill hurricane blast shrieking round our quaking column like the raging cry of a thousand demons from the lower shadows, and when, through the fresh, vigorous, rain-washed air of the morning, I saw no trace of the vessel on which all our hopes hung, I feared that the northern gale had carried her out to sea, and left her a sinking wreck.

Digitized by Google

Said Valdo, joining me on the dizzy height, and speaking at the top of his voice to be heard above the whistling of the wind:

"The clouds are still driving fast, and there is a bank of lowering dulness in the north that I like not."

"And there is something missing in the south that I am concerned with," I roared into his ear, pointing to the vacant shore.

"So there is," he shouted back with a calmness and a carelessness in his tone that I could not share; "they have but put off to escape the wreckage near the coast, and will doubtless return when the elements have worked their fury off. But hist! dost hear that low rumbling roar to the north and east?"

"And see that line of white advancing on us swifter than the rising tide? Ay," I bawled in sudden eagerness, "dost know what it portends?"

"By the God of Truth, that do I!" he cried, hurrying to the steps, down which I followed him in break-neck haste, "'tis the last sinking of the land and the last great ocean wave, helped on by wind and tide. 'Twill sweep over this fragment of dry land as over a sunken reef, and yonder wretches will be drowned like vermin in their holes!"

"Haste!" I answered as we flew down round after round of the winding stair that never seemed so long as then. "Haste! or those we love will not have time to get to the upper storeys ere the flood is on us! Haste!"

Right lustily we toiled that morning, getting our wives and children safely placed on the highest floor, then labouring with might and main to secure as much as possible of the sadly small store of grain, and to draw as much water from the well as our scanty vessels would hold.

That done, we withdrew our sentries, fastened up the doors and casements, covered down the mouth of the well, and rêtired to the upper storeys, waiting the coming of the conquering sea.

Below us, in the city and on the plain, the gaunt thousands, roused from their fitful sleep by the roar of the advancing surge, ran to and fro in new-born terror, wailing and shrieking in their madness.

Many climbed to the roofs of the houses that were still whole, whilst others clustered round the foot of the tower imploring assistance or admittance, which, of course, having regard to our own safety, we could not grant.

We had not long to wait in silent suspense before the rushing tide was boiling round us, its impact making the massive column tremble and totter with appalling violence.

It was our one thought, as we watched the inrush of the deluge from the north-east, whether the tower, with all its strength, would withstand the awful force of the raging sea; and when we felt the ground quake and the floors dance beneath our feet, all feared the worst.

But the foundations, as I have told, went deep into the earth, being built on the solid rock, and after the first contact the seething flood passed by with more of noise than danger in its passing, sweeping away the groups of famished wretches huddled together on the lee of the tower, as straws before an autumn gale.

Higher than the highest ruin in the city was the on-pouring tide, and when, bearing on its foaming crest a formidable quantity of uprooted trees and floating wreckage, the water from the northward met the rising water to the south with a sudden swirl and thunderous sound, not one of the hapless creatures at their mercy was left alive.

The water eddied fiercely for some hours after that, shaking the tower in its fury and battering the sides with the many fragments borne upon its ruffled surface, and when all was once more tolerably still, we who gazed from the upper floors of the high column were all who remained alive in the land of Atlantis.

The city, with all its burden of sorrow and sin, lay fathoms deep below the waves, and the birds of the woods and housetops could find no resting places for their feet. The tragedy of Atlantis was at last complete, and no feature was wanting of the horrors foretold by the mouth of Unim, Priest of Truth.

Amid the shrieking of the gale and the lashing of the angry waves, night settled down upon desolate expanse, and those who could sought their rough couches to drown their fears in sleep.

Three days of despair slowly passed over us, perched in our solitary tower, nothing upon the sea breaking its grey monotony save the homeless flight of the gulls, the storm-birds rising on the waves, or the swarming of the ground-sharks over the place where the city had been.

In those three days we seemed to pass a lifetime of suffering and grief, for the water gave out and the sea had crept in, filling the lower chambers, so that we could get no more.

The fell disease which had devasted Kronos was not yet gone from us, and on the weakened frames of many fastened its deadly grip with ease. On the afternoon of the third day our Didron, our one remaining child, was stricken down by the plague, and we put him to rest along with many others in the salt water that filled the lower halls.

We wept not over him as over Vesta, though our hearts were torn with equal grief, for the fountains of our tears were dry, and we said aloud that it was better that he should go before us than be left to perish of thirst at the last. So does grief seek to deceive itself.

It was on the morning of the fourth day that, having risen early to gain the solitude of the column summit, I saw a sail to windward bearing down upon the tower. Although at first it appeared no larger than a gull's wing, I soon noticed, as the ship drew nearer, the Egyptian cut of her canvas, and knew her to be the good old Ravager, which we all deemed lost.

With indescribable joy I watched her swift approach in the soft glimmer of the morning; nor till she came within hailing distance, and I had heard and answered the welcome shout: "The Ravager has come to the rescue of her King!" did I tell the glad tidings to the remnant of the faithful garrison. When I did, all was at once confusion, and many wept for joy who thought that sorrow had left them no more tears to shed.

Without delay we got aboard, taking as much food with us as the ship would carry, and easing round the helm, put off and steered from the silent, lonely tower for the far-off West.

When the mad revolt broke out in the city we numbered 400 men and 200 women and children, while the ship held seventy sailors; when we set forth on the pathless ocean for the last time our company all told was only 150 men and forty of the weaker sex and younger years, so busy had been the arrows of Amarunth.

The tale my two brave officers told was very simple. Orlanis, always an expert weather prophet, had foreseen the coming of the storm and noticed the sudden sinking of the land, and though against the wish of many others, had deemed it his duty to put out to sea.

After struggling with the tempest for three days, they got command of the ship again and so came to our relief, being themselves greatly relieved to find the tower still standing.

"I thought it cowardice to leave the shore while you were exposed to all the fury of the gale, but I am only a clumsy landsman compared to Orlanis," Atris said with the grimmest of grim smiles upon his haggard face.

"It was wise to follow his desire," I answered, and thereupon commended my captain warmly for his skill and promptness.

Digitized by Google

But my thought hurries on to the culmination of my life story and the coming of the end, which Unim had wisely withheld from my knowledge. As the sturdy vessel ploughed her way through the western waters in the clear glow of the morning light, our faces cheered and hands sought hands in thankful tenderness.

For myself, I felt as though a weight was lifted from my mind, and I was free to end my days in peace in a foreign land, for was not life left in us at the last, and hope renewed, and love, that is stronger than life or hope, still making joy within our hearts? And were not the stout timbers of a veteran vessel creaking beneath our feet as the wind in her bellying sails bore us from the scene of the last act in the mournful history of Atlantis?

Yet scarcely had we voyaged from the sun till the watch-tower sank low on the eastern horizon, when the sharp eyes of a sailor discerned two ships fast sailing from the south towards us, one, the larger, pursuing the other and smaller, and gaining slowly but surely upon her as they drew rapidly towards the path we were steering. I seized the helm and pointed the Ravager so as to meet them without delay.

"'Tis as well to greet them one by one," I said to Orlanis, who stood at my side in the prow, trying to make out the vessels, "for we know not who they are, and one enemy at a time will be enough for us."

"I like not their looks at all, King," said he, "and also, I seem to know the smaller ship by sight. Mind you not once going aboard a long, low craft like that, against my desire?"

"By the Spirits, 'tis Tirhak the Pirate, whom I told to search for the ship of Listra!" I cried, motioning Valdo and Atris to me, "and now the thought is in my mind, the greater ship is like the phantom craft that I saw from the shores of Kronos on the even when the Sleeper was slain! To arms, men! and below with our wives and little ones! We have yet a fight to win ere deliverance is ours!"

"The time shall find me ready," answered briefly-spoken Atris, his hand on his sword, and a gleam of fire in his hollow eyes; and Valdo said:

"Nor shall I be wanting, whose love is the greedy blade, and whose bridal bed has ever been the field of war!"

"I have no fear for your prowess," I said, "and the pirates, once at bay, will strike while they have strength to stand; but I sorely wish our iron-beak were still at the prow, for then we should have no need to board."

The two ships, both with full spread of canvas, were still foaming on, the pirate being within a league, and the other craft but half that distance astern of her, and coming up regardless of our presence, hand over hand. She flew the selfsame flag that the rebels of Ulmeca had chosen, and we were sure now that she was the mysterious vessel of outlawed Listra, and did not wonder that Tirhak fled for Atlantis rather than fight her alone, so great was her size and swift her speed.

The Ravager herself could not have raced through the flying spray faster than did that cursed craft, whilst she could carry a crew at least double the number of ours.

"We shall be upon them presently," said Orlanis, "up with the Royal Banner, and let them know our reputation!"

"And pull her up short when we meet the first," I cried. "We must talk with Tirhak before aught is done."

So saying I ran below, and clasping Briseis in my arms, bade her be of good cheer, for one of the ships was a friend, and the wanton who had slain our youngest son should meet her just punishment ere the sun went down.

"Yet be not harsh, my husband, my love!" pleaded my sweet wife, encircling my neck with her white arms, and kissing me with all a maiden's sweetness. "If she will pass on without drawing weapon, so let it be, for surely blood enough has been shed in these last months. Yet if she will not, and you must strike, strike hard, and show no mercy for my sake, for I have a strange fear of this leman in my heart, and I could rest in peace did I know the salt waves plowed above her body. Think me not cruel, husband, for it may be a warning of the spirits that troubles me, but be not thou the first to provoke the strife."

"Dear one!" I cried, letting her rest for a moment in my arms, as she had done in that fair garden now under the sea, "dear one, it shall be as you wish in all things, and fear not for me in the worst, I pray, with 'Sunderer' in my hand—it is a staunch friend."

I left her then, and went on deck, but how her sweet eyes followed me till I had climbed the stepway, and was out of her sight!

Orlanis now stood at the helm, and with him my two officers and Penares. Taking my trusty blade from its sheath, I cleaned it well from the stains of rust that had gathered on it, polished it, and sharpened its matchless edge upon a piece of soft stone, moistened with oil.

As I laboured, and the ringing metal shone and sharpened in my grasp, the old war spirit crept into my soul with all its thirst for a foeman's life, and its longing for the clash of arms, and as I worked, I sang till the others caught the spirit, and grim faces flushed at thought of a coming struggle. Our prow was now level with the pirate's bow, and I hailed the long-bearded old man who stood in the stern of his ship as both banks of oars flashed out, backwatering, and we came to rest.

"Whither in such haste, old friend of Didron?"

From the gangway of his vessel the white-haired old pirate answered me, his voice still ringing full and strong.

"To Kronos, King," he said, "bringing you the ship you sought in vain!"

There was a twinkle in his eye and mirth in his voice, that made us laugh in spite of ourselves.

"Or meanest thou that yonder ship is bringing thee, my Tirhak?" I queried, pointing to Listra's craft, which was now rapidly nearing us on the larboard tack.

"There may be a leaven of truth in thy saying," returned he, "for I thought I should surely lead the enemy into a trap if I could only bring her near the coast, though it seems there is no coast as yet, and yet I could swear by all the gods that three days agone I was not two days' voyage from the shore! Canst unravel me the mystery?"

"Let us settle with the foe first," I said, cutting him short in his garrulous career, "and then we will talk of vanished coasts and sunken cities. Art willing to join us in a bout with the swift sailing craft?"

"Ay! and that without second thought!" he cried, buckling on a blade that one of his hardy men brought. "If my time has come, I could not wish to die in better company or in better fashion. It hath always been my desire to close my eyes before an enemy's face, with a sword in my hand and a shout of battle sounding in my ears. Lead on, son of Didron; thou shalt not find the pirates hang back for fear of a woman's crew!" and the burly old sea-rover, who had just deemed discretion better than rashness, put his ship about, shaking his huge fist the while at the oncoming foe.

"Seemeth as though our Princess hath a large crew aboard," muttered Valdo, "or she would not come forward so readily."

"That may be," I said; "but many or few, we shall fight her if she wants a fight, though she shall herself decide. Furl sails, Orlanis, and let us trust to our oars alone, as Tirhak is doing. Keep her head forward, and get ready the grappling chains."

Now we were within hailing distance of the strange ship, nor had I long to take note of her lines and build and admire her with a sailor's critical eye, when in calm, clear tones that I remembered well, this greeting came across the water:

"Welcome, Arnon of Atlantis, Macis of Thinæ, deserter and traitor, welcome!"

There was deep sarcasm and contempt in the words and the manner in which they were spoken, there was deeper scorn and blacker hate in the face of the beautiful fury who uttered them.

The ship was tearing towards us through the water like a living thing, the white spray rising before her sharp curved prow like a fountain of foam, and the erst Princess stood near the helm, the keen wind casting her flying draperies behind her and tinging her cheeks with freshest red as she called her mocking salute and ill-concealed challenge to us.

For answer I would have sent her a shower of arrows and leaden bullets; but, remembering my weakness before her wanton charms and my promise to Briseis, I replied, fitting a shaft in my bow meantime—a shaft with her name graven upon it:

"Greeting, Listra! Welcome to Atlantis, from whence you have so long been a stranger, though rumour has it that you paid us a visit once in the night, when none could see your face and be captivated with its beauty. As you wish to land again, the way is free, and I will not make effort to put off your visit."

"Art turned into a weakling, or in thy second youth?" asked the fair rebel, laughing an evil laugh to her crew; "thou, Macis the Fearless, Arnon the Iron-fingered and the Iron-hearted! Forsooth, strange things happen in these days! Surely, when I chase thy hired spy nearly to thy palace—if it be yet standing—thou wilt require some explanation?"

The graven shaft shook in my hand with rage as I listened to her insulting speech, and Tirhak scowled black defiance at her taunts. Still I controlled myself, giving her another chance, though now the ships were close, and behind the beautiful speaker I saw familiar faces.

"'Tis not my wont, Listra," I retorted, "to brook flouts and sneers from any, least of all from the false lips of a child-slayer. But the Queen bade me pass in peace if it might be, so that each could go our way without strife. As for my comrade of the long-ship here, you will not despise his mettle when he turns at bay."

I could not have used worse words to calm a jealous woman's passion, and I might have known it, were not slowness of wit my greatest failing.

"Thy coward comrade I despise no less than thyself," hissed the Princess across the space that separated our keels, "and know that I spurn thy meek Queen's gracious intercession as the bereaved lioness would mock at the mercy of the hunter who had slain her lord and feared herself! No, spare yourself speech, who fear to fight because your gentle love is aboard!" she said, as the bulwarks of the vessels grated, and Tirhak, like ourselves, having pulled in his oars, raspcd adown her leeward bow, "I will say my say before I strike, Macis, and it is this: Now that your dear one is within my grasp, and you are fleeing from the wreck of your land, the chance for which I have plotted and longed has come, and I shall not let it slip. Recall, my Macis, the words I spoke to you in the palace, when your Queen foolishly gave me life and liberty. Recall them—then ask of me if I pass in peace! You are in my power now, my false-faced warrior, and your mild-eyed Queen as well. Fight, then; and may a thousand demons drag your footsteps down to the darkest shadows!"

Then came the cry of war, the rattle of grappling chains, the clash of sword on sword, and a flood of men poured over our bulwarks ere we had time to draw in rank; and the strife began.

(To be continued.)

"AN AMERICAN EMPEROR."

JEROME K. VANSITTART, the richest man in the world, a product of American monopolies centring in a few families, and finally in a single individual, meets and falls in love with Mademoiselle Honorine de Montpensier, who similarly comprehends in her own person all the legitimist claims to the throne of France. He proposes to her and is rejected on the ground that she can marry no one but the Emperor of the French, as, although by the Salic Law a woman cannot ascend the throne of that country, she is compelled to preserve her right of inheritance.

A wild idea that he shall pit his brains and his money against the French Republic, takes complete possession of Vansittart, and he seriously plans out a campaign towards that end. He first consults his most trusted financial agent, Mr. Peter Studevant, and arranges for no less a sum than two hundred and fifty millions sterling to be at his control within the next eighteen months. He also arranges for a magnificent palace of wood, glass, and iron to be sectionally built in New York and shipped to Paris. As his scheme is principally to win the regard of Frenchmen of all classes by a huge and successful commercial and national undertaking, he secures the services of Mr. Walter C. Maclaren, a noted young American engineer. The latter, with an English and a French engineer, is dispatched on a secret mission to Northern Africa.

With Vansittart is staying his old friend, Dick Harland a light-hearted and straightforward but impecunious young Englishman. Vansittart takes him into his confidence, and half-jocularly appoints him his Master of the Horse. The millionaire picks up in Central Park a whole-souled and honest vagabond named James Bates, otherwise known as Arizona Jim, and after a queer rencontre, selects him to be the Captain of the Guard.

After some months of quiet thought and preparation Vansittart sails for Europe with the characters already mentioned; the Comtesse de Fontainbleau accompanies Mdlle. de Montpensier as her companion.

He wins the hearts of the Parisians by his lavish generosity and exhibition of sympathy with everything French. One day he is visited by M. de Tournon, Minister of the Interior, against whom he is warned by Honorine. Tournon and he set out for the levée at the American Embassy.

The above is a synopsis of that part of Mr. Louis Tracy's serial, "An American Emperor," which has already appeared in PEARSON'S WEEKLY, and will enable you to pick up the thread of the story at once. Naturally it is only a very, very bare outline.

Digitized by Google

RED WHITE & BLUE

FRENCH COFFEE.

Delicious for Breakfast or After Dinner.

In making, use rather less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary Coffee.

SOLD EVERYWHERE.

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to the

PEARSON POTTERY Co., Hanley

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 Pieces for £1 1s.

100 Pieces for £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery. The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful. Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

½ A MILLION 7/6 FULL DRESS LENGTHS TO BE CLEARED AT 6S

BLACK, NAVY, GREY, AND SEVERAL CHARMING SHOT EFFECTS

Patterns of the above, also SALE PRICE LIST, Post Free.

CLEARANCE PRICES quoted for Dress Goods, Mantlings, Suitings, Flannels, Flannelette, Calico, Shirtings, Blankets, Quilts, Sheets, Towels, Gloves, Corsets, Stockings, Handkerchiefs, Umbrellas, etc.

TREMENDOUS REDUCTIONS IN EVERY DEPARTMENT.

FIRST ORDER OPENED MONDAYS, WEDNESDAYS, AND FRIDAYS SENT FREE AND CASH RETURNED.

Send to-day for Sale Price List and list of Lucky Winners.

REMNANT BUNDLES (containing 12 yards), in long lengths—Dress Serge 12/-, Calico 3/6, Flannelette 4/6, Union Shirting 7/9, Flannel 8/9.

LUTAS LEATHLEY & Co., Dept. 130, ARMLEY, LEEDS.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS COCOA.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

WITH FULL NATURAL FLAVOUR.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

JOLLY'S 'DUCHESS' PILLS.

POSITIVE CURE FOR ANÆMIA.

A box containing 60 doses post free on receipt of 2/6. Address—

BRITISH DRUGGISTS LTD., 219, Oxford Street, LONDON, W.

THE DEAF HEAR

The New Patent

SOUND DISCS

Completely overcome DEAFNESS and HEAD NOISES, no matter of how long standing. Are the same to the ears as glasses are to the eyes. Invisible. Comfortable. Worn months without removal. Explanatory Pamphlet Free.

The L. R. WALES CO., 62 & 63, New Bond St., London, W.

A SUM of from 10s. to 20s. per week offered for spare time to either sex, everywhere; work can be done evenings.—Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 92A, Aldersgate Street, London.

CAN YOU WRITE?

Of course you can! Why not then emboss your Notepaper, etc., with a pretty Monogram? using the

Patent Pocket Monopresse

Every Initial and Monogram kept in stock. Monograms of one or two letters, 9d. each, post free. Apply—

CHAS. ROMPLER, 7, New Basinghall St., London, E.C. Agents wanted.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING Co., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free. Address L. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

A KISS.

I HAVE been vegetating, like a turnip, in this forsaken place for more than ten years now, and ten years hence I shall probably be still smouldering away here in unaltered circumstances, as far as human possibility can foresee; and yet be it understood I was, and still am, a very promising young man; all my friends, nay, even my enemies, agree that I might aspire to lofty and exalted positions in my native land. Alas! History repeats itself, and my undoing was brought about by a woman, and that woman was the Queen herself. This is how it befell:

I was ridiculously juvenile when my disgrace overtook me; let us say nineteen years of age. One afternoon, charmed by the softness and warmth of the early spring air, and pushed forward undoubtedly by unkind fate, I betook myself to the sheltered glades of the royal park, that I might muse undisturbed beneath the glorious linden-trees, whose branches met in gothic-like arches fifty feet above my head. I sauntered idly about, revelling dreamily in the soothing sights and sounds which gratified my senses on every side; the deep silence of the forest remained unbroken, save for the hum and whir of insect life, and the psalm-like sing-song of the quiet river which followed the avenue trod by an aimless foot.

I seated myself on a moss-covered log by the river where it widens into a miniature lake, and from whence a fine view of the palace arose in grey cloud-like splendour before me.

The dip of oars, languidly drawn through the water, aroused me from my day dream. I leant forward curiously, wondering who the intruders might be, when the sound ceased abruptly, and in the stillness a summer duck with purple throat and bronzed wings drifted by, calling gently to its mate; then the dip of oars sounded again, while in the gathering dusk I discerned the prow of a small boat rounding the curve, and hidden among the bushes I watched the occupants.

A young woman wielded the oars; she was in all the glory of early youth and beauty; slim and shapely she looked, as she pulled the little craft with easy strength through the placid water, her bare arms gleaming like satin in the waning light. Holding my breath, I studied her fine, proud features, the beautiful eyes, the delicate curve of the divine mouth. Filled with ecstasy and rapture, I wanted to fall on my knees and pray. It was the Queen of France.

I had loved her secretly for a year or more, and it was of her that I had come to dream in solitude through the long, soft hours of this spring afternoon, which seemed an emanation from her gracious person.

In the stern of the boat sat Her Majesty's pretty little nephew, Prince Louis, lightly holding the silken cords of the tiller. Absorbed in reverie, the Queen, with her small head thrown back and her swan-like throat exposed to my adoring gaze, continued to row in the golden light of the setting sun.

A sudden shrill cry rent the air, awakening me from my beatitude, and to my horror I saw the little Prince tip over the cranky boat and fall into the water, while the Queen caught at the branches of a tree and clung affrightedly thereto. In less time than it takes to tell I was swimming in the river after the child, whom I seized and brought to shore; then I turned the boat over and started to rescue the Queen. I took her lovely form (which had been made for Kings alone) into my arms, seated her in the craft, and rowed to land. She watched me with her marvellous wide-open eyes, in terrified silence, until at last feeling terra firma beneath her feet once more, she flew to her nephew, her boy who lay almost swooning upon the ground, and covered his little face with tender kisses.

Then turning to me she said with deep emotion: "You have saved his life, and I will give you in return anything which you may choose to ask of me."

"Anything!" I echoed hotly, while a thrill quivered through and through my frame and shook me from head to foot. Astonished at the suddenness of my reply, her eyes sought mine in wonder. I knew not what she read in their depth, but she blushed deeply and lowered her eyelids. As I have mentioned before, I was very young at the time, and although it may not behove me to say so, I was reckoned one of the handsomest youths at Court. The Queen knew me well, and had often smiled upon me when her eye, by chance, met mine fixed upon hers in speechless but most eloquent adoration.

As she hesitatingly lifted her glorious eyes to mine again, I saw a sudden flash of light pass through them which sent the hot blood tingling through my veins, and flinging discretion to the winds, I repeated: "Anything! Really? Does not your Majesty wish to recall her words?"

She made a negative movement of the head, while her colour deepened, and I, idiot that I was, madly enamoured of her beauty as well as of the glamour of royalty which hung about her like a perfume, begged in almost inaudible accents for "one kiss, only one."

"Your youth alone can excuse such presumption," she murmured reproachfully; but before the words were out of her mouth I had caught her beautiful head in my two hands and laid my lips on hers. In that wondrous second I felt the fresh delicious mouth tremble and return rather than repulse my caress; but I was quickly brought to my senses, as the Queen pushed me hastily aside and one of the Court Chamberlains advanced towards us from an adjacent by-path.

All this, and indeed it was little enough, reached the King's ears in due time, and the Queen was brought severely to book for her indiscretion. She unhesitatingly admitted the facts, I understand, but, ah me! did she ever confess that for one half second we were accomplices in that gentle kiss?

Being without fortune, and dependent on my Sovereign's bounty, it was but a span before I found myself just here, in this outlandish place, sent as secretary of legation. I am surely buried alive, unless it may please Heaven to gather my amiable master to a better world. There are moments in which I curse myself for a knave and a dolt, but toward Eastertide each year I receive from the royal palace a box of fresh and fragrant jonquils, and then rapture fills my soul, and I would not change places with the highest functionary in the land.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

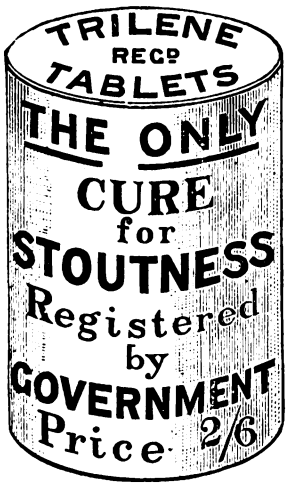
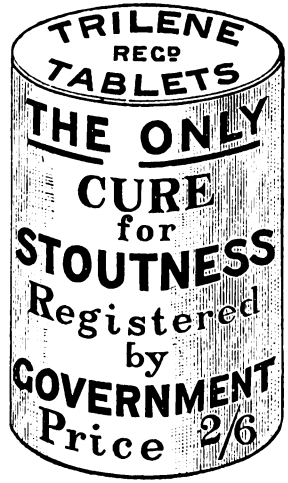
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 70, Finsbury Pavement, London.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87, Alexandra Road, Norwich.

"GENTLEMEN,—I have had some boxes of your Tablets for my wife, and she has derived great benefit from them.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Illustrated Family Novelist, November 30th, 1895, says: "A great many women who are plump by nature worry about their stoutness. However, there are some perfectly safe remedies for embonpoint, among them being the Trilene Tablets, which are not only safe, but absolutely beneficial to the general health, and speedily produce the desired effect."

MR. TAYLOR, Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "I have lost quite 2 stone since taking your Tablets."

"6, Brighton Terrace, Hull.

"MRS. JOHNSON has much pleasure in saying she has derived great benefit from your Tablets."

"3, Castle Road, Deal.

"MRS. J. PEARSON is glad to say she is much thinner."

Convalescent Home, New Brighton, Cheshire.

MISS S. J. PRITCHARD says: "They have done me good. I am 21lb. lighter already."

"Bretton West, near Wakefield.

"MISS L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of Tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

MRS. HUTCHINSON, 46, Irwell Street, Widnes, Lancashire, writes: "I have taken three boxes and am reduced a stone."

A. D. BILLINGS, Bell Inn, Aldershot, writes: "Have derived great benefit already. Less in size and weight, and breathing greatly improved."

25, Windsor Terrace, Penarth, Cardiff.

MISS M. FLAVELL says: "I have lost 2 stone, and am much better in health."

Extract from Bury and Suffolk Times, June 15th, 1894: "Miss Atherton sings and dances as piquantly as ever, and is a marvel of agility, considering how much flesh she has put on of late. Her friends should induce her to take a course of Trilene Tablets, about which I hear wonderful things. One portly acquaintance of my own by merely a few weeks' use of these little Tablets, has reduced his bulk perceptibly. I am assured the Tablets are harmless and tasteless, and that the Trilene Company in Finsbury Pavement, London, are doing an enormous and ever-increasing trade."

MR. GILLESPIE, 50, Chancer Road, Forest Gate, Essex, says: "I have lost just 3 stone."

2, Chariot Street, Hull.

MR. JUBB, Chemist, says: "My customers speak highly of your Tablets."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.

MR. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17½ stone, and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17 stone, was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15 stone."

Aspern, 29, King's Hall Road, Beckenham.

MISS S. WOODHOUSE writes: "I have much pleasure in stating that your Tablets are really a safe cure for stoutness; they have cured me, and I am a perfect figure now."

MRS. GIBBON, of Radford Cottage, Bitterne, says: "I have derived great benefit from your Tablets, especially abdominal."

The Lady, October 8th, 1896 (giving advice to a reader who complained of stoutness), says: "The Trilene Tablets help to reduce stoutness, if taken daily; they are made of purely vegetable ingredients, and are quite harmless."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 70, FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's

EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE

FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lb.	30/-
No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 50lb.	37/6
No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 55lb.	41/3
No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lb.	48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

BLACKHEADS or "Maggots," Pimples, Blotches, etc., immediately and permanently removed by my Skin Cleansing Lotion, "CUTISOLINE." Never fails. Hundreds of testimonials. Post free with directions, 1/6, 3/- and 5/-. AUSTIN LENNOX, Skin Specialist, 1, Shoe Lane, Fleet Street, LONDON.

TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, Mrs. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

NOSE A RADICAL PERMANENT CURE Medically approved, for Red Noses. 3/9, post free, under cover. Pamphlet, "Red Noses, Cause and Prevention." 1/-; Machines for Ugly Noses, particulars for stamp.—LEES RAY, Specialist, Wavertree, Liverpool.

HAIR DESTROYED permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

DEAFNESS CURED

On receipt of stamped envelope, a lady who cured herself of Deafness and Noises in the Head, after fifteen years of suffering, will send to all afflicted free particulars of the Remedy, which is simple, safe, sure and inexpensive. Address—Mrs. C. E. AUSTIN, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

'DRUNKENNESS'

CURED. A Lady having cured her husband secretly of intemperate habits, will gladly send particulars of the remedy on receipt of stamped envelope.—Mrs. S. S. BARRINGTON, 4, Featherstone Bldgs., LONDON, W.C.

THE

GREAT COUGH REMEDY, BRONCHONIA.

A Marvellous Remedy for Coughs, whether arising from Consumption, Bronchitis, or Asthma. Its efficacy is testified to by Eminent Physicians. Of all Chemists, 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per bottle. Post free, 2s. 9d., 4s. 9d., and 11s. 6d.—J. HOWARD & Co., 20 and 21, Queenhithe, LONDON, E.C. One Trial will prove its Efficacy.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 421. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 23RD, 1897. [ONE PENNY.

"No flaw in its claim to be ABSOLUTELY PURE."
MEDICAL ANNUAL.

FRY'S
Pure Concentrated
COCOA

Awarded Highest Honours. | "Strongest and Best." HEALTH

Over 200 Gold Medals and Diplomas awarded to the Firm.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ¼lb., 10d.; ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; 2lb., 4s. 4d., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON

MOUSTACHES

Heavy and Handsome, Speedily Produced.

BALD PATCHES ERADICATED BY USING ESAULINE.

TESTIMONIALS DAILY.

POST FREE (secretly packed) in British Isles,

1/6, 3/-, and 5/- from

S. S. KNOWLES & CO., 30, NEWGATE STREET, E.C.

10'6 10'6

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS.
THE WORLD'S GREATEST COSTUMIERS.

10/6 10/6
10/6 10/6
10/6 10/6
10/6 10/6
10/6 10/6

DESIGN NO. 100.

HALF-A-GUINEA.

Made in our world-famed "SPECIALITE SERGE," all shades—Black, Navy, Brown, Cinnamon, Drab, Grey, Electric-Blue, Myrtle, Bronze-Green, Petunia, Ruby, Cardinal, etc. Any of our Half-Guinea Designs produced in our new and fashionable FRIEZE CLOTH in all the latest SHOT EFFECTS will be 15s. 6d.

PATTERNS POST FREE.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO. are giving better styles and better value than ever.

Our New Illustrated SKETCH BOOK, containing all our Latest and Newest Fashions, is now ready. Ladies are requested to write for same, which will be sent FREE by return of post.

In ordering please name Short Stories, quote number of Design of Costume, and give the following measurements: Neck to waist at back, bust under arms, inside sleeve, length of skirt in front, and size of waist.

ORDERS PROMPTLY EXECUTED.

Each Costume securely packed and sent carriage paid 9d. extra.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., 17, ROSCOE ST., COLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

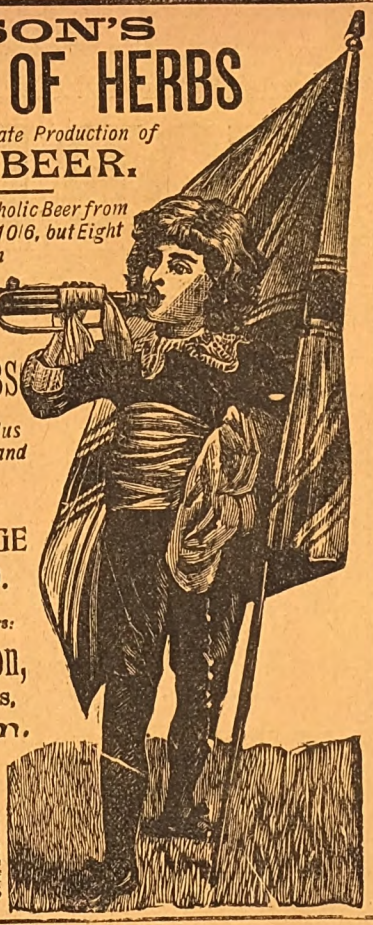
Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.



If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

RED WHITE & BLUE

FRENCH COFFEE.

Delicious for Breakfast or After Dinner.

In making, use rather less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary Coffee.

SOLD EVERYWHERE.

ADVERTISERS should write for particulars of Special Positions.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS COCOA.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

WITH FULL NATURAL FLAVOUR.

JOLLY'S 'DUCHESS' PILLS.

POSITIVE CURE FOR ANÆMIA,

POVERTY OF BLOOD, etc.

A box containing 60 doses post free on receipt of 2/6. Address—

BRITISH DRUGGISTS LTD.,
219, Oxford Street, LONDON, W.

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free. Address L. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

REGD.

Dr. Mackenzie's ARSENICAL TOILET SOAP.

Specially prepared as a beautifier of the skin and complexion, and guaranteed to contain a small but absolutely harmless quantity of arsenic. Produces a lovely skin and complexion, and cures spots, pimples, redness, and freckles. The finest and purest soap made. For all irritations it is most emollient and soothing. Absolutely harmless. But beware of the many worthless imitations. Have Dr. Mackenzie's or none. Deliciously and expensively perfumed, at all Stores and Chemists', 1s. per tablet, 3 in box, 2/6, or post free from S. Harvey, London Bridge, S.E.

WAR! WAR!! WAR!!!

In consequence of the JAPANESE and CHINESE War we have on hand a large quantity of Pure Chinese Spun Silk Handkerchiefs (21in. square) suitable for PRESENTS. We offer these to the readers of Short Stories at the very low price of 1/1 (post free). This splendid offer will only be open for fourteen days, and will not be repeated. Address—

ATAR SYNDICATE,
28, Martin's Lane, Cannon Street, LONDON, E.C.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
January 23, 1897.
No. 5.
S.S. S.S.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 5.
Jan. 23, 1897.
NEWSAGENTS
S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope.—Address, Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 179, Westminster Bridge Road, London.

WHY BE FAT?

When a Lady (who has discovered a simple means of self-cure) will be happy to send particulars of same to any sufferer from this distressing complaint, free, on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Address, Mrs. TREVOR WELLS, 327, High Holborn, London, W.C.

No. 421.] [1d.

For the Week ending January 23rd, 1897.

AN INDIAN LOVE STORY.

The Face in the City Well.

YES, Sahib, you are right—I am a devil, for my heart is as evil as my face. But the word of the Sahib is faulty in some respects, for all black men are not devils, as you say, but are men born of women, and therefore different only in that they are a different colour to the Sahib.

Pardon me, Sahib—you do right to reprove me—but my heart is bitter just now, and from my lips drop words that are black with hate—therefore do I speak so that I forget that I am in the shelter of the Sahib's compound. The water of the Sahib's well is sweet, the shelter of his trees is pleasant, and his presence is gracious to me, therefore ought I to be blest; whereupon my tongue is loosed, and I speak out of the bitterness of my heart.

How mighty is the Sahib's understanding!—truly nothing is hidden from it. How did the Sahib know that I could tell a tale of my life, if I were so minded? My face betrayed me? The Sahib is indeed wise to be able to read the hearts of men through their faces. I am an old man now, and I have held my peace for many years, but there are times that come upon me when I must speak, even though it be to a Sahib, for, as you know, your nation does not understand my nation, and we are as sealed books to you.

The Sahib is curious? Then am I surprised, for the white man but seldom feels curiosity regarding we that are not of his colour. It is only the story of a woman—the Sahib still desires to hear?—then will I open my mouth, for my heart warms towards him, for it is told in the bazaar that he is just in the matter of payment, and deals not out kicks and blows to those whom he employs. It is a long story, but for the Sahib's sake I will cut it short, lest white ears should be wearied with the long continuance of my voice.

I was a young man then, Sahib, straight and upright as a seesum tree, swift of foot, and handsome as the leopard that crouches among the rocks; strong also was I, so that the wrestlers in the city dreaded my approach. The Sahib looks in my evil face and wonders if what I say is true, but before God my word may be believed, as the Sahib will discover if he questions the old men of the city. Truly my face is ugly now so that no woman may desire me, but it was not always so. The Sahib grows weary—I will begin.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

It is strange to speak of this matter, therefore does my tongue travel a crooked road and take a long time to arrive at the beginning!

It was the third day after the feast of the Mohurrum —the Sahib was not in the country then or he would know that never has there been such riots as during that time. It was shortly after the Mutiny, and the hearts of men were in a state of turbulence and unrest, therefore they fought until the troops were sent among them and blood was spilled like water, so that the terror of the English was driven deep down into the hearts of all who saw and took part.

But three days had passed since the riots had been crushed, and the city was lying quiet as a whipped cur that had not yet recovered from its wounds. And as I sat by the well that stands in the the centre market place, and thought on these things, a woman came to draw water. She was a respectable woman, Sahib, for her face was covered up from the sight of men, her eyes only being visible; and I watched her as one might watch any other living thing that came that way. And as I sat thus, I noted that the wheel upon which the rope of the bucket runs was stiff, wherefore I arose and set it right.

And as I glanced idly down into the water of the well, the woman's cloth fell aside so that I saw the reflection of her face—then the next moment she had covered it up and the reflection had vanished. And in that instant, Sahib, my heart had grown hot with love, for the face of the woman was exceeding beautiful, as beautiful as that of a houri from Paradise ; such was the beauty of her face that it might dwell for ever in the hearts of such men as saw it!

Yes, the Sahib is right—English women are also beautiful, but that is, so long as they are tall and fat; but the white Mem Sahibs only touch our eyes, whereas the native women touch our hearts.

And as I sat and dreamt, the woman passed away down the road that leads to the nether part of the city, and no man knew that I had seen her face. And at once a great longing seized me to know who she was and whence she came, wherefore I sought out Dudder Bux, the letter-writer, for he knows the whole business of the city, and is also willing to talk upon it should a man approach him rightly.

And when I had sat and drank* tobacco and talked upon many things that were far from my heart, I said: "Saw you the woman who came and drew water while I sat by the side of the well?"

And Dudder Bux smoked his hookah for a while, and then replied:

"I did."

Now my heart was burning with impatience, wherefore I said:

"Tell me, O Dudder Bux, who the woman is, and where she lives."

Then Dudder Bux laughed long and loud.

"Ho, ho!" he cried, "where the flowers are there the bees come. Thou art going the way of the multitude, for the fame of her beauty has spread; but she is not for you, she is about to be betrothed to the Keeper of the Thana. Even were she free her father would not give her to you, for he is a hard man, and grasping withal."

But I still craved to know her name, so that at last I prevailed upon Dudder Bux to tell me.

Then cried I:

"Take your pen, O Dudder Bux, and write this letter for me to the woman, for my heart is hot with love."

But the letter-writer would not, for he said it was an evil thing, and that through her father would the Judgment of God be visited on his head.

It was hard work, Sahib, but at last I prevailed upon him by the offer of much money, so that he wrote this letter:

"Thou art as a houri from Paradise, and in the light of thine eyes lieth man's knowledge and happiness.

"Thy lips are the gates of love, thy mouth is a ruby temple, thy teeth are the pillars thereof; but thy voice is like gems dropped from the Throom of God.

"Thy hair is a mesh within which to catch and hold men's hearts captive. My heart waiteth for thee; thou art my life and my love!

"My heart is hot with love; it melteth before the light of thine eyes and the magic of thy lips. Open thou therefore thy heart to me that I may enter and dwell therein."

Thus did he write, Sahib, under my guidance; then folded I the letter and gave it into the hand of one who might be trusted, with instructions that he was to deliver it into the hand of the maiden when she was alone and there were no other eyes to see.

And after many days had passed, I received an answer by the hand of Dudder Bux, wherefore I knew that the messenger I had sent was to be trusted. And the maiden wrote little, for she was shy, so that the pen trembled in her fingers; but she said that what I wrote was evil, for it was not the custom to write unto young women such letters as the one I had sent. But she knew not the uprightness of my heart towards her, Sahib, or she would not have written this thing.

And that night, Sahib, I went out and stood in the shadow of the babool tree that is on that side of the road facing her father's house, and there I played on the zither and sang songs such as the men of this country sing to the women they love. And after a while her father came forth and looked round, but seeing no one he went within again. But the woman I saw not, for she was in the courtyard sitting with her mother and the other women of the household.

And the next morning early I went and knocked against the door-posts of her father's house, so that the door was opened to me. And I, having called her father out, spake upon the matter that was nearest my heart, and besought him to give me his daughter in marriage.

Then he laughed scornfully, and looked upon me with an evil smile. "Ho, ho!" he cried; "so your heart also is inclined that way! The story of my daughter's beauty has gone abroad, so that I might, if I were so minded, build the foundations of my house upon the young men who stand as suitors in the shadow of it."

Now this was a crooked saying, and as I pondered upon it, the man stooped down and digged a hole in the earth—so large, Sahib. And he, having done this thing, rose, and said unto me: "Can you fill this hole that I have digged with rupees? If so be that you can, my daughter is yours; for I am, as all the bazaar says, a hard man and fond of money."

Then was I sad, for my substance did not run to so much. But I cried:

"Tarry yet awhile, and I will earn the money quickly, and then come for your daughter."

And he answered:

"I will tarry."

* Smoked tobacco. This is a literal translation of a Hindustani idiom.

Digitized by Google

Then waited I the whole of that day, and when the sun had set, the woman came forth, and looked upon the rising moon. And I drew near, and revealed myself to her carefully, for it was not in my mind to frighten the maiden, and drive her from me.

And she looked upon me with the startled eyes of the fawn, for her heart was shy as the hearts of young maidens are when they know not the power of love.

"Was it you," she cried, "who wrote to me by the hand of Dudder Bux, the letter-writer?"

"It was indeed I," I made reply.

Then for many moments we stood silent. And at last I minded me that the time was short, and that I had much to say before I left her. Then drew I near, my lips burning like live coals with the love that was in my heart.

"Heart's delight!" I cried, "the time is short, and I have much to say unto thee."

And at my presumptuous speech the woman turned and would have left me, but that I held her back.

"Nay, nay," said I; "be not afraid; for I would not harm thee if I could."

Then held I her tiny left hand, Sahib, and as I gazed upon her rosy-tipped finger-nails that were like unto the morning sun upon the clouds, my tongue broke its bonds, and I spoke words of passion and love to the maiden, until I felt that she trembled with the echo of the storm that was within me. And as I looked down through her eyes into her heart I saw the first dawn of love, and felt that already the victory was half mine.

Then cried I: "Heart's Heart, uncover to me that I may once more look upon thy beautiful face."

And she turned away her head and said: "Nay, this is an evil thing that you say to me. Would you have me be as the English Mem Sahibs who flaunt about in the light of day with uncovered faces that all men may look upon them?"

Then answered I with passion and love trembling upon my lips: "I ask this thing, Heart's Delight, because my heart is burning with love for thee. I swear before God of the honourableness of my intention towards thee, wherefore I pray that thou wilt do this small thing."

And the woman was silent for a long time, but by the light of the moon I saw that she trembled at my presence. Wherefore I went softly, and parted the covering that hid her face, she forbidding me not, and, Sahib, I kissed her upon her beautiful lips as it is the privilege of an Englishman to kiss the woman he loves. Thus was our love ratified that night! Then did she return to her father's house, and as for me, I went back to dream of Mothi, and how I might win her.

Yes, Sahib, my tongue is so dry that it cleaveth to the roof of my mouth by reason of the long converse I have had. The Sahib is indeed gracious, but I cannot drink of the fire-water, for it is forbidden in the Koran.

The story draws to its close. There is not much more to tell. The next morning, Sahib, I left the city, and, having arrived at Fyzabad, I borrowed the character certificates of a man who was now too old to work, and took service with a Contractor Sahib who was at that time making much money under the Government, and became a bearer such as the one who sits without in the verandah. And the men of that city said I was a rogue, but, Sahib, in those days my whole thought was of Mothi, and how I might find the money that her father required for her.

And after much time had passed, I left the Contractor Sahib, and returned to the city of my people. But my heart trembled within me through some unknown fear, so that I sought out Dudder Bux, the letter-writer, and begged him to tell me all that had passed in the city since my departure. And when I had heard all, I rent my garments and tore my hair, for Mothi's father had taken her and given her in marriage to the Keeper of the Thana. And having drawn from Dudder Bux the place where she now lived, I repaired to that quarter of the city and took up my station outside the house.

And as I stood thus, there came to my ears the low sound of a woman crying, and the dull thud—thud of a stick upon living flesh; and my heart grew hot within me so that I leapt over the wall and stood inside the courtyard. My tongue now refuses to dwell upon what I saw there, Sahib, but at the time my brain swam and my heart grew fierce so that I leapt upon the man and wrestled with him until he fell. Then took I off my shoe for I would not defile my hands with striking him, and smote him many times on the face with it.

And the man lay very still and moved not. And Heart's Delight watched it all with quiet, frightened eyes, and when all was over she came gently to me and I led her forth. And in the Market Place I hired a horse and together we left the city and rode night and day with fresh relays of horses, for we were riding with happiness and love as the prize.

And at last we reached a city far enough south of the Ganges, and there we tarried a week—and to this day, Sahib, my old heart throbs when I think of the divine happiness of those days spent with my Mothi!

And at the end of that time there came men who seized and bound me and took me before a magistrate, Sahib, for they said that the Keeper of the Thana was dead, and that my hand had slain him. And for many days I lay in prison, my heart rent with thoughts of Mothi's loneliness and unprotectedness; and at last they brought me forth, and the case was heard. And when I comprehended the sentence, Sahib, I cursed the day that I was born and behaved like a madman; but they paid no heed and only laughed in my face.

And for thirty long years I toiled in the prison yard, and in that place I was accounted as one who was mad. And when the sentence was accomplished, Sahib, I came forth, my body bowed and shrunken with age, and my hands rough as the elephant's hide, by reason of the many ropes I had twisted and the hempen mats my fingers had woven. Then did I seek Mothi with passion and love still hot in my heart, but none knew aught of her, and her name had passed away like a shadow passes away at noonday.

But at last I found an old man who remembered the woman, and from his lips I learnt that Heart's Delight had died in that city of want and privation—with none to care for her. And the light of her beautiful eyes was for ever quenched, and her lips for ever silent! Ah, Sahib, I am old in body, but hearts take long to die.

Nay, the Sahib does not understand the people of my nation, or he would not offer money—let the Sahib throw it to the passing beggars, for my spirit is still proud, and silver cannot heal broken hearts.

The Sahib is my friend; he does well to reprove me; but he is a young man and does not yet know what it is to love. . . . . I was mad to talk upon this matter; let us drink tobacco together, and I beg that the Sahib will forget that I have opened my lips and laid bare my heart.

FRANCIS GLOVER.

Digitized by Google

A MESMERIC FEAT.

THEY were talking about mesmerism in the green room of the theatre. Terrell, the manager, was there, and did not believe in it at all.

"Mesmerism is simply another word for trickery," he said confidently.

"Pardon me, but have you ever witnessed any mesmeric phenomena?" asked the man with the dark, penetrating eyes. He was a newspaper man, a friend of one or two of the chief actors, and haunted the green-room. Terrell had seen him there before, and did not take kindly to him—perhaps because Fred Upham, the newspaper man, had bothered him to accept a play of his. However, a theatrical manager cannot afford altogether to offend the Press, so Upham was not interfered with.

Terrell answered him rather curtly, however.

"Thousands of times," he said, "what they call phenomena; men eating candles, and all that sort of nonsense; but it is all trickery."

"Mind, Mr. Upham is a mesmerist himself," put in the leading lady.

The manager shrugged his shoulders.

"Would you like to see an exhibition of what I can do?" asked the journalist quietly.

Terrell shrugged his shoulders again.

"Would you care to wager that I can't stop your play to-night by mesmerising the company?" went on Upham, as quietly as before; and they all laughed, Terrell among the rest.

"I am quite serious," said the journalist, "and if Mr. Terrell does not object to my making the experiment—as he can hardly do after his assertions—I shall be happy to show him how easy it is to rule the wills of subjects whom I have been allowed to bring a little under my mesmeric control."

"What would you do to us?" asked the leading lady.

"Simply make a few passes before you went on. I should not, of course, send you into the mesmeric sleep, or you could not go on at all, unless I willed you and directed your actions!"

She turned to Terrell.

"Oh! do let him! There's a dear."

The manager frowned.

"I can't have my plays humbugged about even for your sake."

"But, according to you, I cannot do anything," said Upham. "If there is nothing in mesmerism I cannot affect your play at all. Will you agree to a wager?"

"Come, Mr. Terrell," said everybody, "you cannot refuse to back your assertions."

"It is too absurd," said the manager.

"But there is no harm in having a little money on it," said Edmund French, the comedian. "Mr. Upham is welcome to make as many mesmeric passes on me as he pleases, if the experiment is made on the monologue, but I don't think he will be able to prevent me going through my piece."

Edmund French was acting a monologue, called: The Lost Will, as the first piece every night before the drama. The Lost Will had been written by a well-known dramatist—Terrell never under any circumstances risked a play not written by a well-known man—and it was not much of a success.

Edmund French made as much of it, of course, as anybody possibly could: but it did not go very well for all that.

Perhaps this is why the manager allowed himself to be cajoled and bullied at last into wagering one hundred pounds that Upham could not, while sitting in a box on the following night, prevent Edmund French from performing the piece, or make him act in any unusual manner during the performance of it.

The wager was put into writing, and both Terrell and Upham deposited their hundred pounds with one of the company.

Terrell called upon Edmund French to give his promise that he would not play any tricks, but French shook his head.

"No, Mr. Terrell, I know perfectly well that if I did, I should leave your company on Saturday night. And I can't afford to do that, even if Upham offered me all his £100 as an inducement."

Terrell laughed.

"How well you know me," he said.

* * * * *

Next night every member of the company who had not to be dressing for the drama was in the front of the house, anxious to watch Fred Upham's experiment.

The journalist had made a few impressive passes over Edmund French after he had dressed, and then went with the manager into a private box before the curtain went up.

Digitized by Google

"Does French play nothing but light comedy?" he asked carelessly, when they were seated.

Terrell laughed his rather unpleasant laugh.

"He does not get the chance. They all think they are taking the wrong parts. French thinks he has the making of a serious actor. Comic men invariably have; but it is lucky for the public that we managers keep them to the parts that they can really do."

"I think I'll make French play a serious part to-night," said the journalist thoughtfully; and as he spoke the curtain went up.

Everybody who had heard of the experiment to be made, glanced at Upham, who, as the curtain rose, fixed his dark penetrating eyes with a concentrated look of command on the face of the actor.

Half-way across the stage French seemed suddenly to feel the effect of his commanding glance. He had come in as usual with the little skip of a comic old man, but now he suddenly stopped dead. The members of the company ceased to look at Upham, and fixed their eyes of anticipation on Edmund French. His panic was only for a moment—the ordinary spectators could hardly notice it—then he walked to the seat that he had to take by a small table, but he staggered as he walked with uncertain steps, and when he reached his place, sank down with his arm on the table, and his face on his arm.

"Why, the man is drunk!" said Terrell.

And when French spoke his voice sounded as though the manager was right. Most of all, he was not speaking his lines, but something quite different. The audience, however, noticed nothing wrong, for the words were coherent and intelligible, although they certainly were not the words of The Lost Will.

His apparent drunkenness seemed part of the play. The words were even interesting, and there was a listening hush over the place, which was not usually noticed when The Lost Will was played.

"It is a trick," said Terrell, but Upham, with his dark eyes fixed on the actor's face, did not seem to hear.

His cheeks were unnaturally pale, and drops of cold perspiration stood on his forehead.

"French shall suffer for this," growled the manager again, and Upham, with his white, concentrated face, turned to him with sudden excitement.

"Be silent, man, unless you want a fiasco. Leave me alone, and I will pull you through. Distract my attention, and see what happens."

The manager glanced at the stage again in obedience to the journalist's directing finger.

The actor was sitting quite motionless, with a vacant look on his face. Terrell was conscious now that he had stopped speaking in the middle of a speech at the instant that the mesmerist had turned his eyes from the stage.

"For Heaven's sake, go on," he said, conquered. As Upham turned back the play went on again, the astonished manager not speaking another word during the whole performance.

The piece that French was giving Terrell had never heard before; it seemed to him to take hours delivering. In reality, the monologue was quite a short one, and occupied less than half-an-hour, but to the anxious manager expecting every moment that something might disturb the mesmerist's attention, and cause the piece to break down ingloriously, the minutes passed like hours. Even in his agony of suspense the manager could not help noticing Edmund French's acting. It was the most wonderful part of the whole affair. He was completely transformed, and played with a depth and passion that astonished those who knew his ordinary acting in comic character, clever as that was. He had always been able to make the audience laugh. To-night, in this strange little monologue, he was making half the audience cry. When, all too soon for everybody but Terrell, the curtain came down, there was a perfect hurricane of applause, and the actor was called again and again.

Next day there was an enthusiastic notice in one of the principal morning papers, whose critic had been lured there in time for the monologue by a note from the leading lady. He could not say enough of the play or of the acting. "Without any notice on the programme and without even changing the scenery of The Lost Will," he wrote, "there was produced last night at the theatre a short play which was as remarkable for its quite abnormal cleverness and beauty, as for the modesty of its anonymous author, who allowed it to appear without even a title." The critic went on enthusiastically to describe the beauties of the monologue, and then gave a quarter of a column to Edmund French's acting.

In the afternoon Upham received a visit at his rooms from Terrell and the actor who held the stakes.

The latter handed over the two hundred pounds, and Terrell asked if it were possible to get a copy of the monologue, which French had delivered under the journalist's influence.

"It was a splendid thing," said the manager. "Where on earth did you get it from? I suppose you must have known it yourself word for word?"

"Yes," said Upham quietly, "it was a little thing I offered you six months ago, which you said would not do at all."

"Well, I hope you will offer it to me again," said Terrell. "The public will expect it now. I only hope French will act as well when he is not under your influence."

"Oh, I expect he will," said the mesmerist, with a smile; but it was not until almost a year after, when his plays were asked for everywhere, and French had married the leading lady and joined another company, that Upham handed him back his one hundred pounds and explained how anxiously he and his "chum," Edmund French, had been to get a hearing, the one for his plays, the other for his serious acting.

"But that pause when you took your eyes away?" stammered Terrell.

"Oh! the pause was in the play," laughed Upham.

W. J. MORGAN.

RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION No. 1.

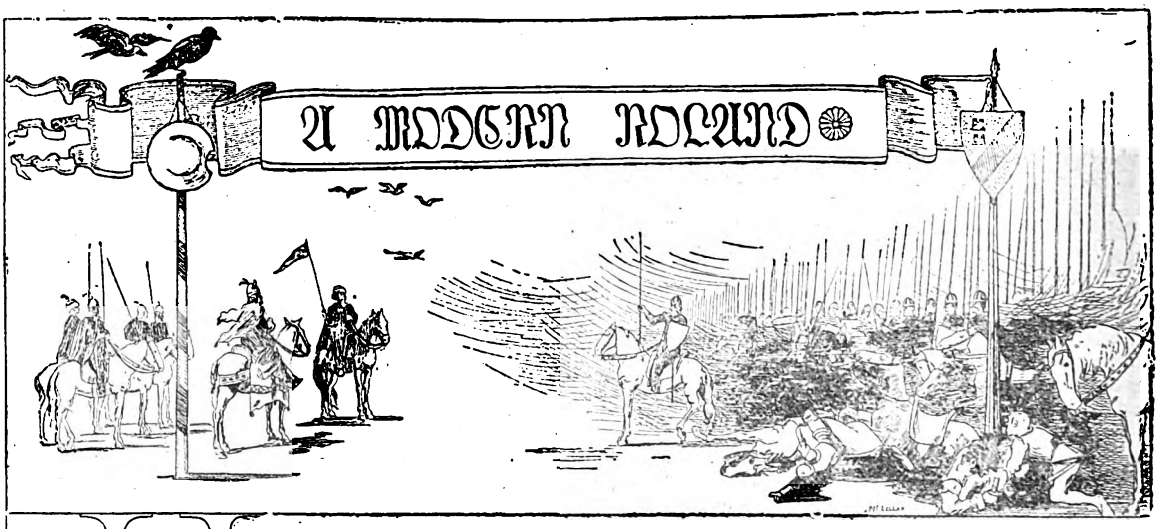
(NEW SERIES.)

TWO GUINEAS have been forwarded to Mr. ROBERT CUNNINGHAM, 52, Dean Street, Glasgow, whose anagram ran as follows: "Ye yarn a heap, P.W."

Result of Coupon Collecting Competition.

Full names and addresses of winners in this Competition will be found in Pearson's Weekly dated January 23rd.

Digitized by Google



IS name was Roland, which was very fine, as everyone will admit. It was also Perkins, which was not so fine; he admitted that himself. He was, in fact, so keenly conscious of the disproportion between the two names that he came at last to be known as plain Perkins. This was, no doubt, partly because of his own persistent avoidance of his christian name—"Yours truly, R. Perkins," he always signed—and partly because of the ferocity with which he was accustomed to resent the familiar appellation "Roley," which an injudicious wag had on one occasion, and only on one, ventured to couple with "poly." It was after this that he dropped the Roland from his signature and adopted the one given above.

Mr. Perkins had been left an orphan at the early age of seven and had passed the age of wisdom, as defined by the law, before he learnt aught of the history of his celebrated namesake, which will be the more readily understood when it is stated that Mr. Perkins had been indebted for his early education to the Parish, by which estimable institution he had been, when twelve years old, bound apprentice to a hairdresser.

As Mr. Jackworthy's business improved, so also did the position of his young apprentice, till, at twenty-two, behold our Roland the prop of Mr. Jackworthy's declining years and practical manager of his very lucrative concern.

So far Mr. Perkins had been happy. His life, if not flooded with continuous sunshine, had, at least, not been darkened overmuch by clouds of trouble. It annoyed him, certainly, to be obliged to resent any trifling with his christian name; but this was only occasional, for at the time of this history few people knew the significance of the letter R, and fewer still would have cared to inquire.

Mr. Perkins always breakfasted early with a good appetite, saw that everything was in apple-pie order, appeared fresh, rosy and smiling before, or rather behind, each successive customer, and conversed with astonishing fluency and apparently tireless iteration on the state of the weather, past, present, and to come. Were a customer indiscreet enough to indulge in a conversational bolt, Mr. Perkins would gently lead him back to his favourite topic with a persuasive insistance before which the most aggressive were wont to yield. Once, indeed, the flow of his speech had been checked, when a certain farmer, broad of chest and rubicund of visage, had, at the first allusion to the weather, so heartily objected to the same, that Mr. Perkins, catching sight of the scowling face in the mirror, judged silence to be the safest, if not the best reproof, and presently bowed out the offender with a dignity worthy of his noble name.

Up to the age of three-and-twenty, then, Roland had been happy. Then there befell the one great event of his life—he fell in love. Not with saucy Miss Jackworthy, whose bold black eyes flashed many a bid for admiration at the customers as they passed through the shop, or lounged over the counter, paying for a smile the price of half-a-dozen bottles of Jackworthy's Marvellous Trichopoietic Fluid, done up neatly in pink wrappers with a yellow slip inside, whereon was set forth in six different languages the virtues of the persuasive compound, together with a couple of illustrations, showing how a bald-headed young man, after using three bottles, became the proud possessor of a head of hair which a Papuan might be excused for envying.

Not with the fair face of Arabella Morl, whose father was in the drapery line round the corner, and who three times at least every year announced in his plate glass window "Great Sale of Remnant Stock! Must be Cleared at any Sacrifice! Bargains! Bargains!"

Not with Miss Leonora de Vancy, on whose charms, ample enough, and displayed in anything but a niggard fashion, Mr. Perkins was accustomed to gaze without a touch of emotion in the music hall where, after the shop was shut, and he was free to come and go as he liked, he was occasionally wont to forget the labours of the day.

No, not to any of these did the great heart of Roland yield, but to—I must out with it—to the Lady Maud Ellanton, the daughter of his Grace the Duke of Marlshire! Yes, there it is in plain English, and you may smile at it, laugh at it if you will; but it is true.

It was soon over, this first and last passion of Roland Perkins, and it came about in this wise. One night a belated customer, hurrying from the saloon, left behind him an old book, which Mr. Perkins, noticing, carried to his room for safety. After supper he dipped into its pages, where, among a number of quaint tales, he read with deep attention of the story of his namesake, the type of knightly chivalry, Charlemagne's great paladin, Roland. A fanciful account, no doubt, but one which absorbed the reader, and gave to the name he bore and had learnt to detest a new interest and fascination.

Digitized by Google

"I must learn more about this chap," said the little hairdresser to himself, and accordingly, one day—a holiday—he refused the offer of a drive with Miss Morl and her brother, and found his way instead to the British Museum.

Arrived there, the astonished attendant found for him the literature which Mr. Perkins in his ignorance could but lamely ask for, and far into the afternoon he read the legends of the great king. True, many of his first illusions were dispelled by the hard facts of history, but these he put aside, and clung to the romance which the sweet singers of old time had woven round his hero—his very own, his namesake.

As he walked homewards in the gathering darkness, Roland's step was light and springy, his head was held high, his eyes shone, and his whole being was aglow with a new and entirely pleasureable excitement.

In that one afternoon the young man's horizon had widened immensely, the great book of the glorious past had been opened for him, and as he turned its glowing pages his heart grew hot within him to think that this magnificent heritage was his, his own imperishable possession.

Life held now a deeper and a sweeter meaning; he was no hero, it might never be his to play a hero's part, but he bore a hero's name, and that, he vowed, should be rescued from the limbo to which he had ignorantly consigned it, and set like a jewel in his cap, plain for all folk to see.

As Roland drew near Mr. Jackworthy's house, which adjoined the shop, he saw that estimable man standing at the door, gazing anxiously up and down the street, and as he perceived his assistant approaching he uttered an exclamation of satisfaction.

"Ah, Perkins," said he, "I'm glad you've come home early, for there's an important job on hand. As soon as you have had your supper you must go to the Duke of Marlshire's house to dress Lady Maud's hair for a costume ball. Mr. Poulter"—the second assistant—"usually goes there, but as there's no knowing when he'll be back, and the message says to be sure and send in good time, you'll have to go yourself."

"Very good, sir," answered Mr. Perkins; and, his supper finished, he set out, somewhat excited at being thus suddenly introduced into the mansions of the great—a privilege hitherto monopolised by Mr. Poulter—yet at the same time confident in his skill as an artist, and rejoicing at the opportunity to display it. Had he known; could he have foreseen, perhaps—but he did not know, he could not foresee, and so he went.

Arrived at the great house, Mr. Perkins was shown into a room, where he waited patiently for the appearance of the lady. The day had been a fatiguing one for Roland, unaccustomed to pore over musty tomes, and his brain was already tired with the weight of its newly-acquired store of knowledge, which coursed through it in a strange, fantastic jumble of fact and fancy. How long he waited he never knew, but presently, as he sat in a chair before the cheval glass, Mr. Perkins' head drooped forward on his chest, the curling tongs slipped from his hand to the floor, and he dropped heavily asleep.

He awoke with a start. To his dazed eyes, only half opened, the mirror and his own sordid reflection therein were invisible, and he looked, or thought he looked upon an apparition from another world, so exquisitely beautiful in his opinion was the face at which he gazed, so lustrous, so angelic were the soft, kind eyes which looked into his own.

In one moment, however, the dream faded and reality took its place, and with many stammering apologies the sleeper rose to his feet. But that moment had done its fatal work, and Roland Perkins, lifted in spirit by his afternoon researches into a sphere infinitely removed from that of his commonplace, every-day existence, fell bound, metaphorically, hand and foot before the charms of the Lady Maud. Fell into love so passionate, so wild, so hopeless, that only the sublime pathos of it saved it from being supremely ridiculous.

Down sat Lady Maud, all unconscious of the havoc she had wrought, graciously supposing, and even condescending to inquire if the hairdresser had had a hard day's work. But Roland was mute, and with his eyes resolutely turned from the mirror, and bent upon the fair head before him, he went deftly and swiftly on with his task.

His eyes . . . bent upon the fair head before him.

Only at last, when it neared completion, he raised his head, and forced himself to look. In an instant his brain swam, and his senses took temporary leave of him. He was intoxicated, mad, and from his dry lips escaped an inarticulate sound, so curious in its intonation, that Lady Maud glanced swiftly at his face in the glass, there to encounter a look so wild, so agonised, and withal so terrified at its own temerity, that she stared back aghast, only to drop her eyes a moment later and smile complacently at this visible effect of her marvellous beauty.

Digitized by Google

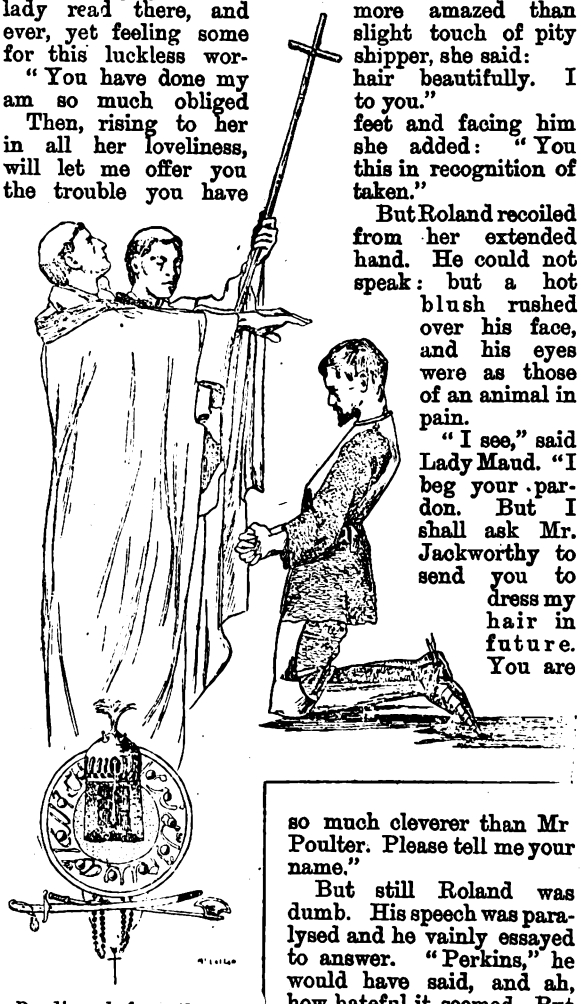
Presently she looked again, and still Roland, forgetful of everything else, gazed at her face in the mirror. But now his expression was changed. Dumb misery, hopeless longing, patient submission to the inevitable the lady read there, and more amazed than ever, yet feeling some slight touch of pity for this luckless wor- shipper, she said: "You have done my hair beautifully. I am so much obliged to you."

Then, rising to her feet and facing him in all her loveliness, she added: "You will let me offer you this in recognition of the trouble you have taken."



Bending before the priestly benediction.

But Roland recoiled from her extended hand. He could not speak: but a hot blush rushed over his face, and his eyes were as those of an animal in pain.

"I see," said Lady Maud. "I beg your pardon. But I shall ask Mr. Jackworthy to send you to dress my hair in future. You are so much cleverer than Mr Poulter. Please tell me your name."

But still Roland was dumb. His speech was paralysed and he vainly essayed to answer. "Perkins," he would have said, and ah, how hateful it seemed. But not a word would come, suddenly his tongue was loosened, and unable to control himself, impelled by a force he could neither comprehend nor resist, he drew up his form, while from his astonished lips burst the words: "Roland de Ronrcesvalles!"

Not less astounded was Lady Maud. For one brief minute she stared at the sorry figure before her, and then, as she buried her face in her handkerchief, peal after peal of irrepressible laughter broke from her. When she raised her head again she was alone.

Out into the night sped Roland, shame on his brow and rage in his heart. Where he went he never cared, but his feet intuitively bore him to his home, where, throwing himself upon his bed, he tossed and turned all through the most miserable night he had ever known.

Too unlearned to be able to analyse his thoughts, too unused to deep emotions to divine his own disease, he only suffered, suffered as an animal under the torture of an undeserved lash. A sense of burning shame oppressed him that he should be as he was, mingled with a fierce longing to be he knew not what. And at last towards morning he fell asleep and dreamt. And who shall say whence came his dream?

Spread out upon a far extending plain glittered the spear head of a great army, awaiting the shock of battle. Anon it came. Arms clashed, and mailed forms were hurled bleeding and dying to the dust, while myriads of arrows, hurtling through the air, drank deep of the hearts' blood of knight and squire, with little care for high or low degree.

On the one side the fair faces of the Franks; on the other the dark-visaged Moslem host. Christian or Islam—which will gain the day? Now one side, now the other surges forward, only to reel back shattered before the impenetrable phalanx opposed to it. But slowly, surely the turbaned hosts press on.

The Christians waver—recoil—fly. No, not yet. Out from among them bursts with sudden fury a knight. Superbly mounted, in splendid armour, of firm stature and exalted mien, he spurs to the front, his drawn sword dripping with blood. It is enough! At mere sight of him the Christians gain new courage, and once again their faces are turned towards the foe. "A Roland! A Roland!" is the cry from a thousand throats, and backwards, ever backwards, the Moslem torrent is swept, wave rolling back on wave, the dying piled upon the dead, till over all the banner of the victors waves, and above that scene of hate and carnage rises supreme the peaceful cross of Christ.

And now once more the shout is borne upon the air, long and loud. "A Roland! A Roland!" and bending before the priestly benediction, the knight of Blaives bares his stately head, tossing to his squire his shattered casque and dented shield, and then, as he lifts his eyes to heaven, wonder of wonders, the dreamer beholds his own face! His own face glorified, transfigured, ennobled a thousand times, but still his own, and with a shout of mingled terror and triumph he awoke.

"Perkins," said Mr. Jackworthy, as they sat at breakfast, "you must have done uncommonly well last night, for there's a note come this morning asking me to send you back again to-night to dress Lady Maud's hair."

"It must be Mr. Poulter that's wanted," answered poor Roland, shivering slightly at the recollection of what he had endured.

"Not at all," said his master; "it's you. The note says to be very particular to send the same young man who was there yesterday. It's you, right enough."

"Very well, sir," replied Mr. Perkins; "I'll attend to the order." And pushing away his plate, he rose to begin the business of the day.

All through the long morning and afternoon he went about his work mechanically, but his thoughts were far away, and in spirit he fought once more that glorious fight, or rode in joust and tourney, while over all and watching all, holding for him the crown of victory, smiled the queen of beauty; and her face was the face of Lady Maud.

At length the weary day came to an end, and Roland set out once more for the Duke's mansion, and presently he stood again in her ladyship's room, his heart thumping against his side, and that dry feeling about his mouth and throat which he had experienced the night before. All in a moment Lady Maud stood before him, and then the memory of his shame overcame him, and he hung his head in agony.

Digitized by Google

Lady Maud, however, sat down without a word, and the hairdresser began his task. Only when it was completed and he turned to go, she rose and faced him.

"I was very rude to you last night, Mr——"

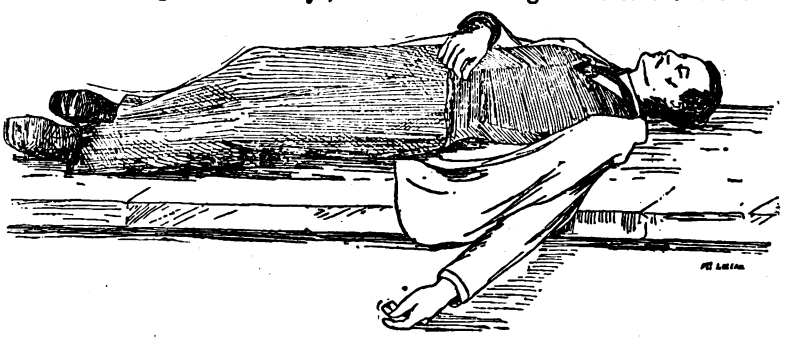
"Perkins," he interrupted hurriedly. "And don't name it, my lady. I made a fool of myself. I had been reading—and I was tired—I forgot—I—I——" he stammered, and hung his head again.

"And I hurt your feelings, Mr. Perkins," said Lady Maud. "Believe me, I did not mean to do so. Will you forgive me?"

Roland cast one swift glance at her lovely face, lit with a tender smile in which was no suggestion of derision, and then with a grace no one could have suspected in him, he sank upon his knee, and lifting the hem of her gown to his lips, pressed a passionate kiss upon it, and before she could recover from her surprise, had hurried from the house.

For a moment Lady Maud stood perfectly still. Then she smiled: then she laughed a light little laugh. "Poor fellow!" she said softly to herself, and descended to her carriage.

How it came about no one could exactly say, but coachman and footman were flung different ways, and lay stunned and bleeding on the road, while the splendid horses, mad with terror, dashed along, dragging behind them the carriage with its light burden, Lady Maud and her mother. The Duchess shrieked, but Lady Maud sat still, with white, set features and lips compressed, as, leaning forward a little, she waited for the end.



It came. Out from the throng of horrified onlookers on the pavement dashed a man, and hurled himself at the horses' heads. Kicking, plunging, rearing, they bore that clinging figure along with them in their wild career.

But the man's arms were strong, and the heart in him was big, and ere the willing hands that rushed to help could do aught, the horses were checked, and the danger was past. But, even in the very moment of victory the near horse lashed out his iron-shod hoofs.

There was a dull, sickening crash, and the brave rescuer fell headlong to the ground just as a couple of stalwart policemen grasped the reins, and forced the trembling horses to a standstill.

Then, while the Duchess lay moaning on the cushions, Lady Maud opened the carriage door and stepped out.

"Who stopped them?" she inquired, then she saw and recognised the prostrate figure, and rushed with a little cry to his side.

"He's done for, poor chap," said a bystander. But Lady Maud paid no heed to the words, as, kneeling there in the dusty street, she raised the head of her deliverer and pillowed it against her breast, her hot tears falling thick and fast upon him.

Slowly the eyes of the stricken man opened. His face was fat and square and commonplace, but a smile that transfigured it to the likeness of the knight of his dream played for one instant over it.

"My Lady!" was all he said, and in that supreme moment, leaving the transfiguring smile upon the dead lips, the spirit of Roland Perkins took its flight.

REGINALD HORSLEY.

Jumbled Story Competition.—28.

ON page 106 appears a story, each line of which is numbered. The lines are all in their wrong position, and the prizes mentioned below are offered to those who write on a sheet of paper the numbers of the lines in the order most nearly correct. The title is jumbled up, and should be correctly given and pasted on the paper containing the effort.

The conditions are jumbled in the following paragraph as an example. The correct order of the lines is given in line 10.

1 SHORT STORIES on or before Monday,
2 awarded to the readers whose solutions first
3 JUMBLED STORY.
4 Four Prizes—one of £5 and three of £1 each—are
5 January 25th, and envelopes must be marked
6 correct. In the event of a tie, the prizes will be
7 reach this office.
8 All attempts to be delivered at the offices of 9 offered to the readers whose keys are most nearly 10 4—9—6—2—7—8—1—5—3—12—11—13—10.
11 a sheet of paper the figures in the order they
12 Competitors in doing the story should write on 13 believe to be correct, thus:

£400 IN CASH PRIZES.

£100 is offered to the reader who collects the greatest number of coupons from Short Stories and Pearson's Weekly.

Another £100 to the reader who collects from Home Notes.

Another £100 to the newsagent who collects from Short Stories and Pearson's Weekly.

Another £100 to the newsagent who collects from Home Notes.

Readers must not collect newsagents' coupons, and they should lump Short Stories and P. W. coupons together. Home Notes coupons are to be collected separately.

ONE HUNDRED POUNDS FOR A WEEK'S WORK.

HUNDREDS OF CONSOLATION PRIZES WILL BE GIVEN.

No Coupons are to be sent to us until Jan. 1st, 1898.

Digitized by Google

JUMBLED STORY No. 28.] [See Page 105.

HE THEN BIT GOTTODS.

Dorminster was driving his phaeton in the park, this he did not seem to mind—probably because men, as will be seen, are as obstinate as women.

He swung the greys round, and turned back.

"You brutes," he said, punishing them with the sweetest, girlish face in all the world.

For an instant this charming sight was flashed with his sister at his side. The greys were fresh things, you know, from a distance, and he fascinated an Indian, or a Zulu in war-paint, Society found him away. Dorminster pulled them in savagely.

At the time Dorminster was a pet of Society.

With a great cry Dorminster sprang forward, remarking that he was going to shut himself in his confound——"

"Good gracious," said his sister, "I thought you darted through the canvas, the picture fell in two, that it was not wise to bolt away from pretty faces.

A clever artist, with hair artistically long, young, blue eyes, and a laughing mouth. Dorminster took him with a rush past Lady Orchadson's carriage. He half turned in his seat to try and put in driving performance with merry eyes, and the whip, "why can't you behave yourselves, when your brother falls in love with your greatest distingué, although perhaps not so interesting as she had never existed. And the greys learnt again the reins, "her daughter, her carriage, her footmen, on his brain; then the greys bolted again and drew his bow, and then—why, then his eyes fell on the girl alone behind the canvas, and a moment later she's gone."

The girl was leaning on the rails, watching his girl friend, and considers his case as hopeless.

So Dorminster and his sister—always "His girl for whom I would give my life, my art, everything that I possess, to have one glance from. You and her pug dog may be swallowed up in the frankest of laughs on her lips.

On the way back he was silent and moody, only his lips were near to hers, and she—well, she obeyed him interesting enough.

"Did you see the girl leaning on the railings, and clear away a pile of pictures and costumes, and to introduce you."

"Such a dear creature," said hostesses, "so very like you. How do I know that he really loves you? Dorminster came in. He threw his hat in a corner, and folding his arms, looked sadly at the picture, and the face was the face of the canvas brought to life. He set a piece of canvas on it, and began to draw.

"Whatever is the matter," cried his sister, "were I knew you."

The girl had disappeared as completely as though everyone but Lady Orchadson didn't want him to make space for a large easel that he drew forward.

"Lady Orchadson," said Dorminster, pulling at some new paints."

"Come," she cried, "quick, I want to show you the girl whom I love, the girl whom I worship, the sister," in spite of brains and beauty—were to be with would-be mothers-in-law.

In his studio, Dorminster began feverishly to have them at our next reception."

"Let's get away from this horrid crowd," said her friend, and did the best thing that she could downstairs to her visitor.

Lady Orchadson, for instance, arranged that he betrayed her. "Well, I will confess to you, dear. I have heard of her."

"And who may she be," inquired the visitor in laughing at us as we rushed past?" said Dorminster, "and go home."

Downstairs his sister was laughing over the events that morning, and absorbed his attention. They may see her for two minutes while I go out to buy the door.

She went to her brother's studio, and knocked at the picture. There! isn't it lovely? And exactly me immensely. But that was long ago, and before he comes back and looks at it, just put your knife and a girl's face looked timidly up at him—"I am dying to see him."

A girl's face appeared on the canvas; just a girl's charming, and his sister—so handsome, we must face, looking up to you, with a suggestion of merry studio, and was not to be disturbed. At which his sister knew that he had been saved at least from what is the best thing to do. Quick, he's coming!"

"I will write to her," said the sister, "and ask her of the morning. It is something to be amused at his art, to have one glance from you. Test him? you so very anxious to see the Orchadsons?"

She sent the letter by the first post, and two days worked on this with infinite care and skill, pausing later the fair unknown, that Dorminster had seen with your brother. I saw him at exhibitions and should meet her daughter on every occasion, and that at one time I fancied myself very much in love to come for a fortnight, and then—we shall see."

"How is the interesting brother," she asked. Well, I will tell you what he said. He said that he for one fatal moment, came to the house.

"Oh, impossible," cried the girl. Yet her blush met at all the best houses. He was overwhelmed down into her eyes. Then he bent his head, until he's fallen in love with. He won't see anyone."

He took his hat, and went out. His sister ran through, and slit it, down and across, and let him knife, and stand behind the picture—so—and when would give up everything that he possesses, even one mother-in-law.

"He's very busy painting a picture of a girl whom were in love in that quarter."

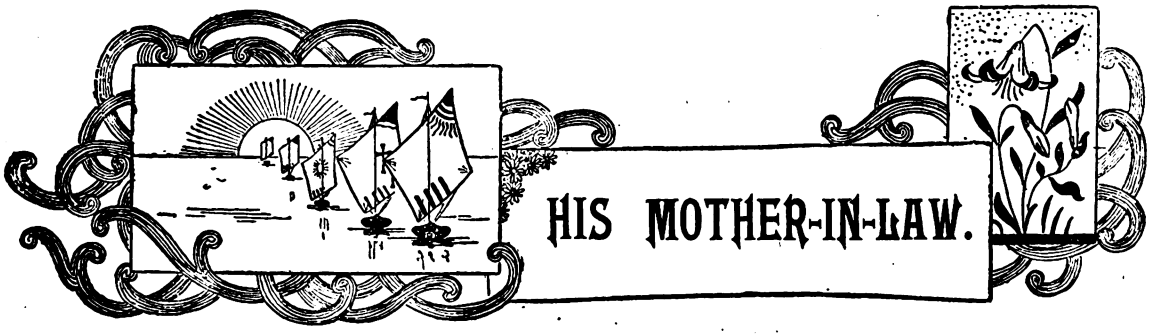
"I will fetch him down," said the other, "and see your genuine face behind it. Then you will see all innocence. "Oh, that Orchadson girl, I suppose. My dear girl, that's easy enough. Take this palate do—surrendered to him.

She darted from the room, leaving the trembling Dorminster. "I am in love with her. And now marry the girl. For in matters of this description sighing heavily. Suddenly the blade of a knife and took the girl's face in his hands, and gazed only to mix new paints.

"It is you," said the sister slowly.

"Come in," cried Dorminster, "come in and see bowels of the earth for all that I care."

Digitized by Google



HIS MOTHER-IN-LAW.

MRS. BULPER was a very remarkable lady. Whenever her name was mentioned it invariably produced a series of little shudders. Yet none of her friends absolutely disliked her.

When she was present they would smile on her affectionately, and listen to her utterances with respectful attention; they even came to her for advice—for Mrs. Bulper was a lady of great knowledge and experience—and were always ready to declare that "anything she didn't know wasn't worth knowing." Yet no sooner was she out of sight than the manner of her friends would undergo a most surprising change. They would draw a deep, inward breath, raise their eyes, shake their heads, and murmur "Gorgon," "Vampire," and declare in whispers that Mrs. Bulper chilled them to the very marrow of their bones.

When a lady is pronounced by her friends to be a "Gorgon" and a "Vampire," it must be evident to the meanest capacity that she must differ in many ways from the rest of her sex.

Mrs. Bulper was unlike the majority of married women in two respects. First, she was always changing her husbands; and, secondly, she was always changing her furniture and other belongings.

This requires explanation. Mrs. Bulper had buried four husbands, notwithstanding which another gentleman was forthcoming who was willing to give this much married woman his name and provide her with board and clothing. Mr. Bulper made her fifth. All the other husbands had expressed their entire satisfaction with the lady's behaviour during their lifetime and testified to the sedulous attention she had bestowed on them during their last illness.

Yet the breath was scarcely out of their bodies before the relict began to look about for a successor. It will hardly be believed but she was scarcely thirty when her fourth husband died. She then remained a widow for nearly eighteen months, and at the end of that time began to entertain the most gloomy anticipations as to the future. She did not ascribe her failure to secure another partner to any decrease in her personal attractions, for Mrs. Bulper was one of those compact little women whose bright grey eyes and healthy skin defy the ravages of time.

Furthermore she had borne her bereavements remarkably well, and the doctor's certificate silenced the voice of calumny. No, it was neither to the finger of time nor to the voice of slander she attributed this prolonged widowhood.

It was simply the result of over competition. The market was glutted with widows.

Still, for all her gloomy prediction, she managed to hook a fresh fish. The lady had a snug little income of her own, and this fact became known to Mr. Bulper, who was on the look-out for a lady so situated.

The gentleman had no weaknesses or superstitions of any kind, and being absolutely devoid of fear led the lady to the altar. One child, christened Rosie, was the result of this union, a soft-eyed, flaxen-haired creature who grew into a very pretty woman and won, when she was about eighteen, the hand and heart of Mr. John Clayton, a prosperous young stockbroker living in London.

Deeply attached to his child, Mr. Bulper, after her departure, spent so much of his time at the club that Mrs. Bulper looked round for some relaxation, and soon found in bartering and exchanging an amusement quite to her taste.

She took in all the exchange papers and studied them with as much intentness as a betting man bestows on the current odds. This new taste soon developed into a positive craze. If she bought a black silk dress one week, she was sure to exchange it for a brown one the next. The sealskin jacket was parted with for a carpet, her hearthrug for a coal scuttle, her gold watch for a sideboard, and her own sideboard for an oil-painting.

She worked at this hobby with such indefatigable energy that the changes in her home rivalled the changes in a kaleidoscope. It never presented the same appearance two weeks running. Fresh things were constantly coming in to replace those going out.

When quietude reigned among her furniture, she turned her attention to her husband, with the result that he frequently sallied forth in the evening arrayed in garments which a day or two before had been worn by someone else, although the gentleman was too engrossed by his club to pay much heed to his wife's doings.

Even when on retiring to rest one evening, he found the bed so high that he had to climb in with the aid of a chair, and the next night, not being able to find the matches, undressed, and, mounting the chair in the dark, stepped into space and came down heavily. He only swore a little, and presently forgot all about it.

The fact was, that he didn't care a brass farthing about his wife's hobby. She couldn't exchange the house for another without his knowing it. He knew the knocker, was familiar with the number, and that was enough for him.

After his death it transpired that he owed quite a large sum of money, and an execution being put in the house, Mrs. Bulper had to move into lodgings, where she quickly found it was not considered legal to exchange and barter without the consent of the owner, which in this case, being the landlady, was not forthcoming. Thus circumstanced she fell back on her own belongings, and, after she had exchanged everything she possessed in the world for something else, suddenly remembered she had a daughter, and that she was well married and moved a good deal in society.

Digitized by Google

Who could tell? Why, she might be able to secure another partner. True she had had a surfeit of husbands, but she disliked a solitary life, and soon convinced herself that even the society of a fresh mate would be preferable to the solitude of the widow. So when Rosie came to her husband one day with tears in her pretty eyes, saying:

"Oh, Jack, dear, poor papa is dead, and the shock has so prostrated mamma that she hasn't been able to write to me before; and she is all alone in the world, Jack, and quite broken down with grief; and there is the spare bedroom, dear, which is always being used by your friend Mr. Yardley, whom you know I never liked, and she will leave us, dear, as soon as she gets over the blow."

Jack hummed and hawed a good deal. He didn't like the idea of a woman who had had five husbands residing in his house, but when Rosie hinted that Mr. Yardley was coming too often and that he stared at her when Jack was not looking, he consented, and the next day Mrs. Bulper received an invitation from her son-in-law, and immediately began preparing for her departure.

Jack had sent his invitation with some misgivings. He knew nothing practically of mothers-in-law, except from the types presented in novels and farcical comedies, but it was better to have the relict of five dead husbands occupying the spare bedroom, than a fellow who stared at one's wife when the husband wasn't looking.

In a few days Mrs. Bulper arrived with a great number of boxes, containing a most miscellaneous assortment of things. She was delighted with her son-in-law, enraptured with her grandchildren, but not quite so sure that the house was furnished in good taste.

Rosie, who was not as yet aware of her mother's recent developments, was alarmed.

"Why, mamma, dear, Jack and I purchased everything together, and were most careful."

"Very likely, my dear," rejoined her mother; "but you must remember you are both very inexperienced, while I—well I have had more than one home, as you know, therefore I must know something about how one's house should look. This drawing-room suite is very handsome, I admit, but the blue in the carpet kills it, positively kills it."

Rosie looked startled, but realised in the course of a few weeks that all such defects as "bad contrast," "want of harmony," "doesn't blend well," were to be remedied.

Before Mrs. Bulper had been in the house a month she had thoroughly imbued her daughter with her own ideas.

Rosie had always loved our spring or autumn sales, where everything is sold at a reduction, but purchases even at a sale were expensive, whereas in exchange and bartering the excitement was just as great, and the expense nothing. But it behoved them to be cautious. Jack liked his home and belongings, and had pronounced them "deuced cosy," and he had rather a masterful way about him when angered, so Mrs. Bulper, with the skill of an old hand, rearranged the rooms one by one, leaving those which Jack used to be dealt with last. The two ladies thoroughly enjoyed themselves. Bartering was a new sensation to Rosie and an indispensable one to her mother. Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays they devoted to inspecting the goods of other people. Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays they remained at home to exhibit their own.

One Wednesday evening they missed a train at Finchley, whither they had gone to inspect some bed-linen which the owner was willing to exchange for several dozen of Jack's old claret, a very fine wine. When that gentleman knocked at his street door that evening he noticed that the servant who admitted him was a new-comer. This, however, did not surprise him, for since the day when things began to be daily moved out for other things to be brought in, servants had been exchanged as often as the furniture. Jack started slightly as he hung up his hat. He did not recognise the hall lamp, and he could have sworn his umbrella stand had had a plate glass back. There was no plate glass in the one he was looking at. Then he went into the sitting-room, looked round for a moment, beat a hasty retreat, and regained the street.

"I must have gone in next door," he murmured, but no, there was his number. What did it all mean? He rubbed his eyes; yes, it was his house, so he knocked again and was re-admitted by the same servant, who eyed him suspiciously and asked if his name was Clayton. With a sinking heart he went over the house. All the old things were gone. Carpets, furniture, curtains, pier glasses, all new—well, they were not exactly new, but they were new to him. Then a thought struck him, and he went into his study. His oak escritoire was gone. In its place reposed a mahogany one. Thick drops of perspiration stood upon his brow. There were a number of letters in the top drawer which he had intended to destroy years before. He realised in a moment that his wife had bartered it away. He also remembered seeing the newspapers devoted to that branch of commerce lying about the house. The lady who had his desk would, of course, find a key to unlock that drawer, and after reading the letters, would return them—not to him, he knew the sex too well for that—but to his wife.

They were letters he had received before his marriage. It was all through that old "Bluebeard." He had been a fool to let her in the house at all.

Presently the ladies returned, and a pretty scene ensued. Jack kept his temper till he ascertained the address of the lady who had his escritoire, and then he let out. He gave Mrs. Bulper to understand that she might change her husbands as frequently as she pleased, but she shouldn't change his furniture. Finally, he declared that he hated the look of the place, and should spend the rest of the evening at his club. But he did not go to his club; he drove straight to the address he had secured and recovered the letters. While he was tearing them into pieces on his journey home, he had time to consider his position.

His mother-in-law must go, he was determined on that. Rosie hadn't been the same woman since her mother had been in the house. If it hadn't been for that lie of Rosie's he wouldn't have had her there at all. He had spoken to Mr. Yardley about looking so earnestly at his wife, and he had denied it. He didn't want a row. Mrs. Bulper was a sensible woman, and would listen to reason, so that evening he broached his plan.

"Lor', mamma," exclaimed Rosie, horror-stricken, "you surely wouldn't marry again."

"My dear," said her husband philosophically, "your mamma has looked so happy since her bereavement, that I can see she realises that widowhood is not without its advantages."

Digitized by Google

"I'm afraid you're right," sighed the much-married woman.

"Of course I am," continued Jack, "when one is a widow one knows where one's husband is, but when one of yours was alive I will bet you didn't."

"You speak truly," replied Mrs. Bulper solemnly; "from first to last I never knew how Mr. Wallace, my second husband—no, he was my third—spent his evenings."

"But," returned Jack, "I think it my duty to inform you that anyone whose life is associated with the figure five is certain, according to statistics in my possession, to fall a victim to some dreadful calamity. Therefore, I say, sooner than deprive Rosie of a mother, marry once more for the sake of your only child."

Mrs. Bulper quite understood the drift of all this, and when a few days later Jack gave a party to which none but bachelors were invited, she exerted herself to the utmost, and gushed and frisked about in the style which had been so successful before. Jack's friends thought her a very nice sort of woman, so they said, but they eyed her with the same sort of curious look one assumes when gazing at a showman's bearded lady or tattooed man. They drank Jack's whisky and smoked his cigars, but they wouldn't have married the mother if she had been worth a million. They knew all about the five husbands. Jack had often spoken of them and made all sorts of jokes on the subject.

There was one gentleman, however, a Mr. Harryman, who was willing to make the sixth. Mr. Harryman was not well off, being only the transfer clerk in a South African Gold Mining Company which might pay 50 per cent. dividend this year and be in liquidation the next. Mrs. Bulper discovered this, and refused him. Jack was greatly annoyed, and spoke very sharply on the subject to his mother-in-law, and another scene took place.

"You must really understand, Mr. Clayton," cried the widow, "that when I promised to marry again I did not promise to marry anybody. I'm not of a speculative turn of mind where husbands are concerned. In addition, though not an old woman, I do not care to marry a man who may be years before he gets into a good position. Find me a husband who can keep me in comfort, never mind his age, and never mind his health, but mark, he musn't drink or gamble, and he must have a good income."

"You won't find him on this planet," groaned Jack, "I should advise you to travel."

"Travel at mamma's time of life," cried Rosie. "No, you'll stay with me, won't you, dear?" and then the two women embraced and mingled their tears while Jack walked out of the room speechless with rage.

In a few days the ladies felt their courage revive, and things came in and things went out as before. One day there would be an easy chair for Jack and the next there wouldn't. He was constantly missing articles of wearing apparel, and on one occasion found himself putting on a pair of trousers much too small for him. He flung them out of the window.

Small wonder that he was constantly quarrelling with his mother-in-law, who invariably found an ally in his wife, who had now lost that tender shyness of manner which had constituted her great charm in Jack's eyes. The soft persuasive tones were gone. In a word the timid, retiring creature had been transformed into a hard business woman.

"Thank God," groaned Jack, "the children are all right. She hasn't been able to infect them."

But at dinner one Sunday—he never dined at home now, except on Sundays—a thrill of horror went right through him, a dull despair settled on his faculties when he saw his eldest boy, Guy, exchange a piece of his Yorkshire pudding for a piece of his sister's meat. Jack said nothing, but the look he gave his mother-in-law boded ill for that lady.

Jack Clayton was no fool. He was a member of the Stock Exchange, where simplicity and innocence are unknown qualities. Mrs. Bulper had chosen to match her wits against his, and she must take the consequences.

A few evenings after a Mr. Pilsby, an old friend of Jack's father, called. Jack introduced him to the ladies, but did not treat his guest with any great cordiality, admitting, after he had gone, that he had never liked the man. "He is, however, very well off, and has a lot of property, besides being part owner in a vessel of enormous tonnage."

Mrs. Bulper pricked up her ears as she heard this, and received Mr. Pilsby the next time he called with marked impressement.

This seemed to greatly anger Jack, who confided to his wife that it was shameful of her mother to lure the old idiot on for the sake of his money. This was, of course, repeated to the lady, who redoubled her attentions.

Mr. Pilsby was not a pleasant gentleman to look at. He was small and mean in person, his skin was yellow and shrivelled, and his general appearance savoured of what is known as grimy. But he was part owner of a vessel of enormous tonnage.

"You are sure of that," she asked Jack one day.

"Quite," was that gentleman's reply.

Mr. Pilsby was ardent, and the lady was not shy. The gentleman proposed, was modestly accepted, and a few weeks later, to the delight of Jack, his father's old friend led his mother-in-law to the altar. The honeymoon was spent at Broadstairs, in the retirement of which place she had leisure to study the character of her new mate. Being a woman of experience she soon probed her new partner to his uttermost depths. The result filled her with the profoundest misgivings. On her return to town she had him watched, and presently discovered the whole truth. She had been tricked.

Jack was smoking his pipe one evening in placid contentment, watching his wife, who had now resumed her former self, and promised to barter no more, when Mrs. Pilsby entered, dragging her husband after her.

"Rosie, your husband is a villain," screamed the infuriated woman. "I have been and married his clerk."

"Well," said Jack coolly, "he is none the worse for that."

"But you told me he was part owner of a vessel of enormous tonnage."

"So he is. Aren't you, Pilsby?" said Jack sturdily.

"I believe so, sir."

"I don't believe it," shrieked his wife. "Prove it!"

"Go on," said his employer, "prove it."

Mr. Pilsby then took from his pocket a small piece of wood which he handed to his wife. It was well varnished, and attached to it was a label on which was written: "This piece of wood is a portion of the Royal George."

ARTHUR GOODRICH.

Digitized by Google

Or, THE ROMANCE OF A LOST CONTINENT.

By GEO. C. WALLIS, Author of "The Winning of Gunhild," etc.

CHAPTER XXIX.

"SUNDERER'S" LAST STROKE.

THE arrow sped from my bow, driven by the full force of a strong bow and a lusty arm, but my aim was hurried and shaken by the sudden rush of men, and, missing the Princess by a hand-span, the shaft was fixed, quivering, in the mainmast of her ship. She laughed a little, bidding one of her men draw it forth, and placed it in the dainty quiver that hung from her ivory-white shoulders.

I soon had my hands too full of work to follow her further movements, for her men were many and well armed, and by a cunning stratagem had divided our force in two, thus holding us at a disadvantage. Valdo and Atris were together in the stern, defending the cabin-way, whilst Orlanis, Penares, and myself were cooped up in the fore of the ship with a dozen men only.

But I never lost heart when "Sunderer" flamed before me, and right vigorously I played upon the heads and arms of the foe with its shining blade.

Though I had not had good practice with it for many years, I found that my hand retained its cunning, and the wild joy of fierce encounter came back to me with all its first freshness. So terribly I smote and slashed and cut and pierced with its keen razor edge, shearing alike through armour and shield and head-piece, that the enemy drew back a space, fighting at respectful distance, and trusting to the heavy rain of arrows from their own ship to bring me down, as it had brought seven of my men.

Presently, however, the attack closed in again, and the galling shower of missiles ceased, lest it should do equal damage to friend and foe, and in the forefront of the boarders came the Lord Dison, whom I had last seen at the Court of Listra, when I sent him sprawling on the ground for his insolence.

He was a stalwart soldier, though he carried a sinister face, and I saw that his teeth were set, and his eyes blazed with the fury of a pent-up passion. He used a great, broad blade, heavy and short, and excelled in swordcraft.

"Ha! Dison!" I cried, that I might, by enraging him, disturb the calm that a soldier should always bear, "thinkest to touch me with that clumsy flesher's knife? Hast forgotten my skill in the palmy days of old?"

"Not I," he answered, drawing nearer and waiting for a chance to dash upon me, "nor have I forgotten thy cowardly boastings. But for the fair Princess I had then done with thee what I must needs do now. How likest that, turncoat?"

His ugly weapon shot forward and upward, cutting a long gash across my chest, which but for my springing backwards sharply would have been my death.

"As much as thou relishest that!" I retorted, parrying his second stroke, and passing "Sunderer's" keen edge across his left shoulder, and unnerving his arm so that the shield fell clanging to the deck. Then we parried and cut, and slashed and pierced, and rattled blade on blade in right good earnest, till the fight around us ceased, and men stood to watch us as the fire flashed from our whirling swords.

I never thought that mortal man could stand against my skill so long as did this man, but I was weak from hunger and thirst and distraught with sorrow and anxiety besides, whilst he was fat with good living and strove for a stern revenge.

Long and savagely I played my steel upon him, attacking, defending, pressing him sorely with long, sweeping strokes and anon beating him back with a pitiless rain of blows which hacked his armour to shreds but tired my arms.

I got him down upon his knees once, only to let my sword slip from my grasp ere I could strike, and once he sent "Sunderer" spinning from my hand into the lee scuppers. For a moment I shook with fear; the next I closed with him so suddenly that his blade was rendered useless, and fastening my iron grip upon his throat, came nigh to pressing the life out of him.

However, I was not minded to slay him that way, so I let him go, and seizing my sword again, waited till his breath came back.

Then doggedly we set to work again, with feint and stroke and ringing of metal, but now I had the best of it, for his breath came fast and short and his arm was unsteady.

Now I toyed with him, not wasting my strength, and as I grew calmer and more confident he lost his coolness and struck at random, till, with a false motion, I threw him off his guard, and my trusty blade passed through his heart like a flash of light. He leapt up without cry or sound, then fell headlong on the deck.

"So endeth the days of the Lord Dison!" I said to the foe. "Let Nayrahn, whom I saw with him on your ship, now come forward if he wishes such an end!"

The enemy answered me with shouts of rage, and closed in upon us again, fighting more furiously than before, and the sharpshooters perched in the rigging of Listra's vessel began to gall us afresh, one accursed shaft laying Orlanis dead at my feet ere a dozen moments had passed.

I was growing warm to the work now, and, despite my scratches, made dreadful havoc in the opposing ranks, forcing them back foot by foot, till I joined hands with Valdo and Atris, who were holding their own well. United, my crew made bolder show, and encouraged by my exhortations and the loud din of strife from the windward side of Listra's ship, where Tirhak and his pirates fought, pressed the foe slowly to the bulwarks, dislodging also the few who had got foothold on our spars.

Digitized by Google

Suddenly there arose a wild cry for help from the Ravager's cabins, and a dense cloud of smoke poured up the ladderways, followed by forking tongues of fire. The deck grew hot, and the foe, startled, scrambled back to their own vessel as quickly as they could, endeavouring to cut the grapnel chains as they went.

Calling to my men to fall upon them and prevent their accomplishing their desire, I sprang to the wooden stair, and, despite the volumes of suffocating vapour, dashed down into the ship's interior. In a single glance I saw that the fire was running along the passages, and that the woodwork aft was blazing furiously, as though saturated with some inflammable liquid, and at once guessed that the foe had poured burning oil into the ship through the rowholes, unseen and unheard by us who were fighting above.

Raving bitterly at the malice of her who had caused this cowardly thing to be done, I groped my way to the cabin where Briseis was, brushed through the throng of frightened women who crowded round me, seized her in my arms and bore her to the fresh air of the deck. She was benumbed with the stifling smoke, nor recovered until I placed her against the mast and fanned her lovely face with Dison's dinted shield.

Then her sweet eyes opened slowly, resting their glance upon me, and she said:

"Now that I can see thy face, Arnon, I am content. Let me not stay thy hand from its duty."

I cannot explain why it was so, but at that speech of my Queen's, a great wave of love swept over me, sweet and thrilling as the first flush of joy felt by a favoured suitor, and kneeling down on the hot deck I placed my arms about her and pressed her willing lips to mine in a passionate caress, again and again.

"Thou art my love," she murmured softly, "but the Spirits grant that this be not our parting kiss."

Then I tore myself away, and with the help of others, brought up the women from below, only just in time to escape the fire, which had now firm hold of the ship's timbers.

Soon the flames leapt roaring up the stairway and out at the rowholes, the pitch between the boards of the deck began to boil and bubble beneath our feet, and smoke rolled in dark masses along the vessel's length.

I examined the boats, and found, as I expected, that the foe, in their brief visit, had stoven their bows in, leaving them useless as rotten logs. Our danger was pressing; we had no choice.

"On board Listra's ship with you all!" I cried, "if you do not want to be fuel for this fire! First our toughest warriors, and next we who have to carry our children and wounded. Up with you, my merry men, and see that they do not cut the linking chains. We will set her ship afire whilst we fight, and then we shall escape in Tirhak's craft. Forward with you, and no quarter!"

The brave fellows obeyed, though they numbered less than fifty now, and made their way on the foe's deck so splendidly, that, but for the ceaseless rain of arrows from her crosstrees and spars, we should have got our weak ones over safely. As it was, besides my Queen, only ten who were not grim-faced warriors placed foot on the other ship.

It was the prow we gained, and, placing our charge in such shelter as we could, we turned our faces aft and joined in the bitter fray. On Tirhak's deck the battle was still prolonged, the white-haired old pirate still heading his reckless men and seeking to cross swords with the traitor Nayrahn, who there led Listra's forces.

The rolling billows of smoke now swept across the deck to larboard, blinding our foes and giving us a moment's rest, which we utilised by binding our wounds and watching the old sea-dogs.

Presently Nayrahn met the grizzled veteran who so persistently sought him, and then their weapons flashed and rang, and their respective followers cheered them on. But the pirate, though a man of well-knit sinews and of passing toughness, was feebled with his age and weary with his previous exertion, and his eyes were not so steady as in his youth; so it was not long before the blade of the traitor did its work and found its way through the old man's heart.

Next moment the bow of Valdo bent, and a shaft flew whizzing in the air, stretching the victor lifeless at the side of his vanquished foe.

"Methinks that traitor will trouble us no more," said my officer grimly.

Now the pirates drove back the rebels to their own ship with a great rush, slaying them by scores as they ran, and leaping on board in hot pursuit, joined with us and pressed our foes slowly back into the stern. As we went forward, however, fresh men came up the cabinways to reinforce the foe, and from the pirate craft smoke and flame suddenly shot up, showing that she, too, had been fired by the rebels from below.

Our position was now precarious in the extreme, for the Ravager was already blazing like a furnace, Listra's vessel had caught fire from it, and the wind still blowing from that quarter, beat back the men who strove to cut the grappling chains or pour water on the conflagration.

Thus all three ships were ablaze on a solitary sea, and we who were on board—the sole survivors of Atlantis—instead of uniting with each other for mutual safety, were doggedly striving to spill each other's blood on the heated deck! Oh, the folly and the madness of it! and the fiendish hate of the woman who caused it all!

All told, the armed men who rallied round me now numbered seventy only, whilst the rebels mustered one hundred odd. Listra I had lost sight of for a time, but as the flames got firmer hold of the lower timbers, she appeared on deck, taking her stand in the stern, and urging on her men with madly eloquent words.

Outnumbered as we were, we still pressed on, slowly gaining ground, and heartily thankful that the clouds of smoke had dislodged the marksmen from the rigging. The roar of fierce-fanned fires was all around us now, the drifts of warm, blinding smoke swept across the deck in billows of vaporous discomfort, well-nigh taking our breaths, and causing our eyes to run with unwilling tears; and the crackling of wood and the hiss of blazing fragments falling in the sea intermingled with the cries and groans of the wounded and the shouts of the living who fought in the horrible midst.

We fought all the more desperately because we saw no hope of life or rescue when the strife was o'er; despairingly struggling as men who have resolved to sell their lives dearly if they must die, and reck not how nor whom they slay in the fever of their last moments. So continued the battle, till the sun—looming a dull, deep crimson through the dense pall that enveloped us—sloped slowly to the west, telling that it was past the hour of noon.

By then, so mercilessly had we plied our weapons, I had not a score of able followers left, and Listra had but twice as many. Yet neither band thought of yielding or asking for a truce, though the flames had seized upon the hold, and one of the hatches was a fountain spouting fire, though we could scarcely bear our feet upon the charring timbers, though some of the women shrieked aloud in their fear, and one leapt overboard in the madness of her terror.

At last, seeing her chance, the Princess commanded one half her men to fall upon us more furiously, so that we could not stir from our vantage place near the mainmast, ordering the others meanwhile to dash past us and secure our women.

Owing to their superior numbers they did this with ease, and though we gnashed our teeth with rage and strove like maddened beasts to get to their assistance, we saw our nine precious ones brought before our implacable foe.

"Bind them and throw them overboard;" said the

Digitized by Google

Princess, in tones that sounded strangely soft and low, "all but the trembling Queen. Bind her to the helm, here—so—and now to your work again."

The horrible command was executed with due dispatch, and soon we were fighting as before. Now Atris fell, slaying two foes as he went down; and Penares also sank in death with a broken blade in him. Save Valdo, who still laboured dauntlessly at my side, I was left with only five brave men. Said my grim-visaged follower, his keen eyes glittering with somewhat of their old-time brightness:

"It seemeth, King, that thou and I have yet a deed to do before we reach the Shadows!"

"Thou speakest truth, old friend," I answered, smiting down a foeman as I spoke, "and it seemeth fitting also that we should. The deed shall be the saving of my Briseis and the ending of this evil leman's ill career."

"As thou sayest," the veteran replied, unceremoniously digging an opponent in the ribs to the latter's great discomfort.

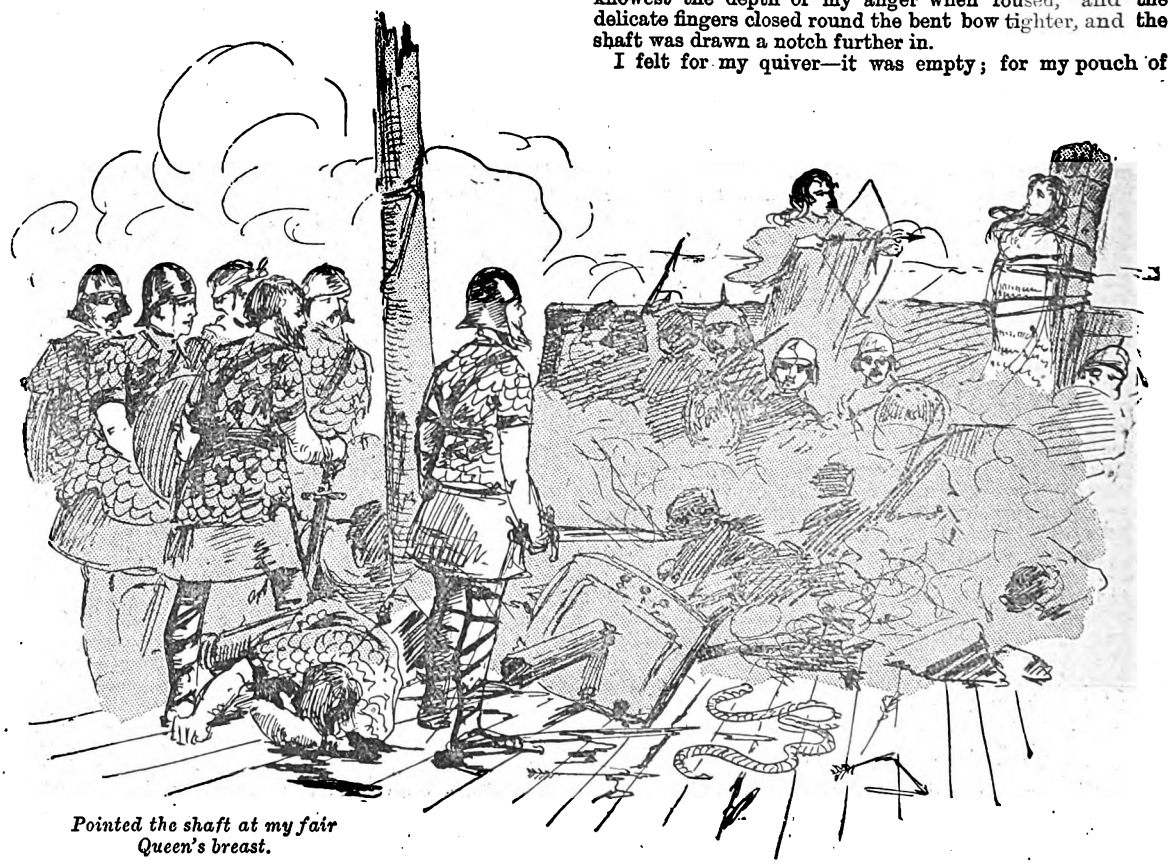
But Listra heard our talk above the din of strife and fire; for all were crowded in the stern, where was comparative safety; and suddenly bade her dozen men lower their weapons while keeping on guard between her and ourselves. Instinctively we stayed our hands also, waiting in surprise for what might next befall.

I feared the very worst as soon as I heard the silvery tones of her hateful voice and saw her cast a swift, malignant glance at Briseis; and when she drew that fateful graven arrow from her dainty quiver and fitted it to her bow with deliberate carefulness and pointed the shaft at my fair Queen's breast, I knew that the greatest sorrow that the world now held for me was hanging over me as a heavy sword suspended by a spider thread.

My heart seemed to leap within its socket, my teeth gritted, and I bit my tongue till the blood ran from my mouth. Then Listra spoke, still holding the arrow pointed straight at her victim's breast.

"Arnon the King," she said, sweet and humble now, "art weary of this strife? Thou answerest not. So be it. I am weary of it and tired of staying here, e'en though naught but a watery grave await us otherwhere. Say, Macis—or Arnon, if that name pleases thee better—wilt throw thy sword away, and leave this meekling to herself and be my love from now, whether death come soon or late? An thou wilt, her life shall be spared; an thou wilt not—thou knowest the depth of my anger when roused," and the delicate fingers closed round the bent bow tighter, and the shaft was drawn a notch further in.

I felt for my quiver—it was empty; for my pouch of sling-bullets—it was empty, and I knew that the life of my Queen was in the hands of her bitterest foe, and that I was powerless to reach her before the treacherous hands could do their work.



Pointed the shaft at my fair Queen's breast.

Before I could reply, Briseis called to me, her eyes flashing defiance and her voice composed and scornful:

"Listen not to her pleading, my Arnon, even to save my life. I would sooner die knowing thee true, than live by thy falseness, e'en though it be dissembled on my behalf. See, I have no fear now that I am face to face with the end, for I know that thou wilt not be long in seeking me wherever I go. Only I would like to be laid to rest with the Passport Piece in my hand, that we may both gain the Garden of Pleasure."

"Again I ask thee, Macis—who was once my true beloved—again I ask thee if thou wilt come with me at the last, and so save this creature's life?" said Listra, mocking the Queen. "Make thy choice, and that swiftly, or my hand may be tempted to do the work I like not, for thy dear sake."

Digitized by Google

"Let me think!" I cried, distraught at the fearful peril, and paralysed by my utter helplessness, "let me think!"

"Heed her not, my husband," pleaded Briseis, "her promises are lies, and her endearments but temptations to separate us from each other in that greater life beyond the tomb. Nor hath she any goodness or beauty which a true man should desire. Heed her not, my dear one, to whom I say farewell."

Whether she spoke thus tantalisingly and derisively of the Princess in order to force her hand to do the deed, or whether she spoke out of the bitterness of her heart unthinkingly, I know not, but scarcely had her lips closed when Listra broke into a mocking laugh, slackening the bow slightly.

Then back she stretched it to the full again, her fierce face all awork with the evil passion in it, and with a wild cry of "Vengeance!" let the cursed arrow fly. On it sang in the heated air, well-aimed and passion-urged, piercing my beloved's heart and transfixing her to the helm. So swift was its passage from the nearness of the aim, that the smile of courage on my dear one's face never changed, but was fixed in death, and so remained when the red blood rushed forth, and, flowing down, incarnadined the whiteness of her robes.

"Ye Gods! How did I live through that fearful moment? How did I keep my reason, or hold my hand from slaying myself in that first, swift spasm of misery? I stood as one stunned and blinded, knowing not whither to turn or what to do. But not for long. With that cry of "Vengeance!" still ringing in my ears, I woke to action, and repeating it in a clarion voice, I rushed forward.

The hot blood of youth surged through my throbbing veins anew, and all the lusty vigour of my earlier years welled in my nerves and sinews, as, sword in hand, I broke through the line of foes, scattering them to right and left. They were more than a match for our men even then, and soon Valdo and I strove together, two against seven enemies, all well-armed and desperate.

But, wielded in my wrath, "Sunderer" was not to be denied, and the good sword's matchless edge tore riotously through shields and armour, helms and blades, bone and sinew, sparing not, resting not, drinking carnage with a quenchless thirst, and flaming above the victims heads like a circle of light, here, there, everywhere, as though the air was full of sharpened blades, till of the seven only one remained alive, fleeing for shelter behind the mast. I turned a moment to look for Valdo then, to see him stretched upon the deck, dying, his eyes glazing fast. A red gash across the temples told where the last blow had fallen. I knelt over him a second, inclining my head to hear his last words.

"Farewell, King and comrade," said he, "it has been a worthy fight. Fare——" and the lips closed as the speech died away in a faint whisper.

I sprang up, still with sword in hand, and turned away—for I could not weep—and seeking out the one remaining foe, drove the blade through the wretch, splitting him in half against the crackling mast. Then, smoke-grimed, bloodstained, mad with revenge, I strode heavily to where Listra crouched fearfully in the stern, and leaning on "Sunderer's" ruddy length, prodded her with my foot.

"Princess," I said with mock humility, "it grieveth me to rouse you, the more so as I am in such sorry plight to come before a lady. Natheless I make bold to think that the gravity of my message will excuse the grimness of my face. We are alone, Princess, in the midst of three burning ships, and unless we make hasto to bestir ourselves are likely to be burnt with them, for all but this end of the deck has fallen in."

"Spare me! spare me!" cried Listra, suddenly springing to me, and clasping my knees in supplication, all her fiery passion gone now as a snowball melted in the sun, "have pity on me, Macis, for I have done what I have done for love of thee!"

"Love!" I said scornfully, pointing to the pale form with the arrow in her breast, "call you that an instance of your love? I would rather have the hate of the foulest hag who ever walked the streets of Thinæ than the love of such as thee! Go to!" I cried, roughly shaking off her embrace, "make ready to leave this doomed vessel."

"Wilt go with me, Macis?" she pleaded, "and forget the past? The boat here I had provisioned for a cruise in case of defeat. Wilt be my own sweet Macis once again?"

"Thine, murderous leman?" I said, scathingly, raising the great blade high above her head. "Thy love, when the blood of Briseis calls for vengeance? Not if thou wert immortal, and had beauty everlasting. No, an you leave this ship as I desire it will be in the spirit, and not in the flesh—so," and I nerved my arm to strike.

"Oh, Macis!" she entreated, clinging to me all the more when I repulsed her, "slay me not for the sake of the love I bear thee!"

But I had no mercy. Black rage consumed my soul, the iron had entered into my vitals, I was mad with grief at the loss of all I held dear, and those lips which would have pleaded for pity even in that last hour were cold in death.

So I swung the great sword thrice round my head with a mighty whirl, its angry hiss drowned in the shrieks of the kneeling woman, and then, swift as a flash of light, "Sunderer" fell, passing down the quivering body, and severing it in twain!

That was my famous sword's last stroke, and, smiling a grim, sardonic smile, I turned away from the prostrate form to where the body of Briseis hung, reverently cut the thongs and the shaft that held it, placed it in the boat, and let the latter down into the sea, scrambling down the stern-chains after it.

Desperately I pulled away from the ship, nor had I gone far when the deck whereon the last tragedy had been enacted fell in with a crash, and a volume of smoke and sparks shot up from the place, telling how nearly I had been lost.

On—on—I rowed, the excitement still keeping my strength up, till I was clear of the red-glowing rocks; on—on—towards the solitary watch-tower looming up out of the solitary sea.

I reached up, clasping the nearest stone casement in my numbed hands, and resting there a moment, looked back upon my track.

The sky was of cloudless blue, deep almost to darkness, not a wave ruffled the wilderness of waters, and the edge of the sun glowed in the west like the curve of a golden shield. All was still, and the oneness of the whole was unbroken by sight or sound, save where, on the far-off rim of sea and sky, rose a curl of smoke and a tongue of flame.

(To be concluded.)

On the Conclusion of this Story,

A = STIRRING = SERIAL

WILL COMMENCE,

BY

MR. CHARLES EDWARDES,

ENTITLED,

"THE WRECKERS OF SCILLY."

VOL. 2 of PEARSON'S MAGAZINE

IS

NOW ON SALE, Price 6s. 6d.

CLOTH BINDING COVERS, 1s. 9d., POST FREE.

HALF MOROCCO, 2s. 3d., POST FREE.

Digitized by Google

A Dialogue of the Line.

SCENE: A first-class railway carriage. Julia Northcote, a young lady of attractive appearance, discovered alone in a corner of the compartment. Papers, travelling-rug, dressing-bag, etc.

Julia (yawning): "I wish this train would start. It's five minutes after the time already! My foot-warmer is getting cold."

(The guard whistles, train starts.)

(Porter heard speaking outside.)

"Here you are, sir."

(The door is opened, and a man springs in, falling over Julia's feet.)

Stranger: "A thousand pardons! I hope I did not hurt you."

(Their eyes meet.)

Julia: "Mr. Emerson! No, it can't be!"

Emerson: "Why not? Have I altered in two years? Am I past recognition?"

Julia: "Two years! Is it really two years?"

Emerson (seating himself opposite her): "No—one year and nine months."

Julia (blushing): "Since——"

Emerson (sighing): "Since——"

(Silence.)

Julia (presently): "I thought you had quite forgotten me."

Emerson (aside): "Thought right for once."

Julia: "And it is never pleasant—to be forgotten."

Emerson: "How cruel you have grown!"

Julia: "Yet I had reason to form that conclusion. You remember our visit to the Hobson's, and the ball?"

Emerson (looking uncomfortable): "I do!"

Julia: "Why did you leave early the next morning, without saying good-bye?"

Emerson: "Business. I was called away by telegram."

Julia: "And you never wrote. You—you said at the ball you would write!"

Emerson: "Did I?"

Julia: "Have you forgotten that too? Really your memory——"

Emerson (speaking quickly): "It was so long ago, and things alter. Why, in these past months I've been to the other side of the world. I only returned to England last week. What have you been doing in the meanwhile? Getting married?"

Julia (a mischievous twinkle in her eyes): "Yes!"

Emerson (relieved): "Really! I congratulate you—I mean—I congratulate him. He—he's an awful lucky fellow. May I ask his name?"

Julia (hesitating): "Dickson—Nugent Dickson."

Emerson (expanding): "'Pon my word, some people have good fortune, notably the successful Mr. Dickson. It makes us poor bachelors horribly envious."

Julia: "Why not go and do likewise?"

Emerson: "You are cruel, you know the reason perfectly well."

Julia: "I know the reason?"

Emerson: "Yes, you said just now that I had forgotten! It was an unkind cut, Miss Northcote—I mean Mrs. Dickson—but I did not deserve it, though I confess my conduct may have appeared—strange, inexplicable—at the time. I feel I owe you an explanation——"

Julia: "Go on."

Emerson: "You alluded just now to a ball. How vividly I remember every detail of that pleasant evening. Our talk under the trees in the garden—the dances we had together."

Julia: "Eight waltzes, and two sets of lancers."

Emerson: "And then the drive home, do you remember that drive?"

(He leans forward and touches her hand.)

Julia: "It was very wrong."

Emerson: "Was it? I did not think so at the time."

Julia: "Aunt Lena went to sleep in the corner of the carriage."

Emerson: "I always liked your Aunt, she was such a tactful woman."

Julia: "But your explanation——"

Emerson: "Is simply this. I fell madly—desperately in love with you. I felt irresistibly drawn to you, but my better nature told me you were too good for a penniless fellow like myself, I could never have made you happy."

Julia: "Penniless! you had a thousand a year, an assured income!"

Emerson: "Bah! What is a paltry thousand a year nowadays! A woman with your tastes—your beauty—would have been miserable on such a pittance! So I sacrificed my feelings, and with lacerated heart tore myself away."

Julia: "How noble of you!"

Emerson (aside): "She swallows it!"

Julia: "I thought it was for another reason—I fancied you did not care—I cruelly misjudged you!"

Emerson: "I hoped on my return to find you still free. I had luck in those distant lands, and should now have been in a position to ask your hand. But Fate has been against me from the first. I can but bow my head and except the inevitable. Dear Mrs. Dickson, you will think kindly of me sometimes."

Julia (looking up under her eyelashes): "Very kindly."

Emerson (much affected): "And may—I—see you occasionally?"

Julia: "But do you really——"

Emerson (holding her fingers): "Yes, I do."

Julia: "And if it were possible—if it were not for Nugent—you would——"

Emerson: "I would marry you to-morrow."

(Miss Northcote draws the glove from her left hand, and reveals its ringless state.)

Emerson (staring stupidly): "Oh! I say!"

Julia: "You may well look surprised, I was only joking after all, and you must forgive, because——"

Emerson: "Because?"

Julia: "I have learnt your secret. I know now that

Digitized by Google

I am loved, that all my hard thoughts of you were base and unfounded. I am ready to forgive. But how pale you look, Mr. Emerson! I am afraid my happy news was too much for you, I—I was hardly considerate, I did not realise the strength of your love, the depth of your devotion."

Emerson (looking wildly round for a chance of escape): "This—er—this is—er—my station. I—I will write."

Julia (as the train slows): "Oh! what a pity, and just as our talk was getting interesting. You won't forget to write this time, will you?"

Emerson (springing out): "Indeed I shall not."

Julia (leaning through the window): "What a wretched little place!"

Emerson: "Let me put up the window, it is so cold for you."

Julia: "But now we can't talk. There is such a thing as being too considerate."

Emerson: "Good-bye, Miss Northcote."

Julia (as the train starts): "I wonder he did not call me Julia! Some men are so reticent."

Emerson (to porter): "How soon can I get a train on to Longly?"

Porter (grinning): "Why it's just gone! Didn't you get out of it? There ain't another for a three hour, and that's sure to be late. Oh, they do travel on our line!"

WINIFRED GRAHAM.

RESULT OF JUMBLED STORY COMPETITION.—No. 26.

THE first prize of £5 goes to Miss Mannion, 16, St. George's Road, Ladbroke Grove, London.

The following receive £1 each: Miss Grant, 4, Morrab Terrace, Penzance, Cornwall; F. C. Piper, Kenersley House, Cliftonville, Margate; H. P. Wright, 72, Evelina Road, Nunhead, S.E.; Miss E. Crane, 143, Cannon Street, London; Mrs. E. A. Hallam, 46, Clifton Road, Peckham.

(See page 121.)

Twelve copies of "FOOTLIGHT FAVOURITES" will be given to the twelve persons who make up the cleverest composite picture of all or any of the illustrations appearing in the Christmas Double Number of Short Stories.

HIS CONCEPTION OF TRILBY

This is a reproduction of one of the attempts sent in for the Christmas Number Competition (No. 3) in Short Stories, the result of which appears on page 126.

Digitized by Google

VENUS.

"AN' so your dad ain't going a-whalin' any more," exclaimed Miss Elizabeth Shoreham semi-interrogatively, as her eyes wandered from the walrus tusk which adorned one of the walls to the black eyes of the only occupant of the room besides herself.

"No," replied Venus. "He says as he ain't been for ten years; the whales have forgot him an' he don't see a use of scrapin' acquaintance with 'em again."

"Drat that snag!" interpolated Miss Elizabeth, as she came upon a snarl in the wool which, under her guidance, was gradually forming itself into an article of wearing apparel. "Seems to me I never run against nothin' but snags all my life. If 'tain't been in the wool, it's been in my relations, an' if 'tain't been in my relations it's been in——"

"I didn't know you had any relations, Miss Shoreham."

"Well, I haven't had for years back, but their memories is all the time a-croppin' up an' a-pesterin'," exclaimed Miss Elizabeth, as the almost-forgotten death of the last one recalled vividly her own advancing age.

"Do you mean ghosts?" asked Venus, dropping a stitch in her sewing.

"Ghosts? Never!" snapped Miss Elizabeth. "I don't believe in no such animals. It's just snags—plain, every-day snags. Ghosts only bother you night times; snags bother days as well as nights, an' for one that's alone, with no friends, an' no one that cares more'n twopence for you——"

"I hope you don't call dad an' me snags, Miss Shoreham."

"N-no, you're no snag!" admitted Miss Shoreham, "but your dad—he is just the worst I ever see, an' I wish I knew what way he's going to jump next."

"Why do you want to know that?" ventured Venus.

Miss Elizabeth hesitated. Could she summon sufficient courage to confide in the daughter of the man to whom, with her fading charms, she clung as the only possible escape from a state of single blessedness, now that all other means of escape were married, dead, or in other ways rendered unavailable? She decided to risk it.

"Venus Hardy, I think you're mighty honest, an' that's why I'm a-goin' to make you one o' them confidence women like they had in days of old. Has your dad never said anything against me?"

"Why, no, Miss Shoreham! He—er—likes you very much."

Venus's eyes twinkled mischievously.

"I thought that much," commented Miss Elizabeth, laying aside her knitting, "but he has never mentioned nothin' stronger? Does he never say anything?"

She saw the laughter hidden away in the girl's eyes, and changed both her tone and subject abruptly.

"Now, Venus Hardy, you're a-laughin' at me inside—I can see the front o' your dress shake—I might 'a' known it."

Miss Elizabeth . . . delivered her ultimatum.

"I didn't mean to," apologised Venus.

"I'm not so sure," snapped Miss Elizabeth. "How'd he ever come to call you Venus, anyway?"

"I don't know. I never asked him."

"It's a mighty embarrassin' sort of a name," went on Miss Elizabeth. "If I was called Venus, seems to me I'd feel as if I wa'n't dressed proper."

Venus flared up.

"I've been called it all my life, an' no one can say I haven't been dressed proper."

"H'm. I don't know," observed Miss Shoreham, still inclined to be irritable, "who sews 'em for you?"

"I sew 'em myself."

"Yourself? Who fits 'em?" continued the lady.

"Dad!"

"Your dad! That accounts for the look of 'em," exclaimed Miss Shoreham, greatly relieved. The solution to that riddle had bothered her for a long time. "Jim Peter's wife swears you go out on the beach nights, an' picks up clothes what comes ashore from wrecks."

Venus turned indignantly.

Digitized by Google

"Jim Peter's wife needn't measure me by herself," she said.

"I gave her a well-baked piece o' mind about it, too," went on Miss Elizabeth, studying the effect of her words from over the tops of her spectacles, "for I know Jim took a cradle what drifted ashore the night afore she had that clearin'-up shower of twins, an' it come mighty handy, for, if it hadn't been for that, some o' them other young ones would 'a' had to 'a' slept in the fire-place. But if your dad is a-lookin' after the fit o' your clothes as well as your eatin' an' drinkin', seems to me his hands is as full as Jim Peters', and someone ought to be a-helpin' him carry his load. No wonder the man ain't no time to go a-whalin'. Does he never suggest that you'd better be a-havin' a mother? You ain't had one as far back as I can think."

Venus shook her head but did not look up, for there were tears in her eyes.

"How old are you?" continued the inquisitor.

"I don't know. Dad's never told me."

"Just as I thought." Miss Elizabeth rose and, placing a hand on each hip, delivered her ultimatum. "Venus Hardy, listen while I tell you somethin'. Your dad is a-goin' to be looked after proper if I have to do it myself, or, the first thing he knows, he'll be beached high an' dry same as any other fellow."

Venus looked up. Her eyes were bright now and her cheeks were flushed. Womanlike, she longed for a confidant of her own sex and had reached the point where further restraint was an utter impossibility. She must tell someone—anyone.

"Miss Shoreham," faltered the girl, "somebody's asked me to help make a home already."

"Already—who?"

"I'm a-keepin' that in the family yet."

"Does your dad know?"

"N-no!"

"Well, as he's the only family you've got, seems to me 'tain't in the family yet. You'd better think me the family for a minute."

"No, for you ain't!" said Venus decidedly.

"Venus Hardy, you may not mean disrespect, but you sound mighty near it, an', if I should be a-comin' into the family, you want to keep on my sweet side."

"Now I know what is the matter with you," cried Venus, the truth suddenly breaking upon her, "you're makin' up to dad—oh, Miss Shoreham!" and Venus levelled her index finger at her visitor and laughed.

The visitor was capable of retaliating, however, and did so without delay.

"If you wasn't stone-blind about your own love affairs, Venus Hardy, you could see that your fore an' aft's turned 'round, for it's your dad as is a-makin' up to me."

"Then I am glad—really I am," cried the girl, as all doubts and fears fell away from her heart, "for then I don't have to feel very bad about leavin' dad, do I, seein' as he can get you to provide for him? I've tried to feel bad about goin', but I can't, for Jack is—oh, he's just like dad, only he's younger, an' smarter, handsomer, an'—an'—everything!"

"Is it Jack Nobles?"

Venus blushed.

"How'd you guess?"

"Ask me no questions, an' I'll answer no lies."

"You won't tell dad?"

"That hangs on what your dad tells me."

"Then it's all arranged," exclaimed the girl, "you make dad push me towards Jack, an' I'll push dad at you."

Miss Elizabeth tossed her head, and, indicating a closed door beneath the walrus tusk, said: "Tell me what's in there afore I compromise myself."

"I don't know what's in it," replied Venus.

"You mean you don't want to tell. As often as I've been in this place, I never see in that room yet, an' the shutters are shut on the outside, too—I've noticed that."

"Well I've never seen in it, either, for the door's always locked, but that ain't why I haven't been in, for dad often told me to wait till he takes me himself. Sometimes he takes in bundles, too, but he says he's goin' to show 'em to me as soon as I am old enough to understand."

"Bundles? H'm. I ought to know what's in there, too, afore I become your mother. Maybe it's your other mother he has in there—what do you s'pose?"

"I don't know."

The clock on the wall struck five. Venus rose hurriedly.

"Goodness, it's late! I must get supper—but you just sit still an' I'll see dad take you home."

"No, no," simpered Miss Elizabeth, "'twould be so conspicuous."

"He'll be home soon," urged Venus, determined to facilitate her own love affair if possible by facilitating that of her father and Miss Elizabeth. "He seemed so jolly this mornin' about somethin' that perhaps he's goin' to ask you to-day, an' he'll be glad to find you without havin' to trot 'round to the neighbours to hunt you up."

"Then I'll help you get supper," exclaimed Miss Elizabeth impulsively, determined to give material evidence of her gratitude.

"There ain't enough work for two. You'd better finish your knittin', for dad may never give you another chance. Just sit still an' I'll keep runnin' in an' see if anything's wanted," and Venus repaired to the kitchen, humming a tune as she went.

Miss Elizabeth sat still as directed for a few moments only. For years that locked door had been to her another unsolved riddle.

"Seems as if I hear someone a-breathin' there," she soliloquised, as she edged nearer to the object of her thoughts, and, at the same time, held her knitting so that she could begin work at once in case of interruption. "He may be a-keepin' one o' them harem-scarems from Africa I've read of," she continued, "an' if he is, it's my duty to find out, for if I can stop that man from a-bein' a Bluebeard by a-marryin' him, it'll be a worthy action that won't throw me back when Gabriel gets 'round to a-tootin' his last trumpet, an' as he ain't tooted his first one, as far as I can remember, goodness knows how long he'll take a-gettin' to his last one, unless he toots it first."

Miss Elizabeth looked out across the sands and the fisher boats to where the waves restlessly tumbled over one another in a mad race to reach the high-water mark. No one was looking her way, and Venus was still singing in the kitchen. The coast seemed clear. She scrutinised the door of the mysterious room closely, and made the agreeable discovery that the key was in the lock. The temptation was irresistible, and, with pulses throbbing wildly, Miss Elizabeth turned the key and threw open the door.

"Can't see a thing. It must be something dreadful!" she observed, quaking inwardly, as she peered into the darkness. Then something large in one corner of the room caught her eye. Miss Elizabeth gazed at it until becoming aware of its full proportions, and overwhelmed by the discovery, she unthinkingly stepped into the forbidden apartment.

Digitized by Google

"A pianner!" she gasped. "A thing I've wanted since the day afore I was born. No wonder he didn't want Venus to see it—'twould 'a' made her feel dreadful to be a-livin' here with it a-knowin' all the time 'twas for me. I bet she's been in here just the same."

The sound of a door shutting caused Miss Elizabeth a guilty start, and, as she stepped back into the sunlit room beyond, her shoulder was grasped by a powerful hand.

"Eliza Shoreham," exclaimed the owner of the hand angrily, "if I ever catch you in that room again, you can count yourself among the dead an' missin'! What'd you do in there?"

"Why, good-evenin',' Cap'n!" gasped the trembling woman in as cheery a voice as her lungs and palpitating heart could produce. Her Bluebeard idea certainly seemed no idle fancy. "I was a-knittin' an' felt a draught, an' I just peeped in to see if the window was open."

The Captain released Miss Elizabeth and pushed forward a chair. She wasn't quite sure as to whether she ought to run or sit down, but another look at the Captain's face convinced her that he really wished her to be seated, so she obeyed his facial command with as little delay as possible and prepared herself for anything from a proposal to a bomb.

"I was countin' on Venus goin' in that room first," said the Captain. His manner was still stern, but his anger was cooling rapidly. He and anger had been estranged for twenty years.

"I dare say she has seen it," ventured Miss Elizabeth, by way of apology for her own indiscretion.

"Seen what?" inquired the Captain suspiciously.

"The pianner, of course."

"You saw the pianner?" thundered the Captain in such a terrible voice that Miss Elizabeth felt that the enormity of her crime was beyond all earthly computation, and she breathed with greater difficulty than ever. "Eliza Shoreham, sit where you are. As long as you've seen that much, I'm goin' to tell you somethin' mighty important, but if you ever lets it out to anything havin' breath, I'll chase you over the earth till you're so flabbergasted you'll jump off it."

"I'll never—no, never!" faltered Miss Elizabeth contritely. "Here—I'll give you a hand," for the Captain had gone to a cupboard while speaking and was returning with some cups and saucers to place upon the table.

"No, you won't!" he said curtly. "You stay where you are. You'll need your strength to listen with."

And Miss Elizabeth stayed where she was.

"How does Venus strike you nowadays, Eliza?" asked the Captain, as he went towards the cupboard a second time.

"Seems to me she's a lovable kind of child," replied Miss Elizabeth with soulful emphasis; then, resolving to dare all, she added: "Seems to me I wouldn't mind a-havin' her for a daughter myself."

"Now wouldn't you, Eliza? Well, there's only one way that could happen, but I don't see no signs of it."

The Captain laughed aloud. He was returning to his usual good nature, but Miss Elizabeth was not altogether cheered by his words.

"Why, I've just been offered command of another whaler, but I'm goin' to refuse it on account of her, although there's been a deal of money offered. I wouldn't leave that girl for all the whales in the sea an' there's more'n a few of 'em."

"Cap'n," broke in Miss Elizabeth nervously, "before you go on, I want to ask you—I most forgot—where's Venus's mother?"

"Venus's mother?"

"Yes—your other wife?"

"My other wife?"

The Captain laughed again and brought his clenched fist down upon the table with great force.

"Eliza, true as you're settin' there, I never had a wife in my life."

Miss Elizabeth rose to her feet while the blood rose to her cheeks.

"An' you ask me to stay here an' talk to you, Cap'n Hardy, with that woman a-hangin' over your head? Where is she?"

"I don't know."

"How old's Venus?"

"You've got me again, Eliza."

"You mean to tell me you don't know the age of your own flesh and blood?" fairly shrieked Miss Elizabeth.

"She ain't no flesh and blood o' mine!"

"Not? Who named her?"

"I did."

"Where've you been to hear that name?"

The Captain gazed at his questioner in astonishment.

"Why ain't you never heard of Venus? She was the most beautiful lady on earth, Eliza, an' she was throwed up by the sea."

"Do you mean to say that girl's a—a—mermaid?"

"You've guessed it pretty near, Eliza!"

"Go on, Cap'n—I'm a-tryin' to swallow it."

"Then you'd better chew it well, Liz, or it'll choke you. Do you remember twenty years ago to-day?"

Miss Elizabeth shook her head emphatically.

"Well, you ought to, for you were no kitten-fish even then; but I guess that was the year you was off in your head about Jim Peters elopin' with Sal. That's another time you missed it, Eliza. Anyway, it'll just be twenty years to-night since there was the biggest storm out there I ever saw, an' there was a wreck—but it was too far out for anybody to help—an' the ship went down an' no one's ever heard of it or anyone on it. I was on the beach all night, an' towards mornin' there was a spar tossed by the waves, an' it came right to my feet. There was somethin' tied on it."

"Venus?"

"'Twas a bundle, an' when I looked close, 'twas a kid, sure enough. I thought 'twas dead, but I give it a chance, an' took it to my cabin, an' put it by the fire, and blessed if the kid didn't come to life, an' fidget so, an' holler, that I knew 'twas a woman, an' I guessed right, for she's in the kitchen there a-singin'. That's why I called her Venus, 'cause she was throwed up by the sea."

"Seems to me you might 'a' named her Seaweed. Why didn't you bring her to me?"

"You, Liz. Just look back that far an' remember yourself. You was set on havin' Jim Peters then, an' you'd have sent me to kingdom come mighty quick. My, but you was stiff those times. The kid hollered loud, too, an' I didn't know whether to throw it back into the water or to take it to the asylum, but when I thought o' givin' it away, the loneliest kind of a feelin' came over me, an' I resolutioned I'd just keep that kid, an' find out myself what this married life is that folks talks so much about—for I had a young one there already without the expense an' bother of a wife throwed in. Then, thinks I, if married life gets too much for me, I'll put the kid in the asylum, an' married life can be blowed. You see, Eliza, 'twas a sight better'n adoptin' a wife, too, for, if the experience was not successful, it might 'a' been a job to put her in the asylum with the kid. I kept the young one in a basket for a whole month, an' fed it on a bottle, but it did nothin' but holler, grin, an' sleep, and never spoke. Then I went off on a whaler, an' took it with me—I took it on board in a basket. I didn't come back to this place till ten years or so after, an' then Venus come with me as my daughter, for most on 'em had forgot me an' asked no questions. I tell you, Eliza, married life has agreed with me as far as its gone, but now I'm gettin' old, seems as if sometimes I most wish I had a wife instead."

Digitized by Google

Miss Elizabeth grew even more interested.

"Have you found the woman, Cap'n?"

The Captain brought his hand down upon the table again.

"That I have, Liz, an', whenever I've seen what she'd like or has wished for, I've got it an' put it in that room which you sneaked into. There's a Chinese wash-basin in there that she wished for five years back, an' it's been in that room ever since the day she wished for it—an' a work-basket—an' a sailor's hat—a bathin' suit—a pianner——"

"A pianner is such a grand ornament," interpolated Miss Elizabeth ecstatically. "I know a man that plays the accordion mighty sweet, an' I'll ask him over. I'm sure he'll play beautiful on it."

"You'll have to see Venus about that party."

A plate dropped from the Captain's hand.

"What's she got to do with it?"

"Why—she's the one!"

The Captain's face beamed with joy, and Miss Elizabeth's heart stopped beating for five awful seconds.

"Venus, your daughter?"

"She ain't my daughter."

"She's just the same."

The truth dawned upon Miss Elizabeth and she sobbed hysterically:

"Oh, you wicked man! What do you mean by a-leading me on like this and then a dropping me down as if I was a poisoned snake?"

"An' you thought I was after you? Oh, Lord, what a joke!" and the Captain laughed so boisterously and so heartily that Venus in the kitchen felt confident that Miss Shoreham was soon to be a mother to her.

"Two can play at jokes, Bill Harding," exclaimed Miss Elizabeth in her wrath, "you just go on an' laugh an' when you've done I'll take a turn an' I'll catch a sight bigger whale than you ever thought of catching, too!"

"All right, Liz, go on an' catch your whale, but seems to me you'd better give up that notion—or you may get swamped."

Miss Elizabeth tossed her head defiantly and prepared to throw her bomb.

"How do yer know Venus'll have you?"

"How d'ye know? How d'ye know the sun rose this morning?"

"Well, when it sets to-night, you want to look out it don't set on you. Does she know you are not her dad?"

"No, but I'll soon 'range that."

"Then you'd better 'range it afore Jack Nobles 'ranges it for you."

"Jack?"

The Captain stopped suddenly in his ninth trip from the cupboard to the table.

"Do you s'pose she'll have you when she can get him?"

A plate dropped from the Captain's hands. He stooped to pick up the pieces and forced himself to laugh, but the laugh was hollow and lacked heartiness.

"Marry him? Pshaw! That's a pretty good-sized whale, after all—but I can see through it. You want to get quits with me for vexing you."

"All right, Bill Harding—I can't stay to supper for private reasons, but sometime when you find out that Venus don't want you no more than she does the measles, maybe you'll think of a woman you might 'a' had——"

The Captain gazed blankly at Miss Elizabeth. He saw her gather up her things and go towards the door.

"You, Elizabeth?" he inquired incredulously.

Miss Elizabeth turned a flushed, angry face upon him from the doorway.

"Me? Not much! I was only askin' for a friend. She wrote an' told me if I knew of any old man what wanted someone to make a home for him, to let her know. I'll write an' tell her I don't—that the only old men I know about here what ain't dead is fools."

Digitized by Google

And Miss Elizabeth, believing that she had given the proper vent upon her wounded feelings, turned and walked down the beach, confronted all the way by the fact that her matrimonial chances possessed the blackest possible outlook. She had certainly done her best, but there seemed no use in trying to thwart fate any longer, and, once in her cottage, she gazed upon the five cardboard mottoes worked in many-hued worsteds that adorned one of her walls.

For many years they had been her sole sentimental props, and, as she slowly read them aloud to herself for the last time, her eyes filled with tears. They could be of no further use to her, and, mounting a chair, she removed them from the wall one by one. "Watch and Pray," "The Lord Will Provide," "While there's Life there's Hope," and "Where there's a Will there's a Way," she burnt in the kitchen fire; but when she came to "What's Home without a Mother," her heart failed her. She could not burn that one, and, wrapping it up carefully, she put it away to send to Venus as one last desperate hint to the Captain.

She removed them from the wall one by one.

"If you don't bring him round," she said to the motto, "nothin' will."

For some time after Miss Elizabeth had gone, the Captain stood motionless in the centre of the room, gazing far out over the sand and sea. He was trying to believe that Miss Elizabeth had only spoken in jest, but something in his heart told him that she had not.

"I saw his arm round Venus the other night, but I never suspected," he murmured. Then, going to the door of the mysterious room, he opened it and entered. It was some time before he had opened the windows and shutters, but the sun shone at length upon the accumulated dust and cobwebs and the strange collection of modern and antique furniture. Then he heard Venus coming and went to meet her.

Venus was still singing, as she came from the kitchen with a steaming teapot in her hand, for she wanted to give Miss Elizabeth fair warning of her approach.

"You are my little true lover,
You are my little boy blue,
But I'm your old auntie, darling.
And I cannot marry you."

So sang Venus, with a curtsey to the Captain when she had finished. The Captain turned his head away and clumsily brushed a tear from his cheek.

"What's this I hear about you an' Jack?" he asked, without looking at her.

Venus set the teapot upon the table, and turned to him confused. Then she noticed that he was alone.

"Where's Miss Shoreham?" she cried. "Don't you think she's nice, dad? You like her better 'an me, don't you?"

The Captain gazed longingly into the girl's eyes. She went to him and he put his arms about her.

"You're ahead of 'em all with me, lassie," he said.

"I'm so sorry—you look sad, dad. What did she do to you?"

"I'm sad at thinkin' I'm goin' to lose the lassie I've loved so long. Do you love Jack?"

Venus hid her face on the Captain's shoulder and her reply was inaudible, but the Captain thought he understood.

"All right, lassie," he said with as much cheerfulness as he could muster. "It's all right, but why didn't you tell your old dad about it an' not keep it back. It struck me so sudden, I can't see it clear yet, an' you know I wouldn't hurt a hair in your head, an' if you wanted all the Jacks in the world, I'd never 'a' took 'em from you; an' now, lassie, I want to ask you something,—for I ain't been married, an' don't know what love's like—would it make you give up your dad for—for—now sposin' Jack an' me was going' away on a long voyage—don't stir, I only said sposin'—an' sposin' you could only go with one of us—what one would you choose, lassie."

Venus started back from the Captain, and, in a voice trembling with superstitious awe, said: "Dad, I've dreamt the same dream the last three nights, but it didn't seem as if I was sleeping. Every night it seemed as if I was awake an' listenin' to the waves break on the beach till I couldn't stand the noise: an' I got up and went out to stop 'em from singing—an' every time Jack an' you was there in different boats going away for ever and ever—an' every time, as soon as I came down to where the waves wash my feet, Jack an' you stretched out your hands to me an' I had to choose what one I'd sail with."

Digitized by Google

The Captain gazed lovingly into the girl's eyes.

"An' did you always choose the same one, lassie?"

The Captain's wealth of love for the girl shone in his eyes. Venus nodded her head.

"An' who was it?"

The Captain grew faint and looked away from the girl for there was no response and no sound save the breaking of the waves upon the beach.

"Was it me?"

Still there was no answer. Venus was gazing at him half in fear, and half in adoration. Their eyes met and she slowly shook her head.

The Captain spoke hurriedly so that the girl might not notice the tremour in his voice.

"Venus, I was goin' to speak to you about somethin' similar to-day, an' I'm mighty glad now that Jack's going to provide for you, for you dreamt part right—I'm going away on a long voyage."

"No, dad, no! You said you wouldn't."

"But I've had a fine offer, lassie, an' I can't refuse, for I haven't been on the sea for years, an' I'm pinin' for it."

"Don't go!"

Venus threw her arms about his neck.

"I must, lassie, an' there's no time to lose. It'll bring back the old times, too—the times when you was small, an' we used to sail together an' you said you'd marry me when you got as big as me, an' now you're goin' back on your word—but there, it's all right lassie, for Jack'll make two o' me, any day. Where are you goin' to live?"

"Jack's saved money, an' he's waitin' to hear what you'd say first."

"Then tell him I say you've lived in this house for ten years, an' you can't leave it—that it's your house—that I give it to you—an' if he wants you bad enough to come here to live, he can move in just as soon as he can find a parson."

Venus wept for very joy.

"Oh, dad, can we?"

"I've suspicioned you'd be wantin' to be married before long, an' I've been preparin' for it. Look in there!"

Venus had not noticed the open door, and now, as she looked through it into the mysterious room beyond, her joy knew no limit.

"Oh, dad, there's a pianner!"

The Captain was as much excited as she was.

"Yes, an' you an' Jack must bang on it every day—an' do you see the Chinese wash-basin?"

Yes, Venus saw that and many other things of which she had envied others the possession.

"An' when you wash your pretty face in it, you'll think of your old dad?"

"Yes," promised Venus happily, "an' I'll only use it Sundays, so's it'll keep."

"An' now look out through the window, lassie—the first time you ever looked through it, who did you see comin' up the beach?"

"Jack!"

The Captain closed the door.

"I can't show you more now, lassie, for I've a deal to do afore I go. No, I can't stay till Jack comes—some other time'll do just as well—you tell him—tell him it's all right an' that I'm goin' away an' you an' him must keep house for me till I come back, for I may come back with a large family."

"Then you are going to marry Miss Shoreham, dad?"

"Never you mind who I'll be marrying—an' now, lassie, stand here in the doorway an' smile at him—show him the room I've been savin' for you—stop lookin' at me like that—look out at him—beckon to him, lassie. Yes, that's right! Don't you care if the whole earth does see you—he's yours, an' you're goin' to get him. There! He sees you an' he's comin'. Who wouldn't come to you when they see your pretty face? There, lassie, kiss me once more afore Jack knows he can have you. Good luck to you an' good luck to Jack—an'—God bless you both!"

He could say no more but crept noiselessly out into the kitchen. And the girl stood in the doorway and beckoned to her lover as he came up over the sands, and their hearts were as light as the foam of the sea for they never guessed that their happiness had driven an old man forth on a voyage from which he would never return.

JOHN HALFORD.

Key to Jumble Story.—No. 26.

A HEROINE OF SOCIETY. (See page 115.)

88	40	11	33	5	100	30	106	48
10	26	22	2	74	92	3	91	87
69	41	35	17	62	96	50	98
70	27	12	4	86	113	57	105
34	14	13	44	54	114	24	109
36	28	83	47	6	60	1	95
29	20	53	19	89	51	59	101
39	32	37	49	90	84	65	93
76	15	81	80	111	21	73	94
72	7	61	75	102	23	79	110
31	8	16	43	99	52	67	97
71	25	46	56	112	77	68	107
45	18	58	78	103	85	64	66
9	38	42	63	104	55	108	82

Digitized by Google

THE QUEEN AGAINST OWEN

BY
Allen Upward

Author of "Secrets of the Courts of Europe," "The Prince of Calkistan." etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

ELEANOR MARGARET OWEN is charged with the murder of her benefactress, Ann Lewis. Charles Prescott is in love with Eleanor, and holds the brief for the prosecution, while his friend, George Tressamer, is also in love with Eleanor, and holds the brief for her defence. The prosecution is vigorously pressed by John Lewis, deceased's nephew. The case comes on at the Mynyddshire Assizes. The result of the cross-examination of Lewis by Tressamer is that public suspicion, which, for a time, rested on Lewis, is completely removed. The examination of witnesses continues, and the court adjourns. On re-opening, Tressamer commences his speech for the defence.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE DEFENCE.

"MAY it please your lordship. Before I go into the case for the prisoner, I have to submit that the Crown has not produced sufficient evidence to warrant a conviction.

"It has been laid down by the authority of Lord Hale, which your lordship will find quoted on page 276 of Archbold, that no man should ever be convicted of murder or manslaughter on circumstantial evidence alone, unless the body has been found; and in a comparatively recent case—Regina v. Hopkins——"

"Yes, I know that is the law, Mr. Tressamer," said the judge, interrupting him; "but how do you say the body has not been found? The prosecution have identified the hand."

"I submit that is not sufficient, my lord."

"The coroner's inquest was held upon it," called out the counsel for the prosecution, who was decidedly taken by surprise at this unusual objection. Tressamer treated the interruption with contempt.

"The coroner is hardly an authority to quote to this court. Your lordship sees my point is this. Of course the finding of the hand is some evidence of some crime. But it is nowise decisive. The deceased, or, rather, the person said to be deceased, might have cut off her own hand. We have no conclusive evidence that she is really dead."

"But what do you want? Do you mean that in every case the entire body should be found?"

"Oh, no, my lord. If some vital part were discovered, and sufficiently identified, I should say that was enough to go upon. But what Lord Hale means, I take it, is this: that where you are going upon circumstantial evidence—as in this case—where no one saw the crime committed at all, then you must have conclusive evidence from some other source, namely, the dead body."

"But that is not conclusive. That might be the result of suicide."

"Still, it affords a very strong presumption. In any case, there is the rule, laid down by Lord Hale, and acted upon ever since."

"I know, Mr. Tressamer; I am not disputing the law. The only question in my mind is whether this case is not taken out of it by the production of what is part of the body. Of course, I will leave it to the jury to say whether they are satisfied that this is the deceased's hand, if that is any use to you."

"No, my lord, I don't know that I can hope to contest that. But this is a case of life and death, and I certainly would strongly urge your lordship to consider my point."

The judge got up.

"I will just go and ask my brother Wiseman what he thinks," he said. "Personally, I am afraid I cannot go with you."

He went out, and Tressamer sat down in a state of intense agitation. He dare not look round at the dock; but others did, and saw, to their surprise, that the prisoner seemed indifferent to what had just passed.

Eleanor did not want to get off on a law point. Without a real, full acquittal her life, as she had told Tressamer, would be too wretched to be worth preserving. And even an acquittal would not be enough while the mystery of her friend's death was left unexplained. Only the full clearing up of the whole story, only the exposure of the real criminal, could bring peace back into her life.

Digitized by Google

She showed no disappointment, therefore, when the judge returned, with a grave face, and took his seat, saying:

"The trial must proceed. My brother Wiseman inclines to your view, but I am dead against it. I will, of course, reserve the point for the Court for Crown Cases, if you desire."

"If your lordship pleases," said Tressamer.

This was exactly what he had wanted. He now had the chance of getting an acquittal from the jury before him, and, if that failed, of succeeding on the point reserved in the court above.

He rose and said:

"I have one witness to call as to the state of the prisoner's health. I shall, therefore, say nothing now, but call my witness, and address the jury after. Alfred Benjamin James."

A respectably-dressed man stepped into the witness-box.

"You are a chemist, carrying on business at Porthstone. And you have known the prisoner some time?"

"All her life, sir."

"Now, have you advised her recently as to the state of her health?"

"I have."

"Will you just tell us briefly what she has spoken to you about?"

"For some time before the day of the murder she had been unwell. She came to me and asked me to give her something to make her sleep at night. I persuaded her to do without anything, and to take a walk before going to bed instead."

"Yes, and what else?"

"The last night but one before the murder she came to me complaining of nervous headache. I gave her something for it and advised her to go for long walks, two or three miles or more, so as to tire herself out before going to bed. She said she had mislaid her latchkey lately, but would ask Miss Lewis to let her have another, as she thought Miss Lewis had a spare one."

"She came to me complaining of a nervous headache."

This statement caused the jury to prick up their ears. Even they had realised by this time that something in the case turned upon a latchkey.

No further questions were put to the witness by Tressamer, and Pollard saw no opening for cross-examination. The former, therefore, at once began his speech.

"May it please your lordship: Gentlemen of the jury——"

The counsel paused a moment, shook his robe out of the way, clenched his fists upon the table in front of him, and bent forward towards the jury with stern and solemn brow.

"I shall not weary you with the platitudes usual on occasions like this. I shall say nothing to you about banishing from your minds all you may have heard or read in the newspapers about this case, for I am sure it is unnecessary.

"Nor shall I say anything about the weight of responsibility which rests upon my shoulders, because, after all, what is my responsibility to yours? If I make any mistake, if I fail after doing my best, I shall have the consolation of knowing that I am in no way to blame, I have not to answer for the result.

"But you have! In your hands are life and death! The hangman is your instrument; the judge upon the bench is but your assistant. Seek not to shirk your liability; do not trust to others to shield you. On the way in which you discharge your duty to-day depends the most solemn and awful of all considerations—a human life. If you by any prejudice, by any weakness, by any deference to superstition or authority, give an innocent fellow-creature to the tomb, it had been better for you that you had never been born!"

The twelve men in the box shifted themselves uneasily under this indignant apostrophe. They had expected to be cajoled. They found themselves threatened. The rest of those present looked on amazed, and held their breath to listen. The speaker seemed perfectly indifferent to the impression he was creating around him. He glanced at neither the judge nor the prisoner, but fixed his searching eye upon the dozen men he was addressing.

"You know your duty as well as I do. You know you must not give a verdict upon suspicion, no, not though that suspicion were as dark as Erebus, as heavy as lead. You must have proof. You must have certainty. You must know how this crime was done, and why and wherefore, or you must acquit the prisoner."

Digitized by Google

It is only under great provocation that a judge will interrupt the counsel for the defence in a case of life and death, but Sir Daniel Buller frowned and fidgeted as he listened to this extreme view of a jury's duties. However, he reflected that he would have the last word. He could afford to wait until the summing up. Meanwhile he took up his pen and made a note.

"Now, gentlemen, let me say this to you, and let me enforce it with all the earnestness I can command—the fact that a murder has been committed is no evidence whatever against the prisoner at the bar.

"No one denies that the crime has been committed. To do so were absurd. Elderly ladies do not disappear mysteriously in the night like this unless somebody has an interest in making them disappear. The whole question for you is this: Had the prisoner any such interest?

"Something has been said in this case about jewels. A question—a shamefully leading and improper question—was put by the counsel for the prosecution—the junior counsel, who seems to have brought to his work a bitterness and an amount of prejudice against the unhappy prisoner which is fortunately rarely met with in a case of this kind; a demeanour which presents a contrast, indeed, to the moderate and judicious tone adopted by my learned friend, Mr. Prescott, whom I was sorry to see summoned elsewhere—a question, as I was saying, was put to the prosecutor, Lewis, who was only too ready to take a sinister hint, with a view of making him swear that the prisoner knew something about those jewels, about which so much prejudice has been imported into this case. Gentlemen, you know nothing about jewels. No evidence has been put before you to-day as to anything of the sort. So far as you or I can tell, the prisoner was never aware of the existence of such things. We are bound to assume—you are bound by your oaths to assume—that there was no such motive to operate upon the prisoner's mind. What motive was there then?

"Gentlemen, from the beginning to the end of this case not one motive has been suggested, not one syllable has been uttered from first to last, to account for the theory which you are asked to accept, that a young, beautiful, well-cared-for, and well-brought-up girl has suddenly, without the smallest provocation, developed the instincts of a cannibal, and committed a shocking and ferocious murder under circumstances which would revolt the most bloodthirsty of savages."

Every word was emphasised by look and gesture. Every word went home to those who heard it. The crowded Bar stared in astonishment. They had not believed their colleague to possess such force. But he went on with hardly a pause.

"You have been told that this is a prosecution on behalf of the Crown. I deny it. Technically it is so, of course. But who is the real prosecutor? Who has been the moving spirit all along—if not the prosecutor, then the persecutor? Who has lost, or professes to have lost, his wretched jewels? Who, the moment he heard that the crime was discovered, turned round and hurled his brutal accusation at this helpless girl? Who rushed off to lodge his information, so as to be beforehand in case any information were to be lodged against him? Who instructed the solicitors at the inquest? Who gave evidence there and at the police court? Who has been hand in glove with the prosecuting solicitors all along? Who is sitting by their side at this moment, without a particle of decent shame?"

This furious burst of invective seemed to fairly overwhelm the subject of it. He made a movement to go away, but the solicitor restrained him by a whisper in his ear.

"Gentlemen, I am here to defend the prisoner. I am not here to attack anyone else. I do not wish to do so. Would to God that I could shut my eyes to the fact that a terrible murder has been done! But I cannot, and you cannot. Someone did that deed. Someone who had a motive for his act treacherously murdered, and brutally mangled that old, feeble, defenceless woman. I ask you to say it was not the prisoner. I ask no more.

"In the old days it would have been different. It was once the law that when a prisoner was accused of murder by a coroner's inquest, then the jury in this court were not entitled to bring in a verdict of acquittal unless they at the same time, and by the same verdict, indicated the person who was really guilty. If that were still the law—and I am glad it is not—but if it were, I should not hesitate for one moment in pointing out to you at least one person who is more likely to have been guilty of this crime than Eleanor Owen.

"I should ask you, in the famous Ciceronian phrase, Cui bono? For whose profit was this murder? You have been told by a spiteful servant-girl, whom you may believe for aught I care, that Miss Lewis once promised to remember the prisoner in her will. But did she? In the will which has been proved—and if there was any other will it has been destroyed by the same criminal hands that dyed themselves in blood—in a will dated two years ago, there is not one stiver, not one half-farthing, left to Eleanor Owen; but the whole of the testatrix's property, amounting, I believe, to between twenty and forty thousand pounds, is given unconditionally to her beloved nephew, John Lewis!"

What a depth of sarcasm on the word "beloved" as the barrister brought it out! The object of this terrible attack fairly writhed in his seat.

"Mind," resumed the speaker, "I am not responsible for the suggestion that this crime was committed for the sake of profiting under this poor woman's will. That suggestion came from the other side, prompted, I dare say, by the man Lewis himself. What applies to the prisoner applies to him. As far as motive is concerned—and I am now dealing solely with the question of motive—everything is against the prosecutor, and everything is in favour of his victim.

"And now to examine more closely the evidence, such as it is, of the way in which this crime was brought about. It must have been done after ten that night. So far I agree with the prosecution. Now, where is the evidence as to the prisoner's doings that night?

"We know—we have it from the witnesses for the Crown, and from the respectable chemist, James—that she had been unwell, and had been in the habit of taking midnight walks for some time previously. She took one on this particular night. I do not deny it; I admit it. I demand of you to believe it. She went out at twelve, or rather before, let us say, just as the spiteful servant-girl told you. She went out, leaving the door latched, but not bolted, and she walked in an easterly direction along the shore, where the fisherman met her.

"And I want you to note here for a moment how the evidence for the prosecution has been coloured even in small things. As you have heard, the body, or rather the hand, was found next day at the entrance of Newton Bay. Now, as most of you know, Newton Bay lies to the east of Porthstone, some two miles further along the coast. When the fisherman, Evan Thomas, met the prisoner, she was nowhere near Newton Bay, and she had not the smallest intention, so far as we know, of going there. She was simply strolling up and down the Porthstone Esplanade, and her face happened to be turned towards the east when she was met by him. Yet, how is his evidence put before you? 'I met her. She was going in the direction of Newton Bay.' Gentlemen, I say that is a poisoned answer. It is a poisonous suggestion to your minds that the prisoner was actually going to Newton Bay—was making for it at the time. Why didn't they say that she was going towards the tennis-ground, or the Grand Hotel, or the bathing-place. All these lay in the same direction, and there is not a tittle of evidence to show, there is not the smallest reason to suppose, that she ever went a yard beyond those places.

Digitized by Google

"That is how the prosecution has been conducted throughout. That wicked servant, who practically admitted that she nursed a dislike to her young mistress, got into that box, I put it to you, for the deliberate purpose of making the case against her as black as she could. In reality her evidence was strongly in the prisoner's favour, as I shall point out to you. But she, too, was instructed, or was taught by her own evil nature, to so distort the facts as to make them bear an appearance against the unhappy girl who is on trial for her life.

"First, we have the incident of the groan. On that subject I ask you to accept her first story, that it was a mere troubled exclamation in sleep, if it was really heard at all, which I may be permitted to doubt. For when a witness exhibits such recklessness and malice and wilful perversion of the truth in a case of this solemn character, I cannot willingly believe that any jury of Englishmen will consent to take away a human life on such testimony.

"Then we come to the incident of the prisoner's going out. Good heavens! what colouring is put into a simple incident like that! The prisoner, as we now know, and as this wretched woman doubtless knew perfectly well, often went out at night. She suffered from some nervous attack, accompanied by insomnia, and the chemist, Mr. James, whom the counsel on the other side, with all his bitterness, dared not cross-examine—Mr. James told you that he had himself advised her to take these walks at night. Do you believe him? Do you think a respectable tradesman—I may almost call him a professional man—would come into the box and perjure himself on such a subject? Hardly. It would be too much to expect. I do not think that even my learned friend will ask you to say that Mr. James has committed perjury, though I have no doubt at all that Lewis would like to have it suggested."

There was an intense bitterness in the way in which he brought out Lewis's name. Unconsciously the jury began to be influenced by it, and to look at Lewis each time he was referred to with undisguised aversion.

"Yet how this simple incident is magnified and invested with importance and mystery by the other side—by Lewis and his friends! They tell you how the servant awoke at midnight—you know it is an absurd trifle, but the word "midnight" sounds so much more solemn and dreadful than the words "twelve o'clock p m."—how she woke at midnight and heard a door open—as if people didn't always open doors when they wanted to go out! How she got up quietly—perhaps you may be inclined to say treacherously—and stole downstairs. How she recognised the footsteps as those of Miss Owen. How she heard the front door go, and finally found it unfastened, except for the latch. And all as if something very dreadful had taken place, instead of the ordinary incident of a young lady going out for an hour to walk off a headache!

"And, after all, what does it come too? Why, it sounds ridiculous, but the whole end and result of all this is to prove the very thing which I am most anxious to have proved on behalf of the prisoner—namely, that she was out of the house when this murder was committed. They have tried to incriminate the prisoner, and they have ended in proving an unimpeachable alibi!"

He stopped to let his words sink into the minds of the jury, and everyone in court took advantage of the break to change their positions and breathe more freely. Whispers were exchanged, and the feeling began to prevail that a good point had been made, and the prisoner might very likely get off.

"With what happened after that the prisoner has nothing to do. Mr. Lewis and his friends do not seem to realise, what I hope you will realise, that the fact of footsteps being heard a few minutes after is the strongest point in the prisoner's favour. Why, if no one else had been heard to enter the house on that night it would have looked bad for her. But that is just what the prosecution, in their blind mismanagement, have proved. They have shown out of the mouth of their own witness that someone did come in; someone who had been waiting outside ready to come in, and who took advantage of Miss Owen's exit to slip in by means of a latchkey which he had found, or stolen, or borrowed from the deceased.

"Now you have the clue. This girl, who stated that ten minutes had elapsed, when it must have been only three, to judge by her notions of time in other matters, this same girl wanted to insinuate that the footsteps she heard the second time were the prisoner's. Gentlemen, I ask you frankly not to believe it. I ask you to discount her evidence by the evident ill-feeling she manifested. I ask you to believe that the last footsteps were those of the murderer, and they were heavier because they were a man's.

"What else is there against the prisoner? I ask, what else? She came down late the next morning, forsooth! That is the reason why you are asked to send her in her youth and beauty to a felon's doom. Incredible! Monstrous! As if we all did not constantly get up late, for some reason or another. As if a person who had been out late the night before would not naturally oversleep herself. Why, if she had committed a crime she would have taken particular care to be down early. She would have tried to throw off suspicion by acting in her ordinary way. I am ashamed of answering such arguments.

"The latchkey incident is dead in her favour."

Here the jury, who had shown signs of weariness after their long sitting, brightened up again. They had made up their minds that this was the real point in the case, and were honestly anxious for light upon it.

"Two things are clear—first, that the person who last came into the house and did up the fastenings was the prisoner; second, that the prisoner had a latchkey, whether her own one found again or one which she borrowed from Miss Lewis. Now, if the prisoner had committed this murder, let us see what she would naturally have done in trying to throw suspicion off herself.

"In the first place, I say she would not have fastened up the front door. To do so was practically saying that the crime was not the work of an outsider. No, she would have left the door wide open, as if the criminal were some common robber who had carried off his booty and run away. In the second place, she would have thrown away her latchkey, so as to make it appear that she had not been outside. These points are so important that, with your permission, I will repeat them again."

Anyone who has had experience of juries knows how difficult it is to get into their minds a process of logical reasoning. To a trained lawyer such a thing is not so hard, but even to him it is far easier to master reasoning from a book than by word of mouth. Oral teaching has its advantages, doubtless, but few things are harder than to convey ideas of any subtlety by means of speech to an audience.

Tressamer patiently set to work, and for twenty minutes he repeated and explained all that he had been saying. When he thought that the jury really understood him he returned to where he had started from, and re-directed their suspicions on Lewis.

"Before I sit down I think I ought to suggest to you how this crime really was done. You have heard the story of the prosecution. Now let me put to you my story on behalf of the prisoner.

"The deceased woman was wealthy. About her jewels we know nothing, and I do not refer to them, but she had other property to a large extent. The whole of this was to go at her death to a nephew. For two years she lived alone in this house, alone night after night with the prisoner, and nothing happened. At last the nephew who was to inherit her wealth suddenly returned from the other end of the world. That night she met her death.

Digitized by Google

"At twelve o'clock her companion, who suffered from sleeplessness, went out for a long walk. Hardly had she closed the door behind her than the murderer stole up to it and made his way in. Probably he had a latchkey. We know that Miss Owen had mislaid hers. It may have been that. We also know that Miss Lewis had a spare one, and that her nephew was to take up his residence in the house on the very next morning. So that, mark this, if the murder had been deferred for one more day he would have fallen under the same suspicion as Miss Owen.

"The murderer entered, as I said, by means of his latch-key. But it was the first time he had used it. He did not know the peculiarity of the latch. He raised it too high, and it stuck.

"Not staying to notice this, in his wickedness, he passed into the house and upstairs. He tried the door of his aunt's --I mean the deceased's—room. It was, of course, locked,

"Then he carried off the body."

as it was found the following morning. He went into the next, Miss Owen's, which he knew to be empty, having seen her leave the house. Through this he passed into the adjoining chamber. Beneath the bed, in all probability, lay a chest of valuables. Charity would fain suggest that his first intention was merely to steal these, and that the blacker crime was, in a sense, forced upon him by the awakening of the sleeper.

"The next step was to remove the body. For what reason it matters not. It is an impulse with all murderers to conceal the traces of their guilt. They dig holes in the earth and bury it, they carry it into the wilderness and hide it, they sink it in the depths of the sea. But the earth will not contain it, the wilderness betrays the ghastly secret, the waves cast up the horror."

His voice rang through the crowded court like that of one possessed, and every man trembled.

"He lowered it through the window, where the traces were found next day. Then, clutching up his booty, and forgetting, it may be, that all would be his ere long, or possibly not feeling sufficiently sure of his heirship, he hurried down, with agitated tread, so that even the half-sleeping girl in the room above could discern a something strange about his walk. "Then he carried off the body, mutilated for some mysterious and terrible reason which may never be revealed—possibly to lighten his mysterious load; but let me spare you these shocking considerations. All this, remember, Lewis asks you to think was done by a young girl not twenty years of age."

The speaker's voice vibrated with the fury which he threw into this denunciation. The jury trembled under his eye as he rolled it fiercely from face to face. As for the object of these fearful invectives, he turned red and white by turns, and would have interrupted over and over again if he had not been almost forcibly restrained by the solicitor for the prosecution. Tressamer went on, after a moment's pause to recover from his exhaustion:

"And Eleanor Owen, what of her? What was she doing meanwhile? Pacing the shore and trying to soothe her throbbing head with the medicine of the sea breezes. At last she returns, tired and abstracted. She puts her key into the latch, the door yields before her. She notices nothing, but comes in, closes and fastens the door behind her, and retires to rest.

"The next morning she awakes. Just as she is dressed the servants rush up; the whole horror bursts upon her. She is stunned. She does not realise what has happened, or how it concerns her. She finds herself seized and dragged away by this devoted nephew and his creatures. And thus, gentlemen, in that state of darkness and bewilderment, has she rested ever since, and must rest till your just verdict sends her forth once more into the light of day, and the verdict of another jury, not less courageous and righteous than yourselves, sends the real author of this hidden tragedy to the doom he has now doubly deserved."

He sat down. But there was no applause in court, as happens so often at the end of a speech on the prisoner's behalf. All present felt that they had listened not so much to a plea for Eleanor Owen as to an accusation against John Lewis. The barrister had put it too plainly for any man to be deceived. It was not a mere question of guilt or innocence. The issue now before the jury was—which of these two is guilty?

(To be continued.)

Pearson's Shakespeare.

ON Thursday, the 4th of February, will appear the first part of a series of Shakespeare's plays, to be complete in thirty parts, published weekly.

Each part will consist of eighty pages and - - - will cost Sixpence. - - -

The volume, when complete, will contain

824 Illustrations,

drawn expressly for it by

SIR J. GILBERT, R.A.

These illustrations are considered to form the great work of his life.

The TIMES says:

"The pen, the pencil, and the printer have striven together in honourable rivalry, combining clearness of text, elegance of illustration, and beauty of type. The result is worthy of the labour, and we can say with a safe conscience to all who wish to receive or present the bard in a becoming dress, buy this ILLUSTRATED SHAKESPEARE."

1897 PROCLAMATION.

"OH, YES! REVENUES from ECONOMY are ENORMOUS."

The Richest Provision in Knowledge made absolutely easy for the Accumulation of this income. Write to Messrs. F. HODGSON & SON, Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds, who will provide you with full information, posting you free (if, when writing, you mention this Paper) a large, amazingly interesting, valuable, instructive, and detailed illustrated "Pioneer" Reduction Catalogue, showing you what you can save, what to buy and where to buy Carpets, Mats, and Hearthrugs of every manufacture, including Wilton, Plush, Brussels, Velvet, Antique, Foreign, and Furs, also Queen's Royal Household, Prudential, Eclipse and Alarm Carpets and Hearthrugs (Regd.). Also Blankets, Curtains, Sheetings, etc., and a thousand other articles wanted in every household. (Copyright.)

Gigantic Sale of the "Queen's Royal" Household Reversible Rich Turkey Pattern

CARPETS (Reg.)

Trade Mark on all Goods. Beware of Imitations.

Admittedly the Cheapest in the World. Woven without seam. Altogether superior quality, with handsome border to correspond. A marvel for excellence and beauty. Thousands of Repeat Orders and Testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction. When Ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

		Sale Price.			Sale Price.
6ft. by 9ft.		9/6	10½ft. by 12ft.		20/6
8ft. by 9ft.		11/6	12ft. by 12ft.		22/6
6ft. by 12ft.		12/6	9ft. by 15ft.		21/6
9ft. by 9ft.		13/6	12ft. by 13½ft.		25/6
9ft. by 10½ft.		15/6	12ft. by 15ft.		28/6
9ft. by 12ft.		17/6	12ft. by 18ft.		33/6
9ft. by 13½ft.		19/6	12ft. by 21ft.		38/6

A Queen Royal Hearthrug, 6ft. by 3ft., to match, 2/- extra.

SPECIAL OFFER.—Three for 5s. 9d., Six for 11s. 3d., Twelve for 22s.

COLOSSAL SALE OF RICH VELVET PILE

REAL BRUSSELS CARPETS

Extraordinarily Heavy, very Best Quality, Newest and Choicest Designs. In Old Gold, Sultan, Terra Cotta, Crimson, Sky, Navy, and the latest colours. With handsome border to correspond. Guaranteed to wear for years and give every satisfaction. The sizes and prices as follows (all ready for putting down):

REDUCED SALE PRICE LIST.

4½ft. by 7ft.	11/-	VELVET	9ft. by 12ft.	38/-
6ft. by 9ft.	18/-	PILE	11ft. by 12ft.	47/-
7½ft. by 9ft.	23/-	BRUSSELS	12ft. by 13½ft.	59/-
9ft. by 9ft.	28/-	CARPET	12ft. by 16ft.	69/-
9ft. by 10½ft.	33/-	SQUARES.	12ft. by 18ft.	77/-

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any colour preferred.

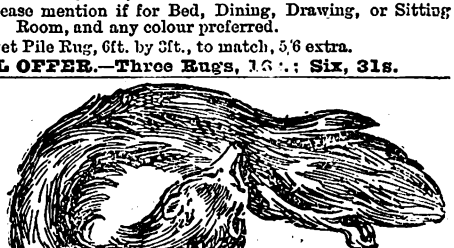
A Velvet Pile Rug, 6ft. by 3ft., to match, 5/6 extra.

SPECIAL OFFER.—Three Rugs, 16/6; Six, 31s.

AH! AH! THE MILDNESS OF THE SEASON HAS DONE THIS.

100,000 Ladies' Luxuriously Handsome, Rich Dark Brown

OPOSSUM FUR NECKLETS



With Life Imitation, Natural Head combined; a most elegant and soft fur, quite equalling in style anything offered at 15/6 each, and for durability not to be surpassed. Similar to illustration.

"SHORT STORIES" SPECIAL NECKLET COUPON. 23/1/97.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above (post free this week only) to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

POST FREE 4/6 WORTH TREBLE.

Cheques and P.O.'s payable to—
F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants,
Woodsley Road, Leeds. Telegraphic Address: "ECLIPSE, LEEDS." Telephone No. 948.

OUR NEW VENTURE.—Yes, Two different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright.)

IN THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (CHANCERY DIVISION), HODGSON v. WEBB BROTHERS.—On the 18th day of July, 1890, his lordship, Mr. Justice Chitty, granted an interim injunction, restraining Messrs. Webb Brothers, of Hackney Wick, from infringing Mr. Fredk. Hodgson's Trade Mark, "Eclipse," No. 93,774 (Leeds).

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ECLIPSE" CARPETS (Regd.)

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. We will forward direct from the looms to any address on receipt of amount, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, in our New (Reg.) Waterlily and Persian designs, the largest ever sold at the price, suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. An "Eclipse" Rug sent with Carpet 1/- extra.

Sale Price 3/6 Each.

SPECIAL OFFER.

Two Carpets and Two Rugs 8/-, or Four Carpets and Four Rugs 15/6.

P.S.—When this Design (registered) is wanted in Carpets or Hearthrugs, as above, kindly quote No. 268,493.

We Rely upon Spontaneous Repeat Orders from our Clients for the Maintenance of our Trade. Established nearly a Quarter of a Century. All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON. 23/1/97.

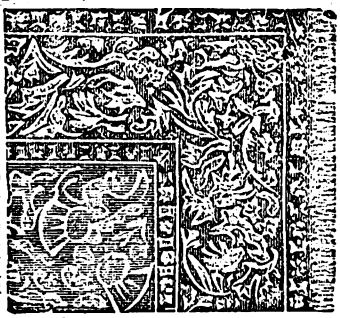
On receipt of this Coupon and P.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send any goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.
Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

PRODIGIOUS SALE OF THE "PRUDENTIAL"

REVERSIBLE CARPETS

(Registered).

Reversible, woven throughout with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in 12 sizes only. These carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine on one side the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian, and on the reverse the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.



REDUCED SALE PRICE.

Size.	Each.		Size.	Each.
6ft. by 9ft.	4/9	REDUCED SALE PRICE.	9ft. by 15ft.	12/6
7½ft. by 9ft.	5/11		12ft. by 12ft.	12/9
9ft. by 9ft.	7/6		12ft. by 13½ft.	14/6
9ft. by 10½ft.	8/6		12ft. by 15ft.	15/9
9ft. by 12ft.	9/6		12ft. by 18ft.	19/6
10½ft. by 12ft.	11/6		12ft. by 21ft.	22/6

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Regd.), to match above Carpets, sent for 1/6 extra, size 2yd. long and 1yd. wide. Special Offer. Three Hearthrugs for 4/3, or Six for 8s., or Twelve for 15/6. sterling value.

P.S.—When this Design is wanted in Hearthrug or Carpet, as shown above, kindly quote Registered No. 268,496.

F. HODGSON & SON, WOODSLEY RD., LEEDS.

Manufacturers, Importers and Merchants.

Telegraphic Address: "ECLIPSE, LEEDS," National Telephone No. 948.
N.B.—Foreign Orders executed and packed free, and shipped at lowest rates.

Digitized by Google

RESULT OF PRIZE COMPETITIONS ANNOUNCED IN THE CHRISTMAS DOUBLE NUMBER.

A VERY large number of persons entered for these competitions, which were altogether a great success. The scrap-books especially were most prettily arranged, and reflected great credit upon all the boys and girls who entered; it was, in fact, a most delicate task to decide upon the best twelve.

On page 115 will be found a reproduction of one of the best attempts in the Composite Picture and the Elephant Straight Line Competitions. Four competitors correctly named the idea which Farmer Hayseed forgot, and the prize of £10 was forwarded to the sender of the first to hand.

A large number of competitors succeeded in solving the two arithmetical problems, and the prizes have gone to those whose attempts first arrived at this office.

COMPETITION No. 1.

FARMER HAYSEED'S IDEA.

THE £10 winner:
HARRY F. FRASER,
Londesborough Arms,
Seamer, near Scarborough.

* * * * * *

COMPETITION No. 2.

ELEPHANT.

F. Gillott, 32, Regina Road, London, N.
James Smith, 19, Montrose Street, Glasgow.
C. W. Ayers, Kent House, Snodland, Kent.
Charles V. Walker, 12, Bridport Street, St. Ebbes, Oxford.
G. F. Saunders, 31, Clifton Place, Stapleton Road, Bristol.
Charles Cale, Colchester.
Miss D. Mann, 29, Mowbray Street, Heaton, Newcastle-on-Tyne.
Miss E. M. Westhorp, 12, Park Village East, Regent's Park.
G. H. Dodd, 37, Plymouth Street. C.-on-M., Manchester.
John C. Scott, 155, Comely Park Street, Dennistoun, Glasgow.
Miss B. Lindsay, 1, Mackenzie Street, Slough, Bucks.
Miss Ethel Simmonds, Sussex View, Tunbridge Wells.

* * * * * *

COMPETITION No. 3.

COMPOSITE PICTURE.

Lindsay Harman, 75, High Street, Bromley, Kent.
C. Puttock, 13, Elgin Terrace, Maida Vale, W.
John E. Scott, 153, Comely Park Street, Dennistoun, Glasgow.
J. Rawland Atkinson, Finkle Street, Kendal.
William McBeath, 45, W. Preston Street, Edinburgh.
Harry Nobbs, 67, Frobisher Road, Hornsey, N.
Edwin Bottomly, Bryn Berllan, Llandudno Junction, near Conway.
John McGarth, 51, Sultan Street, Belfast.
J. M. Child, 4, Cromwall Street, Mount Pleasant, Swansea.
Fred Solo, Theatre Royal, Bradford, Yorks.
George McIntyre, 40, Nithodale Road, Strathbungo, Glasgow.
G. T. Harwood, 137, Harrington Road, Workington.

* * * * * *

COMPETITION No. 4.

COIN.

John Hamer, 3, St. David's Road, Carnarvon, N. Wales.
F. W. Flower, Sibsey, Boston, Lincolnshire.
G. A. Porter, 4, Oak Avenue, Urmston, near Manchester.
A. Keniston, Hinton St. Mary, Blandford, Dorset.
H. W. Spice, 21, Lavender Street, Brighton.
L. C. Knighton, 167, Choumert Road, Peckham.
J. H. Osborne, 19, Sunnyside Road, Ealing.
S. L. Hayton, Star Inn, Newlyn West, Penzance, Cornwall.
J. Pan, Constitution Hill, Aberystwith, Wales.
W. Brown, 132, Kent Road, Glasgow.
J. J. Smith, 379, High Street, Cheltenham.
T. H. Fisher, 162, Waller Road, New Cross, S.E.

* * * * * *

COMPETITION No. 5.

Answer—1800 SOLDIERS.

Mrs. F. Davies, 3, Brunel Terrace, Woodford Bridge, Essex.
Mrs. E. Easton, Flower Lodge, Marble Hill, Cork.
Miss E. Handley, 36, St. John Street, Hanley, Staffs.
Mrs. A. F. Gadsdon, Belle Vue, Westwood Park, Forest Hill.
Emily E. Battle, 116, Alexandra Road, Ford, Devonport.
Miss Warman, The Gardens, Eastnor Castle, Ledbury.
S. A. Pilkington, 22, Lincroft Street, Moss Side, Manchester.
Miss E. Smith, Litfield House, Portishead, near Bristol.
Miss C. E. Wright, 65, Woodgrange Road, Forest Gate, Essex.
Miss Motterhead, 17, Norfolk Street, Hyde, Cheshire.
Miss S. Sides, Union Street, Bridgtown, Staffs.
Miss J. Duncombe, Keymer, Hassocks, Sussex.

COMPETITION No. 6.

SCRAP-BOOK.

Hilda D. Clewlow, Tunley Street, Stone, Staffs.
Kate Williams, 42, Alwyn Street, Aigburth Road, Liverpool.
Ethel Chappell, 19, Murray Place, Stirling, N.B.
Gertrude Page, Victoria Coffee House, Victoria Road, Romford, Essex.
K. L. Davies, 12, Pembridge Crescent, W.
E. Strong, 6, Hunter Street, Carnforth.
W. A. Slade Gosling, 4, Pretoria Avenue, Walthamstow.
A. Webb, 2, Oak Place, Malvern Link.
C. Agnes Cowell, 11, North Street, Fleetwood.
Rhoda Gilbert, 16, Tallow Hill, Worcester.
Hilda F. Gross, 69, Mill Hill Road, Norwich.
Dolly Lewis, 62, Mount Road, Hastings.

* * * * * *

COMPETITION No. 7.

ANAGRAM—"GUILTY GOLD," BY HEADON HILL.

D. Elder, 7, St. Vincent Street, Edinburgh.
Miss R. Napthin, 3, Ditton Walk, Cambridge.
J. A. Walbank, Usworth, Washington, R.S.O., co. Durham.
W. Millard, The Schools, Ascot, Berks.
Mrs. Lywood, Redlynch, Salisbury.
H. Winslow, 8, Firhill Road, Glasgow.
James Galbraith, 1, Park Terrace, Paisley, N.B.
C. A. Elliott, Galley Hill, Greenhithe, Kent.
Mrs. Stanley, 30, Garturk Street, Govanhill, Glasgow.
George W. Blake, 4, St. Martin's Terrace, Salisbury.
F. J. Etherington, 74, Hythe Road, Swindon.
Mrs. Joseph Holmes, Westbury Street, Brood Lane, Laisleredyke, Bradford, Yorks.

* * * * * *

COMPETITION No. 8.

ANAGRAM—"VALDAR THE OFT-BORN," BY GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Alex. Reoch, 14, Forest Park Road, Dundee.
W. Gyde, army schoolmaster, Warley, Essex.
Mrs. J. Read, Forest Lodge, Alnwick, Northumberland.
Horace H. Dunmore, 22, Albion Place, Northampton.
Miss Jeannie Graham, 32, Epworth Street, Belfast.
C. A. Elliott, Galley Hill, Greenhithe, Kent.
Mrs. A. Beck, 4, Victoria Villas, Herne Street, near Canterbury, Kent.
W. P. Armstrong, 12, Arboretum Avenue, Lincoln.
J. Green, 183, Chapel Street, Leigh, Lancashire.
Harry Page, Gordon Place, The Hundred, Romsey, Hants.
F. Goodwin, 1, Rutland Gate, Claremont Park, Blackpool.
John W. Box, 7, Brook Street, Lancaster.

* * * * * *

COMPETITION No. 9.

"THE FINAL WAR."

TOM'S AGE, 14 YEARS. | GEORGE'S AGE, 10 YEARS.

THEY KILLED

63 PARTRIDGES. 45 PHEASANTS.

Job Sides, Union Street, Bridgtown, Staffordshire.
Harold E. Fairdide, 2, Prospect Place, High Road, Upper Clapton.
A. Pelkington, 22, Lincroft Street, Moss Side, Manchester.
D. C. Woods, 14, Guernsey Road, Magdalen Road, Norwich.
G. T. Watson, 31, Salisbury Terrace, Darlington.
C. P. Cox, 63, Stonefield Road, Hastings, Sussex.
Mrs. A. F. Gadsdon, Belle Vue, Westwood Park, Forest Hill.
Miss A. Kidd, 416, Woolwich Road, New Charlton, Kent, S.E.
F. F. Feltham, 73, Hawthorn Street, Totterdown, Bristol.
Mr. E. Simm, New Chapel House, Balderstone, near Blackburn.
R. N. Pudney, c.o. Herring and Son, Chertsey, Surrey.
Howard Lewis, Newsagent, Builth Wells, South Wales.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

1/2 A MILLION 7/6 FULL DRESS LENGTHS TO BE CLEARED AT 6S

BLACK, NAVY, GREY, AND SEVERAL CHARMING SHOT EFFECTS

Patterns of the above, also SALE PRICE LIST, Post Free.

CLEARANCE PRICES quoted for Dress Goods, Mantlings, Suitings, Flannels, Flannelette, Calico, Shirtings, Blankets, Quilts, Sheets, Towels, Gloves, Corsets, Stockings, Handkerchiefs, Umbrellas, etc.

TREMENDOUS REDUCTIONS IN EVERY DEPARTMENT.

FIRST ORDER OPENED MONDAYS, WEDNESDAYS, AND FRIDAYS SENT FREE AND CASH RETURNED.

Send to-day for Sale Price List and list of Lucky Winners.

REMNANT BUNDLES (containing 12 yards), in long lengths—Dress Serge 12/-, Calico 3/6, Flannelette 4/6, Union Shirting 7/9, Flannel 8/9.

LUTAS LEATHLEY & Co., Dept. 130, ARMLEY, LEEDS.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5, Sept. 1, £5, Oct. 1, £5, Nov. 2, £6. Dec. 1, £6. Jan. 2. 1897. £6.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

HAIR DESTROYED.

On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 26, Belvedere Rd., Lambeth, London.

DEAFNESS CURED.

On receipt of stamped envelope, a lady who cured herself of Deafness and Noises in the Head, after fifteen years of suffering, will send to all afflicted free particulars of the Remedy, which is simple, safe, sure and inexpensive. Address — Mrs. C. E. AUSTIN, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

THE

GREAT COUGH REMEDY, BRONCHONIA.

A Marvellous Remedy for Coughs, whether arising from Consumption, Bronchitis, or Asthma. Its efficacy is testified to by Eminent Physicians. Of all Chemists, 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per bottle. Post free, 2s. 9d., 4s. 9d., and 11s. 6d.—J. HOWARD & Co., 20 and 21, Queenhithe, LONDON, E.C. One Trial will prove its Efficacy.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TRILENE REGD TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

131, Victoria Street, London, S.W.—Mrs. ARTHUR WEGUELIN (the "Society" Celebrity) writes: "By simply taking the Trilene regularly, and without change of diet, I have lost 1st. 4lb. in 4 weeks."

Bretton West, near Wakefield.—"Miss L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.—Mr. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.—Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

127, Out Gang Lane, Old Radford, Notts.—Miss E. P. PARSONS says: "I was 16½st. before taking Tablets, and am now 15st.—going on nicely."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Pinsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

All Wool Underclothing.

HAWICK HOSIERY is the BEST.

Lamb's Wool Shirts and Pants, 3/6 each.
Men's Socks, 1/6 each.
Ladies' Stockings, 1/6 and 2/- each.
CARRIAGE PAID.

THE TEVIOT TWEED CO., HAWICK, N.B.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

TOO STOUT

If you require a reliable remedy for the relief of superfluous fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills. No starvation required; you may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5lb. to 7lb. weekly. They are a harmless vegetable preparation; successful in the most stubborn cases, and improve health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, tasteless, and highly recommended. Prices, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., post free, plain wrapper. PROFESSOR F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20

See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (250 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

A SUM of from 10s. to 20s. per week offered for spare time to either sex, everywhere; work can be done evenings.—Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 92A, Aldersgate Street, London.

CORPULENCY CURED

By a simple inexpensive self-treatment, effecting a rapid and permanent reduction without change in diet. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. G. A. BOYD, 14, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London.

BLUSHING.

Particulars of a self-treatment for a permanent cure, as prescribed by eminent physicians of the U.S.A., forwarded free to all sufferers on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. B. F. FIELD, 15, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London, W.

TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, Mrs. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

BLACKHEADS

or "Maggots," Pimples, Blotches, etc., immediately and permanently removed by my Skin Cleansing Lotion, "CUTISOLINE." Never fails. Hundreds of testimonials. Post free with directions, 1/6, 3/- and 5/-. AUSTIN LENNOX, Skin Specialist, 1, Shoe Lane, Fleet Street, LONDON.

"DRUNKENNESS"

CURED. A Lady having cured her husband secretly of intemperate habits, will gladly send particulars of the remedy on receipt of stamped envelope.—Mrs. S. S. BARRINGTON, 4, Featherstone Bldgs., LONDON, W.C.

JOHN JACKSON,

Skittle and Skittle Ball Turner,

113, PENTONVILLE ROAD,

LONDON, N.

Hornbeam Skittles; Sycamore Skittles; Four Corners; American Pins; Cheese Ball, Warranted; Round Ball, Warranted; Lawn Bowls.

FRAMES LAID AND REPAIRED.

Price List on Application.

Digitized by Google

How Time Flies! We have just entered upon a New Year—a year destined to be one of the most eventful of the present Century, which is so near. Will the earth continue to turn on its axis and roll us into the twentieth century? Some prophet has said "No!" But sensible people will only smile at such wild, improbable theories, and inquire to what extent the prophet would like to back his opinions. The closing Century has been an era of invention and scientific and chemical research; Steam, Electricity, and the Healing arts affording the most notable examples of man's progress, and marking the nineteenth as the grandest and most wonderful century in the history of

THE END OF

THE WORLD

During the present year we hope to see our beloved Queen celebrate the 60th year of her reign; we hope to find in the present year twelve months of good trade, good living, and good health. And the latter is the chief blessing; for what enjoyment can man derive from good living if good health be not in attendance? Everyone, therefore—man, woman, and child—should recognise the fact that for Bilious and Nervous Disorders, Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Sluggish Liver, and Female Ailments, no other medicine is required as long as a box of BEECHAM'S PILLS

IS AT HAND.

Beecham's Pills remain at the close of this century as great a public boon, and as fine a discovery in medical art, as they were more than fifty years ago, and have fully justified the public verdict that they are WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

Digitized by Google

A NEW SERIAL—"THE WRECKERS OF SCILLY"—COMMENCES TO-DAY.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 422. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 30TH, 1897. [ONE PENNY.

MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH — Sample Box Post Free, Two Stamps.
Produces beautiful, white, glossy linen. Saves time and labour. In 1d., 3d., & 6d. Boxes. Name this Publication.

BROMLEY'S COFFEE ESSENCE — Sample, 2d. to cover Postage.
Delicious Coffee at One Farthing per cup, prepared in two seconds. In 6d., 1/-, 2/-, 3/6, or 5/- Bottles. 6d. Bottle, Nine Stamps, Post Free.

RISIN' SUN METAL POLISH — Sample Bottle Post Free, Two Stamps
Gives to all metals a beautiful, soft, brilliant polish. In 1d., 3d., 6d. & 1/- Bottles.

C. CHANCELLOR & CO., LONDON, E.C.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

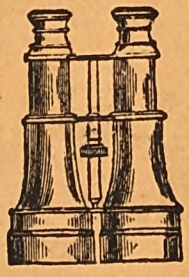
THEOBALD'S

GREAT SALE.

14 DAYS ONLY.

IMMENSE REDUCTIONS TO CLEAR WINTER STOCK AT ONCE.

Bulldog Revolvers, 5/6; powerful Pocket Cartridge Pistol, 3/-; King Air Gun, 4/-; Guinea American Extending Roller Skates, 5/-; Acme Ice Skates, 2/-; Wood Skates, 1/-; Lady's Hand Bag, 8d.; best Dressmaker's Scissors, 7in., 8d.; 8in., 10d.; superior Four Blade Pocket Knives, 8d.; Ladies' Silver Watches, guaranteed, 7/6; Gents', 8/6, 10/6; real Gold Rings, 4/-; real Gold Brooch, 2/6; Gold Pencil Case, 2/-; Magic Lantern and Slides, complete, 1/-; 12 assorted Games, 1/-; free; Mechanical Leotard, 8d.; Steam Locomotive, 9d.; powerful 8-lens Field Glasses, worth 21/-, 7/6; Saloon Cartridge Gun, 5/6; dozen best Tea Spoons, 9d.; dozen Forks, 1/6; half dozen Sheffield Table Knives, 1/6; Ladies' Twill Silk Umbrellas, fancy handle, 2/6; Gents', 4/6; Music Carrier, 6d.; 25/- Musical Albums, 10/6; 10/6 case best Mathematical Instruments, 5/-; 5/6 best American all steel Brace, 12in., 2/6; 1/8 best ivory Playing Cards, 11d.; best Stereoscope and dozen views, 2/-; large Melodeon, 5/-; pair Oil Paintings, on Easels, 1/-; Concertina, 2/-; rich tone Violin, 7/6; Banjo, 3/-; set full size Draughts, 6d.; 1/- Bottle best Scent, 8d.; Nickel Cigarette Case, 8d.; 2/6 best American Self-lighting Lamp, 8d.; £4 4s. Lockstitch Sewing Machine, 21/-; Illustrated Catalogue, 1d.



J. THEOBALD & CO.,

19, FARRINGDON ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

"I USED IT."

MOUSTACHES

Heavy and Handsome, Speedily Produced

BALD PATCHES ERADICATED BY USING ESAULINE.

TESTIMONIALS DAILY.

POST FREE (secretly packed) in British Isles,

1/6, 3/-, and 5/- from

S. S. KNOWLES & CO., 30, NEWGATE STREET, E.C.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & Co's CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

Digitized by Google

"SHORT STORIES" best suit the mood of this eager, restless age, so

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES,

Ready-made and to measure, may be briefly and simply set down as

"ABSOLUTELY the BEST VALUE in the WORLD."

MODEL 583 is one of the latest up-to-date designs made in that ideal fabric, The John Noble Cheviot Serge. It has a smart well-cut Bodice, with the back shaped to the figure and the front pleated at the waist.

10/6. There is a pretty Yoke Collar, and the whole is very daintily trimmed. The Skirt is a full, wide, tailor-made design. Price, for complete Costume, only 10/6; safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

SKIRT ONLY, as sketched, 5/6; carriage 6d. extra.

SIZES IN STOCK fit figures 34in., 36in., and 38in. round bust, under arms; skirts being 38in., 40in. and 42in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

COLOURS. — Black, Brown, Navy, Myrtle, Bronze-Green, Ruby, Cinnamon, Electric Blue, Fawn, Grey, and Petunia.

John Noble's Knockabout Frocks,

With long full sleeves, saddle top, and pocket.
Sizes 21 24 27 30 33 36 39 42 45in.
Prices 1/6 2/- 2/6 3/- 3/6 4/- 4/6 5/- 5/6
Sent Carriage Paid 4½d. extra.

"AN IDEAL SCHOOL OR HOLIDAY GARMENT FOR GIRLS."

AN UP-TO-DATE FASHION VOLUME, containing numerous choice designs of Ladies' and Children's Costumes, sent, together with Patterns, post free on application. PLEASE MENTION "SHORT STORIES."

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

RED WHITE & BLUE

FRENCH COFFEE.

Delicious for Breakfast or After Dinner.

In making, use rather less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary Coffee.

SOLD EVERYWHERE.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

TOO STOUT

If you require a reliable remedy for the relief of superfluous fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills. No starvation required; you may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5lb. to 7lb. weekly. They are a harmless vegetable preparation; successful in the most stubborn cases, and improve health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, tasteless, and highly recommended. Prices, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., post free, plain wrapper. PROFESSOR F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 26, Belvedere Rd., Lambeth, London.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
January 30, 1897.
No. 6.
S.S. S.S.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 6.
Jan. 30, 1897.
NEWSAGENTS
S.S. S.S.

REGD.

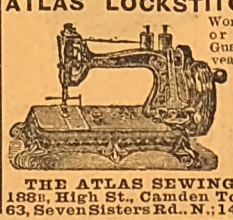
ONE BOX

Dr. Mackenzie's Improved

HARMLESS COMPLEXION WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire; clear, fresh, free from blotch, blemish, coarseness, redness, freckles, or pimples. Post free for 4/6.—S. HARVEY, 5, Denman St., London Bridge, S.E. Half Boxes, 2/9. Use Dr. MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL TOILET SOAP. Deliciously and expensively perfumed, at all Chemists' and Stores, 1/- per tablet, 3 in box, post free 2/6. Absolutely harmless. Beware of imitations.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

WAR! WAR!! WAR!!!

In consequence of the JAPANESE and CHINESE War we have on hand a large quantity of Pure Chinese Spun Silk Handkerchiefs (21in. square) suitable for PRESENTS. We offer these to the readers of Short Stories at the very low price of 1/1 (post free). This splendid offer will only be open for fourteen days, and will not be repeated. Address—

ATAR SYNDICATE,
28, Martin's Lane, Cannon Street,
LONDON, E.C.

WHY SUFFER FROM CORNS, BUNIONS, OR ENLARGED TOE-JOINTS, when a packet of Thompson's Celebrated French Corn Plasters will cure you? It is thin as silk, and can be worn with tightest boot. Post free for 14 stamps from M. F. THOMPSON, Homœpathic Chemist, 17, Gordon St., Glasgow. Thompson's Guide to Health postfree

OTTO-FREEZ

BEAUTIFUL TOILET SOAP.

Everyone should use it. It is so nice for the skin. VALUABLE COUPONS with every Tablet. Two Tablets sent post free 1/-.

THE OTTO-FREEZ CO., 66, High St., Camden Town, LONDON. N.W.

Digitized by Google

A FEAST OF FICTION

No. 422.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending January 30th, 1897.

THE MURDERS AT LITTLE BELTON.

I.

THE actual facts of the Little Belton tragedy were simplicity itself. Bessie Fothergill, the organist of the parish church, was found dead in the organ-loft.

At seven o'clock in the evening there had been the usual choir practice, after which Miss Fothergill had stayed behind for her own private practice. As she did not arrive home by ten o'clock, her brother, Edgar, went in search of her, and, to his horror, found her huddled up on the pedal-board, quite dead.

The body was at once conveyed to the "Queen's Head," and a doctor sent for. There were no external marks of violence, and only when the body was undressed was a small puncture discovered in her back about three inches from the nape of the neck. The village doctor probed this wound, and in a few minutes extracted a hollow steel dagger one tenth of an inch in diameter at its thickest part. The blade had broken off, leaving five inches of steel in the wound, and thus any flow of blood was prevented.

These were the sole particulars communicated to Inspector Dawson on his arrival from the Bradlington Police Office.

If ever there were mysteries on the face of the earth, this was one of them, and the strangest part of the affair was the apparent absence of all motive. The murdered girl had led a quiet, uneventful village life. Music she had learnt principally from her mother, once a celebrated pianist until rheumatism destroyed the technique of her touch. The girl had been apprenticed to the late organist, and on his death succeeded to his post and pupils. Lovers she had none, although a fairly pretty girl, simply because her thoughts were too much taken up with her profession to admit of a man coming between her and her beloved art.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

She had no enemies, because, being poor, she had few friends. No one benefited by her death; on the contrary, she was a loss to the village in many ways, and to her own family in particular. Her father had died in her infancy, her only brother Edgar was an agricultural instructor, and brought but little grist to the family mill. The mother's income was very limited, consequently the deceased girl's earnings were no little help to the household.

On the evening of the murder the door of the church was left wide open by the choir when they left after the practice. The staircase leading to the organ-loft commenced at the porch, and the door at the foot could not be opened from the outside without a key.

There was but one key, and this Miss Fothergill always kept herself, as she was personally responsible to the churchwardens for the good condition of the organ. The schoolmaster, who had been the last to descend the loft steps, affirmed on oath at the inquest that he had shut the door and pushed it to make sure that it was properly closed. "I have daughters of my own," he added, "and I never liked to know that the girl was alone and altogether unprotected in the church."

The Inspector made the customary examinations with stereotyped assumptions of mystery and importance. He went through every possible motive for which the crime could have been committed. But all to no purpose. As well might he have tried to discover what song the sirens sang or what name Achilles assumed when he put on the garb of woman.

The village population was commonplace and prosaic. The majority of the people were farmers or workers in the brickfields and tanneries with which the surrounding country abounded. There were about twenty moneyed families in the place, more or less endowed with this world's goods, and half-a-dozen professional men, but not the slightest suspicion of spicy adventure clung to any single one of them. Humdrum respectability was the dominant note of the place.

When all outward investigation was over, Dawson frankly admitted that the only clue was the broken dagger. It was most new, and of foreign manufacture, the name "Blanchi, Cia., Milano," being embossed round the circular blade. He wired to the police of Milan, inquiring about this firm, but was told in return that no such firm had ever existed in that city. Thus even this solitary link was broken, for, without a doubt, the assassin had taken the precaution of making away with the detached hilt.

In a week Dawson returned to Bradlington, and in less than a month Little Belton itself had ceased to be interested in the tragedy.

II.

SOME months after the death of Bessie Fothergill, Dawson's term of service expired. He had worked long enough in harness and had formed plans of starting life afresh as a private detective. If he could but unravel the Belton mystery, his future was assured. Impelled, then, by no motive of justice or duty, but simply by the wish to advertise himself, he determined to devote all his energy, skill and experience to the discovery of the murderer.

As luck would have it, circumstances so arranged themselves as to give him a facile opportunity of prosecuting his investigation. The post of organist had not yet been permanently filled up, and as Dawson was a fair musician, he offered himself for the vacant post. The salary he asked was merely nominal and his credentials were undeniable, so the churchwardens closed with his offer at once.

Accordingly, six months after the tragedy he was installed as organist and choirmaster of Little Belton church.

His disguise was complete. The long beard was done away with, and his moustache waxed and twirled; this, together with his long, lanky hair gave him the appearance of a veritable virtuoso.

He gave out that he had long lived abroad, studying music and art in the schools of Munich and Dresden. These harmless fictions, coupled with his decidedly foreign appearance, and accentuated, it must be confessed, by his diabolical grimaces and contortions at every discord, more than sufficed to procure him pupils by the dozen; in point of fact, Little Belton soon learnt to pride itself in having a real mæstre in its bosom.

It occurs to me, by the way, that I, Dudley Bertram, have hitherto omitted to state that I was the village lawyer, estate agent, and, though but thirty-eight years of age, was the general wiseacre to the village. In the course of my practice I had been to Bradlington times without number, and therefore knew Dawson quite well. Accordingly, at our second meeting I charged him with his identity, and he laughingly acknowledged it, confessing his motives for the masquerade. Naturally I, as a man of law, volunteered him every assistance in my power.

Many a talk we had over the crime. Sometimes he fancied he was on the scent of the murderer, and then was as gay as a schoolboy; but as each succeeding fancied clue turned out to be a mare's nest, depression seemed slowly to master him.

As legal adviser to the whole community, I was intimately acquainted with the history of every family in the place, which information I confided to Dawson. We turned over in our minds every single person, and not a soul escaped our careful exhaustive analysis. But nothing came of it.

One afternoon I was sitting in my private office, lazily looking over the Law Times, when my clerk announced Mr. Wortley, for by this name was Dawson known in Little Bolton.

"Mr. Dudley," he said excitedly, "I have a clue at last. Look what I have found."

So saying, he held up delightedly a piece of torn paper, nearly two inches square. It was apparently the top left corner of an ordinary sheet of note-paper, and these letters were plainly decipherable: "This is t . . . condemne . . . may pre . . . as noth . . ."

Dawson, with his excited imagination, easily filled up the rest of the missive, which, he confidently asserted, was a warning to the girl from someone who knew that her death was resolved upon. I agreed that his suggestion was plausible, and wished him every success.

"What do you intend doing now?" I asked, as he tenderly placed the scrap of paper in his pocket-book.

"My next move is at once to get leave of absence from the churchwardens for a week or two. Meanwhile, I will have the writing examined by an expert, and compared with the caligraphy of every adult in the place. It is my firm opinion that the writing, although angular and feminine, is that of a man. Look," he added, "the pen has been almost pushed through the paper. Some exertion has been required to write that letter, and in all probability the hand is disguised, for no man ploughs up paper in that fashion in his natural handwriting."

Digitized by Google

So saying, he left me for the church, for the day was Friday and he was almost due for the choir practice.

Poor Dawson! His to-morrow never came. That night he was found dead at the organ. A coil of copper wire was twisted round his neck and the poor wretch had been literally garotted.

On hearing the news I rushed at once to see the body. He had been already searched, his book was there, but the scrap of paper was gone!

III.

A MONTH after the panic caused by Dawson's tragic end, things went on pretty much as before in Little Belton. The little town had acquired a somewhat unenviable notoriety, but this was good for business and no one grumbled.

The Press throughout the land had affected the customary indignation and surprise. The police were blamed for remissness, the church authorities for negligence, and a stigma of possible criminality rested upon every able-bodied creature in the town.

A public meeting was held at the schools, resolutions were passed and—the matter ended there!

Certainly no sane man in Little Belton, with the awful fate of Dawson before his eyes, would care to interfere in things that did not personally concern him.

The pseudo-organist's late lodgings were soon occupied by strangers. A man and his wife, both evidently about thirty-five years of age, had taken the rooms.

In little more than a week this worthy couple had earned for themselves the execration of every right-minded inhabitant. The wife, Mrs. Harcourt, was a flashy, noisy little woman, while Harcourt himself was unmistakably "horsey"—an unpardonable sin in our latitudes. Despite the real or supposed vigilance of post-office officials it soon eked out that he was a betting man. Dozens of racing wires were delivered at 47, High Street in a week; consequently everybody treated the Harcourts with the silent contempt they were supposed to merit.

Harcourt called on me several times on business matters, generally requesting me to apply for money won over betting transactions. As we met purely on a professional footing there was nothing singular in my avoiding him as much as possible outside my office.

From the very beginning I could not bear the man. There was something in his looks which made me suspect that he had profounder thoughts than betting necessitated. More than once I caught him observing me closely from behind his paper in the station waiting-room. Was it possible, I asked myself, that he knew anything of the conversation that took place between Dawson and myself concerning that mysterious scrap of a letter?

My suspicions were fated to be speedily verified. One morning I received a wire summoning me to Bradlington to see an old client who was in trouble. He kept a large public house just outside the town, and was now summoned for allowing his premises to be used for betting purposes. I went up by the first available train. It would not be true to say that I was taken aback on entering the private bar to see Harcourt there quietly sipping a glass of bitter. On the contrary, the house was exactly the sort of place where he was most likely to be found. The moment he saw me he came forward, and, laying a heavy hand upon my shoulder, quietly said: "Dudley Bertram, I arrest you for the murder of Elizabeth Fothergill and George Dawson."

What I said or did, I know not. It matters little. I am to be hanged to-morrow—the sooner the better. All the world knows now that I am the murderer. At my trial I neither denied nor admitted my guilt, and consequently until the present moment I have carefully concealed the motives which urged me to the commission of these dreadful crimes. Dying, I burn a grain of incense to popular curiosity and give my story to the world.

Years ago, when a student at the Roman University, I joined a powerful secret society called the Giurati. On my return to England, bitterly did I repent my folly in so doing. Many a piece of dirty work have I been forced to perform for that gang of fiends. It is now nearly two years since I received the order to assassinate Bessie Fothergill. Against the poor girl the society had no grudge, but against her mother the villains had vowed implacable revenge. The father, it seems, had been a high official of the League, and in his dying delirium had revealed deadly secrets anent the plans of his associates. The mother, a shrewd, grasping woman, seized the situation at once, and made capital out of her information by selling these secrets to the Court of Austria. Her revelations brought nine men to the scaffold. Revenge at the hands of the Giurati is certain, if not always swift. They are too wise in their generation to resort at once to the assassination of their victim, for they know that death is, alas! too often no punishment at all. They determined to wait until Bessie was the main support of the home, and the joy of her mother's life. The murder of the daughter was to be the punishment of the mother. As is well known, Mrs. Fothergill became hopelessly insane on the night of the murder.

I murdered the girl, broke off the dagger, and in my terrified haste dropped the hilt into the pedal-board of the organ. There it was found by Dawson, and forwarded to headquarters.

After the discovery of my letter of warning, I knew that sooner or later I should be tracked down, and the murder of Dawson was planned at once. Slowly and gently dragging myself up the loft stairs I rushed upon him as he sat dreamily fingering the key-board, and twisting the wire around his neck rocked his body backward and forward until he breathed no more. I then searched for the scrap of paper—but it was gone!

Harcourt and his wife were private detectives who had been in the village since the murder, and I never knew it. The man palmed himself off as a traveller for various novelty companies, and so visited every house in the place, whilst his wife was at first disguised as a barmaid at the "Queen's Arms." Dawson knew them well, and they worked in conjunction. Before going to the church on the evening of his death he had given the fragment of letter into Harcourt's keeping. It was the handwriting expert's testimony that sealed my fate. From that day forward I was watched night and day, and Harcourt only deferred my arrest in the hope of discovering my motives for the crime. At my trial I maintained a stoic silence, solely in the vain hope of escaping the gallows on a plea of insanity.

And now I hear the procession being formed in the courtyard outside my cell. By straining my neck at the window I can see the cross-bar.

Ah! they are coming for me.

H. F. RUSSELL.

Digitized by Google

BUTTERCUP.

THERE was once a young Doctor, who, in spite of his youth, was so wise and learned, that the seven wise men of Greece, had they entered into a disputation with him during a visit to the upper world, would have stood before him like school boys.

This Doctor had gone out one morning early in spring into the open air, in order to hear the grass grow, for he also understood this, and as he wandered amid the light green of May and saw the many coloured marvels of the air, the butterflies flying about the star flowers, and heard how the crickets in the grass, the birds in the branches, and the frogs in the meadow brook sang their wedding songs, then he thought of his native village that he had left years ago in order to attend the university, and thought also of the small, black-eyed girl, who had given him a heart of ginger-bread as a farewell present and at the same time shed bitter tears, and he felt curious about it.

On the following day the Doctor packed his bundle, took his knotted stick in his hand, and walked out through the door, bearing joy and pleasure in his heart.

After three days he beheld behind the blooming fruit trees the blue slate roof of his native church tower, and the wind bore to him the mellow pealing of bells.

"The question is whether she will know me," said he to himself. "Scarcely, and I also will have trouble to find again the small Greta in an eighteen-year-old girl.

"But her eyes, her great coal-black eyes, they will betray her to me, and if I see her sitting before her door, on the stone bench, then will I step close up to her—and the rest will come of itself."

The Doctor threw his hat into the air and gave so loud a shout that he was frightened at his own voice. He looked anxiously round to see if anyone had witnessed his outburst, but—besides a field mouse, which fled hastily to its hole, nothing living was near.

With high beating heart, the scholar entered the village. The pealing of the bells was stilled, but instead could be heard the merrier fiddle and sound of flutes. A bridal procession moved through the narrow village streets.

The bridegroom, a young, portly peasant, appeared happy and proud; the bride, adorned with a glittering bridal crown, had cast her eyes modestly to the ground. But once she raised the lids, and the eyes, the great coal-black eyes, betrayed to the Doctor the girl who stepped beneath the bridal crown. And he, the unfortunate, turned and went back unrecognised upon the way he had come.

It was noon. Golden green gleamed the field, and where water flowed there had the sun strewn over it thousands and thousands of glistening rays. Light is pleasant, but that day it caused the Doctor pain, and, therefore, he shaded his eyes with his hand. So he stepped forward, and it pleased the traveller, who had already gone a long distance, when he looked upon a dust cloud moving towards him.

"Good friend," said the stranger, addressing the Doctor, "the sunlight blinds you. Is it not so?"

The Doctor assented to this.

"See," said the other, "there is no better remedy than grey spectacles, like the ones I wear. Try them," and with these words he took his spectacles from his nose and handed them over to the Doctor, who yielded to the man and put on the dark-coloured glasses. They really benefited his eyes. The sun lost its bright glare, the meadow with its red and yellow blooms, the trees, bushes and canopy of the heavens, all were grey, and the Doctor was pleased at this.

"Are the spectacles for sale?" asked he of the strange traveller.

"They are in good hands," returned he, "and I always carry several such spectacles with me. Take them as a keepsake, Herr Doctor."

"Ah! so you know me? And may I ask——"

"Who I am," interrupted the stranger. "My name is Growler. Farewell." With these words he struck into the field path and soon disappeared. But the Doctor pressed the grey spectacles fast upon his nose, and moved along.

Since this occurrence years had passed. The Doctor had become a crusty old bachelor and had forgotten to enjoy the world. He still went out into the open air, but the green of the trees and the magnificent colour of the flowers were no more in existence for him. He pulled up the plants and dried them. Then he laid the flower mummies between grey blotting paper, wrote beneath them a Latin name, and that was his greatest pleasure, if it could be called a pleasure.

Once in his excursions the Doctor came upon an out-of-the-way valley, in which flowed a brook that turned a mill. And as he was thirsty, he asked an old woman, who sunned herself before the door, if he could by chance have a drink. The old woman assented to this, bade the guest be seated, and went into the house. Not long after, a young maiden brought milk and bread, and placed both before the guest on the stone table.

Then it occurred to the Doctor that the maiden was not ugly, but on account of his grey spectacles he could not be positive, and he did not like to take them off, for he knew the sunlight caused his eyes to pain. Silently he partook of what was offered him, and then, as the miller's daughter would not take payment, he pressed her hand and left. But she looked after the melancholy man until he disappeared behind the thicket.

The meadow valley, in which the mill was situated, no doubt must have harboured many kinds of rare plants, for the learned Doctor returned again three days after his first visit and also called again at the mill. And he came yet more frequently, and was soon a welcome guest.

To the old grandmother he brought sugar, coffee and other practical gifts, and he entertained the miller with instructive conversation. To the blonde little daughter he directed never a word, but contented himself by once in a while looking at the fair one through the grey glasses, then the grandmother would gently nudge the miller and nod her head knowingly.

Digitized by Google

One day, after the Doctor had left the mill and gone along the ridge of the valley, he noticed a mole fastened in a mole-trap, which endeavoured by struggling to escape death from strangulation. The kind-hearted man approached, loosed the prisoner, and set him on the earth, after which the Doctor and the mole each went his way.

On the evening of the same day, as the scholar sat in his study, it so happened that a bat came flying in through the open window. It seemed very wonderful, for on the bat rode a little man not taller than a finger, and the little man dismounted and bowed low before the Doctor.

"What seekest thou here?" said he to the little one, not very affably. "Go to the fable writer and disturb not sensible people in their work."

But the little man would not be dismissed; he came nearer, sat down upon the sand-box and spoke:

"Am I not known to thee? I intend thee good, for to-day thou hast released me from a trying situation. I am the mole that thou released from the trap."

"Indeed! And who art thou really?" asked the scholar, and surveyed the little man through his spectacles. He was of small, dainty stature, and had the glasses not been grey, the Doctor would have noticed that the little one wore a green coat and a golden yellow cap.

"I am the meadow sprite, Buttercup," said the dwarf. "My servants attend the grass and herbs. One washes them with dew, another combs them with the sun's rays, and again another furnishes nourishment to the roots. The last named I was watching this morning, and in order not to be recognised, I took on the form of a mole. While in this form I fell into the trap from which thy hand freed, and now I am here to thank thee, and to offer thee a service in return."

"Well, let me hear it," said the Doctor.

"Thou art a learned man," continued the Buttercup. "Thou art acquainted with flowers and plants that grow in valleys and upon the mountains, in the forest and fields; but one flower thou knowest not."

"What one?" asked the learned man, interested.

"That is the flower they call heart's joy."

"No, this one I know not."

"But I do," said Buttercup, "and I will tell thee where thou mayest find it. If thou wilt go up to the source of the mill brook, which thou knowest, until thou comest to a rock, there thou wilt find a cave, which the people call the goblin's cavern. Before the entrance blooms the flower, heart's joy, but only on Trinity Sunday, at the hour of sunrise, and who then is at the place can pluck the flower. Hast thou understood all?"

"Perfectly."

"Then, farewell," said the little man, and then bestrode his flying steed, and flew out through the open window.

The Doctor, astonished, rubbed his forehead and shook his head. Then he buried himself in a volume which was bound in pigskin.

A couple of days after this event the beautiful miller's daughter sat at evening before the meadow mill, and near by her the grandmother. The spinning wheels whirred and the old woman told of Frau Berchta, the White Lady, who gave industrious spinners knots of flax, which afterwards changed into yellow gold, and of many more marvellous things. Also she told of the sleeping man who sat in the goblin's cave. Once in a hundred years he became visible, and if a maiden kissed the sleeping man three times, then was he released, and in reward became the maiden's own sweetheart. So the old woman related and the beautiful maiden listened and spun out the tale like the thread of flax which her white fingers twisted.

In heaven the stars appeared, and as it was the time when the elder blossoms droop, the eyes of the maiden were overcome with sweet weariness. She sought her chamber and went to rest.

In the night there appeared to her a little man who wore a green robe and yellow cap; and the little one seemed very friendly and said to the maiden:

"Thou lucky child: To thee and to no other is the sweetheart in the goblin's cavern allotted. This morning the sleeping man becomes visible; at sunrise he sits slumbering at the entrance of the cave, and if thou art not afraid to kiss him heartily three times upon the mouth, then hast thou broken the spell and won a sweetheart. But take great heed during the work of deliverance to speak no word nor make a sound, for otherwise the sleeping man will sink three thousand fathoms into the earth and must wait again a hundred years for his deliverance."

So spoke the wight and disappeared. But the maiden awoke from her sleep and rubbed her eyes. A sweet scent as of new-mown hay filled the chamber, and through a crack in the window shutter the grey morning appeared. Then the courageous maiden arose and dressed. She softly left the chamber and walked with tucked-up gown through the dewy grass towards the goblin's cavern.

In the branches the forest birds already stirred, and, half asleep, tuned their throats. The white mist sank to the earth and lay in streaks over the meadow, and the tops of the pines were coloured yellow. Then the beautiful miller's daughter stood at the entrance of the cavern, and there sat on a moss-covered stone a sleeping man, just as the little dwarf had previously predicted. The maiden came near and almost gave a loud cry when she saw the sleeping man so closely resembled the Doctor, for he even wore grey spectacles.

But the maiden fortunately remembered the warning of the dwarf and silently, but with heart beating high, drew near the sleeper in order to perform the pious and innocent work of deliverance; and it seemed to her not to be so distasteful as she had previously thought.

Softly she bent over the sleeping one and kissed him on the mouth. The man made a motion as if he would awaken.

The maiden kissed him the second time. Then the man opened his tired eyelids and looked at the maiden, who appeared ghost-like through the grey glasses.

But she remained steadfast and pressed the third kiss on his lips. This caused the awakened one to start up in such haste that the spectacles slid off his nose and broke into splinters on the stony ground. And he saw again, after a long period, the sunny verdure of spring, gay-coloured flowers and the blue heavens, and in the midst of all the splendour, a maiden beautiful as a May rose and slender as a lily. And he embraced her and gave her back the three kisses.

On a golden butterfly sat the meadow sprite, Buttercup, and kicked his little legs for joy. Then down he jumped, so that the flower shook violently, and went about his important occupation.

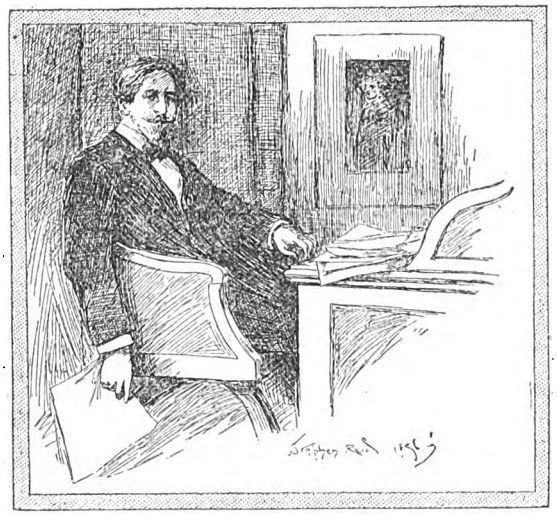
He had kept his word; the Doctor had found his heart's joy and the beautiful miller's daughter her sweetheart.

JANET STOYLE.

Digitized by Google

I.

"WILL monsieur the sous-directeur see Madame Blouet?" the clerk asked, opening the door of his chief's office. The sous-directeur's room was a large and lofty apartment, official in its furniture and appointments. Its two windows were draped with heavy, green damask curtains, the wall-paper and upholstery were of the same colour; the highly-polished floor reflected the severely simple furniture, and there was a black marble clock flanked by bronzes on the mantel-shelf. With his back to the fire, the sous-directeur, Hubert Boinville, was working at a mahogany desk covered with papers and official-looking documents. He raised his grave, melancholy-looking face, with its dark eyes and beard streaked here and there with grey, and looked at the card which the clerk held out to him. "The Widow Blouet" was written there in an old and feeble hand. The name conveyed nothing to him; he tossed the card aside.



Working at a mahogany desk.

"Show her in," he said resignedly. The clerk disappeared, and returned in a moment, introducing the visitor, who paused in the doorway to drop an old-fashioned curtesy.

Hubert Boinville half-rose from his seat and with a cold, polite gesture pointed an armchair to the stranger. She sat down, bowing her thanks.

She was a little, frail old woman, clad in neat but shabby black. The merino gown had been turned more than once; greenish shadows lay in its folds. A veil of rusty crêpe which had clearly done duty in more than one period of mourning hung limply from a bonnet of ancient shape and framed a round, plump face, ruddy, and wrinkled, like a winter apple. Her eyes were black and bright; her compressed lips showed the absence of many teeth.

"Sir," she began, a little breathlessly, "I am the daughter, widow and sister of Government officials who were good and loyal servants to the State, and I have addressed a petition for assistance to the Director of this department—I should like to know whether I may venture to hope that it will be granted."

The sous-directeur listened to these preliminaries impassively, he had heard so many of these appeals.

"Have you been helped before?" he asked phlegmatically.

"No, sir, up to the present I have managed to live without assistance—I have a small pension and——"

"Ah!" he interrupted drily. "In that case I fear we can do nothing for you. We have to help so many persons who have not the resource of even a small pension."

"Listen a moment, sir," she said desperately. "I have not told you all—I had three sons; they are dead. The last gave lessons in mathematics. Last winter, in going from the Pantheon to the Chaptal College in the pouring rain he caught a cold which turned to congestion of the lungs and carried him off in a fortnight. His lessons had enabled us to live, his daughter and me. The expenses of his illness and of his funeral drained my resources—I have been compelled to raise money upon my pension in order to meet the most pressing debts, and I am left with my grand-daughter to face starvation—at eighty-two. It is a great age, sir——"

Digitized by Google

Her eyes, beneath their wrinkled lids, had filled with tears.

The directeur had listened attentively to her story. The sing-song intonation and, here and there, a provincialism had struck his ears like once familiar music. The homely idioms had a flavour which he seemed to recognise and which gave him a singular sensation. He rang and asked for the papers in the case, and, when the clerk had placed them before him, he examined them with evident interest.

"You are a native of Lorraine?" he asked, less coldly.

"Yes, sir, from Argonne—you recognised my accent? I thought I had lost it after living so long in other parts of the country."

The directeur looked with growing pity at the old woman whom some rude wind had torn from her native soil, and finally thrown, after many wanderings up and down the arid paths of official life, into the great, heartless city. Little by little his reserve gave way; he almost smiled as he said:

"I also am a native of Lorraine, and I lived for a long time at Clermont, near your village. Take courage, madame; I trust that we shall be able to obtain the help you ask for. You have given your address?"

"Yes, sir; 12, Rue de la Santé, near the Convent of the Capucines. Very many thanks. Your kindness is a great comfort to me, and I am glad, too, to have found a compatriot," and the woman retired with many bows and humble reverences.

Boinville rose and went to one of the windows looking upon the garden which lay behind the office. It was not the great, leafless chestnuts, however, that he gazed at so intently; his eyes were fixed on things much more distant. Far away there to the east, beyond the chalky hills and plains of Champagne, he saw a valley bordering a great forest. A modest little river flowed through it, bathing with its yellow waters the walls of an old town.

It was there that he had lived as a child; thither he had returned for his holidays. There his father, registrar of the local court, had led the narrow life of the official who has only his salary to live upon. Strictly brought up, accustomed from his earliest years to a stern conception of duty and to hard work, he had left his native place when he was twenty, and had only once returned—to his father's funeral. Gifted with ability and an indomitable will, with a giant's capacity for work, he had rapidly climbed the official ladder, until, at the age of thirty-eight, he was sous-directeur of his department of the ministry—a very young man, his fellow-officials thought, for such an important post.

Austere and punctual, a martinet in matters of official routine, he reached his office each morning at ten, and remained until six, often taking work home with him. Naturally reserved—the instinctive self-defence of a sensitive temperament, he was looked upon as the type of the coldly correct bureaucrat. He went little into society, and his life had always been so busy that he had never had time to think even of marriage. His heart had, however, spoken once, when he was a youth of twenty, but as he was then in a very subordinate position, and without fortune, the girl he loved had repelled his advances, and had married someone else. This early disappointment had left a trace of melancholy which the success of his career had never quite effaced, and that evening the widow's story of her distress, told in the accent and dialect of his birthplace—that accent which one never forgets—brought home to him the loneliness of his life more vividly than he had ever realised it before.

Leaning against the window he turned over, as one stirs a heap of dead leaves, the recollections of his childhood, and the perfume of those happy years so long passed seemed to fill his whole being.

He returned to his desk and, taking the widow's papers, endorsed upon the margin:

"A worthy case. Petition granted"—then he rang and sent the packet to the chief clerk.

II.

ON the day that the grant received the sanction of the Minister, Hubert Boinville left the office rather earlier than usual. It had occurred to him that he would himself carry the news to Madame Blouet.

He found himself in a large garden.

Three hundred francs was a mere drop in the bucket of the ministerial budget, but in the widow's home it would become a fertilising shower. Although it was the beginning of December the weather was mild, and Boinville traversed the distance between his office and the Rue de la Santé on foot. It was growing dark when he reached his destination. By the aid of a gas-lamp he deciphered the number 12 over a door sunk in a long wall of rough masonry, and, pushing the door open, he found himself in a large garden. Two or three lights were shining through the trees, and he made his way towards them, meeting the gardener, who guided him to the widow's little house.

He knocked at the door, which was soon opened by a young girl of apparently some twenty years of age, who looked at the visitor with wide-open eyes.

She wore a black dress, and the lamp she held showed the golden lights of her waving brown hair, her rosy, dimpled cheeks, and clear blue eyes.

"Have I made a mistake?" Boinville murmured; "does Madame Blouet live here?"

"Yes, sir, please come in. Grandmother, a gentleman wishes to see you."

"I am coming," a shrill voice in an adjacent room cried—and a moment later the old dame appeared, untying her blue linen apron as she came.

"Sainte Mère!" she exclaimed, "is it you, sir? Pray excuse me—I did not expect the honour of a visit from you—Claudette, offer the arm-chair to monsieur—she is my grand-daughter, all I have left, sir."

Digitized by Google

Boinville sat down in an old, carved chair, covered with faded velvet, and, with a rapid glance, examined his surroundings. The room seemed to serve as parlour and dining-room combined. The furniture was meagre; a small stove in white faïence on a slab of red marble; on one side a large oaken cupboard; in the centre a round table, rush-bottomed chairs, and on the walls two or three engravings; the whole was singularly neat in its old-fashioned rusticity. He explained shortly the object of his visit.

"Ah! many, many thanks! my monsieur," the widow cried. "They may well say that 'it never rains but it pours.' Just think! the little one has passed the examination for a situation in the telegraphs, and while she is waiting for an appointment she has been doing some illuminating. To-day she has been paid for a large order she has executed, and we are going to celebrate the Feast of St. Nicholas, just as in the good old days. You remember the St. Nicholas, sir?"

"But, grandmother," the girl interrupted laughingly, "monsieur does not know what the St. Nicholas means. They take no notice of it in Paris."

"He knows very well, all the same. He comes from our own province, from Clermont."

"The St. Nicholas? Of course, I remember," the sous-directeur said, his sad face breaking into a smile; "to-day is the sixth of December."

The Saint's name had kindled a host of memories

"No, grandmother," the girl murmured, "it would be an impertinence."

which were flashing through his mind. He saw the great stone fireplace in the home of his childhood, decorated for the festival; he heard the seductive music of the fiddlers as they marched through the streets of the town gathering the lads and lasses together for the annual ball; he remembered how, in the early dawn, he would creep out of bed and run downstairs to the hearth to seize the sabots full of the toys the Saint had brought when he came down the great chimney riding on his white ass.

"So this evening," the old woman continued, "we are going to have all the old-fashioned dishes for supper. The gardener has given us cabbages and potatoes for a good potée; I have bought a Lorraine sausage, and when you came I was making preparations for the tôt-fait."

"Ah! the tôt-fait!" Boinville cried; "it is nearly twenty years since I heard it mentioned, the cake of eggs and milk and flour; how good it used to taste!".

As he sat, smiling at his recollections of the old-fashioned country dishes, the old woman drew her grand-daughter aside and seemed to be discussing some grave project.

"No, grandmother," the girl murmured; "it would be an impertinence."

"Why? I am sure it would please him," and as Boinville looked at them inquiringly she turned and said:

"You have already been very kind to us, monsieur; but I have one more favour to ask. It is growing late and you have a long way to go before you can dine—we should be much honoured if you would stay and taste our tôt-fait—should we not, Claudette?"

"Yes, grandmother, but monsieur would dine but poorly, and besides he is probably expected at home."

"No, no one expects me," Boinville replied, thinking of the restaurant where he generally ate his solitary meal; "I have no engagement, but——"

He hesitated, looking into Claudette's laughing eyes, then, with a cordiality he seldom displayed, he added:

"I accept, without ceremony, and with much pleasure."

"Ah! that is right!" the widow exclaimed gaily. "What did I tell you, Claudette? Lay the cloth and fetch the wine, while I see to the kitchen."

The girl had already opened the great carved press, bringing out a chequered table cloth and napkins. In a few moments the table was spread, and, taking a carafe, she left the room.

"She is a great comfort to me," Madame Blouet said; "she is so bright and cheerful. It will be but a poor meal for you, monsieur, but it is offered freely, and then it will remind you of old times, will it not?"

When the meal had come to an end, Claudette cleared the table, and her grandmother took up her knitting and sat near the stove. Soon, however, soothed by the warmth of the room, she dozed over her work. Hubert and the young girl thus found themselves practically alone, and Claudette bore the main burden of the conversation.

She, too, had passed her childhood at Argonne, living with an aunt; and she recalled many local stories and traditions with an exactness which almost made Boinville believe himself at home once more. The room was very warm, and Claudette had half-opened one of the windows, through which the breeze brought the scent of the garden below where the splash of a small fountain made itself heard as its waters lapped the sides of their stone basin. The convent-bell slowly tolled the Angelus

Digitized by Google

Hubert Boinville lost himself in a waking dream. He seemed to be twenty years younger, to be transported to some rustic cottage near his early home.

His youth, so long buried beneath huge masses of official documents, revived once more, and Claudette's blue eyes seemed to open a whole world of delicious, undreamt-of possibilities to his weary soul.

The old dame woke with a start, murmuring an apology for having "just closed her eyes for a moment."

Boinville rose, it was time to take his leave. Warmly thanking Madame Blouet, who exacted a promise that he would return, he took Claudette's hand. Their eyes met for a moment ere hers were lowered in confusion. She conducted him to the door, and on the threshold he pressed her hand once more, without, however, finding anything to say.

Nevertheless his heart was full, and when he was in the deserted street the air seemed filled with the music of the violins he had so often heard as a child on St. Nicholas' Eve.

The sous-directeur entered with renewed vigour into his official duties. Sittings of the council, interviews, reports, left him no time to pay another visit to the Rue de la Santé. The recollection of that eve of St. Nicholas, however, often recurred to him in the midst of his work, and more than once he had found his attention distracted by the remembrance of Claudette's blue eyes.

They seemed to flit like delicate butterflies over his documents, to shine in laughing mockery from the glowing embers in the grate, to bear him company in his gloomy bachelor's quarters. Sometimes he looked at his beard, already turning grey, and thought of his loveless life, and of his years, and wondered, like the old fellow in La Fontaine's fable, "whether he had passed the age of Love."

One day—it was a gloomy afternoon towards the end of December—his clerk opened the door of his office.

"Madame Blouet!" he announced. Boinville rose eagerly to receive his visitor. When she was seated, he asked after her grand-daughter, flushing as he spoke.

"She is quite well, thank you, your visit brought us good luck, monsieur. She has been waiting for a long time for a vacant appointment in the telegraph service, and yesterday it came. I did not wish to leave Paris without taking leave of you, and assuring you once more of our gratitude."

Boinville's heart beat fast.

"You are leaving Paris?" he asked; "the situation is in the provinces?"

"Yes, in the Vosges, and I, of course, go with Claudette. I am eighty-two, my dear sir, and cannot have much more time to spend with her, and we do not wish to be separated."

"And you are leaving soon?"

"The first week in January. Adieu, monsieur; you have been very, very good to us—Claudette asked me to thank you for her, too."

The directeur seemed absorbed; he hardly answered save in monosyllables. When the old dame had gone, he sat for a long time, his elbows on his desk, his face covered with his hands. He slept badly that night, and the next day his clerks found him exacting and hard to please. At three o'clock he left the Ministry and half-an-hour later he rang Madame Blouet's bell. Claudette came to the door. She started and blushed when she saw him, but there was a glad smile in her eyes.

"Grandmother has gone out," she said, "but she will not be long, and will be very pleased to see you."

"It is not Madame Blouet but you whom I wish to see, mademoiselle."

"I?" she murmured, confused.

"Yes, you," he said brusquely. His throat was parched, he could not find the words he wished to speak. "You still intend to leave next month?"

She answered by a nod.

"Are you not sorry to be leaving Paris?"

"Yes, very; but we must go. It is such a fortunate

"Do you find me too old?"

opening for us, and grandmother will be able to spend her last years in peace and comfort."

"And if I were to offer you a means of staying here and still making Madame Blouet happy?"

"Oh! monsieur!" she exclaimed.

"It is a heroic step," he added. "And perhaps you would find the task too great."

"I am brave—but tell me."

He paused a moment to take breath, and then quickly, roughly almost, he blurted out:

"Will you marry me?"

Her face expressed only surprise, not fear. Her lips remained half-opened, but a tender light came into her eyes.

Boinville dared not look at her lest he should read refusal in her glance. At length, alarmed at her silence, he asked:

"Do you find me too old that you seem so startled?"

"Startled?" she asked frankly. "No, but agitated, and—and—content! I dare not believe it yet!"

"Dear child!" he cried, taking her hands, "try to believe it, and believe, too, that it is I who am content, because I love you!"

She said nothing, but her eyes spoke so elegantly that he could not mistake their meaning. They told him that she also was happy, and he drew her closer to him. She suffered him to do so, and growing bolder, he raised her hands to his lips.

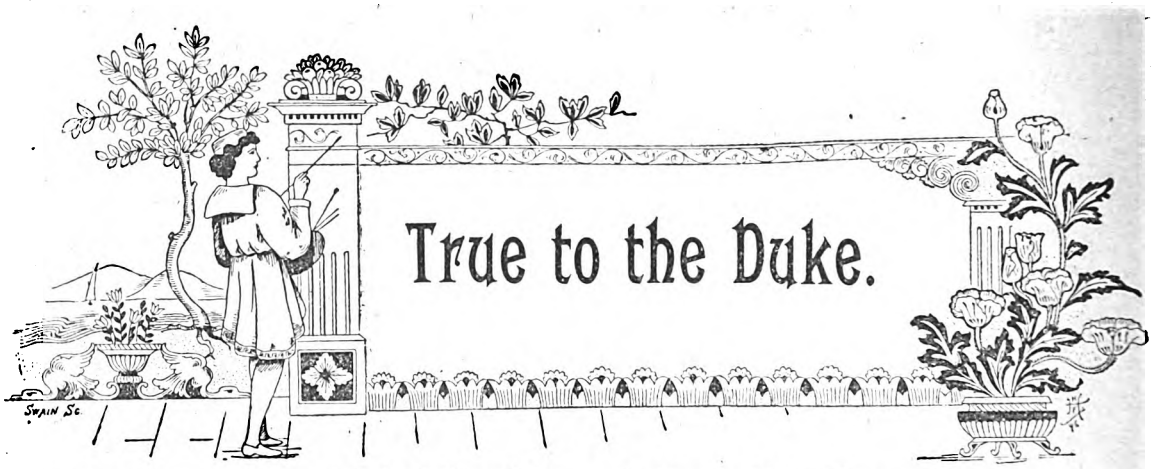
"Holy mother!" Madame Blouet exclaimed, as she came up the steps, and caught sight of the lovers.

They turned toward her, he a little confused, she blushingly radiant.

"Madame Blouet," Hubert said gaily, after a momentary pause. "That night I dined with you Saint Nicholas came down the chimney and brought me a present, just as he used to do when I was a child—a wife! This is her—your grand-daughter!"

ANDRÉ THEURIET.

Digitized by Google



True to the Duke.

THE warm summer sunlight that sifted through the leaves of the sturdy English oaks in Somerset Wood one day fell upon a boy lying at full length on the mossy ground.

He was a stout, good-looking lad, with fair features and chestnut-coloured locks, inclined to curl. Beside him lay a cross-bow with a feathered shaft in the groove, and the boy's hand could have picked up the weapon at a moment's notice.

For some time he had been watching the gambols of two squirrels just beyond bowshot, and in hopes that they might come a trifle nearer and give him a chance to bring one down.

The spot occupied by the young marksman, whose name was Perry Preston, was the summit of a gentle rise which commanded a fair view of the surrounding forest.

While Master Preston lay there he thought of the great battle fought a few days previous at Sedgemoor between King James' men and the rebellious Duke of Monmouth, then a fugitive, with a kingly price upon his head.

The boy had heard of the battle; indeed his uncle, a Mendip miner, had fought there for the lost cause, and at that very moment was hiding somewhere out of reach of the king's hunters.

No one seemed to know where Monmouth was, and the king's soldiers were scouring the countryside for him.

In a short time it would be night, and the gleams of sunlight, which lit up the forest, would give way to shadows.

Presently the boy put out his hand and picked up the cross-bow; but all the time he kept looking at the squirrels.

One of the little animals had frisked to within bowshot, and Master Preston did not want the game to escape.

The boy quietly raised himself upon one knee and took deliberate aim at the squirrel, then liberated the bow-string and watched the arrow in its flight.

The shaft went true to its mark, for the squirrel tumbled from the log, upon which it had perched itself, and Master Preston, with an exclamation of triumph, ran forward.

The further side of the log was well banked up with leaves and into these the game had fallen.

When the little marksman reached the log he looked over and then drew back.

To his astonishment he was looking at a man half buried in the leaves, a man dressed in peasant costume but with a kingly-looking eye and a handsome face.

Perry stood dumfounded, and could only gaze at the man, speechless and full of fear.

"Do you want your squirrel, lad?" said the stranger, taking from the leaves the dead game, which he held up before Master Preston.

"I'll take it, if you please," and the boy took the squirrel, but did not stir.

By this time the man in the leaves had risen to his knees and was looking at the boy.

"I'm a peasant who might be wanted by those men who are after the soldiers of the unfortunate Monmouth," he said; but Perry laid one hand on his dirty sleeve.

"You'll find me true," he answered. "I know you. You are His Grace, the Duke."

The man started violently and drew back.

"I the Duke?" he cried. "Look at my garments, boy. Surely no duke ever masqueraded in such."

"But you are His Grace," persisted Perry. "I was in Taunton when you entered the city, and I remember quite well how you lifted your hat to the people and how your voice sounded."

"Then I am lost," was the reply. "I have come to this at last—to be betrayed into the hands of my enemies by a Somerset boy."

"Not so. I am not an informer. But you are in danger. They have been hunting along the hedges down yonder, for I saw a lot of rough riders beating the bush this morning."

"Beating it for poor Monmouth. Oh, if I had an army once more at my back——"

He stopped suddenly and looked away while he seemed to tremble.

"They are quite near us," said Master Preston. "There is a chance for you."

"What sort of chance, boy?"

"The old milk-house."

"Yours?"

"Yes. It is an old affair, but it has a false floor put down by its builder long ago. But you cannot go to it while it is light."

"Then back to my bed of leaves I must go," said Monmouth, with a smile. "If I escape, boy, you may some day be a duke yourself."

A few minutes later Master Preston trudged homeward with his squirrel and dressed it in the cramped front yard by the humble home.

Digitized by Google

He said nothing to his mother, a widow, about his encounter with the hunted fugitive, and eagerly waited for dusk.

By-and-bye he went to the old milk-house, now rarely used, for the king's men some years before had taken the widow's last cow, and there he prised up a board and disclosed a commodious hiding-place underneath.

"The last place they'll look for the Duke in," said the boy. "He will be safe here."

Away he went to the wood, and, like a keen trailer, found the log and the fugitive behind it.

Without a word the two hurried back to the milk-house by a circuitous path, and Master Perry concealed the great Duke under the old boards.

As Monmouth pressed the boy's hand in parting, he looked up into the youthful face and said:

"May you be a duke some day whether I become king or not," and then Perry put the boards over him and went away.

* * * * *

Hardly had the boy reached home when six men rode up to the house and called the widow out.

They were members of Feversham's army—the general who had defeated Monmouth's forces—and they were looking for the fugitive. Master Preston came out of the house with his mother and looked at the gaudy but dirt-spattered regimentals and the rough faces of the cavaliers.

The moment one of the fellows spied Perry he covered him with his gloved hand.

"That's the boy," cried he. "Come, you little jackanapes. What were you doing in the wood to-day?"

"Hunting, sir," said the widow's son. "I shot a grey squirrel in the forest, as mother here can testify, for we had it for supper and ——"

"Who crept across the lane with you after dark?"

Master Preston did not quail. The crisis had come and the ordeal was before him.

"Some one with me?" he exclaimed. "I went into the forest quite alone and came home in like manner, sir."

"But there are tracks of two parties in the soft mud of the old lane down yonder. Come, boy. You can't deceive the riders of the King, and it is high treason to shelter this rebel, Monmouth."

At mention of the hunted man's name Mrs. Preston clasped her hands and turned pale while she looked at her son.

Perry remembered that the ground in the old lane they had crossed on their way to the milk-house was quite soft and liable to leave there the impress of their shoes; but he did not immediately reply.

"A good many people cross the lane," said he at last, "I don't doubt that there be foot-prints in the ground there."

"And one of the prints shows the elegant foot-track of the rebel whom we broke at Sedgemoor."

"My son is honest," at this juncture exclaimed the widow. "I know him to be civil and kind, and he went to the wood to-day, not to hide Monmouth, but to get a squirrel with his bow."

"Yes, and he brought down more important game," broke in the leader of the detachment. "Here, come up on the saddle, boy," and the man darted at Perry, who before he could get beyond his reach, was seized and jerked off his feet.

In another moment the boy found himself on the saddle before the trooper, who looked him sternly in the face as he continued.

"We want the rebel, boy. Don't deceive us. Where have you hid Monmouth?"

In an instant fire seemed to light up the widow's eyes and she remembered the indignities she had suffered at the hands of the troopers of King James, for she cried out:

"If you've made a promise, Perry, stick to it. Keep your word, boy, even if given to Monmouth!"

The troopers looked daggers at the woman and one thrust out his sword, but she sprang out of the way and laughed at him.

"We'll wring the little chick's neck but what we'll make him tell where the rebel is," said the captain of the detachment. "The King will have no nonsense and, boy or man, the person who refuses to betray the hiding-place of the arch-rebel, Monmouth, shall feel His Majesty's displeasure."

With this the little troop wheeled, and Master Preston, held firmly to the saddle, was carried away.

A few yards from the house the men halted and all crowded round the man who held Perry prisoner.

"Where is he, boy?" they asked.

Perry looked into the rough faces and saw no leniency there; then he glanced at their broad swords, the very weapons that had wrought such ruin at Sedgemoor, and for a moment contemplated the general mien of the six.

"You haven't proved to me that there are footprints in the mud in the old lane," said the boy.

"But we can," was the answer. "You want to be convinced, do you? To the lane you shall be taken."

* * * * *

In a little while the boy was taken to the spot, and when it was reached one of the men dismounted and led his horse toward a certain spot.

A full moon was in the sky, and in some places the ground was plainly visible and the very blades of grass that covered it.

They had entered the lane which Perry and the Duke had crossed on their way to the old milk-house and presently all stood on the bare place.

"Put the lad down here," said the man who had gone forward afoot. "I want to show him what a dainty footprint the hunted fox makes. Here it is, as plain as when we left it, and here beside it is the rougher boot-track of the widow's bairn."

In compliance with the request the captain of the troop put Perry down, at the same time telling the trooper on the ground to take hold of his wrist and escort him to the proof-spot.

Master Preston felt a hand at his wrist and he was led forward in a jiffy.

"There they are, your tracks and those of the arch-rebel's!" exclaimed the cavalier. "You crossed here. Why, everybody in England knows the print of Monmouth's foot, no matter if he wears a shepherd's boots."

At the same time Perry was pushed forward and roughly held over the soft ground.

He saw the tracks he and Monmouth had made; they seemed to accuse him of treason to the King, but he did not quail.

"You see them, boy? Now, sirrah, where is the fox?"

It was the captain of the band who spoke, and Perry straightened in the moonlight.

At the same time the man who held his wrist seemed to give him a little freedom, for the grip relaxed as Master Preston looked at the trooper's horse.

It was a lithe-limbed chestnut, such as he once rode among the Mendip Hills when on a visit to his uncle, and an idea flashed through the boy's brain.

"I give you a minute, boy. We cannot wait here all night while you know where the rebel is. Stand aside, Goschen. He is safe here."

The trooper who had dismounted stood aside, quite releasing Master Preston; but the next moment an event of startling importance took place.

The Somerset boy sprang toward the horse and caught the rein as he left the ground.

His movement was agile as the leap of a squirrel, and before the astonished cavalrymen could interfere he was on the the horse's back, tearing up the lane like mad.

Through the moonlight, like an arrow from his own cross-bow, went the boy, and in a little while five steeds were tearing after him, amid the clanking of heavy sabres and the shouting of vile epithets.

It was a race in favour of the boy who knew every foot of the road, and at a certain spot he turned aside where some bars were down and galloped across a meadow.

Fatigued and in no good humour the five horsemen came back after a long chase, compelled to admit that a boy had beaten them, while several miles from the spot Master Preston, hidden in a safe retreat, congratulated himself upon his escape.

All that night did the troopers watch the widow's house in hopes that the boy would ride back and fall into their clutches, but he did not oblige them, and at daylight they went away.

All the next day the hunted man remained under the floor of the old milk-house, and at night he was piloted away by his little rescuer, who, upon parting with him, received as a keepsake the Duke's ring.

It was Monmouth's last escape from the snares of his persistent pursuers, for the following day he was taken and carried to London.

During his imprisonment there he did not forget the boy who had saved his life in the Somerset forest, for he was permitted to address Master Preston a letter, and there is little doubt that had Monmouth reached the throne he would have kept his promise and made Master Preston the youngest Duke in England.

T. C. HARBAUGH.

THE BELFRY.

"IT was the end of December," old Père la Chouette said, one day, "just as it is now, excepting that that year was the terrible '70. It was so cold that the very atmosphere seemed frozen, and snow, thick snow, stifling all sound, covered all the roads and paths.

"The Prussians had not reached St. Martin yet, but one could feel that they were coming through the forest; three days ago we had heard two dull reverberations, borne on the still, winter air, which told us that they had blown up the bridges. After that we had no news, communication with Evreux being broken; it was terrible, the silence which walled us in, as it were, from the outer world; and it was the more terrible because we all felt that there was worse behind.

"The company of the 202nd Regiment that was garrisoning the village had no orders upon which to act, and Captain Bougeart said at last—the church clock was striking four and night was already gathering:

"'I cannot stay here; I risk being captured with all my men without the chance of firing a single shot; the village lies in a hollow, it is impossible to defend it. I shall establish myself on the hill-side towards Guirandières and from there try to re-open communications with my brigadier.'

"He drew me apart—he knew me well, and knew, too, that I was an old soldier.

"'They are not sorry to see me leave,' he murmured, pointing to the group of the principal inhabitants of our little village, 'and—well—they are quite right. If I stayed they would only have to meet a heavier levy, and perhaps they would see their property destroyed under their very eyes. But, Père la Choutte, you can do me a service: if the Prussians come, find a means of warning me. One of your village urchins will pass anywhere, through anything, a gun-shot can be heard a long way off in this still, cold air; a bell rung—by accident, of course, would be even better. I shall be on the alert and shall know what it means.'

"I promised what he asked, and shortly afterwards they moved off, retreating through the cold, grey light reflected from the snow. When I saw the last uniform disappear it seemed to me that I was no longer in France.

"I entered my little cottage and was unhooking the iron pot which always hung over the fire in order to pour out my soup when I heard sounds outside: rapid trotting horses' hoofs beating, muffled, on the thick, soft snow.

"I stooped and peeped through a chink in the window shutter and I saw four great brutes of Uhlans dimly outlined against the frosty sky; what little light was reflected from the snow showed me their horses and vague shadowy figures of men, each with his slender lance, a black line upon the night.

"Suddenly they dismounted and crept stealthily through the village, and half-an-hour later we were invaded, silently, without a single cry or a word of command to break the silence of the night, as by an army of shadows.

Digitized by Google

"It occurred to me that if Captain Bougeart were not warned he might fall back upon the village the next day and would be killed or taken prisoner with all his men. There must have been a whole division of the enemy, more were arriving every moment. I could hear the heavy wheels of artillery crunching the frost-bitten roads.

"Could I make my way to the Captain? It was not to be thought of for a moment. I had sprained my ankle a fortnight previously and I was no longer young, even in those far off days. I could hardly drag one leg after the other for the shortest distance. A messenger?—where could I find one at that time of the night? He would be caught and shot, to a certainty.

"And then I thought of my post as bell-ringer; it was not for nothing that we had a great bell that could be heard as far as three leagues away. I hastily put on my sheepskin coat and went out. I knew what I was going to do.

"The street was full of troops, horses, and baggage waggons. They had not lighted any bivouac fires, and at each exit from the village guards were posted to prevent anyone from leaving the place. They were evidently meditating some sudden coup, and I reflected, sadly, that a body of our troops was in the neighbourhood and would probably fall victims to an ambush if they were not warned.

"I went out with the most unconcerned air I could assume under the circumstances. They only saw in me an old man, halt and lame, limping feebly along, and they paid no attention to me. I had the key of the church, and I entered and locked myself in. I was on familiar ground, and, lighting a lantern, I found that all was well. The bell-rope hung down within reach of my hand; I simply had to pull it. But it occurred to me that, at the first stroke, the Prussians would break down the door and compel me to silence, perhaps before our troops had heard the signal.

"So I turned towards the narrow, winding stairs and was soon in the organ-loft: there again, I decided, I was too near the enemy.

"Ma foi! I had to climb still higher, in spite of my bad foot. It was not easy, for the staircase only run to the level of the triforium, and then I had to take to a ladder. And no one who did not know the peal of bells and its frame-work as well as I could have ventured there in the dark, for in many places there was nothing but an iron rod or, perhaps, a bolt-head projecting from the face of a beam to serve as foot-hold.

"Courage! By hook or by crook, straining every muscle, every nerve, I gradually pulled myself up—my ankle was terribly painful—I reached the top, the very top, and groped for my bell, my favourite big bell which seemed to thrill to my touch. Without pausing to regain my breath I drew the clapper towards me and great waves of sound filled the belfry and floated out upon the air. Another single stroke and then I rang without stopping the terrifying tocsin. Boom! boom! the great bell pealed, almost stunning me, rousing all the country-side.

"The village far below me began to show signs of life; between the strokes of the bell I heard people running and calling one to another, then someone beat upon the church-door.

"'Will you stop that infernal din?' a voice called out in a gutteral German accent.

"Boom! boom!

"Then I heard something whistle through the air and immediately afterwards the sound of a shot. They were firing at me.

"A noise of breaking timber, of iron-studded panels striking the pavement, and then I heard footsteps in the church and on the little winding stair.

"'Will you come down and at once? Schweinpelz!' the same voice cried. 'Wait till I can get hold of you!'

"They were climbing!

"Feverishly I swung the great clapper to and fro and. to my great joy, between the waves of sound, I heard the answering peals from the churches of Saint Leu and Morgny—in the far distance I thought I could distinguish the sound of the bells of Azay—they were in the triforium below me now!

"The reverberations of a rifle-shot are terribly deafening when re-echoed from a stone-vaulted roof; bullets struck the beams all round me, sounding like blows from a heavy hammer as they buried themselves in the timber; one struck my bell and cracked it, making it emit a sound as of some wounded living thing. At last a voice called out:

"'Genug! genug!'

"I understood that to mean 'enough!' for the firing ceased and a voice gave some word of command in German. I saw a soldier lay down his rifle and glance up at the belfry as though measuring the height, then, slowly but surely, without a pause, he began to climb.

"The snow was falling in soft, thick flakes; they drifted in at the louvres of the bell-chamber, covering all the beams and iron rods, and I realised that if I were saved from the fate which seemed so near me I should owe my delivery to the kindly snow. Already I felt as though the Prussian's hand gripped my shoulder.

"He climbed carefully, making sure of each foot-hold as he mounted; from time to time he threw back his head so as to be able to see where I was, and I could make out his face with its blue eyes and good-natured expression.

"How I hated him! It seemed as though there was no escape for me. When he reached the stays he hesitated—the cold iron must have burnt his hands—perhaps his head turned when he saw nothing but a black abyss below him and all around the thick, white snowflakes falling, always falling. I heard the nails of his boot grate on the ironwork and he let go his hold with both hands. I watched him fall and disappear into the chasm below, I heard the dull thud of his body as it rebounded from one beam to another and then the sickening crash on the floor of the church.

"And through it all I heard the distant bells ringing—I felt each stroke beat upon my strained nerves until I could have screamed.

"At length a rent appeared in the sky, and, slowly, a little light began to show me the surrounding country. From my belfry I saw all the familiar features of the landscape emerge one by one, and far away below me lay the village—there were people in the streets. I could see their white, upturned faces as they tried to discern me. At the foot of the tower a squad of Prussians were piling faggots against the walls; they were going to smoke me out as they would have done some fox.

"All at once I heard a volley of rifle-shots and the gay notes of the French bugles—how I love their sound—the Germans ran to arms, surprised and in disorder.

* * * * *

"They had to lower me down by a pully, I was so stiff with cold; and I have never been able to understand what mysterious power enabled me to climb up there in safety that terrible night."

FRANCOIS DE NOIN.

Digitized by Google

THE YOUNG MAN FROM TEXAS.

I.

THE Prince was smitten, and he was going home. There was nothing contagious about it: simply a species of homesickness, savouring of remorse: nothing worse. By my reference to this individual as the "Prince," the reader must not assume him to be possessed of that royal blueness of blood so popular a gift amongst princes of regal extraction.

The "Prince" was merely one of those honorary titles bestowed by an approving coterie of acquaintances.

He was princely in his habits and dress, princely in his vices and virtues, and princely in his open-handedness, in fact, princely in everything save birth, and this circumstance may probably account for his alienation from his family.

When quite a beardless youth, he had set off to seek diversion in foreign lands. For years had he dropped all connection with his relatives in the way of correspondence, memories, and so forth. And now, by dint of some spontaneous revolution his heart turned again to the scenes of his boyhood.

His latter day friends wrestled with his new resolve. They opened their yearning hearts; they beseeched, they flattered, they promised, they threatened, all in turn, but to no avail. With an affectionate look he put these all aside; and accordingly, early in the month of February, we find him waiting at New York for the English steamer.

On his way to the quay he had been attracted by the frequent recurrence—so to speak—of a strange young man. This personage had first arrested his attention by the peculiarity of his dress; but afterwards it seemed to the Prince that the young gentleman was dogging him.

As for the twentieth time the Prince met him, he said something my pen refuses to fashion.

Taking his place on the vessel he awaited her departure, drawing a happy breath as she left the mooring and steamed out to sea.

Night fell, and the Prince went on deck for a constitutional, soliloquising beneath the breezy boon of tobacco. He made for the bow, possibly intending to poetise upon the "Prodigal's Return."

Reaching it, he saw what he fancied to be the figure-head swaying. He put out his hand to save it. Strangely, it had a coat-tail, and as he tugged the pale face of the strange young man bent its glance upon him. Instantly the Prince resorted to his unsanctified vocabulary, in response to which the strange young man muttered:

"I beg your pardon?"

"Oh, nothing!" returned the Prince mildly. "You look pale—have some brandy?"

"Thanks! Don't—mind——" Here the strange young man looked yearningly at the ocean and said no more until the liquor forthcame.

With this introduction they remained friendly and reached London in company.

It was late one Saturday night when they parted at the station.

"Going home?" questioned the young man, lingering as he took the Prince's hand.

"Hm—yes! Are you?"

"Not to-night. To-morrow. I'm going to enact the part of a returned prodigal.

"Got any family—much?" asked the Prince.

"Who, the governor, or I?"

"The governor—your father, of course."

"Not large. One stalwart marriageable girl. By-the-way, too, it's her birthday to-morrow. Comes into a few ha'pence. I must see her. Shall we meet again?"

"Yes—pleased, I'm sure. Where?"

"Oh, here. Say one o'clock; before I see the judge."

"Judge? Where—who?"

"Oh, that's my governor."

They parted.

The Prince betook himself to a saloon to freshen his appearance before going home. It was rather late, but being Saturday night he thought his people might possibly be up.

Whilst standing before the mirror brushing his hair he abruptly stopped and started.

"The dickens!" he muttered beneath his breath. "Never noticed this before. H'm, awfully strange!"

He had remained gazing at his reflection some time, when the attendant notified closing time.

With the last glance at the mirror, he realised that were it not for his fragile moustache, he might be the double of his late companion, the strange young man from Texas.

With thoughts still intent upon this remarkable coincidence, he wended his way along the deserted streets towards the house he had left as "home." It hardly occurred to him the changes a few years might have wrought, and his only anxiety was "how would they receive him?"

Reaching the house, he suffered an affectionate tear to trickle down his nose, as for a moment he stood gazing upon it.

"Yes!" he thought. "The same old place, but mightily improved!"

Seeing no light, he hesitated at first about entering that night; but at the last moment of his mental debate, a yellow streak, creeping between the shutters of a lower apartment, caught his hungering eye. So, knocking softly at the door—the servants' entrance—he waited.

Before long the door opened a few inches, and a voice from behind the lubricating elements of a wax candle, whispered: "Who's there?"

Digitized by Google

"The son and heir of this household!" answered the Prince jocosely.

He was admitted and confronted by a saucy-looking servant girl, who expressed surprise at his unexpected return.

"Do you want any supper, sir?" she asked.

"No, thanks. I'll go to bed."

"All right, sir. You can have this candle; I'll show the way."

Too tired to think more, he undressed, blew out the light, and slipped into bed. In a very few minutes, the velvet hand of sleep touched his drooping eyes and took him to perfect repose.

II.

ON the following morn he sprang from bed—rubbed his eyes—yawned with an air of expectant happiness, and commenced his toilette.

His relatives, so long bereft, should not see the prodigal return in proverbial rags and disorder.

His choicest princely instinct was clear, and he dressed with all the fastidiousness of a soon-to-be bride.

Then with rife expectation, and pleasant anticipation, he betook himself to the breakfast-room.

The people waiting there heard his springy footstep on the stairs, and before he had time to realise anything, a lovely girl rushed out, threw her arms about his neck, and rained a perfect hurricane of tears and kisses in the neighbourhood of his nether lip.

He was dazed, literally astounded. What did it mean?

He had no sisters or such like, and here was this strange, stupefying beauty rhapsodising over him, as though he had just escaped the jaws of death.

The maiden drew back, surveying him at arm's length.

"Yes!" she cried delightedly. "It is indeed Sammy, and see, mamma, he has grown such a lovely moustache. Oh, however did you do it?"

Here she kissed him again, and hugged him into the room. To attempt a characterisation of the Prince's feelings would be a wicked waste of time and paper.

No sooner had he passed the door, than a massive, judicial-looking man came forward.

"Samuel!" he said profoundly—and the spoons chattered with the chinaware—"Samuel, my boy, we have no words upon our lips adequate to such an occasion as this, and the language of our heart must appear weak if examined. Let us then dispense with words and ceremony—silence being the most eloquent and, and—begin breakfast!"

But for the blushing Prince the worst part of the ordeal had been in reserve, for at this juncture a stately old lady with corkscrew curls came forward, drew his head down to her level, and kissed him once on the forehead, once on each cheek, finally concluding with an amalgamated array of six upon the lips.

"Welcome, Samuel!" said she. "Welcome, thrice welcome, on this happy day!"

He looked about in poorly disguised amazement. As in his sleeping apartment, this room was altered. It was certainly the same chamber he recalled as "breakfast-room," but yet how different; and how superbly furnished. Then again that pompous-censorial old fogey was not the father he had known, nor the stately old lady his mother.

For the second time he pondered the question—what did it mean? In a trice the answer occurred to him.

His people had gone—removed—were dead, or something of the sort. Certainly.

It was years ago that he left home, and these present tenants had mistaken him for some well-remembered friend, returning after a long sojourn.

But it was his duty to speak. He must, he would speak, and was about to do so in spite of all, when his curiosity prompted him to delay a little longer.

Breakfast being over, the host suggested a walk before luncheon, and the young people delightedly acquiesced. However, before they had gone far, an old fogey occupant of a passing carriage beckoned to the guardian. Excusing himself, as he said, on business, adding, with a smile, his suspicions that they would be happier alone, he seated himself beside his friend and drove off.

They were in a lovely, half rural road, and he could no longer endure the weight of his deceit.

Bracing his nerves, he was about to declare himself, when his lovely companion interrupted him. She had been scrutinising his face askance. The indication she looked for came, and so she spoke:

"Don't speak!" she began. "I know what you are going to say. I am very glad you determined to tell me at once, for it makes me think well of you!"

The Prince looked thunderstruck. Well he might; but his amazement was followed by a look of sorrow.

"This," he said with conscious pain, "should come from me. I was just——"

"Yes, I know you were, but I anticipated you. Don't blame yourself. You could not have spoken earlier, since I interrupted you at breakfast. I hold you quite blameless, and so will papa. I saw my mistake at once; but how could I retract just then?" Here a barely perceptible flush mantled her lovely face, and the Prince imagined her to be what she almost was—divine in body as in soul.

"Now, look here," she continued, "I have been thinking about this, and I want to keep it up. You see how well pleased dear mamma and papa both are; let them remain so. I am willing to take all the blame of the deception. Will you do it for me, please?"

"Oh, I cannot allow that!" he said quickly. "It is too selfish of me. Besides, how vexed must they inevitably be when they learn the truth."

"Ah, but it won't be so bad, really, and—and——" (here her voice trembled almost pleadingly) "perhaps you have—no home!"

For just a moment she broke down, and her head turned gently aside. From that instant for ever after the Prince would willingly have died for her.

"To please me!" she said at length, smiling upon him with glistening eyes.

"To please you," he answered in a low tone, broken by tender emotion. Although quite manly in thoughts and deeds, he had to exercise superhuman restraint to avoid kneeling to her with streaming eyes.

"Will you tell me your name, please?" she asked him next.

"You know it, since you have used it already," he rejoined.

"Ah, that was a peculiar coincidence. I mean your second name, though."

"Marnham. Samuel Marnham!"

She stood suddenly still, regarding him curiously.

"Samuel Marnham," she repeated softly. Then, after a pause: "Mine is Worseley!"

"Agnes!"

That was all, but each fully understood; mutually recalling one thrilling scene enacted long years ago in company. From the breast pocket of his coat the Prince drew a little parcel. Unswathing a ridiculous amount of cotton wool and paper, he produced a Humane Society's medal, with his own name and that of Agnes Worseley graven upon it.

Digitized by Google

She took it carefully from him as though it were some cherished token of a departed friend.

"Oh, let me keep it!" she beseeched. For, after all, the Prince was no stranger—only a rescued friend from the ruins of bygone days.

"But however did you mistake me, and who for?" questioned he as they turned homewards.

"I thought you were my brother, who went away a long, long while ago, and hasn't since returned. You are very like him. You see papa is mistaken as well."

And so in this strain they continued to talk until their arrival home.

The Prince never once thought of his experience the day before, or of his appointment for the present day, so great was his absorption in the lovely peace and happiness about him.

III.

AT luncheon time the house was crowded. Stately guests of both sexes flocked to the grand reception. There were lords and ladies, plain Mr.'s and Mrs.'s, noble and ignoble men, right reverend and wrong reverend gentlemen of all denominations, sizes, and shapes, but all more or less human.

The Prince studiously made himself general property, so that none had cause for conceit. He cleverly avoided making himself cheap, and, consequently, was always in request. Possessing that ineffable genius of artistic social restraint, he found that his harvest was literally a golden one.

"You are acting your part splendidly!" Agnes whispered, and for the first time a flash of excitement darted through his princely eyes, but was drowned in the heightening colour of his cheek, and instantly he became outwardly calm again.

At the conclusion of the grand dinner the Prince's success was complete. His table-talk and manners were absolutely faultless; and every maiden face plainly proclaimed its possessor had found a realisation of her ideal. Then he began to tell a story.

No one was more intent upon every gesture and word than Agnes Worseley. She seemed with her eyes to lift each utterance off the Prince's lips. Suddenly she started as she realised the story was characterising some half-fashioned anticipation she held in common with the narrative. She nudged him, but so abandoned was his eloquence that her touch evoked no response. He was nearing the climax. The audience hung upon his lips, spell-bound and open-mouthed; and with one puff he could have literally blown them to eternity.

Two minutes more and the iron hand of Fate would thunder downwards.

The listeners strained in their postures to catch each word and glance.

The Prince, pinned by every eye, writhed his burning tongue swiftly towards the crucial point. Apopletic veins seemed like to burst from every neck. A quick pulsation showed on every cheek, and bosoms were trembling and quivering beneath superhuman restraint, when the door of the room flew open, and upon the threshold stood "The Young Man from Texas!"

IV.

IN the space of a thought the gases flashed up, disclosing the company in a state of speechless consternation.

For the second time a flash of excitement gleamed in the eyes of the Prince, and he looked round for Agnes.

She was close beside him.

The strange young man came directly up, and grasping him warmly by the hand, gave utterance to the shocking but ambiguous phrase:

"You're a fraud! Why didn't you keep your appointment?"

Then the Prince, quite perplexed and half indignant, said: "But, sir—this language? You shouldn't have sought me here. I would have explained later."

"Oh, and why not seek you here?" questioned the young man. Then turning to the astounded host and hostess, said: "Judge! Father—mother!"

A momentary pause ensued, and then the judge, with a frown on his forehead and a twinkle in his eye, rushed forward and heartily embraced that strange young man from Texas.

Then the strange young man, turning with a fraternal smile to Agnes, kissed her, afterwards deliberately beaming upon the company and saying:

"Permit me to introduce my friend—a—a—Mr.—— What's your name?"

"Marnham—Samuel Marnham," responded the Prince, now fairly recovered.

"The dickens it is, though," ejaculated the strange young man in genuine surprise and unaffected warmth. And shaking the Prince's hand more heartily than ever, continued: "I'm deucedly glad of that though, upon my soul," and inwardly the judge echoed the same sentiment. With humourous profundity in one eye, and terrible censure in the other, he approached the Prince, exclaiming:

"Explain, sir. What is the meaning of this freak?" But before the other could reply, Agnes stepped forward, holding high the medal.

"Papa, papa, see this! My name and his coupled here together! You must remember, papa. He is the son of your old friend, Sir David. You must remember him! He saved——"

"I know all about that!" roared the Judge, trying to grow red in the face.

"Well, papa," said Agnes, hardly able to suppress her laughter, "aren't you going to forgive us? Besides, it was all my fault—really, truly."

As the door closed upon the last of his guests, the Judge, giving way, laughed consumedly, and the whole family was made to sit up into the small hours of the morrow to pacify and quell his boisterous mirth.

When at length the family party arose, the Judge's eyes were suspiciously moist. Taking the Prince's hand, he said with true affection: "You will stay with us—long——!"

That was all he could manage, but it was said in that peculiar manner admitting of no alternative reply.

As requested, the Prince remained the Judge's guest for the next day, and the next week, and the next month, and so on for a long while; and so generously devoted did the pair become that the Judge, upon request, granted the Prince the freehold of two valuable properties, to wit, the beautiful Agnes and the house next door.

The self-same guests who attended the Judge's feast were at the wedding also; upon which occasion the indigo-dye millionaire confidentially declared to several marriageable young ladies, that neither the Prince nor the large-hearted Judge were so much to blame for the general deprivation, as the strange young man from Texas.

DUNSTAN DENN.

Digitized by Google

A LEGEND OF THE FLOWERY KINGDOM.

WHO is there, since the earliest dawn of intelligent perception, that has not wondered at the peculiar picture on the old and familiar willow-pattern china? Who has not studied the odd figures and tried to guess at their meaning? And yet I dare say there are few of us who have ever heard the story, which is as familiar to the natives of the Flowery Kingdom as Robinson Crusoe or Rip Van Winkle is to us.

The tale was related to me by a lady who has travelled extensively in China, and who, prompted one day by mere woman's curiosity, determined to learn what the picture meant.

In the first place, the name, "willow-ware," is taken from the tree which occupies the lower left centre of the plate, and which is supposed to represent a willow in spring unfolding its blossoms before its leaves appear.

On the right hand of the plate is seen a Chinese house supposed to be of unusual size and magnificence, the wealth and resources of the owner being indicated by its being two storeys high, and also by the large and rare trees which surround the building. This residence belonged to a wealthy and powerful mandarin, named Woo Tsang, a close friend of the Emperor and generally acknowledged as possessing great influence. In his household dwelt with him his wife and daughter and his private secretary, Mok Chang, who attended to the details of the mandarin's duties and was allowed to reside with the family.

After the death of the mandarin's wife, that official importuned the Emperor to release him from his duties and permit him to retire to private life. This, of course necessitated the discharge of the secretary, Chang, who, it seems, had fallen deeply in love with the mandarin's daughter, Koong-see, and not in vain, for his love was returned.

Every evening after sunset, Koong-see was observed to linger on the steps which led to the banquet-hall, and when twilight came on, she would steal down the garden path with her faithful maid to a remote part of the grounds and meet her lover. And there also did the lovers meet on the eve of Chang's dismissal and exchange vows of mutual love and constancy. But many evenings afterwards, when the discharged secretary was supposed to be miles and miles away, lovers' whispers might have been heard among the orange trees, and as darkness came on, the large peonies which grew against the wall had their gorgeous petals destroyed by Chang as he climbed through the brilliant blossoms.

By the assistance of Koong-see's maid, these interviews were kept secret from the mandarin, for the lovers well knew the hard customs of the country where social rank was unequal.

Chang's merit, however, was admitted everywhere, and the young people pictured a time when all obstacles would be removed by Chang's success in diplomacy and trade. But, by some manner or other, a rumour reached the ears of the old mandarin of what was going on, and he forbade Koong-see to go beyond the walls of the house, and as for Chang, he was threatened with prompt death if he continued his visits. Furthermore, the mandarin had a high fence built across the pathway from the walls of his home to the water's edge. This is the zig-zag fence which appears at the lower end of the picture.

Finally, after all these precautions, Koong-see's maid was discharged, and her place was supplied by an elderly woman, whose heart was as shrivelled as her face. To further provide for his daughter's imprisonment, and at the same time to give her needed exercise and fresh air, the mandarin had a suite of rooms built adjoining his own banquet-hall, and projecting out over the water and surrounded by a terrace upon which Koong-see could walk in safety. These rooms will be seen to the left of the mandarin's house in the picture.

When all this was completed the old mandarin rested, convinced that there would no longer be any more clandestine meetings between his daughter and the discharged Chang. However, to still further satisfy himself, the mandarin engaged Koong-see to a wealthy friend of his, Ta-jin, a noble of very high degree, and in every way the equal of the girl except in age, he being probably about sixty years old. The wedding was decided upon without any consultation whatever with Koong-see, and it was to take place at the "fortunate age of the moon, when the peach tree should blossom, in the spring." The willow tree was then already in blossom, but the peach tree had scarcely begun to bud.

Poor Koong-see shuddered at her doom, and trembled as she watched the buds of the peach tree as they slowly blossomed forth. But one day she was cheered by a happy omen; a bird came and built its nest in the corner above her window. One afternoon, as she sat watching the little architect carrying bits of straws and feathers to its future home, her attention was attracted to a cocoanut shell which floated gently at her feet, and which was fitted up with a miniature sail. She picked it up and in it found a small pearl she had once given her lover, and a piece of rice paper on which was written in the handwriting of Chang, these verses:

The nest yon winged artists build
Some robber-bird shall tear away;
So yields her hopes the affianced bride,
The wealthy lord's reluctant prey.

The fluttering bird prepares a home
In which the spoiler soon shall dwell;
Forth goes the weeping bride, constrained;
A hundred cars the triumph swell.

Mourn for the tiny architect;
A stronger bird has ta'en its nest.
Mourn for the hopeless, stolen bride;
How vain the hopes to soothe her breast.

On the other side of the paper was written these words: "As this boat sails to you, so all my thoughts tend to the same centre; but when the willow blossoms drop from the bough, and the peach tree unfolds its buds, your faithful Chang will sink with the lotus blooms beneath the deep waters. There will he see the circles on the smooth river when the willow blossoms fall upon it from the bough—broken away, like his love, from the parent stem."

Then as a sort of postscript was added: "Cast thy thoughts upon the waters as I have done, and I shall hear thy words."

When Koong-see finished reading, she burst into tears. "He has not forgotton me," she cried, "he still loves me." Then she hid the little boat and the message in the folds of her loose flowing dress.

Koong-see well understood what her lover meant, and trembled as she thought of his threat of self-destruction. Then she took out her little ivory tablets, and with her embroidery needle wrote: "Do not wise husbandmen gather the fruit they fear will be stolen? The sunshine lengthens, and the vineyard is threatened by the hands of strangers. The fruit you most prize will be gathered when the willow blossoms droop and fall to the earth."

Much doubting, she placed this message in the miniature cocoanut-shell boat, and, after the manner of her countrywomen, put therein a piece of frankincense and launched the shell upon the water and watched it as the current of the stream gently drew it away, and she could no longer see it in the distance.

Days and weeks passed on, but no answering message appeared; all intercourse between the lovers seemed at an end, and poor Koong-see became more and more disheartened and discouraged. The blossoms on the willow tree were nearly ready to wither and drop, and additional alarm was aroused in her heart by a visit from her father, who seemed to be in the best of spirits. In his arms he bore a huge box, filled with the rarest of jewels—a present from old Ta-jin.

The mandarin then said that the happy suitor was coming that day to enter into the preliminaries of marriage, such as taking wine and food at the house of the bride's father. Like a bird in a snare, poor Koong-see felt that the toils were being drawn closer and closer, and her heart gave way in despair as she looked about her and saw no way of escape.

Ta-jin came, his servants preceding him, beating gongs and shouting his achievements in war. The number of his titles was very extensive, and the lanterns on which they were all inscribed were magnificent. Owing to his high rank, he was borne on an elaborate sedan with eight bearers, thus showing his position to be that of a viceroy.

While all this revelry, drinking, and feasting was going on, a poor stranger presented himself at the door of the banquet-hall and asked for alms. No attention was paid him, however, and finally becoming apparently weary of begging, he took from the porch an outer garment that had been carelessly left there, and throwing it about his shoulders he quietly drew a screen across the banquet-hall doorway, and passing behind it he slipped into Koong-see's apartments. In another moment he had made himself known—it was Chang, and the meeting of the lovers was touching in the extreme. Quickly then did Chang beseech his sweetheart to fly with him. "For," said he, "the willow blossoms already droop upon the bough, and the wise husbandman has come to gather in his fruit."

Koong-see was delighted at the sudden turn of affairs, and at once consented to her lover's wishes. She gave to him the box of jewels Ta-jin had presented to her that day, and, watching a favourable opportunity, the lovers stole from the house. They had reached the bridge at the foot of the willow tree, shown in the picture, when the mandarin became aware of his daughter's flight, as he happened to catch a glimpse of her through the door, and, raising a fearful cry, he himself rushed in pursuit of the fleeing couple.

This part of the story is represented by the three figures on the bridge. The first is Koong-see, following her is Chang, and in the rear is the old mandarin. As the Chinese artist knows nothing of perspective, he could not place the enraged father in any other position than in the peculiar proximity in which he is represented. The sketch simply illustrates the flight and pursuit, and is sufficiently graphic for that purpose.

The old mandarin, intoxicated as he had become during the feast, had some difficulty in keeping up the chase, and Chang and Koong-see eluded him without great effort. The few servants who were sober enough to have successfully pursued the couple were detained to wait upon Ta-jin, he having worked himself into a monstrous rage when he learnt what had occurred, and so great was his fury that he frothed and foamed at the mouth—and it was thought that he had fallen into a fit, and thus the lovers made good their escape.

Digitized by Google

Every plan possible was adopted during the following days to discover where the undutiful daughter and her lover had fled; but when the servants returned night after night and brought no intelligence which afforded any hope of finding them, the mandarin gave himself up to despair and became a prey to low spirits and ill-humour.

Ta-jin, however, continued active and persevering, and employed spies in every village for miles round; he made a solemn vow of vengeance against Chang, and congratulated himself that by his power as a magistrate of the district he could exercise his authority, and when Chang should be discovered he would instantly suffer an awful death. Koong-see, too, should die, he said, unless she fulfilled the wishes of her father—not for his own satisfaction, but for the sake of public justice.

Meantime, the lovers were in hiding at no great distance from the mandarin's home, having sought refuge in the humble cottage of the mandarin's gardener, which is shown in the picture on the opposite side, and to the left of the bridge. Here also Koong-see found her former maid, who, it seems, was the wife of the gardener. Through these faithful people the lovers learnt of the steps taken by their pursuers, and thus they were successful in eluding them for a long time.

At last the mandarin issued a proclamation, stating that he would forgive Chang and his daughter on condition that they would return to his home, whereupon the innocent gardener evinced such joy at his master's relenting that he brought suspicion on himself, and his house was ordered to be watched. But far more knowing was Chang than the gardener, and he knew full well that the proclamation which the mandarin had issued was only a ruse, and he quickly decided to escape from the gardener's home with Koong-see at the first opportunity. A week passed by and still the lovers remained in hiding in the cottage of the gardener.

One evening at the end of the week, however, a soldier knocked at the door and was admitted by the gardener's wife. He entered and read the proclamation of the mandarin, and then pointed out the many advantages to be gained by all the parties concerned who should assist in restoring to the arms of the mandarin his daughter, and how she could then become the wife of Chang. The attachment of the gardener's wife for her former mistress was enough to enable her to keep her presence of mind, and after appearing exceedingly curious as to what reward she would obtain if she were successful in discovering the missing couple, she led the soldier to believe that she thought they were in hiding at a place not far distant, and if he would first obtain a distinct promise of reward in the handwriting of the mandarin, she would do all in her power to lead them to Chang and Koong-see. To this the soldier agreed, but he declared that he must leave a guard round the house. Of course, the poor woman dared not object to this, but she remonstrated loudly and severely concerning the impropriety of a lot of rough soldiers being left without the restraint of a commander, and thus she afforded the trembling lovers an opportunity to overhear what was passing, and of the dangerous position they were all in.

As soon as the soldier had taken his leave a brief conference was held between the lovers and their protectors. Only a few minutes, an hour at the most, was all they could call their own. In front of the house was the suspicious guard, ordered to allow no one to enter or leave the place, and in the rear was the broad river and no boat at hand. Something must be done, as Chang well knew that to remain where they were would mean separation, and for himself a terrible death. He saw plainly through the mandarin's scheme of issuing the proclamation, whereby he pretended to forgive the eloping lovers, as simply a bait to tempt them to return. Their only hope was in escape. But how? The river was the one chance.

"It is the only means of escape left us," said Chang, "and I must swim across the river and secure a boat on the opposite side."

"You will be seen and murdered in the water. No, no; do not attempt it," pleaded poor Koong-see.

"It is our only chance," cried Chang, as he slipped off his "poqua," or loose outer garment, which is worn by the higher classes, or those seeking literary honours.

Koong-see clung to her lover, but his resolution was firm, and bidding her to be of good cheer, since he would return soon, he sprang from the window into the stream below. Long before her lover had reached the other side of the river Koong-see fainted. Her faithful maid laid her on a couch, and after reviving her they both stationed themselves at the window and anxiously watched for Chang's return. While they watched a sudden knock was heard on the outer door. The gardener's wife could scarcely bring herself to leave

Digitized by Google

Koong-see, but no other course was left her; she must leave her mistress alone.

Going from the room she securely closed the door behind her and drew a screen across to conceal it. When she opened the outer door she found the soldier had returned, bearing with him a document from the mandarin in which was offered large sums of money for the discovery of Chang and Koong-see, and another promise that no harm should come to them if they would return. The gardener's wife made a pretence that she could not read the writing, and giving the soldier some spirits made of rice, she further managed to divert his attention until he finally became impatient, and roughly demanded that if she knew anything of the whereabouts of the couple she should give the information at once or else suffer punishment. Thus almost an hour had been whiled away when the soldier was called out by one of the guardsmen, who told him that the mandarin had sent a messenger inquiring why Chang and his daughter had not yet been brought before him, and requiring an immediate answer from the commanding officer in person.

This gave the gardener's wife time to see what had happened in the inner room. As she entered it cautiously she saw at once that Koong-see was no longer there, and going over to the window she was just in time to see a boat rapidly drifting away in the darkness and carrying as its passengers the two lovers. Then she closed the window and awaited the return of the officer.

He came soon enough, stimulated by a severe reproof from both the mandarin and Ta-jin for his delay, and at once commanded his men to search the house. But too late; the lovers had fled and were by that time far away down the river. Then the soldiers began to suspect that the gardener's wife had played them a trick, but she looked quite innocent, and persuaded the officer that she had been imposed upon and was sorry she had given him so much trouble.

The boat as seen in the picture, floated down the river all that night, requiring no extra exertion from Chang, who sat at the prow watching over Koong-see. When morning came the boat entered the main river, the Yanktse-kiang, and their passage became more dangerous. Before the sun was well up they had joined other boats, navigated by people who lived entirely upon the river. To one of these boatmen Chang sold a jewel, which he took from the box that had been presented to Koong-see by the viceroy, and with the coin bought from another some food.

Thus the lovers floated on for several days until they reached a little island, where they decided to settle down for the remainder of their days. The jewels were all sold in neighbouring towns in such a manner as not to excite suspicion, and with the money thus procured Chang was enabled to purchase the island, and secure all such necessities as were needed for its cultivation and their future success. Here Chang and Koong-see were married, and by applying themselves to hard labour they soon had the land under prosperous cultivation.

On referring to the picture again, the reader will find the island significantly recorded in the upper left-hand corner by the simple artist. The ground is broken up into lumps, indicating recent cultivation, and the trees are small in size, signifying their youth. The home can be seen, and also the diligence of Chang is evinced by the manner in which every scrap of land is reclaimed from the water, and to further illustrate this, narrow reefs of land jut out into the river. Chang, after achieving a competence by his cultivation of the land, returned to his literary pursuits, and wrote a book on agriculture, which brought him both fame and fortune.

But with the fortune which the book brought him it also revealed his hiding-place to his greatest enemy, the viceroy, whose passion for revenge was unabated.

Having waited upon the military mandarins of the river, and having sworn, by beheading a live rooster, that Chang was the person who stole his jewels and fled with his affianced bride, Ta-jin secured an escort of soldiers and attacked the island, first giving instructions to seize Koong-see and kill Chang without mercy.

When the onslaught was finally made, the few inhabitants of the island were wholly unprepared for it, and Chang was run through the body with a sword and instantly killed, although he and his men fought bravely against the overwhelming numbers. Koong-see, on witnessing her husband's death, rushed to their home, which she set on fire, perishing in the flames.

The gods—so the legend runs—cursed the wicked Ta-jin for his cruelty with a terrible disease, and he died unpitied and alone.

As for Chang and Koong-see, they were transformed into two immortal doves, emblems of constancy, which had rendered them faithful in life, and in death undivided.

And that is the legend of the Flowery Kingdom—the tale of the willow-ware china.

MAX STEINLE.

Digitized by Google

A HAUNTED RAILWAY CARRIAGE.

"YES," said Wingrave thoughtfully, as he removed his pipe from his mouth, "there are some queer ghost stories going about, I admit."

"Of course there are," said the Artist, "most unaccountable stories too, except upon the hypothesis that there are ghosts also. Why, once when I was staying at Penzance——"

"Oh, be quiet," growled the Doctor, "we've all heard that story before, and you needn't go on to tell us that you're a member of the Psychical Research Society. We've heard that about fifty times. For my part I don't believe in ghosts. Do you, Wingrave?"

"I don't know. Never made up my mind on the subject."

We were sitting round the fire, a party of four, in the Doctor's sanctum, and the conversation had turned upon the subject of ghosts. The Artist, we all knew, believed in them thoroughly, but the Doctor was a sceptic, and so, for the matter of that, was I too. We had been trying to "draw" Wingrave on the subject, but as yet had not succeeded in getting an opinion out of him. The Artist had related an awful and blood-curdling yarn about a headless spectre, which the Doctor had pooh-poohed, while I had been narrating the somewhat strange experiences of a friend of mine in a reputed haunted house, drawing, perhaps, a little on my imagination for the "facts." But all this, apparently, had no effect on Wingrave. Presently, however, he said:

"I always think myself that one of the strangest things is that so-called haunted carriage on the Brighton line."

"What haunted carriage?" we all asked.

"Why, don't you know? Haven't you ever travelled by the last train from Brighton to London, leaving Brighton at 10.35?"

The Doctor said he had once, but he didn't remember anything peculiar about it.

"Did you try to get in the second-class compartment nearest the engine?" asked Wingrave.

"No, I was travelling third. But why do you ask?"

"Well, you couldn't have got in if you'd tried!"

"Why couldn't he?" said the Artist.

"Because it's always kept locked as far as Hassocks. It's a well-known fact on the line: any official at Brighton will tell you so."

"But why is it kept locked?" I asked.

"Do you mean to say you really don't know?" asked Wingrave in reply.

"No," we replied, "let's have the story."

"Oh, I thought everyone knew it. But here it is. The thing itself happened in '89 or '90, I forget which now. There was an old gentleman named Buxton who had a jeweller's shop in the King's Parade, Brighton, and another somewhere in the Strand. These shops were managed by his two sons, one of whom lived on the premises of each, while he himself had a house at Norwood. He was in the habit of travelling between London and Brighton with a second-class season ticket, and on Thursday nights invariably carried a large stock of valuable stones and other jewellery in his bag from the Brighton shop. He always left by the last train, got out at Norwood, and took his bag on to London the next morning.

"Well, a couple of blackguards got wind of his movements, and determined to rob him. Their plan was this. One of them hired a trap and waited near Hassocks station, while the other was to get in with Buxton at Preston Park, if he were alone, and chloroform and rob him between that station and Hassocks, then jump out when the train stopped and make for the trap. Twice an attempt was made, but each time Buxton was not alone. The third time, however, there was no obstacle."

"And was he robbed?" we asked.

"Worse than that," replied Wingrave. "When he was attacked by the other he made a most desperate resistance, and the end of it was that there was a knife drawn, and poor Buxton was stabbed in the heart—the affair happened in the Hassocks tunnel. Well, the murderer propped him up in the corner of the carriage, got out at Hassocks, found his friend waiting with the trap close by, and the two of them drove off furiously, while the body went on to London Bridge before they discovered that the old man was dead."

"And is that all?" said the Doctor.

"Oh, dear no. Don't you know the sequel? But there, I forgot you were all three so densely ignorant about such a well-known thing. Why, the murderer himself was killed within twenty minutes of the death of his victim."

"How?"

"The horse shied at a sign post or something and upset the trap. The murderer was thrown out and broke his neck instantly, while his confederate was badly hurt. It was through the latter that the whole affair became known."

"What a ghostly story," said the Artist as Wingrave slowly filled and lit his pipe. "But what about the locking of that carriage door? What has that to do with it?"

"Ah, that's the sequel. And a very curious thing it is," he replied. "Ever since the affair happened there's been a difficulty about the second-class compartment nearest the engine on that train, until for some time past now, no one is permitted to enter it until the train gets to Hassocks."

"But what is the difficulty?" asked the Doctor.

"Why, people who travelled in it used to complain of all sorts of things which happened between Preston Park and Hassocks. Several times ladies travelling alone were found in a dead faint and afterwards declared that they had seen two men scuffling in the carriage. Sometimes a hideous shriek would be heard, and once or twice the train was stopped by some frightened passenger pulling the electric alarm. So at last it was determined to keep the door locked, as I've said before."

"But surely," I said, "they don't run the very same carriage in which the fellow was murdered every night and in the same position, do they?"

"No, and that's just the curious part of it. It doesn't matter what carriages they put on, or how they arrange them. The second-class compartment nearest the engine always gives them trouble unless they lock it."

"Well, and is that all?" said the Doctor with a tinge of scepticism in his tone of voice.

"No, there's something more. Every night just after the train gets to Hassocks Station a horse and trap are distinctly heard galloping along the road."

"Gammon!" said the Doctor.

"They are, I tell you. Why, every farmer in the place knows about it, and if one of them happens to be driving on the road near the station when that train comes in, he'll jump down at once and hold his horse's head."

"Why?"

"Why? Because haven't I told you a horse and trap are heard directly afterwards? And horses that this sound passes have been known to bolt from fright."

"I should like to have this story corroborated," said the Artist.

"So you can; it's easy enough. Anyone at Hassocks Station will tell you. Why don't you write to the station master? He'll be able to give you fuller details than I can."

"Look here," ejaculated the Doctor. "Do you mean to say you believe all this?"

"My dear fellow," replied Wingrave, "I've just told you the facts of the case as I heard them. I don't pretend to offer an explanation. I only told you of a most remarkable circumstance, and, as I said a moment ago, you can easily get the story corroborated if you want to."

* * * * *

That story interested me so much that I thought about it all the next day, and finally determined to try and get some further information. So I wrote and sent a letter directed to—

The Station Master,
Hassocks Station,
Hassocks,

detailing what I knew of the case, and asking him to supply me with further particulars.

The "further particulars" arrived by return of post, and were as follows:

Hassocks Station, December 9th, 1896.

DEAR SIR,—In answer to your letter I beg to state that I know nothing whatever about the matter you mention. No carriage arrives here locked from Brighton, and no sounds as of a horse and trap are heard. Neither was there, to my knowledge, any such murder committed. I might mention that I have to-day received two other letters asking for information on the same subject.—Yours faithfully, J. CLARKE, Station Master.

"Sold!" I ejaculated, as I put on my hat and started for the Doctor's. On my way I met the Artist.

"Have you had a letter from the station master at Hassocks?" I asked.

"What! Have you been made a fool of too?" he growled.

"Just so. But come on. I'm going to see the Doctor."

We found him at home, and as we entered the room he tried to hide an official-looking letter laying on the table.

"All right!" we cried, "you needn't put that out of sight. We've both got one like it. Quite a job for the station——"

"Oh, shut up, do! So you're both sold as well. That's one consolation."

And now we keep studiously off the subject of ghosts when that arch-inventor, Wingrave, appears, while if he dares to mention a railway carriage, or the station master at Hassocks, or anything approaching the subject of that terrible "sell" of his, we take up the nearest thing to throw at him, and he has to fly for his life!

VICTOR LORENZO WHITECHURCH.

A STORY WITHOUT WORDS.

£10 in Prizes.

ON page 156 four sketches are given in their proper order. £5 is offered to the reader who sends us the most appropriate wording to go under each sketch, the whole to form a story descriptive of the illustrations, and £1 will be given to each of the senders of the next best five attempts. These competitions will alternate with the Jumbled Story competitions, at all events for a time.

It is not necessary for competitors to have any literary ability. If you have a good idea, surely there should be no difficulty in putting it down in words. The whole of the story is limited to one hundred words, which may be distributed under the sketches according to the judgment of the competitor.

All that you have to do is to write in the order of the sketches the wording that you think most appropriate, inclose your attempt in an envelope (which should be marked "Picture Story"), and forward it to this office before Monday, February 8th.

Digitized by Google

THE QUEEN AGAINST OWEN.

By ALLEN UPWARD, Author of "Secrets of the Courts of Europe," "The Prince of Balkistan," etc., etc.

CHAPTER IX.

THE JUDGE.

WHEN evidence is called on behalf of the prisoner, counsel for the prosecution enjoys the right of reply. This right young Pollard rose to exercise, and, as is often the case with beginners at the Bar, he did much better as a speaker than he had done as an examiner.

As soon as he was fairly on his feet, his leader came into court and took his seat. The other case in which he had been engaged had come to an end shortly before this, but Prescott had purposely lingered outside, so as to avoid the duty of replying, which would have been assigned to him had he returned in time. As he had heard nothing of the case, nor of Tressamer's defence, the course he adopted was the best even for the interests of the prosecution—in fact, it was the course usually followed under parallel circumstances.

The first part of Pollard's reply was simply a recapitulation of the evidence. Afterwards he made an attempt to answer the attack on Lewis.

"Gentlemen," he said, "my learned friend has practically charged Mr. Lewis with this murder. On what grounds has he done so? What evidence has he brought against Mr. Lewis? Mr. Lewis is the heir of the deceased, it is true, but then he is her nephew. When he came back from Australia, he went at once to see her. He has told you, in answer to my questions, that this was out of gratitude to her for her kindness to him when he was a young man. There is nothing suspicious, therefore, in his going to her before his sister, who lived in the North of England, moreover, probably a long way off.

"Then my learned friend has laid stress on the fact that this crime occurred the night of his arrival. But I submit, gentlemen, that it would have been more natural if he had abstained from it the first night, and done it some time after, if he did it at all. I might suggest to you that the prisoner did it the night Mr. Lewis arrived on purpose to throw suspicion on him."

And so on. Finally he closed in a form of words which even the most inexperienced prosecutor has by heart.

"In conclusion, gentlemen, I ask you to banish from your minds every trace of prejudice, and to forget everything which you have read elsewhere about this case, and to determine it solely on what has passed here to-day. If the evidence you have heard leaves a fair and reasonable doubt in your minds as to the prisoner's guilt, no doubt you will acquit her; but if that evidence is so strong and convincing that you are morally satisfied that the deceased woman met her death at the prisoner's hands, then it is your duty to return a verdict of guilty."

With this he sat down, and his brother leant over and congratulated him, while the other solicitors began to consider whether there might not be something in the young man after all.

And now it was Sir Daniel Buller's turn, and all eyes were directed upon him as he settled himself in his chair, with his face towards the jury, who strove to catch his lordship's eye, and conveyed as much appreciation as possible into their faces.

"Gentlemen of the jury, it now becomes my duty to recall your attention to the facts of this case, and to give you what assistance I can towards finding your verdict. You have been told by counsel on both sides that this is a grave and important case. Gentlemen, every case which comes before a criminal court is grave and important. In this case, it is true, the life of a fellow-creature is at stake; but that consideration ought not to affect you one way or the other in bringing to bear upon the evidence before you that impartiality and cautious discrimination which it is the duty of a jury to apply indifferently to every matter that may come before them."

A slight sensation of relief in the jury-box. Among the audience an impression that his lordship is going against the prisoner.

"The duties of a jury in a case like this are exceedingly simple, but perhaps it may be advisable that I should briefly remind you in what they consist. And, first of all, it is, I am sure, unnecessary for me to insist on the absolute necessity of your resolutely putting out of your minds every particle of knowledge, and every impression of whatever kind, which you may have collected in regard to this case from sources external to the inquiry conducted here to-day. It is, I feel, equally superfluous for me to caution you against attaching the smallest weight to any evidence which I was compelled in the course of this case to exclude. The law of evidence is the accumulated experience of the ablest intellects that have adorned the Bench of which I am so unworthy an occupant." (Strong impulse on part of jury to murmur "No," manfully suppressed.) "And, in applying it, I can only say that I have never personally laboured under any hesitation as to its general soundness, though I may occasionally doubt as to its applicability to particular instances.

"You will remember that allusion was made by the prosecution in their opening to the supposed existence of certain valuables, the property of the deceased. It is my duty to tell you, speaking as judge in this case, with all the evidence before me, that there is not sufficient evidence that any such valuables were in the deceased's possession at the time when she came to her unhappy end, and that in any case there is not a particle of evidence that the prisoner had ever heard, or was even remotely aware, of the existence of the articles in question.

"Whether they were there or no is, of course, immaterial to the case. The jeweller, whose name, I believe, was John —Thomas—no——"

"William Williams, my lord," called out Pollard.

"Ah, thank you, Mr. Pollard! But it is of no consequence, because, as I am explaining to you, gentlemen, his evidence really ought not to affect your minds one way or the other. Even if deceased bought these things, there is no evidence that she kept them by her. She may have disposed of them in some manner of which we know nothing. The fact that they have been missing since her decease affords in itself some ground for supposing that she did so part with the control over this property. But, as I must repeat, what became of it is perfectly immaterial, because there is absolutely nothing in the whole of the evidence before us, and by which we must be guided, to fix the prisoner with knowledge that these valuables existed at all.

"You will observe, gentlemen, how important this becomes when we come to consider the question of motive. I agree with Mr. Tressamer, about whose general line of defence I shall have something to say presently"—(Tressamer frowned; the rest of the Bar looked nervous)—"in saying that the apparent absence of motive is the most inexplicable feature in the case for the prosecution. You will, of course, have fresh in your minds the evidence of the servant on this point." (The jury found it quite hopeless to even pretend that they had anything of the sort.) "I refer to her statement, which I will read to you presently"—(visible depression in the jury-box and throughout the court)—"that deceased promised the prisoner on one occasion to leave her a legacy, or something of the sort. Gentlemen, that is peculiarly and emphatically a matter for you to deal with, and on which it would be out of place for me to offer you any guidance whatever." (Dismay among several jurymen; stolid pride among others.) "If you believe that evidence—and I confess I am wholly unable to follow the prisoner's counsel in some of his comments upon the general demeanour of the witnesses, most of whom appeared to me to give their evidence with every appearance of impartiality, and in a manner which showed that they realised their responsibility—but all that, again, is rather a matter for you than for me—if, I say, you believe that evidence as to the legacy, you must consider for yourselves what weight you ought fairly to attach to it, and how far in your opinion it furnishes a motive adequate to inspire the very heinous crime into which we are now inquiring."

Digitized by Google

The jury by this time were fairly at sea. They could not for the life of them make out which side his lordship was taking, and, of course, it never once occurred to them that he was trying to avoid taking any side at all.

"And now, gentlemen, to consider the evidence against the prisoner more in detail." (Suppressed sighs from the gentlemen.) "This is one of those cases which depend entirely on what is commonly known as circumstantial evidence. Well, gentlemen, the evidence of circumstances is just as good as any other evidence, and very often it is far more reliable and far less subject to be vitiated by improper influences than ocular and oral testimony. In cases of this kind it is seldom that we can get anything but circumstantial evidence. When a man is going to do a wicked and criminal act he does not call witnesses around him. No, he avoids all human sight, he perpetrates his deed in secrecy, and all that we can do is to seek to penetrate the mystery by such means as are at our disposal."

Impression confirmed that judge is against the prisoner. Tressamer looking slightly anxious.

"The question for us, therefore, or rather for you, gentlemen" (the jury look important), "is not whether the evidence is circumstantial or not, but whether it is sufficient to convict the prisoner. Sufficient, that is, in your opinion, as men of intelligence and firmness, bringing to bear on this case the same qualities of mind which you bring to bear from day to day upon your ordinary avocations, whatever those may be. That the evidence is sufficient in law I am reluctantly compelled to decide. Whether the court which deals with points of this description will confirm my judgment or overrule it I cannot say. In the meantime, you must take it from me that you are legally justified in convicting the prisoner. Whether you are really justified on the facts is, of course, a very different question."

Impression among many that judge is going for acquittal. Jury still in doubt.

"This is one of those cases which make a judge congratulate himself on the existence of trial by jury. It is one of those peculiarly difficult cases in which the mind is perplexed between its desire to mete out punishment for a singularly atrocious crime, and its inability to disentangle the knotted skein of mystery which shrouds the whole circumstances of the affair. I rejoice unaffectedly that the responsibility of discharging this delicate and dangerous task is thrown, not upon my shoulders, but upon yours."

Undisguised dismay of jury. They cast appealing looks round the court and meet nothing but contempt. The general feeling is now that the judge is in the prisoner's favour. By this time the majority of those present share the same view.

Then Sir Daniel proceeded to go into the evidence at great length, reading passages here and there from his notes. When he came to the evidence of the servant Rees, he threw out a suggestion which struck doubt into many a mind which had till then believed in the prisoner's innocence.

"A very great deal in this case undoubtedly turns on this evidence as to footsteps. You may, I think, take it as admitted on all hands, by the prisoner's counsel as well as by the prosecution, that the witness is correct in saying that she heard the prisoner leave the house. That she recognised her walk correctly that time there can be no manner of doubt. Then we come to the second time, when she heard footsteps ascending the stairs. And I may pause here to remark that I think a quite exaggerated importance has been attached to the discrepancy between the witness's ideas of time and the correct idea. Gentlemen, we should all of us fail if we strove to indicate with accuracy the length of a given interval of time. We use the expressions 'five minutes' and 'ten minutes' in ordinary conversation, without attaching any very definite meaning to them, and, therefore, I cannot see that the witness is in any way discredited if she mistook a period of three minutes for one of ten, or vice versâ."

The jury nodded approval. Now they were on firm ground.

"But it is her answer to Mr. Pollard, when he asked her as to the second set of footsteps, that I wish to draw your attention to. She said, as I took it, 'I did not notice them,'—that is, the footsteps—'but I think they must have been Miss Owen's, or else I should have noticed the difference.' Now, I think you will see the importance of that." (The jury try to see it, and, failing in that, try to look as if they saw it, and fail a second time.) "Remember, the state of things is this: the witness is wide awake; she has just been down to the front door and up again, and ten minutes after, or three minutes only according to Mr. Tressamer, she hears someone come in and walk upstairs. Now, gentlemen, under those circumstances one would naturally expect the witness to be on the alert to distinguish any difference, if difference there were, between the footsteps. And if the person entering the second time were not the prisoner, to whose tread she was accustomed, and which she was expecting to hear, but if it were someone else—a man, let us say, with an entirely different tread, and a tread to which she was wholly unaccustomed—I say one would naturally expect the witness to note the difference instantly, to wonder who it was that had entered, to feel alarm when she heard the unknown stranger proceeding upstairs and into the bedroom; and, in short, one would expect her to get up and rouse the whole household to discover the robber, as she would naturally assume him to be."

The jury were much impressed. A feeling of gravity spread all over the court. In the prisoner's mind there was a sensation as if the sun had retired behind a cloud, leaving a leaden atmosphere all round her.

"Leaving you to attach much or little importance, as you please, to that observation" (jury puzzled again), "I will pass on to the point about which so much has been said—namely, the latch." (Jury bend forward with straining ears. They have felt this to be the difficulty all along, and are anxiously desiring to be told what it all means, and what bearing it has on the case.) "This latch, or rather lock, appears to have been of peculiar, though not unusual, construction. As you doubtless know, gentlemen, locks do differ very much from one another, and it is essential to their usefulness that they should do so. If all the locks on our doors were of the same pattern, one key would open them all, and consequently the locks would be rendered useless for the purpose for which they were designed. In ancient times, before such articles had come into common use, it was no doubt the custom to have a rude species of door-fastening, calculated rather to keep the door fixed in its place as against the violence of the weather, than to furnish any obstacle against the ingress of undesired visitors. But, gentlemen, we are not living in those times, but in our own; and we are here to administer justice, not with regard to the ideas prevalent among our remote ancestors, but with regard to the ordinary and reasonable practices of everyday life around us."

Digitized by Google

This last part appeals to the jury. They nod their heads in approval, and wait for further enlightenment.

"Law, gentlemen, it has often been said, is common-sense; and though there may be a sense in which that maxim is not strictly verifiable, yet in a broad and general way its applicability has never been and cannot be disputed. And, therefore, gentlemen, your common-sense will agree with me when I say that it is a lawful presumption—a presumption which the law warrants you in drawing and in holding till you have some satisfactory evidence to rebut it—that the person who obtains access to a house or any other building secured by a lock of this description must have in his or her possession a key which is capable of opening that lock."

Continued approval of the jury. They find his lordship a little tedious perhaps, but sound. At last there seems a fair prospect of light being thrown upon the case.

"Now, that there were in existence keys which fitted this particular lock cannot, I think, be seriously doubted by anyone who has listened carefully to the evidence which has been put forward both by the prosecution and by the defence in this case." (Gratification of jury. How simple it all seems when a master-mind is at work upon the apparent mystery!) "The only question left for you to decide, so far as I can discover, and if I am wrong it is not for want of careful consideration, is this: whether, on that night into which we are inquiring, the prisoner had or had not a latchkey, and, if so, whether she used it, and in either case, whether any other person had a similar key, which he also employed in opening the door of this house." (Jury getting slightly fogged again. But they no longer sorrow as one who hath no hope. They rely on his lordship to pull them through.)

"It is perhaps a circumstance worth noting, though the explanation may be very simple, that neither side has produced a latchkey purporting to be one of those belonging to the latch in question." (The explanation was simple. Neither side had thought of it.) "But in the absence of any ocular demonstration one way or the other, we are, I think, justified in assuming that the keys in question were small, portable articles, such as could conveniently be carried in the pocket. In saying this I merely appeal to your own experience as men of business and householders, who are most of you probably in the constant habit of carrying articles of this kind yourselves." (Jury in smooth water again. How could they ever have thought this matter presented difficulties?) "There, gentlemen, I must leave you. I can throw no further light upon the hidden circumstances of that night, and must leave you to decide for yourselves on a calm and deliberate review of the evidence whether, in your opinion, such a key as I have indicated was, or was not, in the possession of the prisoner at the bar, or of any other individual whose name has or has not transpired in the course of this trial, and if so, whether the prisoner, or that other person, or both of them, did or did not obtain access to the house by means of that nature."

Collapse of jury. Dashed in a moment from their height of fancied security, they lay helpless at the bottom of the abyss.

The summing-up was nearly over. Tressamer had begun to hope the judge had forgotten him. But Sir Daniel had reserved his melodramatic effects to the last, as all orators know they ought to do.

"And now a few words as to the unusual, I may say, I hope, the extraordinary, though unhappily not quite unprecedented, line of defence which has been adopted in this case. The prisoner's counsel has not contented himself with merely defending the prisoner, he has gone far beyond that, far beyond the necessities, so far as they present themselves to my mind, of his position, and has distinctly and deliberately brought an accusation against one who is not on trial before you, and has, therefore, no means of rebutting the attack. For such a course there is, in my opinion, not a shadow of excuse. I have listened with great patience to the evidence in this case from the beginning to the end, and I have not detected anywhere anything that casts one particle of suspicion upon Mr. Lewis.

"He was attacked for having come so promptly to visit his relative on his return. But his explanation was straightforward, and such as to commend itself to everyone who heard him. I shall not trouble you with any defence of Mr. Lewis, however"—(gratitude of the whole court)—"but I must condemn in the gravest and strongest manner the way in which Mr. Tressamer has abused his privilege as an advocate to spring a charge of this deadly character upon one who is, so far as we can see, a perfectly innocent man. If this sort of thing is to be indulged in, the honour of the Bar—that noble profession to which it is my glory to have belonged—will be dragged in the dust and its formidable immunities will have to be sharply and summarily curtailed. It has been well said that no assassin is so terrible to the community as the assassin of reputations, and in my opinion the man who is capable of taking advantage of a technical immunity from punishment to lie in wait for and destroy in cold blood the whole character and career of another, reveals a blackness of disposition which fits him for the commission of any crime, aye, though it were as heinous as that of which he has accused his victim."

It was a crushing rebuke. The crowded Bar turned and looked at their comrade as though they expected him to sink through the floor. But he sat pale and rigid, tearing off the feather of a quill with his teeth, but showing no other sign that he had heard the Judge.

"It is the prisoner who must suffer most by such a line of defence." (Here Eleanor looked up suddenly, as if she had only just begun to pay attention to what was going on.) "Its natural effect on your minds must be to induce you to ask yourselves not the real question before you, namely, is Eleanor Owen guilty or not? but this other question: which is guilty, Eleanor Owen or John Lewis? And to that you could, as conscientious men, give only one answer.

"But that is what I want, if possible, to avoid. My principal reason for making the remarks I have made about Mr. Tressamer's speech is that I do not want you to confuse the issues, as he has confused them, but to return your verdict freely and impartially, having regard solely to the bearing of the evidence which has been given upon the guilt or innocence of the prisoner."

Here his lordship abruptly came to an end, just when the long-suffering jury were expecting that he was at last going to give them a hint as to his own leaning in the case.

It was now the part of the clerk of arraigns to rise and request the jury to consider their verdict. But that functionary had taken advantage of the charge to fall into a light and pleasant slumber, from which it became necessary to rouse him. One of the Bar, therefore, put out his hand and pulled the clerk of arraigns by the sleeve. He started awake, and, hastily stumbling to his feet, looked wildly round for information.

The day before this incident would have provoked mirth. To-day it caused nothing but impatient annoyance, except to a few junior barristers, who thought it professional to show callous indifference to what was going on. At last, however, the clerk of arraigns was made to realise what stage had been reached, and he called the bailiff of the court and gave the jury over to his charge, with the following form of words:

"You shall take this jury to some convenient place, where you shall lock them up without meat, fire, or light; you shall suffer no man to speak to them, neither shall you speak to them yourself, except to ask them if they have agreed upon their verdict; so help you God."

The oath was taken, and the twelve men filed slowly out.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

WHAT COMES OUT OF THE GRASS.

AN extraordinary man was Joshua Key—ugly, deformed and morose; long, lank, and bony; narrow in his shoulders, and hollow in the chest. His arms were long and skinny, and his head, clad by a thin, strange-coloured hair, was pear-shaped, narrow at the jaw, and massive at the forehead. His brows were hairless, and his pointed chin and sunken cheeks bore not a trace of beard. Two little dark eyes, restless and dilating, flashed beneath his hairless brows. His arms were strangely long, and reached, as they fell to his side, the bony knee of his short leg. Yet, despite his deformities, he was graceful in all his movements, which were slow and indolent.

The life and soul of the man lived in his eyes; they never ceased flashing. Roving or fixed they flashed the light of anger.

The manner of this man was strange, and his surroundings weird, uncanny. He spent the main part of his days up in the low, dark loft, which, by a long window, overlooked the marsh and swampy moorland that stretched some miles away from the rising ground upon which the dilapidated house stood.

This loft, with its thickly-sanded floor, with the withered bush and bramble that stood heaped in every corner, with its common deal table under the window, and its low milking stool, was Joshua Key's retreat, Joshua Key's monastery; and the graceful, coiling creatures that entwined themselves round the stems and boughs of the bramble, or lay coiled up in the corners of the long glass cases arranged round the room, were his idols. He loved those creeping, curling, wriggling, rearing snakes. He loved them, as we love at twenty, with a silent, pitiful, melancholy adoration, when a glance of recognition quickens the pulse, and brings the hot blood tingling to our ears.

He was pleased to lie upon the sanded floor and watch their movements as they curved their way towards him and pressed their little black noses against the plate glass cases, or as they turned and twisted their graceful, supple bodies around some branch of bramble, and, swaying to and fro, spat out their tongues as if to mock him. For hours he would lie prostrate upon the floor, and imitate the motions of their heads, fixing his round, black eyes on theirs, and spit as they spat, hiss as they hissed.

Or he would while away his day sitting on his milking stool before a boa-constrictor's cage, and imitate the serpent's mode of rearing; contracting his body, and swaying to and fro; then elongating himself, and twisting his head quickly to the right, to the left, and fixing his eyes upon some object, thrust out his tongue, ten, twenty, thirty times in rapid succession.

Hours he would while away in such a manner; days he would stay shut up in that dark, low loft, living upon biscuits, and the raw flesh of rabbits and pigeons, which, anon, he flung to his vipers, and a few stray leaves of a lettuce's heart. He was dead to the world, but most of all to the fair-haired girl in the room below his loft, the girl who bore his name, and called him husband, master.

She was a fair young girl, with a thin, pale face that had been beautiful. Deep, dark lines in her cheeks, once so plump and rosy, marked the dry courses where tears of bitter disappointment had so often flowed. All that remained of her early beauty was the cloud of soft brown hair that loosely fell upon her shoulders.

She was alone! alone, save for Joshua her husband, and Donald, the old male help who made pretence to do her bidding. No other voice than Donald's would ever reach her ears, unless it was the chattering babble of some smiling child, whose prattle the low wind carried across the moor from the rising land beyond; for Joshua was as dumb as the dead.

She rarely saw her husband, moreover. Days often grew into weeks without her meeting him, and, per-adventure, when she chanced to meet him on the stairs, he would pass her by without a glance or sign of recognition, and wander out, and down to the marsh-land, where he would stay until the white mist rose, and the sky grew dark. But sometimes he would meet her and, seeing, would silently and indolently take her into his long arms, and press his thin, bloodless lips to hers—and hasten. Sometimes she would find her solitude insufferable, and call for Donald, to ask him something, that she might feel the strange sensation of hearing a human voice. But Donald was generally as dumb as his master; he would hearken to her calling without responding, and she would call in vain, and call again, in loud tones that struck strange terror into her sad young heart, when she would seek her bed-chamber to bury her face in the pillows, and sob herself into the oblivion of sleep.

One day she sat alone in her room, gazing out of the window at the thin white mist that hung on the marsh-land, grey in the evening light. She was asking herself, as she did a score of times each day, why she had allowed herself to leave her home of two years before, to plight her troth to a man she loved not; and she buried her face in her arms, and answered the stereotyped answer:

"It is in the power of his eyes!"

Therein lay the secret of her misery, and all that had led up to it. It was the power of Joshua Key's eyes that had fascinated her, and enticed her from her home. She had not strength to resist the influence of his glance. His will was her wish when their eyes met. He was her master, she his slave, and her impotence was a bondage and a bane. Early in her married life she had found her level, and had abandoned speculation upon her master's occupation in the room above her own. She knew his worship, and his idols, and was well contented with this but scanty knowledge.

Digitized by Google

Sometimes she would hear him moving, and the creaking of the three-legged stool upon which he sat to mock the movements of the boa-constrictor; but she was now well used to it all, and it never set her wondering what he could be doing. She never dared to question him; indeed, during the whole two years they had been married she had only spoken seven slow words to him, —"Don't, don't look at me like that!" The thought of freeing herself by any means of the burden of her existence had never occurred to her. The question that ever filled her mind was as to how it would all end. It could not go on for ever, and yet it appeared to her impossible that it could ever end. The past two years had seemed to her a whole eternity. She could not conceive the end.

Her mind was full of the queries she set herself, as she sat at the window watching the curling mist upon the swamp grow thicker and greyer, as the daylight died behind the distant hills. How could it end? How would it end, if end it could?

A sudden terror seized her. She know not what there was in the sounds she heard in the room above to strike terror into her. She had heard many similar sounds which never had disturbed her. It was only as if some heavy body were dragging across the floor. That was all, and she knew not why it terrorised her. But it surely did.

She rose involuntarily from her seat and with a cat tread left the room and made her way up to the loft. Never had she seen inside this room. All that she knew she had learnt from Donald. And now the door of the loft stood ajar and she before it. But she hesitated. There was absolute silence within, and it filled her with an inexplicable dread. She dreaded to learn; she dreaded to see. But she dreaded the most to retreat in ignorance.

The sounds of dragging were renewed, and she hesitated no longer. One step, one motion of her arm, and the door stood open, and she within the loft.

Full length upon the floor, leaving a track behind him in the thickly strewn sand, lay Joshua Key, wriggling and creeping in the manner of the mode of progression of a snake. His long arms lay closely at his side, and his legs together. His head was raised, and his small black eyes flashed fire incessantly. He had wriggled on his stomach from the farther corner of the loft, and was creeping gradually towards the door. Nearer and nearer—then his flashing eyes caught hers, and he stopped and fixed his glance unfalteringly upon her. She stood transfixed. She neither moved nor spoke, but her breath was hard and heavy, and her body swayed to and fro like a poplar under a heavy breeze.

* * * * *

She lay upon her bed, and Donald was chafing her cold, white hands. In an instant she recollected.

"Did I faint, dear Donald?" she murmured.

Donald nodded, and then left her.

Afterwards, a hundred times a day, she went all over that scene again. And yet she never anticipated how it would end.

* * * * *

The day had been warm, but now a doubly-heavy mist hung over the swamp, and gave a grey-blue light to the long grass and rushes that flourished to hide the bog. Still, Joshua Key's wife sat out in the damp, cold air, which clung round her like a moistened cloak. A book lay in her lap. Her eyes wandered from her book to the strip of neglected ground that stretched from the house down to the reeds and rushes bordering in a thick band the vast swamp. Then her eyes traversed the swamp, and rested upon the blue-black peaks that rose in the far distance above the mists and plain. Not a sound disturbed the air; not a human figure lent a vestige of animation to the melancholy scene for as far as the eye could reach. The only moving object was the blue-grey mist, which rose and fell, in curves and clouds, as each soft rain-breeze swept across the swamp.

She let her head rest back upon the peeling wall of the house, and fixed her eyes upon the sky. The clouds were dark and lowering. There would be rain in the night, she thought, and the swamp would rise and encroach upon the bordering land.

The air was growing colder, damper. She felt it touch her skin, and shivered. She felt the moisture on her hand and cheek. A feeling of unrest, as though some magnetic influence was at work upon her, but too impotent to move her, crept over her. She moved restlessly, and watched the curling mist as it rose and fell.

Her husband was down there, she recollected. Her lord and master, and her king, was wading in the marsh and bog, among the tall green grass and heavy-headed rushes, seeking a snake that had escaped.

The feeling of unrest grew stronger. She felt more distinctly from whence the magnet worked, down in the marsh, among the stagnant pools and waving reeds. It moved her now. It drew her eyes, it moved her limbs, and she saw where marsh and meadow met, reeds angrily dividing, as if some creeping creature was through them making way towards her. She watched the tall grass tremble as the creeper crept along, which clearly showed the course the creeper took. She took two steps towards the marsh, and stopped. What could it mean? What could it be? The movement of the grass was such as might have been caused by the travelling of a snake.

An irresistible force seized her, and dragged her down to the marsh. It took her without her wish or will towards the spot where the mysterious creeper would emerge from the reeds.

Her eyes grew heavy, her pulse grew slack. Yet she still saw the trembling of the grass. Nearer and nearer to herself it trembled. Nearer and nearer she approached the edge. She reached it, and the reeds and grass, and the extreme border of the marsh, trembled, snapped, and fell before the prostrate form of Joshua Key.

He was clad in a long, black, and slimy waterproof. His arms lay closely to his sides, and his head was bare.

As he emerged from the long grass, he raised his head and stopped. His eyes met those of his wife, and blazed with the light of fury.

Slowly, with snake-like grace of movement, he crawled up to her, and raised himself to his feet. She neither moved nor trembled, but let him entwine his long, thin arms around her neck, and press his lips to hers. With supernatural strength, he pressed her lips, forcing her head back—back further, until something snapped, as the reeds had done, under his weight. He let his arms relax. She fell. He crouched upon the ground, and crept back into the reeds. On and on through the path he had made in coming. On and on till he sank exhausted in a stagnant pool.

That night rain fell for hours, and the waters of the swamp rose two feet.

C. RANDOLPH LICHFIELD.

Digitized by Google

A STORY WITHOUT WORDS.—No. 2.

SEE PAGE 150.

Digitized by Google

OR,

The Romance of a Lost Continent.

By Geo. C. Wallis, Author of The Winning of Gunhild, etc.

CHAPTER XXX.

ON THE SHORE OF THE SHADOWS.

Two days I sat mourning over the body, speechless as a marble statue, taking little nourishment, save scanty drinks of water from the ample store in the boat, and anon gazing fixedly at the waste of water tossing outside the massive tower; after which time I roused myself, though every movement caused my wounds to gape and pain afresh, and with much labour got the boat with its melancholy freight inside the sheltering building.

Then I drew the sail-cloth from the body, and bound it up again with care, as it is the custom to bind the dead, smoothing the white robe, stroking the calm, lovely face, arranging the locks of raven hair. Then I secured a Passport Coin within her hand, according to her last wish, and next laid my beloved sword, my "Sunderer," upon her breast, encased still in its jewelled sheath, and cleaned and brightened as though fresh from its maker's forge.

"Lie there, good sword," I said. "Thy work is done now thy master's love is gone; and none shall use thee now that I have no more need!"

So I bound the two together, and after imprinting a lingering kiss upon the cold lips of the dead, bore my sorrowful burden down the winding stairs till I came to where the sea in the lower stories stopped me, and there, weighting the shrouded figure, consigned it with a bitter heart to the still, black water, watching the ripples and bubbles on the surface as it sank down—down—to where the form of little Didron already lay.

"Farewell, sweet wife!" I cried aloud in the gruesome silence, the words echoing dismally in the solitary place; "farewell. Thy Arnon will be with thee soon."

And the emptiness replied: "Will be with thee soon."

Then I crept back up the stairs and sat down on the highest floor, weary and forlorn, for it is a sad thing to bury your own dead, with your own hands to place them in the grave from whence none return. In the misery of my soul I strove to curse the gods, but my lips grew feeble and my courage failed, so that I dare not, and sat alone in silence, grieving, wishing that I had never been born. At last sleep, long delayed sleep, pressed down my eyelids, and overcome with weakness and fatigue I succumbed to its subtle, healing influence, waking not till the sun had set and risen and was near to setting again.

I was refreshed then, and in less pain and strangely calm in mind, though grief weighed upon my heart heavily as a load of lead. I parcelled out my store of food and measured my quantity of water, finding that the first would last me for some months and the latter but a few weeks. However, I knew that the season of storm and rain was coming on, when I could collect sufficient water in the channels of the tower top, and with my spear and sling I could obtain fish and bird whenever my supply should fail.

Whilst searching the deserted chambers I found some writing tools, and many sheets of prepared parchment, which had been reserved for State Rolls and priests' sayings, and the fancy seized me to beguile my solitary lot with setting down the thoughts and doings of my wandering life. I welcomed the sudden inspiration with avidity, for something I must do if I did not mean to go distraught, and so, after nursing my wounds till I could sit to the wooden bench with ease, began to write this strange and stormy history.

Having plenty of oil in my lamps, I started towards the even of a lowering day, the style and method of my writing coming to me in a flash of thought as I gazed out upon the desolate expanse of sea.

Digitized by Google

As though to mock me, the land had risen again somewhat, so that the heaped-up wreck of the many buildings of Kronos formed a sunken reef at the mouth of a new bay which extended over the lower part of the city, and the blackened shores of this bay, mere reefs in themselves, were awash with the billows at high tide.

Here and there some pile of masonry projected from the surface, and right in the midst of the shallow inlet a single granite column rose defiantly from the waters—a melancholy memory of the Temple of the Three Spirits.

As the darkness of the even grew, the promise of wild weather was well fulfilled; the surf broke heavily upon the sullen shores and curled in a foaming ridge above the buried bar, the seamews screamed, the gale howled fiercely round the massive tower.

A few tattered clouds sped swiftly under the stars, and away in the south the lightning forked across the sky.

I seized my writing tools in haste and began; my hand hurried over the pages, and the spirit of the storm spoke in the written words. I wrote on swiftly, heedlessly, far into the wild, wet night, nor rested from my labour till the story was so well begun that I knew I could set it down to the end. To the blinding glare of lightning, the deafening roar of thunder, and the angry dashing of the billows on the mighty tower, I wrote on, living over my youth again, and when I laid the sheets aside, the sun was glowing in the hazy east like a ball of fire.

So day by day I took up the long story, writing out of the sincerity of my heart, omitting nothing, not sparing myself, nor avoiding my weaknesses in the least, and growing to like the task until I came to tell of where I first met Briseis in that well-remembered garden.

Then my hand trembled, refusing to proceed, and my sorrow burst forth anew. For a week the parchment lay untouched, and I paced the stony floor with gnawing misery eating into my very soul.

The strain grew great. The solitude, the lack of a cheering voice or a friendly face, was getting too much for me to bear, when I recollected my skill in preparing noxious draughts that I had when a priest in the Land of Khem.

"Ha! ha!" laughed I, with bitter mirth, "'twas not in vain old Mitres taught me the mixing of the poison cups which stood in the sacred parts of the temple of Karnac for the punishment of desecrators! 'Twas not in vain, I swear!"

So I compounded a deadly draught from the infusion of many dried herbs that were stored in the tower; a cupful of poison running over; a measure of dark-brown liquid, full of the death that is the beginning of a new life; and, placing it on the bench before me, sat down with a feeling of reckless defiance of all the powers that be.

"Soon, Briseis, I shall be with thee," I said, "for when the sun goes down I shall drink this cup and set my spirit free!"

Patiently I waited, with the Passport Piece bound tightly in my hand, till the light of day dipped slowly in the sea, casting a softened twilight glow over all the scene, most pleasing to the senses after the scorching glare of a tropic moon. Then I seized the fatal cup, and crying:

"Health to thee, Amarunth, great god of death!" raised it towards my lips.

But ere they touched the noxious liquor a shadow passed before my eyes, and a sweet voice whispered in my ear:

"Stay!"

I looked up, and at what I saw dashed the cup upon the stony floor, shattering it to fragments, and spilling the contents at my feet. It was the shade of my Briseis—nay, it was herself in very truth who stayed my hand and drove the fierce despair from out my soul with one beseeching glance of her endearing eyes!

I was not alarmed nor felt a great surprise, being so full of the thought of my beloved that her appearance fell in with the humour of my mind, and I sat regarding her beauteous figure—which shone faintly luminous in the deepening dusk—with admiration and content. She was clad much as in life, and upon her head was twined a spray of berries, like those of the mountain ash, only that each berry glittered in the shade as a diamond of the purest water. After the first glance she looked at me no more, standing with downcast eyes till I spoke.

"Briseis," I said, breathing softly lest I should dispel the vision, "why keep me from thee longer?"

"For thine own good, my Arnon," she replied. "Knowest not that 'tis written in the Book of the Soul: 'Let him who would forestall the hand of Destiny take heed for himself, lest he find not for ever the peace that his soul craveth?'"

"Ay, I know it," I answered, "but solitude and anguish hath unsettled my reason."

"Wherefore I came to save thee from thyself," the shade of Briseis made reply; "for I saw thy mad intent, and would not have it so. Think not I have forgotten thee," and she looked upon me with the old bewitching tenderness.

"Do the spirits, then, see all that happens to those left in the flesh?" I asked inquisitively. "Have they power to appear and speak with whom they will?"

"Thou would fain know the secrets of the future, Arnon," she answered smiling, "and it is deemed that the message of the Book of the Soul is sufficient for the children of men."

"You may be," I intreated, loth to bate my curiosity. "There are some things thou couldst tell me of without angering the gods?"

She seemed to think in silence a moment, looking upwards, then answered me:

"Some inkling of the glory of the Garden of Joy and some forewarning of the Land of Shadows I can give thee. When thou diest, linger not in the murky vapours of the Shades, but press forward to the Light of the Spirit World, which shineth bright and constant as the evening star; press towards it heedless of the many luring lights that glimmer all ways through the gloom, for these latter are never still.

"The portal of the Garden is ever swinging slightly open for the faithful ones to enter in, and having found the Steadfast Star thou wilt see the way thereto clear before thy feet. The Warden of the Gate is an old man with a flowing beard and a grave, stern face, but his eyes are kindly, and the passers-in are welcomed with his blessing, giving him the Passport Pieces from their hands as they come. He straightway casteth down the coins upon the fertile soil, and from each piece there springeth up at once a lovely plant with a sweet-smelling flower. And the faithful enter in and wander in the Sacred Groves.

"Of the Garden I may not tell thee much, only saying that the beauty and the glory of it passeth all belief, and never palleth on the soul's most subtle sense. It is the dwelling of the Three Spirits which yet are one—the Great Eternal All-in-All, and the light of Their Presence shineth everywhere throughout the land—upon the waving trees, the gorgeous blossoms, the rippling brooks, and the tinkling waterfalls of the winding Stream of Peace; and the sound of Their Voices breathing words of love and rest is ever stealing through the Garden in the form of a whispering wind, fanning the bloom-laden branches of the avenues and rustling through the pliant rushes by the River's brink.

"One thing more I will tell thee and have done, and must be gone. They who choose rather to wait the coming of their beloved than to go forward alone into the full perfection that lieth far within, can rest near the Gate till their loved ones come. There is a great crowd waiting now, for many are they who would rather wait than proceed alone."

"And thou, Briseis?" I asked.

"I am one of those who wait," she said, "and our children also, with many other of thy friends. We shall rest by the Gate till thou hast passed the Golden Portal and we can go

Digitized by Google

1/2 A MILLION 7/6 FULL DRESS LENGTHS TO BE CLEARED AT 6S

BLACK, NAVY, GREY, AND SEVERAL CHARMING SHOT EFFECTS

Patterns of the above, also SALE PRICE LIST, Post Free.

CLEARANCE PRICES quoted for Dress Goods, Mantlings, Suitings, Flannels, Flannelette, Calico, Shirtings, Blankets, Quilts, Sheets, Towels, Gloves, Corsets, Stockings, Handkerchiefs, Umbrellas, etc.

TREMENDOUS REDUCTIONS IN EVERY DEPARTMENT.

FIRST ORDER OPENED MONDAYS, WEDNESDAYS, AND FRIDAYS SENT FREE AND CASH RETURNED.

Send to-day for Sale Price List and list of Lucky Winners.

REMNANT BUNDLES (containing 12 yards), in long lengths—Dress Serge 12/-, Calico 3/6, Flannelette 4/6, Union Shirting 7/9, Flannel 8/9.

LUTAS LEATHLEY & Co., Dept. 130, ARMLEY, LEEDS.

THE DEAF HEAR

The New Patent SOUND DISCS

Completely overcome DEAFNESS and HEAD NOISES, no matter of how long standing. Are the same to the ears as glasses are to the eyes. Invisible. Comfortable. Worn months without removal. Explanatory Pamphlet Free.

The L. R. WALES CO., 62 & 63, New Bond St., London, W.

A SUM of from 10s. to 20s. per week offered for spare time to either sex, everywhere; work can be done evenings.—Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 92A, Aldersgate Street, London.

CAN YOU WRITE?

Of course you can! Why not then emboss your Notepaper, etc., with a pretty Monogram? using the

Patent Pocket Monopresse

Every Initial and Monogram kept in stock. Monograms of one or two letters, 9d. each, post free. Apply—

CHAS. ROMPLER, 7, New Basinghall St., London, E.C. Agents wanted.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS COCOA.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

WITH FULL NATURAL FLAVOUR.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots. Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

JOLLY'S 'DUCHESS' PILLS.

POSITIVE CURE FOR ANÆMIA,

POVERTY OF BLOOD, etc.

A box containing 60 doses post free on receipt of 2/6. Address—

BRITISH DRUGGISTS LTD., 219, Oxford Street, LONDON, W.

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free. Address L. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

£150 CASH PRIZES FOR £150

SAINT VALENTINE'S DAY.

TO BE GIVEN AWAY to Purchasers of our Celebrated UMBRELLAS (Ladies' or Gents'), made in two qualities only, price, carriage free per return, 2s. 9d. and 4s. 9d.

Our "SCOTT" UMBRELLA at 2s. 9d. is a Marvel of Cheapness, being made of the finest material, the name SCOTT being sufficient guarantee of its durability.

Our "CITY" UMBRELLA at 4s. 9d. (Ladies' or Gents') is made of the Best Austria Silk, with strong handsome handles and framework, and is well known for its excellent wear, being equal to many sold at 10s. each.

SPECIAL SAINT VALENTINE'S PRESENT.

£150 IN FREE MONEY PRIZES.

First Prize, £30. Second Prize, £25. Third Prize, £20.
Fourth Prize, £15. Fifth Prize, £10.

THE REMAINING FIFTY POUNDS

will be given to the person purchasing the Greatest Number of Umbrellas (either "Scott" or "City") before February 14th, 1897.

The above Prizes are awarded to purchasers sending the most correct solutions of the following words representing eight articles of daily food:

1.—B * * * D.	3.—M * * T.	5.—P * * * * * * S.	7.—S * * * R.
2.—B * * * * R.	4.—T * A.	6.—C * * * * * E.	8.—M * * K.

DIRECTIONS.—Fill in the stars, one letter in each star, to represent an article of food. Copy those you can find out on a sheet of paper and post it, together with P.O. or stamps for 2s. 9d. or 4s. 9d., for whichever Umbrella you may select, and a stamped directed envelope for Prize Results, etc., to

J. SCOTT, THE CITY UMBRELLA CO., 1, NOBLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

NOTE.—This Contest closes on February 14th, but orders should be sent as early as possible before then.

Umbrellas will be sent per return, together with a letter stating whether solutions are correct. Prizes will be dispatched on Tuesday, February 17th. The Prizes will be awarded in order of correctness. Should two or more send in correct solutions to the whole of the eight words, the £100 will be equally divided. We guarantee a Prize to every purchaser correctly solving the eight words. Any representative of the Press is invited to call and see the Prizes dispatched.

Digitized by Google

on together into the greater glory and the nearer presence of the All-in-All. And to comfort thee I say: thy waiting shall not be long, nor weary, and thy end shall be in the arms of the sea that thou lovest so well—maybe in thy hours of sleep. And now I leave thee till we meet beyond the Shadows."

Her glorious form grew fainter and more filmy and darkness deepened before my eyes. With a smile of love and half-regret the vision passed away.

Then I went to my writing again, plying my stylus on the smoothened sheets with fresh vigour and new inspiration. Hope, fair hope, now shone before my onward gaze, and calm assurance of the future took the place of a frenzied despair. The solitude grew less irksome, and the hours of sleep more welcome, and ever the echo of my beloved's words rang sweetly in my ears.

As I wrote, my loneliness seemed to pass away, and I felt as though I lived and moved in the scenes I depicted, heard and told the stories that I wrote, saw the friends and foes with whom my narrative is full.

Now I draw to the close of my task, and the written sheets lie curled in the copper wrapping ready to be sealed before I shut my lids in sleep. The sea has risen since I first began, at first slowly and then quickly, till it is awash with the floor on which my feet now rest—the highest floor of the great tower—and it may be this night or the next—who can tell?—when it will submerge the lofty summit itself, and I shall pass away in a rush of water to the great beyond.

So each night I seal up the writing before I lie upon the couch, thus knowing that 'twill last for ages till Destiny shall bring the hand to open it, and the eye to read its tale of wonder to a world which has forgotten that Atlantis ever was or deems the memory of it but an idle legend, idly told.

But the day of the end lingers, and every dawn I look out wistfully upon the great, glittering sea, thinking that I would fain once more be on its bosom with a good ship's timbers under me, and a gallant crew at my command, breasting its rolling billows, and its plunging storms; for in spite of the ruin it hath brought to Atlantis, and to me, I love the ocean still, knowing that 'tis but the instrument of the wisdom of the All-in-All.

I long once more to hear the curling of its creamy surges on the reefs and shallows of its island shores; to watch its mighty breakers bursting into foam upon its rocky coasts; to hear the distant booming of its tides upon its stony bars; to see the splashing of its wavelets on the shelving sands of little promontories, or the dewdrops of its high-flung spray upon the green fern-fronds of craggy tropic shores; to hear its rushing waters hurrying in tumults through inlets and deep channels; to hear or see it anywhere but here, in calm or storm; heaving restlessly beneath the deep, clear blue of a summer sky, or tossing in fury under the driven clouds of a winter's night; receiving gently the pattering fall of a steady shower, or raging fiercely to the glare of the lightning's flash and the roar of the thunder's roll.

But 'tis in vain: elsewhere than from this silent tower I have looked my last upon the foam-crested sea.

The end lingers, and though this even the water is creeping 'neath the door and darkening the stone flags, it rises but slowly. Still, a sense of something new to come is in my mind, intermingling with the ever-present thought and fond remembrance of my beloved Briseis, and her last appearance and message to me, and feel that soon, in the dim hours of night, I must put off from this misty shore. Sixty years I have lived; a life for the most part stormy; and now must meet my death forlorn, alone, untended, in the time of sleep.

But I fear it not, for I know that beyond the gloom of the Shadowland the light of the Spirit-world shines where the Gate of the Garden stands ajar, and 'tis only a step from the Golden Portal to the presence of my love.

THE END.

"The Last King of Atlantis"

has come to an end, and next week will appear the opening chapters of a new serial story by MR. CHARLES EDWARDES, entitled—

"The Wreckers of Scilly."

Those who care for stirring literature of the kind implied by the title of this narrative will do well to commence with the first instalment, and read through the following half-dozen numbers. A vivid description is given of the methods adopted by the inhabitants of these islands who lived during the early part of this century in wrecking vessels by means of false beacons exposed in the most dangerous parts of the coast. A vein of love runs through the romance, and the illustrations, by MR. STEPHEN REID, are consistent with the letter-press.

RESULT OF JUMBLED STORY COMPETITION.—No. 27.

The first prize of £5 goes to Miss M. Cocks, 35, Pascoe Road, Lewisham.

Prizes of £1 each have been sent to G. Puddy, 26, Moore Lane, Clevedon, Somerset; James Matthews, "The Elms," Newbury, Berks; Charles W. Sayer, Arcade Villa, Arcade Road, Ilfracombe.

£2 goes to Julia McDonnell, 84 Maine Street, Bray, Co. Wicklow.

Title—A LITTLE WHITE CLOUD.

1	80	39	8	5	44	67	51
88	42	24	2	95	98	78	68
43	28	49	12	81	99	93	29
4	22	47	55	94	100	91	70
66	16	87	10	90	69	37	101
61	63	3	83	96	62	35	33
23	36	76	79	54	38	72
30	82	11	9	6	20	104
34	50	85	40	26	57	58
19	17	71	56	27	32	53
7	25	31	52	84	59	92
60	45	46	13	97	14	89
102	64	86	18	77	48	74
103	73	15	65	21	75	41

RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION No. 2.

(NEW SERIES.)

The two guineas has been awarded this week to Mr. J. D. Monsen, 56, Bryantwood Road, Highbury, N., whose anagram—"So I Shot Bert's Sister"—was the best of those sent in.

POST-CARD COMPETITION No. 4.

NEW SERIES.

Two guineas will be awarded to the reader who sends on the back of an ordinary, oblong, Government post-card, the words, "Short Stories," written the greatest number of times. Date of closing: Monday, February 1st.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Complete Re-Issue by Special Request.

GRAND FINE ART GIFT.

The Finest and most Valuable Gift ever offered will be presented to every reader of this issue of "Short Stories."

Each Reader will be entitled to receive from

THE NATIONAL FINE ART UNION,
46 & 47, LONDON WALL, LONDON, E.C., a copy (23in. by 16in.) of the beautiful Steel Plate Engraving, entitled

Windsor Castle

(COPYRIGHT).

This grand work may fairly be considered as one of the finest productions of high art of modern times. It is from the celebrated Picture painted by E. Duncan, Esq., and is engraved in the finest style on Steel by T. A. Prior, Esq.

Upon an eminence to the right of the picture stands the stately historic pile of Windsor Castle, with the Royal Standard flying. The scene in which gay Courtiers have played their parts, and in which the more sober business of the Nation has been consummated, must always be one of great interest to Englishmen. At the foot of the Castle is the historic town of Windsor, resting secure in the protection the Castle affords, and forming a striking contrast to the remaining gaiety of the scene. To the left runs our noblest of English rivers, with its rippling wavelets dancing in the sunlight, and reflecting the fleecy clouds sailing overhead, while the life upon the water gives an animation to the picture nothing can excel. And there is a party of fishermen embarking in their well-found punt, eager for a day of the sport old Izaak Walton loved so well. The magnificence of the foliage and general treatment of the whole picture is most unique, and leaves nothing to be desired.

THIS GRAND PRESENTATION PICTURE will be given to each reader of Short Stories who cuts out the Redemption Bond below, and sends it to THE NATIONAL FINE ART UNION, Head Offices: 46 & 47, LONDON WALL, E.C., together with 16 penny stamps, or Post Office Order for 1s. 3d., payable at the General Post Office, London, E.C., to CHARLES WILLIAMS, to pay the cost of case, transmission, copyright, and other charges. It will then be sent to all parts of Great Britain and Ireland, or to the Colonies, securely packed, and warranted to reach its destination uninjured.

Cut out this Bond and send it to the National Art Union, Head Offices, 46 & 47, London Wall, E.C.

"SHORT STORIES"
REDEMPTION BOND.
WINDSOR CASTLE.
N.B.—Not available after Feb. 23rd, 1897.

Note these Instructions.—All Bonds must be sent in on or before February 23rd, 1897. Colonial Readers only, April 26th, 1897. (Foreign Stamps not accepted.) The Bond must in all cases be sent, otherwise persons might reap the benefits intended for readers of this Paper only. Each copy will be sent securely packed. One copy will be sent for each Bond, and none can be sent without one, except upon the receipt of Two Guineas. The Bond will not again be printed in this Paper, hence the advisability of at once cutting it out and sending it for redemption, as each will be attended to in rotation as received.

Copies of the celebrated Engraving of

WARWICK CASTLE,

from the well-known picture painted by E. Duncan, Esq., and Engraved by G. Godfrey, Esq., being the companion picture to "Windsor Castle," can also be obtained at the same price. Both pictures will be sent in exchange for above Bond and Post Office Order value 2s. 6d. or 32 stamps.

The Pictures are well worth handsomely framing, and their artistic merit and intrinsic value will render them a desirable addition to every household.

FRAMING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION at lowest possible prices for cash. Particulars on application. Every known picture supplied considerably below usual prices. Obtain our terms before buying elsewhere.

All applications must be sent to

THE NATIONAL FINE ART UNION,
HEAD OFFICES—
46 & 47, LONDON WALL, LONDON, E.C.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE
FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.

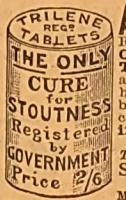
If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

FRILLED BUTTER MUSLIN.

FOR ARTISTIC HOME DECORATION.

White, Cream, Ecru, and 12 Art Shades. CURTAINS, frilled two sides and bottom, 3yd. long, 58in. wide, 6/9 per pair; 3½yd., 7/9 per pair. May also be had by the yard, 58in. wide, frilled both sides, 11½d. per yard. Sample Book of Plain & Figured Muslins sent on approval. ROLLER-BLINDS, edged with Lace or Fringe, from 5/6. Sample Book of Materials on approval. CRETONNES, TAPESTRIES, PLUSHETTES, ART SERGES, etc. Patterns on approval. Table Covers, Cushion Squares and Mantel Borders. Picture Book of Lace Curtains, Lace Blinds, Post Free.

H. GORRINGE & CO.,
20A DEPT.,
NOTTINGHAM.



ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

131, Victoria Street, London, S.W.—Mrs. ARTHUR WEGUELIN (the "Society" Celebrity) writes: "By simply taking the Trilene regularly, and without change of diet, I have lost 1st. 4lb. in 4 weeks."

Bretton West, near Wakefield.—"Miss L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.—Mr. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17½st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.—Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

127, Out Gang Lane, Old Radford, Notts.—Miss E. P. PARSONS says: "I was 16½st. before taking Tablets, and am now 15st.—going on nicely."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

"DRUNKENNESS"

CURED. A Lady having cured her husband secretly of intemperate habits, will gladly send particulars of the remedy on receipt of stamped envelope.—Mrs. S. S. BARRINGTON, 4, Featherstone Bldgs., LONDON, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

Digitized by Google

STARTLING BUT TRUE.

☞ A Magnificent SILVER WATCH to be given away FREE of charge to every reader.

In order to make my name better known than it is, and it is already known to many thousands of people throughout the kingdom, and to introduce my Catalogue into every Household in the Kingdom, I pledge myself and guarantee to give to every reader on application, and who carries out the conditions mentioned below, one of my World-Famed Two Guinea Ladies' Watches. This Watch is of the Best Workmanship, Jewelled in eight holes, richly engraved and Guaranteed for Five Years. This is the most Exquisite and Daintiest Watch in the Market.

CONDITIONS.—That you give a correct reading of the Rebus BELOW, and send same to me with Postal Order for 20s. for one of my Solid Sterling Silver Chains. This chain is of Exquisite Finish and Elegant Design, and is Guaranteed to be Sterling Silver (not metal) as sold by so many of the so-called watch makers. If the Rebus is correct I send you the chain and one of my £2 2s. Sterling Silver Watches Free, mentioned above. If not correct you must accept the Money Back and try again.

This opportunity may not occur again, send at once. No risk.

WA'S WONRFUL WAH*S WE*R W*LL.

A Leading Journal, speaking of our Watches, says: "Wade's Wonderful Watches Wear Well, and we think you will find the same."

ADDRESS:

W. WADE,

Watchmaker and Jeweller,

KING STREET, HAMMERSMITH.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to DR. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

Palatable Substitute for Cod Liver Oil.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins.

Quarter Pound	10d.
Half Pound...	1s. 4d.
One Pound ...	2s. 4d.
Two Pounds	4s. 4d.

(including Tin and Postage).

MRS. CONYERS,
Kilkhampton, Stratton, N. Devon

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5, Sept. 1, £5, Oct. 1, £5, Nov. 2, £6. Dec 1, £6. Jan 2 1897. £6.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS,
5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and
11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope.—Address, Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 179, Westminster Bridge Road, London.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BLACKHEADS

or "Maggots," Pimples, Blotches, etc., immediately and permanently removed by my Skin Cleansing Lotion, "CUTISOLINE." Never fails. Hundreds of testimonials. Post free with directions, 1/6, 3/- and 5/-. AUSTIN LENNOX, Skin Specialist, 1, Shoe Lane, Fleet Street, LONDON.

DEAFNESS CURED.

On receipt of stamped envelope, a lady who cured herself of Deafness and Noises in the Head, after fifteen years of suffering, will send to all afflicted free particulars of the Remedy, which is simple, safe, sure and inexpensive. Address—Mrs. G. E. AUSTIN, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

CORPULENCY CURED

By a simple inexpensive self-treatment, effecting a rapid and permanent reduction without change in diet. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. G. A. BOYD, 14, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London

BLUSHING.

Particulars of a self-treatment for a permanent cure, as prescribed by eminent physicians of the U.S.A., forwarded free to all sufferers on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. B. F. FIELD, 15, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London, W.

TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, Mrs. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

WHY BE FAT?

When a Lady (who has discovered a simple means of self-cure) will be happy to send particulars of same to any sufferer from this distressing complaint, free, on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Address, Mrs. TREVOR WELLS, 327, High Holborn, London, W.C.

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery. The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

THE FIRST INSTALMENT OF "THE WRECKERS OF SCILLY" APPEARS TO-DAY.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 423. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 6TH, 1897. [ONE PENNY.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

"No flaw in its claim to be ABSOLUTELY PURE."
MEDICAL ANNUAL.

FRY'S

Pure Concentrated

COCOA

Awarded Highest Honours. | "Strongest and Best." HEALTH.

Over 200 Gold Medals and Diplomas awarded to the Firm.

10/6 HALF-GUINEA 10/6

COSTUMES

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

DESIGN NO. 100.

COSTUMES 10/6

ALLEN FOSTER & Co.'s HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Are utterly unrivalled all the world over.

PATTERNS FREE.

THE WORLD'S GREATEST COSTUMIERS.

This is by far and away the best HALF-GUINEA COSTUME ever offered to the public. It is made in our "SPECIALITE SERGE," UNSURPASSED FOR WEAR. Can be ordered in any colour and to any measurement. Colours: Black, Navy, Tan, Drab, Brown, Grey, Mid-Blue, Electric-Blue, Myrtle, Bronze-Green, Ruby, Petunia, &c. Our Sketch represents the Costume. Look at it! then LOOK AT THE PRICE!! WRITE FOR PATTERNS. Patterns and Order Forms, together with our new Illustrated "SKETCH BOOK" of Fashions, POST FREE on application. In sending order please mention Short Stories, quote number of Design of Costume, and give following measurements: Round bust under arms, neck to waist at back, length of skirt in front, inside sleeve, and size of waist. PERFECT FIT AND SATISFACTION GUARANTEED. Money returned if not approved. Each Costume securely packed and sent carriage paid 9d. extra.

Bankers: London and County, Aldersgate Street, E.C.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., 17, ROSCOE ST., GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

RED WHITE & BLUE

FRENCH COFFEE.

Delicious for Breakfast or After Dinner.

In making, use rather less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary Coffee.

SOLD EVERYWHERE.

ADVERTISERS should write for particulars of Special Positions.

OUR EYES! OUR EARS!

THEIR DISEASES

CURED WITHOUT OPERATION

NEW TREATMENT.—For Cataract and all Diseases of the Eye; Deafness in all its forms; Noises in the Head and Ears; Discharges from the Ears; Deafness from Influenza and Catarrh cured. Nine cases out of ten cured without personal interview. The special remedies forwarded to any part. Hundreds of letters in testimony. Bleeding, Blistering, and all other obsolete and violent treatment avoided. No "Ear-Drums," "Ear-Cornets," or painful instruments employed. Write for Testimonials and Printed Form of Questions to answer; forwarded free.—Mr. T. ISON, Eye and Ear Dispensary, Leeds. [Estab. 1871.]

WHY BE FAT?

When a Lady (who has discovered a simple means of self-cure) will be happy to send particulars of same to any sufferer from this distressing complaint, free, on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Address, Mrs. TREVOR WELLS, 327, High Holborn, London, W.C.

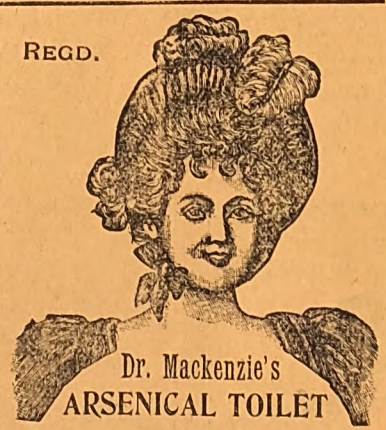
HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BLUSHING.

Particulars of a self-treatment for a permanent cure, as prescribed by eminent physicians of the U.S.A., forwarded free to all sufferers on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. B. F. FIELD, 15, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London, W.

REGD.



Dr. Mackenzie's
ARSENICAL TOILET
SOAP.

Specially prepared as a beautifier of the skin and complexion, and guaranteed to contain a small but absolutely harmless quantity of arsenic. Produces a lovely skin and complexion, and cures spots, pimples, redness, and freckles. The finest and purest soap made. For all irritations it is most emollient and soothing. Absolutely harmless. But beware of the many worthless imitations. Have Dr. Mackenzie's or none. Deliciously and expensively perfumed, at all Stores and Chemists', 1s. per tablet, 3 in box 2/6, or post free from S. Harvey, London Bridge, S.E.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

TRILENE REGD. TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

Ready Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

131, Victoria Street, London, S.W.—Mrs. ARTHUR WEGUELIN (the "Society" Celebrity) writes: "By simply taking the Trilene regularly, and without change of diet, I have lost 1st. 4lb. in 4 weeks."

Bretton West, near Wakefield.—"Miss L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.—Mr. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.—Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

1, 7, Out Gang Lane, Old Radford, Notts.—Miss E. P. PARSONS says: "I was 16st. before taking Tablets, and am now 15st.—going on nicely."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
February 6, 1897.
No. 7.
S.S. S.S.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 7.
Feb. 6, 1897.
NEWSAGENTS
S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope.—Address, Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 179, Westminster Bridge Road, London.

Digitized by Google

No. 423.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending February 6th, 1897.

FROM DUSK TO DARKNESS.

I.

WITHIN the outward wall of a great convent, Father Phillip walked alone. The dusk fell quickly. It was the eve of Ascension, and the gathering shadows, enfolding each other in silent embrace, crept gently into night.

The pale outstanding pillars of the building threw cavernous interstices far back amongst the cloisters, so that a host of fiends might have lingered there unseen.

The solitary man was reading, and the naked trees moaned a wild accompaniment to the soul of the book. Presently a deep shadow fell across his book. Looking up, he saw the figure of a nun passing towards the outer gates. The incident was in no way curious, but the rigid walk—so unlike the general bearing of a sister—and the unusual hour, arrested his attention, and he stepped a few paces after her. She reached the gate, and suddenly stopped.

[All rights reserved.

Then she gave it a thrust with her hands; but it remained unresponsive.

The mere suspicion of a sigh escaped her, a sigh peculiar in its quiet intensity, but of which she seemed to be unconscious. After some hesitation, during which she stood utterly immovable, she bent down, scraping a hole in the encircling snow. Then detaching her crucifix, she placed it quickly in the hollow, and returned the snow to its former condition.

During these movements Father Phillip had come close behind her, witnessing with wonder and indignation her strange performance.

As she rose to go, he took her by the wrist, turning her face towards him: but no sooner had the moonlight touched her features, than he left his hold, and with a cry, sprang several paces back.

He stood petrified, gazing with tongueless awe at her passionless face.

"Madaline!" he gulped at last.

There was no response.

"Madaline!" he said again.

Still no answer.

Then, going with a cat-like tread close up to her, he peered into her eyes, and whispered a long drawn "Madaline!" His voice trembled, but had scarcely a sound.

Stepping back again, he surveyed her at a distance. Though wide open, her eyes were fixed and fireless, like those of a sleep-walker, or a person born blind, or one dead.

Apparently satisfied with his scrutiny, he whispered: "Wait here!" and turned away.

In that one brief space, the established tenour of a strong life, strengthened again as it were by woe, was shattered. He had causes in his heart—projects of spontaneous birth—which thoughts could not fashion.

He crept by the chambers of his chanting brothers, suffering the vespers to stick in his brain.

He reached the room where the keys were kept.

"The key of the outer gate—quick!" he demanded of the monk in charge.

"To-night—Ascension Eve?" queried the man.

"Yes, yes—quickly!"

"I dare not."

"You must—or——"

"Then I will not. You——"

In an instant, before the phrase was complete, the hands of Father Phillip were clenched around the man's throat. The shaven head leapt violently up and down, the jaw fell, the eyes rolled upward, and the skinny hands beat and beat again against the stone wall of the cell. Blood dripped from the wretch's mouth where the tongue was nearly bitten through, but not a cry left his blackened lips, so fearful was the grip of the father. A second later the father felt something "click" beneath his fingers, and the man became suddenly limp.

Releasing his hold, Father Phillip took the key and walked swiftly back to where he left the woman.

Not a soul had seen or heard him, and taking his companion's hand, they passed together beyond the convent gates, unmolested.

II.

Many years before the events above recorded, these two had met and loved—loved with all the passion of natures too long restrained. It was a love acknowledging no tie, no relative emotion, no right or wrong.

Then came the fall.

If Satan fell from Archangel to Devil, why not men and women from ideals to frail mortality?

The man was in the wrong, as usual, seeing which he erred still further; also usual.

He tried to deceive himself it was a reiteration that his sin was the natural consequence of love, and that what is, must have been, and is, consequently, right.

For all this the scales eventually fell from his eyes. Remorse saddled itself on his love, and straightway drove towards a pilgrimage—a life-long palliation.

The woman became insane, and was consequently placed under restraint.

Meanwhile the woman recovered, the only effect of her malady being an inclination to somnambulism. She fancied the voice of the great God addressed her, in response to which, by some strange coincidence, she entered the identical convent where her quandom lover had already for many years been established.

The opening of such a life would naturally be perplexing, and the immediate result was her somnambulistic tendency showed itself, as we have seen, on the very eve of her arrival.

In the hearts of these two the love still raged as strongly as ever.

Father Phillip regarded the meeting as a pre-ordination of Fate. He would possess her, living or dead.

The man still led the woman by the hand, she maintaining a stern insensibility to all transpiring about her. In this order they came upon a rugged, rambling hostelry lying at the bottom of a hollow.

Summoning the keeper, Father Phillip asked for the purchase of beasts and a vehicle. At first the man demurred, casting suspicious glances at the requester's garb and at the statuesque woman by his side. But the sounding chink of money as the Father loosened a bag at his girdle over-scored every scruple, and the equipage was furnished without more ado.

In rewarding the man for his sacrifice, Father Phillip said:

"Take the money, man; it should increase a hundredfold, for it is holy money. Holy in the purpose it serves and holy by reason of its source."

The keeper handled the money as if it were red-hot coal, then, turning into his house, left them to make their departure unassisted.

After the usual preliminaries the cart set off.

The awkwardness occasioned by long absence from such uses soon wore away, and one might have seen that Father Phillip had been and still was an expert driver.

At starting, the pace he kept was very even, skirting all undulations in the ground to avoid jolting. Ever and anon he would glance at the woman beside him to ascertain the effect the change of transit had upon her.

Still she remained unconscious.

By degrees he increased the rate, graduating his efforts with the animals, but never relaxing his watchful care.

They swept along like an awakening hurricane.

The swerves and curves he made to avoid hills were speedily lessened, until, seeing no disturbance in his partner, his course took the line of an arrow. Over hill, over crags and recesses, down hollow and dale, the steaming animals plunged. By hedgerows and wooded land, through drifts and dangerous gullies, they swept like a cloud.

Relaxing his hold somewhat, he gave the beasts their heads. Several times they plunged knee-deep in snow, when with a muffled growl the driver would whip them angrily; but so sure-footed were these factors of instinct, and so keen of scent, that no time was lost by the trifling mishaps attendant on such a journey, and which, if too well considered, would probably have been twice as perilous.

Digitized by Google

Suddenly Father Phillip sprang up, his nostrils distending like a hound's.

He peered back into the darkness.

Listening intently, he heard a faint moaning proceeding from the direction he had travelled.

Gradually to his stiffening ears it became more distinct, eventually assuming the sound of a hollow baying.

The band about his neck snapped sharply as he strained in his eager posture. Then he lashed the animals to a frenzy.

Emerging from a wood, they dashed along a straight road. It stretched along the extreme edge of a precipitous cliff. Far away down below could be heard the thunderous boiling of the sea.

Once or twice, where the land had given way, the cart and its occupants were nearly precipitated down the awful abyss; but so lightning was the speed, that the cart seemed hardly to touch the ground. The road lay stark and ghastly before them, and they literally flew over it.

Standing there in the vehicle, bare-breasted and bare-headed, Father Phillip looked like some legended charioteer sworn to outrun death.

Presently a longer and louder bay swooped upon his ears.

For the first time he uttered a shout—a short, sharp monosyllable, proceeding from far below his throat.

It sped between his parted jaws like a musket shot from the depths of a cavern. Simultaneously, a figure appeared in the path before him. He could characterise no action in particular, but he knew it to be human by reason of its darting swiftly towards the line of his passage.

He saw no more: but the next moment he was conscious of a jolt, accompanied by a piercing shriek, and something flew over the brink of the abyss.

He looked at his companion. A slight tremour shook her, and the mantle of stillness fell. Reviving consciousness laid its hand roughly on her senses, and that oblivion, so closely allied to Heaven, brutally forsook her. Her lids fell quivering. Her hand sought the crucifix at her breast, and she shuddered to find it gone. The languid eyes opened again; this time in the function of sight and inception, and her gaze lighted upon Father Phillip's face. For just an instant they lingered there, when an indiscribable wave swept across her pallid features, the manner of which, probably, had never before been realised.

She sank back without further movement or sound. From the driver's eyes sprang one gleam of deep emotion. His jaws closed, and his finger-nails became embedded in the palms of his hands, so that they dripped blood.

Again the hollow baying reached his ears, and turning he saw two dusky forms limned against the snow. He drove like a madman: lashing the beasts and panting wildly. Foam gathered upon his lips, trailing in his wake like the breath of a demon. Just then another and more frantic exclamation escaped him, for he felt the earth crumbling beneath the wheels of the cart.

With a resounding shriek he urged the animals more madly than before, and with one gigantic bound they cleared the chasm, landing safely on solid ground.

He turned again.

Simultaneously a frightened, frantic wail reverberated through the night. Then there came a roar of falling earth—a terrific crash—as his hungry pursuers fell headlong over the cliff.

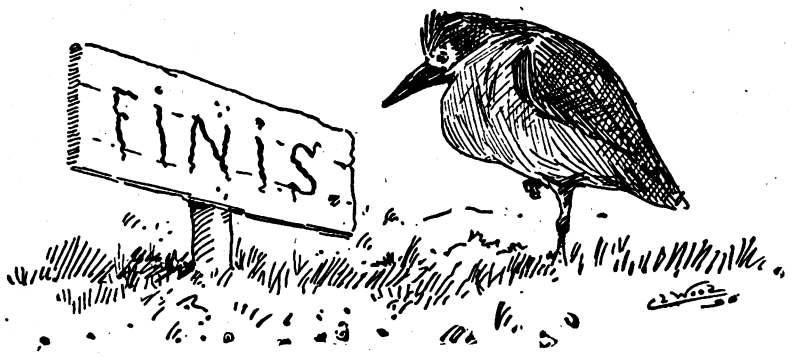
At the same moment the animals fell dead from exhaustion.

Leaping from the cart, he drew the placid woman to his heaving breast, pressing his foaming lips to her forehead.

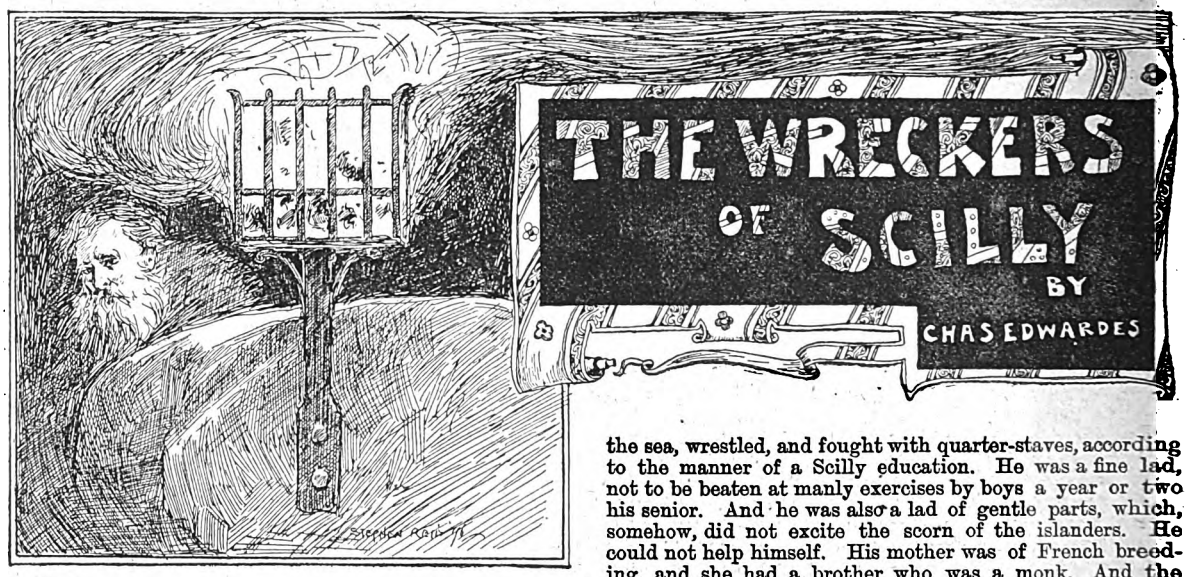
With a cry of anguish Father Phillip realised his burthen was dead.

"Madaline! Madaline!" he moaned.

Dunstan Denn.



Digitized by Google



CHAPTER I.

The Flogging of Nigel.

"That for thy evil spirit, and that, and that! A pretty rope's end of a business that men, fathers of fitter lads than thou, should be preached to and blamed by such a barleycorn of a man!"

"I say it, though you kill me for it, Manuel Nance; 'tis a bad trade—a devil's trade, and——"

"Oh, so thou wilt have more of it, wilt? Come, now, off with thy woollens, that I may whack the bare skin o' thee. Quick, man, and you others lend a hand too. 'Tis rare that we heads of St. Agnes should be talked to thus, by this hop-o'-my-thumb!"

But there was a murmuring among the assembled group of islanders. They were not a very merciful set of men to the eye. Their tanned faces and the long, tangled hair of their heads and their bloodshot eyes gave them indeed a formidable appearance that their hearts somewhat belied. For all that, they were a proverb: "A St. Agnes man" even in Scilly meant cruel things; and on the mainland of Cornwall it was but a round-about phrase for assassin.

Still, even the St. Agnes men had feelings of their own. They had known the lad, Nigel Prideaux, since the day when Mistress Prideaux had stretched the babe in their direction as they crowded round the door of the Prideaux hut to drink in their own riotous way to the new inhabitant of the island, thus born into their very exclusive, if not very tender, society.

Stout limbs!
Stout heart!
And a maw for plunder!

Such was their coarse toast to the crying babe! And the mother had smiled towards them, content that they had paid her and the child the customary honours!

And after that young Nigel had rolled and run with the other half-score or so of children in the island, swum in the sea, wrestled, and fought with quarter-staves, according to the manner of a Scilly education. He was a fine lad, not to be beaten at manly exercises by boys a year or two his senior. And he was also a lad of gentle parts, which, somehow, did not excite the scorn of the islanders. He could not help himself. His mother was of French breeding, and she had a brother who was a monk. And the monk, being on a visit to his sister, found time to instil much into the lad's mind, and to adapt him for the acquisition of more knowledge than he was ever likely to get in all Scilly.

Poor monk! The shocks his sensibilities were subjected to among the islanders would have slain a weaker man. He grew to think of the people among whom his sister's lot was cast as little better than devils; nor would he have been surprised to learn that, with their other Pagan and inhuman practices, they were cookers and eaters of the flesh of babes. This also they had been charged with, though upon no certain evidence.

But the monk in time returned to his own land of

They had paid her and the child the customary honours.

Digitized by Google

Brittany, and Nigel matured as best he could. There was no such boy of fourteen or fifteen in all Scilly as he. To him it was child's play to swim to Meledgan and back of a morning, even with a swell in the water that would have wearied many a man, and bruised some to death against the black rocks which so closely underlie these sad waters.

And now when our story opens Nigel was nineteen, and a man.

How it had happened even he could not have told precisely, but he was in grievous dissympathy with the rest of St. Agnes—save one.

His mother had died in the meantime. Father he remembered none, for he had gone off to Cornwall one day, with a cloudy sky and a fretful wind, which anon became fierce; nor had he ever returned or been heard of. Doubtless he lay at the bottom of the Atlantic, amid the bones of the myriad of men and ships that the ravenous ocean annually devours.

And so Nigel stood almost alone.

His first notable dissension with the others was about the lives of two men whom he had saved in the night.

It was in November, with a roaring sea from the west. He had risen from his pallet and pushed open the door of his house and gone out into the night with his yellow hair flying loose behind him. It was such a night as he loved. From the adjacent houses—poor, thatched affairs, compounded as to their walls of big granite rocks, turf cuttings, and the beams and door pieces of ships that had been washed ashore in the Bays of St. Warna and Wingletang—he had picked his way towards the low uplands looking west and south. But ere going his eyes had sped in a direction with which they were sweetly familiar. Yon bigger hut, with a glow of light from its horn windows, was the residence of Manuel Nance, who exercised lordship in St. Agnes.

It was a lordship derived rather from his own brute strength and robust nature than aught else, for the Crown, the real Lord of Scilly, had issued no commission in his favour. No matter for that, however, in an isle so savage as St. Agnes. The Crown looked for no profit thence, and so long as the islanders did not notoriously misbehave themselves, they might thrive or starve unquestioned.

But Nigel had not lingered near this tiny sparkle of radiance, for the cry of men in agony had at that instant fluttered with the wind to his ears.

Herein he showed how in substance he differed from the other men of the island. They, at such a note of distress, would have girded their knives to their waists, and, with a vile chorus on their tongues, signifying how little hope there was for shipwrecked mariners who relied for rescue upon them, have hastened towards the rock upon which they trusted to hear the vessel strike. But, they would have cut the throats of any living and breathing mortal whom they had reasonable assurance was not worth holding for ransom. And at any time they would have laughed derisively at the notion that they would imperil their own lives to save the lives of these others whom the thundering Atlantic brought within arm's length of them.

But, thanks to the monk, his uncle, young Nigel was not of so abandoned a disposition. And so it happened that ere daybreak he had returned to his house with two poor fellows, the survivors of ten, whom he cared for as tenderly as if he had been a woman.

This of itself was bad. All St. Agnes, save one, rose against him when it was known, and there was talk of instantly slitting the strange gullets. But Nigel managed to postpone the fatal hour, and the next night, again with a yearning glance at the illuminated horn window, he launched the Prideaux boat and alone ran it towards the mainland, with the two strangers on board. Them he put ashore in St. Sennen's cove, and on the third day he reappeared in St. Agnes.

That same afternoon Manuel Nance had sentenced Nigel to be flogged in the place of execution for his treason against the majesty of law and custom as they were regarded in St. Agnes.

He had met Damaris Nance.

The place of execution was so called in jest. It was a smooth level space of turf near St. Warna's Well, with the bowsprit and figure-head of a vessel mounted in the turf between a ring of high granite stones. Here in old times the St. Agnes folk had worshipped their heathen gods, danced hand in hand, and submitted to the will of the priest, who was their intermediary with Heaven. But those days had passed; and now every islander was a Christian. The ring of stones, however, remained. The reverence with which it had been regarded had passed to the well hard by.

This was the work of the thrice-reverend St. Warna, who had come to St. Agnes one day from Ireland, and taught the islanders their catechism and the simple precepts of virtue which stand at the heart of Christianity. These precepts St. Agnes had long ago been content to forget; but the islanders remembered St. Warna. And periodically they took a sheep (or, if they could afford it, an ox), tied it to the figure-head of the broken vessel, and cut its throat in honour of the Saint. And in the evening they feasted, and drank strong ale and sack, and sang songs which had nothing of the Christian spirit in them, but much of the fiend.

This was where Nigel was flogged by Manuel Nance, and flogged well, so that the blood ran from his back on to the turf.

And the islanders did not hinder the flogging, though they had qualms. Nor was Manuel himself quite at ease afterwards when, with a tired arm, he stalked to his house, and called to his daughter, Damaris, for a cup of ale, and calling several times to no purpose, he at length found her in a swoon upon the earthen floor of her own room, the window of which, being open, commanded an entire view of the place of execution. The old woman who tended her had no scruple in telling him what had caused this faint. Indeed, she somewhat jeered at him for having a daughter who could not control herself because she chanced to see the bare back of a young man red with the blood which her own father was so finely drawing from it.

"This once, Manuel Nance, I will endure it at your hands," were the words Nigel had said when the flogging was over, and the Lord of St. Agnes had thrown the rope on the grass. "This once, mind, no more. But it is not for your sake, either!"

Then the others had crowded round him, and the women-folk, ever less brutal than their husbands and brothers, had used oil and herbs to heal the wounds. To all which, though not without smiles and objections, Nigel had submitted. He sat on the grass with his eyes towards the house of Manuel Nance, and let them do their kind, womanly will upon him.

This had happened a month before the opening of my story.

It had been a happy month for Nigel. For three days in succession he had met Damaris Nance at dawn or soon after, amid the granite crags to the north-west of St. Warna's Bay. Damaris had her father's two spotted cows, Mary and Nell, to attend to. It had been mild weather, and the creatures were allowed to be out at night. But in the morning they had to be driven homewards for the milking, which, with the butter-making and all the other gentler arts of domestic life, were Damaris's affair. And Nigel, on a pretence of seeking drift timbers, had gone off at daybreak, too. He was not really bound to account for his own actions so minutely; but it seemed wise to have a pretext. Thus he equivocated excusably to Ban, the idiot lad who helped him with his simple establishment, and could bake bread or broil a mackerel as well as the most accomplished housewife upon the island.

Later, a constant spell of rattling gales had aroused expectation in the minds of the St. Agnes men. The wind was north-west, veering to north-east. In the night, during temporary lulls, the forked lightning played over the needle points of Annet Island, and the more distant western isles. But with the return of daylight the storms also returned, and a misty atmosphere yet further gave hope of disaster, sooner or later, to the rapacious islanders.

And now it was the evening of the seventh day of this unsettled weather. Each night the wicked fellows had kept a beacon fire alight on the headland called Troy Town. It was a misleading light. Mariners who cruised in these waters were accustomed to guide themselves by a beacon above Pelistry Bay, part of the large island of St. Mary's, a mile or two away. They could, by steering well for it, in rough weather get fair shelter between Toll's Bay Island and St. Mary's at this point. But the St. Agnes men meant to lure them to certain ruin by inviting them against the pinnacles and teeth of their island. There was no anchorage by Troy Town except such as Death himself could offer.

It had come to be Nigel's turn to attend to the beacon during the ensuing night, and he had said point blank: "I will not."

Damaris was heart and soul with him in his humane instincts. She had sighed, with her fair head upon his shoulder, and with her soft brown eyes looking into his, as they had discussed her father, and what it behoved them to do to change him.

As if that had been possible! It were as easy to tame a hyena twenty years used to the bloodshed and freedom of the open.

Upon his refusal to do what was reckoned his duty, Manuel Nance, with a flash of his white teeth, had resolved once again to beat young Nigel, this time until he had thoroughly cowed the lad's spirit. But as we have seen, the others interposed, and, with a growl, and a look that meant much, the exasperated and disappointed man had turned on his heel.

Persisting in his refusal, Nigel was passed over for the beacon duty. Another youth, with no scruples of conscience, undertook the charge.

CHAPTER II.

A WRECK! A WRECK!

THAT evening, towards sunset, forty-three of the forty-five dwellers on St. Agnes met in the little glade by the Well of St. Warna to hold execrable revel in the teeth of the gale that still blew mightily. No babe had been born on the island for six years, which by some was viewed as a portent of ill. But the others laughed at the notion that St. Agnes should ever lack men of the same kidney as those who at that time divided the island between them. And little Obadiah Hicks, the latest-born member of the community, ran gleefully at the tail of the throng, chiming out the chorus which was often heard in this unrighteous island:

> "Huzza for the rocks it splits upon,
> And hey for the corpse with its gewgaws on!"

This also was a privilege that Nigel had obtained. He loathed the tradition of St. Warna as it was interpreted by his comrades, and, in strength of his superior enlightenment, did his best to bring it into discredit.

But, of course, he did not succeed in this. The men had drawn the legend into their systems with their mothers' milk. Besides, it ran with their aspirations and degraded beliefs in general.

Nor was Damaris present upon these occasions. This, however, was the less wonderful as it was a bye-word among the islanders how Manuel Nance, her father, kept her apart from the rest. But the old woman, her nurse, went, and a pretty figure she was in the red coiffure in which she had attired her head, and her old eyes gleaming with an unhallowed excitement.

"Simple lily-bud," the old woman termed Damaris, in contemptuous pity for her bringing up; and she rejoiced to make the girl shrink and cry out with disgust at her tales of the rude and bloody deeds in which she—a creature of the same texture as Manuel Nance's baby daughter—had had a powerful finger. If the old hag spoke truth, she had used a knife as well as the worst of the men upon the poor wretches who had crawled from the stormy sea upon the St. Agnes rocks, just able to gasp out a word of pleading.

A bold scene it was, to be sure, this on the edge of the Bay of St. Warna, with the angry red glow of the veiled rays of the sun breaking through the storm clouds upon the white foam on the near rocks, and upon the bronzed faces of the men and women. The wind tore at the gowns and hair of the dames and girls, and was at times so violent that it carried them back a step or two in spite of their most vigorous efforts.

No sky could have been more full of promise to the assemblage of miscreants.

As they buffeted their way down the shore, jumping over the lesser boulders and the fragments of ships which lay about like the bones of mammoths, the men scanned the horizon, some with their hands to their eyes. But for the moment nothing was in sight except the raging sea, and the granite edges to their bay, above which the spray rose in fountains a hundred and more feet in height.

The Well of St. Warna was an insignificant enough object. It was a mere shaft sunk in the turf, with a smoothed granite stone as a sort of half lid to it. You could have bestridden it with ease; nor need you have been frightened at the puddle of turbid water which lay at the bottom of it, some ten or twelve feet down. It may have been crystal clear once upon a time. Indeed it probably was if, as the legend says, it owed its origin to a spring. But the iniquitous rites of which it was now the nucleus may have turned it thick and muddy, and quenched the pure gushing liquid beneath. In short, it was a pool at which the St. Agnes sheep and kine would not have drunk if they could even have got at it.

The men and women formed in cheerless silence, in a half-circle about it, and then, taking each other's hands, they started into song with one accord:

THE HYMN OF ST. WARNA.

A pin for the wind that blows us a ship
Fat packed with good things,
With good things, oh!
Silks, jewels, and rings,
Heavy gold doubloons,
And crowns of the sun,
Of the sun, oh!
Huzza for the rocks it splits upon,
And hey for the corpse with its gewgaws on!
And hey for the corpse with its gewgaws on!

Santa Warna, hear us ask
On our knees thy helping,
While the winds are yelping,
While the winds are yelping.

Send us quick, a fog so thick,
That no ship can 'scape us:
One, two, she's on the rocks,
How she winces with the shocks!
See her shaking!
See her quaking!
And how they screech while drowning!

So a pin for a man and a pin for a boy,
And two pins more for the Saint at the helm;
Huzza for the rocks it splits upon,
And hey for the corpse with its gewgaws on!

Over and over again the St. Agnes islanders chanted this ribald hymn until the twilight was upon them. At the first time, as they mentioned the pins, they all closed in towards the Well, and each (even little Obadiah, who had come provided for it) cast in his or her tribute to the saint—"a pin for the wind" that might bring them a ship; "a pin for a man and a pin for a boy; and two pins more for the Saint at the helm!"

As this ceremony had been observed in St. Agnes for generations and was performed several times a year (oftener in winter, than in summer), none could compute the number of pins which St. Warna already had in her well. But, upon the whole, the islanders had no doubt that they were well requited for their expenditure in this particular article of merchandise.

With one more searching glance seawards, Manuel Nance put a stop to the exercise.

"Home, all of ye," he said, with the tone of a man used to be obeyed, "and you, Evan, to your perch, and see you have faggots enough to last the night through."

Men and women each bent the knee in farewell of their dear Saint, and turned away from the Well.

Two hours afterwards every light was extinguished on the island, save that on the headland called Troy Town, and every islander was asleep on his pallet, save Evan Carman, who sat on his granite chair with ears and eyes alert for the sounds that might tell him his flaring beacon was not lit and fed in vain.

At the beginning of the night he could from his post see the reflection in the sky of the legitimate and humane light of Pelistry—on St. Mary's. But by-and-bye the mist came on and obscured it. There was not the ghost of a doubt that any ship driving from the west to the north of St. Mary's would take the St. Agnes light for that of Pelistry, and, in default of being able to seek protection from the gale in other way, would run for the port that might be supposed to underly it.

The wind worsened in the night. Evan, for all the double sheepskin he wore upon his shoulders, shivered under the searching blasts. They ran round the granite rocks where he sheltered himself, and pierced the skins as if they had been mere cotton sheets upon him.

"A murrain upon the night!" he muttered many times, and he strained his eyes towards the east to see if the day might yet show signs of breaking.

But when his patience was most tried, and the blood seemed like to congeal in his veins, suddenly he became rigid as the boulders on the headland hard by, and he faced the waters with eyes wide open.

Had he heard aught, or was it fancy?

The wind wailed in so many keys that but little imagination was needed to distinguish the voices of men, women and children in its various modes of rioting.

Yet Evan was much mistaken if that was not the cry of real men, cold and hungry like himself. He held his hands to his ears, and listened again.

Then came a report differing from the cannonading of the Atlantic upon the cliffs, and in the lull that seemed to follow a faint cry like the mere echo of a human shout just reached him.

Without a moment's delay, young Evan took to his heels. He flung the sheepskins from his shoulders, and ran like one possessed, through the gorse bushes which grew inland from Troy Town. While yet he was a hundred yards from the cluster of cottages which made up the town of St. Agnes, he screamed at full pitch: "A wreck! A wreck!" Nor ever ceased his cry until a score of the men and lads had tumbled from their beds and joined him in the darkness outside.

"Home, all of ye."

CHAPTER III.

THE FIRST KISS.

MANUEL NANCE appeared with a lanthorn and an iron-shod staff when six or eight of the others had already run off to the headland.

"A gun, say you?" he asked eagerly.

"And a heavy one to make himself heard in such a gale," was Evan's reply.

"Then she may be from the Indies. There ought to be good picking for us after daybreak."

"By St. Nicholas, Master Nance, I hope there will; and I shall have my tenth for telling of her, shall I not, sir?"

"Let's make sure we've got her ere we talk of that, lad. Run and fetch your knife. There's no knowing what may come. These big ships carry great store of men, and a score or two of them may float to us safe and sound if we ain't wide-awake. Get your knife, my son—and tell your women folk to keep to their houses!"

"Faith, an' I will, Master Nance. I was to have cut the throat of the sheep in Passion Week past; but they robbed me of the pleasure. I'd fain try my hand on higher tasks."

"Be off with you, you knave! You may have more of your wish than you'll care for," said the older man.

"Father," whispered a sweet young voice——

"Get thee to thy bed, daughter. Where is thy old nurse?"

Digitized by Google

"Gone with the men, father. Prithee, father, do not do that which shall bring thee to eternal doom."

"I have no time to be prated to, Damaris, my daughter. Thou, at any rate, shalt not hurt thine eyes with sights too strong for thee—thou timid little turtle dove."

So saying, Manuel Nance drove the outer bolt of his house door into its socket. Often before had the girl thus been caged. And so she did but sigh quietly and lie down again on her bed as her father's heavy tread echoed away.

For a while she tried to sleep afresh. It was too early to be about. Though good amenable creatures, Mary and Nell, her kine, would on no account sanction a milking before their wonted time. And so the girl whispered the Lord's Prayer, and the Tresco Islanders' petition to their St. Nicholas, and was going on with a general confession of her trivial sins, when something arrested her.

No: it was not the wind. That had a voice of its own with which she was familiar enough. It was rather like the patrol of strong feet outside. But when she had held her breath until she was nigh to fainting, and had counted twenty paces—as they seemed—she drew her mind's attention elsewhere.

"It is one of the sheep," she murmured. "What a maiden for fancies I am! My nurse is surely right to say there never yet was girl child born on St. Agnes like to me."

Her thoughts must needs then turn abruptly upon him who was the bright morning star of her existence. When she was happiest she loved best to share her joy with him—if only in imagination. And when depression came over her, as it often did (for she was but seventeen, a time when damsels know not what to make of life, and are whiles frightened by its mysteries and harshness), away to him her soul was wont to flee that it might be fondled, until her strength and self-confidence had returned.

"My Nigel!" she exclaimed to herself; and she drew the silken quilt the closer about her shoulders from strange ecstasy. There was that in the mere utterance of the name that cheered her like nothing else.

But it was even with the vision of Nigel before her, his grey eyes and yellow hair as positive as life itself, that his voice also drifted into her room. Sure there never was youth before like him. So broad of shoulders and so fairly made. Some had mocked him to her for his eyes and hair, and the discord there was between them. But she had never seen that. She never looked at him without feeling that she was privileged to do what none others could—to wit, see into the youth's very soul and read the love for her that lay bowered there.

And now she was not only to see him in her dreams, and her morning visions which were neither pure dreams nor entire consciousness, but she was to hear his voice calling to her.

The winds might howl their worst, and her nurse might be as brutal as she pleased, if this boon also was to be bestowed upon her.

"Dear Nigel!" she said aloud to herself—why should she not, seeing that she was alone—"Dear Nigel, I am happier than I ought to be, because of thee."

But a moment afterwards, and while the silvery echo of her words yet tinkled from the Venetian glass and other treasures in the room, the girl bounded from her bed, and cast the silken counterpane upon the floor.

"Yes—I am here, my Nigel!" she cried. "But the words I spake were not for thine ears. I will join thee anon."

And, trembling with the joy that comes to timid girls with their lovers, she began to dress herself.

She had gowns enough to choose from, but for all her finery she cared little. It was the plunder of the sea: her crimson silks and her sapphire-coloured satins; the lace that edged her mantles and the embroidery for her neck. An hour in this thatched hut of St. Agnes, and a skilful tirewoman could have made of her a figure to win the admiration of courtiers.

But she cared not for these treasures—they smelt of death, as she once said to her lover. And so she hastily drew on a plain, puce-coloured bodice, and belted it to her common homespun skirt at the waist. Untanned cowskin shoes covered her pretty little feet. And then her toilet was complete. She would have no shame in bathing her face and hands before Nigel in the cool water in the granite basin by Priglis Bay, whither she would soon be gone for the cows.

As she stepped out by the door which her lover had unbolted for her, the day broke and the dull storm clouds in the west took a brighter hue.

"Damaris, my dear one," said Nigel, taking her by the hand when he had kissed the tips of her fingers, "there will be bad work on the south side of the bay this morning. I know not what to do!"

"Heaven and the Saints keep my father from staining his hands with blood!" exclaimed the girl.

"Didst hear the gun just now?"

"Nay, Nigel, for I was listening to thee!"

"And how didst know that it was I? My Maker has, I trow, given me a face of my own—as he has to all; but how differs my footfall from that of others—of Jewel Fortescue, for example?"

"Jewel Fortescue, quotha!"

"Well then, James Pender?"

"James Pender, he says! Why, Nigel, thy senses have strayed in the night. If the skies were to rain rocks, and each rock were to weigh a ton, then I might, in my ignorance, believe James Pender were taking a solemn walk before my father's house. But thou, Nigel!"

"Am I of such fairy stuff? But hark! Is it not a shame that we should be happy in each other's presence thus while yonder poor souls may be treading on the bridge which leads straight into Eternity?"

"Yet what can we do? My father believes me still in bed. We could not save them."

"Thou couldst not, my diamond eye, and perchance I, too, might mar more than I could mend. But, Damaris, the blood seethes in me. I know not why I am of such various ambitions from the rest. It must be inbred in me from my mother, for I've heard they're milder yonder in Brittany, and all for worship and honest work. But, however that may be, I cannot tarry here, and I will not help them."

"Then since thou art weary of me, and thou——"

"I said not I was weary of thee. I am not five score yet, sweetheart. When I am old and blind and can neither feel nor hear thee, nor taste the memories of thee which will be enthroned in the cobwebbed palace of my mind, then——"

"How flowery thou art, my Nigel! And thine eyes have a brightness in them that almost dazes me! Art sure thou hast not a dreadful fierceness in the back part of thy disposition?"

"Not for thee, my sunbeam, if so. Tell me, then; wilt let me bar thee up again?"

"Marry, no! I will not be barred up like a pig with a litter. It is not seemly treatment of a damsel of my time of life—for I was seventeen last March."

"I know it, beauty, and now thou art seventeen and just fifty-three days and a half."

"Faith, Nigel, there never was such a scholar in all Scilly as thou. To think of thee remembering so much that importest me only!"

"Is that so? I could tell thee more than that, pet. I could, an I would pleasure myself so far on a day like to be so full of dolor—I could number to thee the tale of the silken lashes to thy dear eyes, and score on a table the outline of those pearls, thy teeth, marking infallibly which outvalue the others, and are not to be matched anywhere in the realm. I could describe the exact shape and size, to the millionth of an inch, of the four little beauty spots which thy guardian saint on the happy day of thy birth put upon thy baby face by the touch of his holy finger-tip, though little even his saintship recked how fair they would make thee when——"

Digitized by Google

"Enough!" cried the girl, as she laughingly clapped her palm to the youth's mouth—he submitting with wonderful quietude. "I never heard tongue so runaway as thine, Nigel; and it says the very foolishest of things. Whence dost draw all this nonsense? From what part of thy anatomy? Art dumb at last, sir?"

"I have no choice, my jewel, but to take this little hand prisoner, if I am to open my mouth again. But since I hold it so fairly—how smooth it is, and how blue the veins for an island so sunbrowned as ours!—I would fain hold it always if——"

She stood watching him.

"Marry, good Nigel, I pray thee let me go. I heard the cry of one of my pretty kine."

"Well recollected, Damaris," said the young man abruptly. He let the girl's hand fall, and turned his face seawards. "I fear me I have been weak to tarry with thee, but" (with a fond look in her eyes) "I could not help it. Go thou after the cattle if thou wilt; and tell thy father, too, if thou wilt, who loosed thee from thy cage. I am a man like himself, and have the same yearnings in some kind as he had. I would marry thee, Damaris, though Beelzebub and all his armies massed themselves against me. But I will do nothing against honour."

"Preacher!" exclaimed the girl with a mirthful scoff.

"By this token, my beauty, I mean to preach to thee all the days of thy life—tide what may."

With these words, and somewhat heedless of what he had just said, Nigel suddenly, and like one urged beyond himself, snatched the girl into his arms, drew her passionately towards him, and kissed her lips and her eyes.

"Thou and I, Damaris," he added afterwards, with quivering lips, "were made by the Almighty for each other—I do thee no wrong therefore. And now farewell!"

Not without another ardent look, and a smile in which there was a touch of sternness as well as much sweetness, the young man sped away towards the cliffs. He did not make in the same direction as the other islanders had gone, but moved rather towards the rocks at the extreme west of the Cape of Troy Town. He hoped to be able to see what was going on in St. Warna's Bay without at first being seen. If he could do aught to mitigate the cruelty or inhumanity of his brethren, then he would not mind putting himself to some hazard in the endeavour to do so.

As for Damaris, she stood watching him until she could see him no longer. Never had she looked more lovely than thus, with the colour in her cheeks which her lover had, with so little warning, forcibly constrained thither. She looked on and on—at the dewy grass, the stormy sky, and the white spray of the sea where it rose above the farther slope of the island. But her thoughts were all with her assailant, who had taken such strong possession of her.

"'Tis well," she murmured poutingly, at length, "'tis mighty well to be a man. They do the things we can but just dare to dream of; and yet, indeed, I would not this day have been aught else but a woman, and just the woman I am. Nurse says I'm not a woman until I'm twenty-one; but for once methinks I know better than nurse. I am more of a woman than she is, for he would not do to her what he has done to me. Marry! was it not finely rude of him, and all without a 'Prithee, give me leave,' or 'By your sweet sanction.' And yet, Damaris, my dear, you know—none better—you love him all the more for his rudeness. Sure 'tis passing sweet to be kissed by one's lover. Mary! Mary! Nell! Nell! where are you, harum-scarums? Cows, cows, come and be milked. Oh dear, I shall surely die of pleasure; there's a nectar flowing in my cheeks!"

In this way the girl, fancy free, wandered on as she looked abroad for her cows. But anon a thought seemed to occur to her, and she retraced her steps with all possible speed. She re-entered her father's house and shut the door; and herein she sat on an Oriental six-sided stool with inlaying of mother-of-pearl, with her face buried in her hands, until she heard the lifting of the latch, and her nurse appeared with a red blowsy face, an air of intense excitement, and much dishevelled by the wind.

"Oh, thank you, good nurse, for giving me my freedom; I was growing weary."

"Her freedom, she says," exclaimed the old woman; "a fine thing she'd make of her freedom, a white and pink morsel such as her. Mistress Damaris, if you had spunk in you, you'd never have let yourself be cooped up thuswise. Get spirit, girl, and stuff the notions ye've got from Father Harris of Tresco into the throat of the wind that gives us such merry meals. Look here, girl, that's red for you, ain't it? and this, and this! It's man's blood, my daughter, make what you can of it; and now begone with the milk-pails!"

Damaris needed no second permission to get into the open air again. Her nurse always oppressed her as a sort of nightmare; but there was something quite devilish about her thus gloating over her gory hands. The girl was like to swoon ere she crossed the threshold, and a second time went in pursuit of Mary and Nell.

CHAPTER IV.

The Tragedy in the Surf.

Alas for the good ship King Hal!

She had done stout work against the freebooting Spaniards in the Western seas, and many a cannon ball and many a bolt had she shot right straight to the goal they were aimed at. And this was to be her end, to be broken like a sword scabbard on the hard rocks, which stood sentinel to the homeland that her brave passengers and seamen already scented in the mirky air!

They had had a merry cruise, as such adventures were regarded in those days. A duello with two galleys off the Florida coast, in which each combatant sheered off, content with what the King Hal had done against her. The taking of a fort in the Spanish main with a box or two of gold pieces, and a few score of suits of armour and stands of arms. And, best of all, that meritorious victory over the Santa Trinidad, a warship half as high again as the King Hal, and with a hundred more fighting men upon her. The Santa Trinidad meant rich prize money to every man aboard the King Hal when Plymouth Sound should be reached. In jest they said their ship sailed the heavier for the gold and silver of which she had relieved the Spaniard, after the tussle off the Azores.

And this was what it all tended to!

Digitized by Google

They had had fair weather for the Atlantic until, according to the master's reckoning, Old England was but two score hours' distance. But then gales and fog, a driving this way and that, masts over the board, and a leak had put them all in mind of the proverb which bade them not talk of the child before it was born.

And so at length nothing remained for them but to trust in Providence, and fold their arms while they let the ship ride out the storm as best it could. Of what use was the tiller, when they knew not their bearings? And they had but one pole left to which they could hang a sail.

With stout hearts they went to their beds, and gave themselves into the keeping of the master, on the night that was to prove their last.

The captain of the troop that was on board felt anxious, and allowed his anxiety to keep him from sleeping. Sir Francis Seymour had much at stake on the issue of this cruise. He would have given years of his life to be assured that in a day or two they would be safe at anchor in English harbourage.

But the night worsened, and the master had few words of solace to offer to his superior. He tried to pierce the darkness, and listened for the sound of the sea on the rocks, yet more earnestly than young Evan that self-same moment was listening for what he was so soon to hear. But the wind and the waves made so furious a riot between them, and the air was so thick that he could tell nothing of the destiny that was before him, until it was well-nigh accomplished.

Sir Francis clung to a bar on the deck and prayed for the dawn.

"Is it mending?" he asked, as the master lurched past him with a shout to his men.

"It will be long, sir, ere it mends," was the quick reply. "Pray you, content me by withdrawing to your quarters. I fear for you, sir."

But Sir Francis was a proud man, and ill brooked a request even so civilly put. He was about to say words of a choleric turn, when there broke from the master a storm of directions, which for the instant out-roared the wind itself.

"Turn her, for your lives!" he thundered in conclusion, with his arms upstretched so that the light of the lanthorns above made him look as if he were appealing to the dark heavens themselves.

Then even Sir Francis's landsman's eye perceived what strait had come upon them.

A second time they were brought within viewing distance of a row of black, ugly shapes which could have but one meaning.

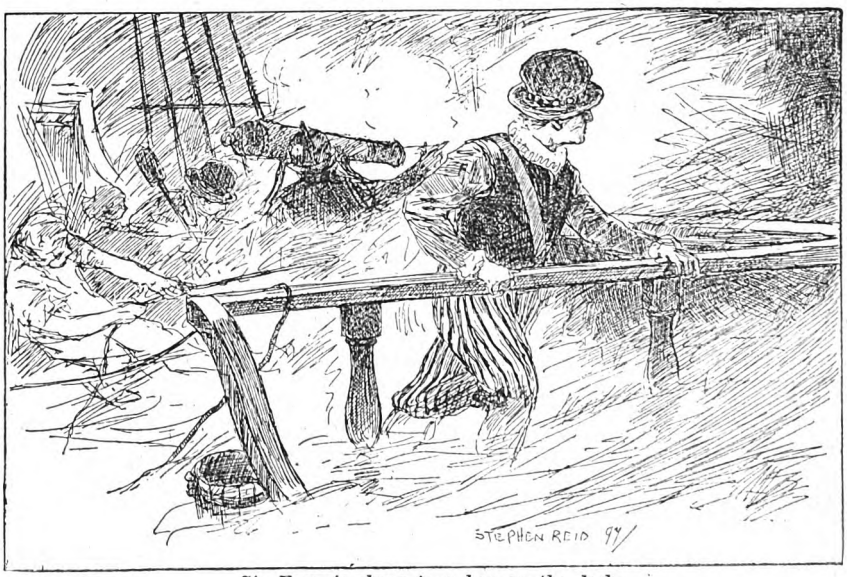
"Are we lost?" he asked.

"I think we are lost, sir," answered the master. "Out with swivel and fire her!" he shouted to the men.

It was done once, then a second and a third time.

Meanwhile, the soldiers from below were crowding on to the deck. They for once heeded not the commands of their captain. Some were in their shirts, some with their doublets unlaced upon their shoulders, and some, avaricious to the last, with their bags of treasure and loot dangling in their hands.

They could all see the cliffs of Troy Town now, only too well. It was odd that the ship had not already been driven upon them. But the current tending against the wind with the tide from St. Mary's was fighting for them. Even yet there was some hope that they might weather the point. If only the struggle between wind and tide lasted a little longer, they might get pushed a fraction more to the north, and then they would at least be free of St. Agnes.



Sir Francis clung to a bar on the deck.

But a sudden grating and instant arrest of the King Hal took this hope away, and a wailing sort of sigh came from the two hundred men who had struggled with Death hitherto in so many different forms—and hitherto successfully.

The master and Sir Francis looked each other in the face.

"Dost know where we are?" asked the latter.

"I judge they are the Scillies, sir," was the reply. "Make way there, men. Must I get my cutlass to ye? You must try it, Sir Francis. The stern boat will bear you best."

"You would do well, Sir Master, to take heed of your ship, while she hangs together. I will do what concerns me. How long will she stick thus, dost think?"

"A minute, sir, or an hour. I cannot tell."

A rush of men then parted the two, and the separation was confirmed by the horrid lurch of the ship, as a great wave broke over her from stern to the forecastle cabin. It took off some of the crowd, like the froth from a full tankard of ale. They cried out, and disappeared.

There was no longer any order or possibility of it on the ship.

Digitized by Google

A knot of men had rushed to the stern to lower the boat. These had been shattered by the great wave. But fortune favoured the remainder. In a trice they had lowered the boat in the calmer backwater of the wave: a dozen had leapt into her: a dozen more jumped for her, and missed their aim: and then, by a judicious movement, one of the seamen promptly guided the boat where the water was less agitated.

These were all that had any hope of salvation. After the brief pause, another and another towering sea fell upon the doomed ship. She groaned and swayed, and then parted in the middle where the teeth of the rocks had spiked her. There was one more mighty cry, and then the foaming sea was marked with the bodies of men, like a pool with dead leaves in autumn, after a rustle of wind in the overhanging trees.

But the St. Agnes men had not in the meantime been idle. Their eyes were better used to the gloom than those of the dying soldiers and mariners. Besides, the white, tempest-driven reaches of the sea were a background of light, against which the agonies of the drowning men showed up completely.

They stood with their knives in their hands, embracing the fearful coast line, and so near to the water that they were wetted to the skin at each inrushing wave.

Little Obadiah Hicks was with them, much in the background, and his mother held him by the shoulders lest his ardour should endanger his fine young life. But this did not, of course, prevent him from piping forth the chorus of which he was so fond:

> "Huzza for the rocks it splits upon,
> And hey for the corpse with its gewgaws on."

Vain was it for Manuel Nance to signal for the stifling of the young monster. His mother, like the rest, had eyes only for the tragedy. And after all, what did it signify? A child's treble could not be heard in this pandemonium of breaking ship and tempestuous wind and waves.

It was a ghoulish business, carried through with method and but few words.

The ship was so close to the beach of St. Warna's Bay that one after another the bodies were hurled ashore. Most were stunned by the shock, yet not all. But whether dead or alive, the quick stab of a knife put away all doubts. They were practised slaughterers, these men, and they did not waste their energies.

This, however, was simple work to what was now to follow.

Young Pender had spied the ship's boat in a sheltered cove, with every likelihood of being able to land her crew. He told of it to Manuel Nance, who ran himself to see what was doing. Then, with three of the others, he scaled the cliffs, which here impended over the inlet, and, watching their opportunity, they rolled a monstrous block of stone over the edge, so that it crashed into the boat and wrecked it utterly. Of those who were not killed by the stone, the St. Agnes men could easily give an account.

The dawn found them still thus hellishly employed. The bay was littered with dead men; the islanders were reddened with their blood, and tiny rivulets of it oozed down among the stones until it reached the water side, where the waves caught it and snatched it off into the Atlantic, as if it were just what the ocean thirsted for.

At last it seemed that their butchering was all accomplished. They had stood for fully five minutes, knives in hand, with their eyes hungrily fixed upon the sea—and it had brought them nothing more.

Besides, the vessel had gone down. No man could continue to live in such a sea as still prevailed.

They were free, therefore, to look about them in other ways—at their wives and children, for instance, and at the inanimate relics of the King Hal, which had already begun to strew their terrible strand. On some of the faces of the women there was an involuntary expression of pity, almost indeed of disgust, for never since any of them could remember had there been so much bloodshed on the island.

But habit and doubt of the propriety of their feelings kept them unprotesting—though they shuddered at what they saw and at the memory of what they had so recently beheld.

Even the men themselves looked askance at each other, as they were now able to reckon up the toll of their achievements.

But Manuel Nance put a summary stop to the reaction which perhaps his experience made him anticipate.

"We have had a hard morning, my lads," he observed, with an attempt at a laugh, that made his bloodstained face look strangely repulsive; "but we shall be richly paid for it ere the day is out—by St. Warna herself, I prophesy that."

Then he sent the women and children away, and while he directed two of the men to continue to stand sentinel over the waves, knife in hand, he set the others digging a wide pit in the ground. Herein were duly cast the stripped bodies of the unfortunate voyagers of the King Hal.

When the grave was filled up, the islanders set their backs to the wind, all save those still on guard, and hurried home to break their fast.

(To be continued.)

MELODY.

Contents for February, 1897:

Song	Only Memories	Frank Moir.
Duet	The Flower Thou Lovest	C. S. Jekyll.
Song	Beyond the Stars	Reginald Somerville.
Violin Solo	Silvery Waves	Carlo Ducci.
Song	We Loved in Vain	Mabel de Feu.
Piano Solo	Danse des Nymphes.	Paul Steen.
Song	Dream of Me	F. Norton.
Plantation Song	Honey Dear	Milton Wellings.
Waltz	Malmaison	Caroline Lowthian.
Piano Solo	Sylvia	O. Cussans.

Our Village Orchestra:
No. 2.—Barn Dance Tchar-Tchar . . . A. D. Furse.
Obbligato Parts to Barn Dance: Violins, 'Cello, Flute, Clarinet, Cornet, Mandoline, Guitar, and Banjo.
Violin part for Silvery Waves.

LITERARY NOTES { The Opera . By Hamish McCunn. / Music of the Month . . . By R. Hichens.

NOW READY. PRICE SIXPENCE.

Books Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON Ltd.

THE FINAL WAR. By Louis Tracy. 372 Pages. 16 Full-page Illustrations. In handsome cloth binding, 6s.

GUILTY GOLD: A Romance of Financial Fraud and City Crime. By Headon Hill. 354 Pages. 16 Full-page Illustrations. In handsome cloth binding. 6s.

VALDAR THE OFT-BORN. By George Griffith. 416 Pages. 16 Full-page Illustrations. In handsome cloth binding, 6s.

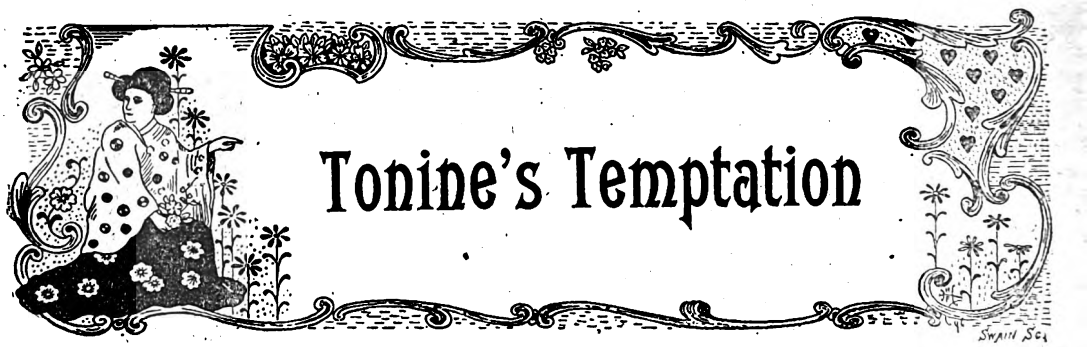
WHEN THE BIRDS BEGIN TO SING. By Winifred Graham. 239 Pages. 16 Full-page Illustrations. In handsome cloth binding, 3s. 6d.

THE IMPUDENT COMEDIAN, and Other Stories. By F. Frankfort Moore. 256 Pages. Profusely Illustrated. In handsome cloth binding, 5s.

FOOTLIGHT FAVOURITES: Hundreds of Portraits of Famous Actors and Actresses. In handsome cloth binding, 3s. 6d.

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE, VOLS. I. and II.—Each volume is profusely illustrated. In handsome cloth binding. Price 6s. 6d. each; half morocco, 8s. 6d.

Digitized by Google



Tonine's Temptation

"Them ain't no fireworks," exclaimed Boule contemptuously.

"Oui, oui," lisped Suzette, hugging the box of matches to her bosom.

"Lemme show you," cried Boule with a sudden inspiration. "I'll set 'em on fire all at once and that will make a fine blaze."

The two children were playing on the dingy stairs of a tenement-house in the French quarter of Soho Square.

Boule, whose real name was Boulanger, was general. He wore a soldier cap made of newspaper upon his sleek, dark head. Two fringed epaulettes decked the shoulders of his faded blue blouse. His sallow face was full of energy, and his black eyes brimmed with mischief.

"Joli! joli!" cried Suzette, clapping her fat hands when the box of matches flamed up with an explosive sound.

But a watchful hand seized the boy. The matches fell in a shower of fire on the stairs.

An old woman who was scrubbing the hall turned with a shriek.

"You little villain," cried the slender young girl who shook Boule vigorously, "you wish to burn the house down, eh? So, the papa shall hear of it. This very night shall he hear it."

"Good heavens, those dreadful children," cried the old woman.

"Never mind, Mme. Pierrot; I can put it out," exclaimed the girl, seizing the pail of water and dashing it over the blaze. The frightened children scuttled away upstairs. "Ah, it is well," growled the old woman, "but now, where is my water?"

"See, I will fill it again," said Tonine cheerfully. She went away singing.

"That boy will come to the gallows," muttered Mme. Pierrot, "but the maiden is very gracious."

Tonine seemed to light up the dingy hall with colour; her clothing was shabby and cheap enough, but the coquettish grace of a French girl was not wanting. Her faded pink dress clothed her as the petals clothe the rose. Her figure was supple and round and straight as a young birch tree. Her sailor hat had seen much service, but the small, graceful head was crowned with a pile of wavy locks, dark brown and soft, with a silky sheen. There were dimples in her pink cheeks. Her dark eyes were full of a shy radiance, for Louis Benoit had just told her they were like stars, stars of a summer night.

She ran lightly up the long flight of stairs to the top floor.

An old grey parrot with crimson-tipped wings called out as she entered: "Voilà, Tonine."

Then, as if eager to show off his greatest accomplishment, he began to sing in a somewhat cracked voice:

"Mère Michele a perdu son chat."

A very angular, skinny old woman was stirring a pot of cabbage soup over the fire. She wore a pad of embroidery over her grey locks. Her scant black gown showed a gaunt figure, somewhat bowed, but clean. A white curtain screened the one window, and a scarlet geranium bloomed beneath the parrot's cage that swung there.

"Coco will think that he possesses a garden," said Tonine, when she placed it there.

"He will dream of Guerande, my flower-wreathed city," said the grandmamma, sighing.

In one corner of the room hung a picture of the Virgin with a yellow wax candle and some holy water before it. A wreath of immortelles surrounded it, and on the small table lay a prayer book and a rosary. On a larger table were set out some blue plates, and a brown loaf of bread, for the evening repast.

"Oh, there you are at last," grumbled the old woman, as Tonine entered. "It is that you linger on the way home. My old bones are aching; I think it is this climate."

"Sit down then, grandmamma," cried Tonine cheerfully, "I will finish the soup. You will see all will be ready when the papa comes. You take care of yourself and be well for the picnic, you know."

The grandmother sank into a wooden arm chair with a sigh.

"Ah, I make me notting of dat peek-neek anglais." Then, relapsing into French, she went on rapidly: "Oh, but to see one more holiday in my own Guerande. You remember the races, Tonine. That was to be gay. I do see it now: the grey towers, the moss-green water in the moat, and the flowers. Guerande is just smothered in flowers, decked like a maiden for her first ball. The crowds come from far and near, and the church bells ring out. The lads come singing arm in arm. The white caps of the women show from afar. And there is the sea all flecked with foam and the salt pits sparkling in the sunshine. Oh, France; oh my country, I shall never see you again!"

"When's that picnic?" said Boule, stealing from the next room like a culprit, his interest in the affair overcoming his fears.

Boule played with street urchins, who called him Bully, and his English was not undefiled. His mixture of French words with Cockney slang was curious.

"Monday week," said Tonine.

She had put her hat away and was stirring the soup, her dark face growing rosy over the fire.

"And where is it going to be?" asked Boule.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, in Greenwich Park."

Suzette had toddled to the table and seized a blue bowl.

She held it out in her little fat hands. "Bonne soup," she lisped.

Tonine caught her in her arms and kissed her. "Little angel," she cried.

Suzette nestled against her, the fair cherubic face and golden hair touching Tonine's dark locks.

The work-worn, weary man who opened the door brightened at the sight. His face was very brown and thin, and when he took off his battered cap he showed grizzled hair. Yet Jean Predon was not old. Hard work and misfortune, not years, had lined his face. He moved stiffly, like an old man.

"We were talking of the picnic, papa," cried Tonine, as she dished up the smoking soup. "We will go; is it not so? We could not go last year on account of dear mother. But all your friends will be there and we will hear the Marseillaise and many French songs. You will think you are back in la belle France again."

Predon looked at the girl's glowing face. "You shall go," he said. What matter that he must resign the new hat he had been saving for so long?

Tonine cleared away the supper quickly, and then she had to put the children to bed. Predon smoked his pipe and the grandmother took out her knitting.

The young girl was shaking out a scant and torn white frock. She looked at it in despair. Tears filled her eyes. "It is impossible," she said. But she tried it on to be certain of the sad truth. She looked like a flower that had burst its calyx. There was nothing to be done with it. She must stay at home. And she could never tell Louis the reason. She could not expose their poverty to another. The grandmother passed through on her way to bed, and saw her sitting in the white gown like a wan little ghost.

"Behold," cried Tonine, rising and making a little curtesy. "Is it not a pity we are not like the flowers? They have new clothes every year, that are pretty and fit them well. And they grow on them and cost nothing."

"Wear what you have on," said the grandmother shortly. "What matters it?"

"Ah, when you were young did it not matter, grandmother?" asked Tonine.

"Perhaps! There is no money for fine clothes. It is hard to buy bread. If we die there is nothing to bury us."

"Then it is cheaper to live," said Tonine, with a rippling laugh.

The grandmother frowned and walked away.

Tonine woke suddenly from a dazzling dream. She had seen herself in a crisp, dotted Swiss gown, with pretty lace frills and pink satin bows. On her head was a wide Leghorn hat, bent in bewitching angles, with clusters of fine pink flowers nestling in filmy lace. She awoke. There was some strange presence in the room.

Her heart stood still. A glimmering light, a ghost-like figure, moved there. But this ghost was bent with age, and the flickering light showed a dark, strong face and gleaming eyes.

The grandmother was moving with slow, stealthy steps towards the sitting-room. "Is she walking in her sleep, I wonder?" thought Tonine, who was suddenly very wide awake. All at once she heard the click of coin. "Money," she thought, and her heart beat fast. "Can it be that grandmamma has a secret hoard?"

She slipped softly out of bed with a glance at the sleeping child.

On tiptoe she stole to the open door and looked in.

By the small table under the picture of the Virgin, the old woman sat. Spread out on the table before her were several pieces of money. One was a five pound piece that caught Tonine's eyes as it glittered in the light.

"And I never knew there was a drawer in that table," thought Tonine, with quickened breath, at the sight of the money.

The old woman touched each piece fondly as she counted them over. "Oh, Holy Virgin, let me have enough to take me back to my own land when I die! Oh, let me live till I am rich enough to die!" She gathered up the coin and slipped it into an envelope. Tonine saw that the drawer only slid in a groove under the table. The girl had only time to slip into bed and close her eyes, when the old woman crept back again.

"I wonder what she has been saving for? It must have taken a long time," thought Tonine. "And she talked as if she had not a sou. Ah, she is a miser then. She could lend me enough for a frock. That gold piece now would buy everything. I might borrow it."

The thought sent a cold chill over her. "I could pay it back in time. I might work evenings. Angele will be married soon and she will let me make her orange flowers, and there are others."

She saw herself in the toilet of her dream. Louis was gazing at her with adoring eyes.

"I would have one happy day. Louis would dance with me and see me for once comme il faut."

"Thief, thief!" whispered a small voice. Tonine looked about her with a startled gaze. It was as if someone whispered in her ear.

But there was no one. "I mean to put it back," she said to the unseen presence. "I am only going to borrow it."

The floor sent a chill through her little bare feet. She shivered in the warm air. She groped about for matches, but when she found one it lit with such an explosive shriek that she dropped it on the floor. She stood there a moment gasping for breath. Then she had to find another match.

At last the lamp was lit. The flames lit up the benign face of the Virgin above it. But there seemed to be a warning glance in those heavenly eyes.

Tonine faltered. A cold hand seemed to clutch her heart.

"But I am only borrowing it," she said, looking resolutely away from the holy picture.

The secret drawer was not hard to find. She wondered she had not discovered it before. In a moment the large white envelope was in her hand.

The writing upon it caught her eye.

"For my burial in my native land."

Tonine felt as if cold water had been thrown in her face. She dropped the envelope. The damp air of a funeral vault seemed to blow about her. Ah, she could not do it. It was like robbing the dead.

No; she would stay at home. Louis would go. He would look into brighter eyes and clasp fairer forms in the gay dances. She would lose him. He was not pledged to her. He was free. But she was not free. When he left her, it was as if all men went with him. He was the one man in all the world for her.

Her heart beat fast now with throbs of pain. She put out her little brown hand and took up the envelope again. The shining gold piece slipped out first. She picked it up and it seemed to burn her hand. She suddenly remembered she had not said her prayers that night.

Digitized by Google

"But grandmother is not going to die. She is strong and well and I shall put the money back," she pleaded with herself.

But all the pretty bloom had faded from her face.

The drawer seemed to groan dolefully as she shut it. Everything was so noisy. The old clock ticked with loud strokes like a hammer on an anvil. Coco in his cage suddenly sang out in his harshest voice:

"Mère Michele a perdu son chat."

* * * * *

The Bank Holiday festivities were in full blast. Greenwich Park was looking its gayest in the summer sunshine. People had come to eat and dance, and these delights filled the hours. The sunbeams danced as if they, too, were having a fête, and the leaves twinkled merrily in the breeze.

The grandmother had been strangely silent and stern all day. She wore her white Breton cap under her bonnet, and a decent black gown. When she dozed at the end of the warm day, Boule took Suzette over to the forbidden shooting gallery. He started at every report and jumped up and down with rapture.

But Suzette trembled and clung to him. "I don't like the bang," she said.

When he found a place where he could peep in, he forgot the child entirely.

Tonine and Louis were struggling out of the crowd in the smaller pavilion. She had danced till she was weary. Her white gown with its floating ribbons was not as crisp as it had been in the morning, but she still looked charming. The curves of her flower-wreathed hat set off the piquant face, where the dimples played hide-and-seek in the pink cheeks. From the crown of her shining hair to the tips of the dainty feet in their canvas shoes she was attired with perfect taste and fitness.

But there was a nervous tension about her. She had rushed from one amusement to another, as if to avoid thought. She felt as if she had quicksilver in her veins or as if she were drunk with new wine. Louis had never left her side. His chains were riveted that day, when he saw her for the first time with the charm of a pretty toilet enhancing her beauty.

She was very tired, and Louis led her away from the crowd to a seat under the shadow of an oak. She knew what was coming by one of those subtle intuitions that none can explain. He loved her, and he meant to tell her so. Thrills of joy went over her, tempered by a touch of pain. She had won, but, oh! had she not lost something that could never be regained? All day, even when gazing into Louis' blue eyes, the haunting thought had tormented her. "If he knew—if he knew I was a thief! How he would start from me in horror and loathing!"

Sometimes she thought of Cinderella at the ball, and how in a flash her fine attire changed to rags. What if she were punished in that way?

But what was Louis saying?

"You know I love you, petite. Is it not so? There is no one like you. Only to touch your little hand cheers me like wine. Tell me, chérie——"

He was interrupted by a sudden rush and hoarse cries not far away. Some one called out: "A doctor, quick; a doctor."

Tonine started and turned pale. "It is grandmother," she cried. "I feel it; I know it. Something tells me that it is so."

Her coward heart prompted the thought.

"Take me to her, Louis," she faltered. "Oh, if anything has happened, I want to die." Louis looked at her in amazement. But he saw her pallor and the strange misery in her dark eyes, so he said nothing. Boule was crying noisily. He caught Tonine by the arm. "I didn't do nothin'," he sobbed, "only told her I couldn't find Suzette an' she tumbled right over. 'Taint nothin', the peelers 'ill get the kid!"

A friend supported the old woman's rigid form. Her face looked as if carved from stone; her eyes were shut.

"Oh, is she dead; is she dead?" gasped Tonine, seizing one of the cold, nerveless hands.

"It's a shock," cried one.

"It's the heat," cried another.

Tonine was pale to her lips. She shook like a leaf in a storm.

"Oh, Louis," she whispered, "find Suzette; I forgot her. I forgot everyone but you." Louis turned away with a rapturous joy in his heart. After all, the grandmother was old. She had saved his life. But his seemed to lie all before him in sunshine.

It was not hard to find the little one. Affairs were too well regulated for a sobbing child to be lost. She was soon in Tonine's arms. Louis did everything. He brought the vehicle to which the still unconscious grandmother was borne. Boule found a panacea for his grief in the ride home. Tonine held her grandmother's head in her lap, and gazed with terror at the face which looked as strange as if it were a mask.

But this was not death. Once on her own bed, the old woman opened her eyes. Tonine sat by her side, shivering.

She rose and administered some stimulant with trembling hands.

"My son; my Jean," faltered the old woman.

"Oh, he is not here," cried Tonine, "but he will come soon. He is doing overwork; poor papa."

"I must say—good-bye," murmured the grandmother. "I am going—back to my own country."

"No, no," cried Tonine, with sobs. "You must not go—you must not leave me. I want to pay back the money. I saw you count it, grandmother, and I wanted the frock for the fête. I was a wicked girl. I took the gold piece. Oh, forgive me, do not die without forgiving me."

And she dropped on her knees besides the old woman and sobbed in a broken-hearted manner.

The grandmother had been hard and stern at times, but now she feebly stretched out her trembling hand and laid it on the bowed head.

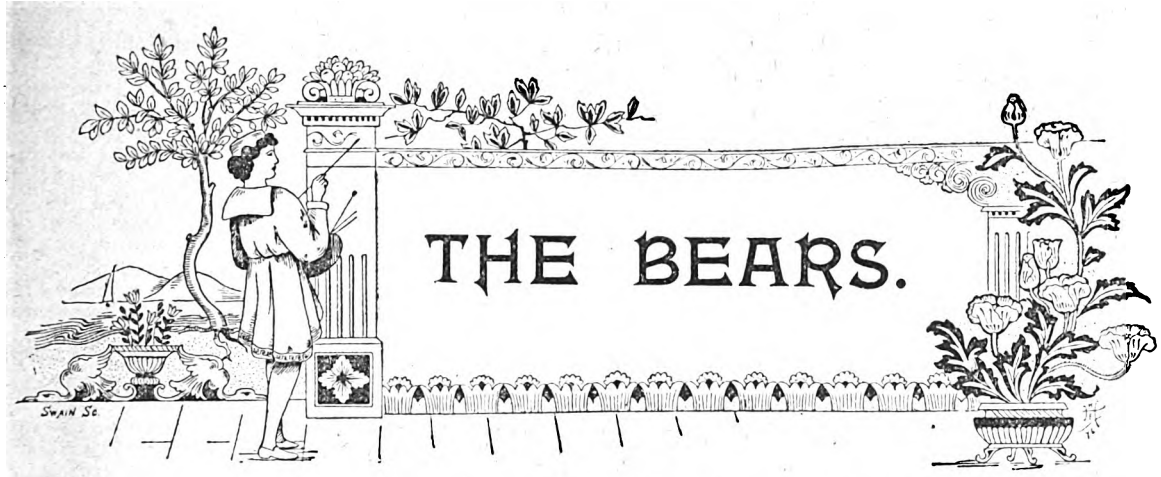
"Chérie," she said gently, "I knew it. I forgive you. What matters it where the old woman sleeps? Le bon Dieu is as near us here as in my own Guerande. I was young once, chérie, and I saw the little love story to-day. The rest of the money shall be for your wedding. I die content—if I can see my boy—my Jean."

"Dear grandmother," cried Tonine. "I do not deserve to be happy. I am not good enough for Louis. But I will punish myself. I will not marry him till every farthing of the money has been earned and restored. And I will not take your savings for the wedding either, but make what is needful myself. Yes, it must be so."

And the grandmother did not die. She lived to dance at Tonine's wedding.

Helen W. Pierson.

Digitized by Google



THE BEARS.

In 1875 expired the five years given to the gipsy bear-leaders to abandon their trade. At a fixed date they were to bring their bears to certain places appointed by the government and kill them with their own hands. I happened to witness such an execution in the town of Belsk.

From four counties the unfortunate gipsies gathered with all their households, wives and children, horses and bears. More than a hundred clumsy beasts, from small cubs to old grey bears of immense size, were stationed at the outskirts of the little town.

The gipsy camps awaited in a state of terror the decisive day. Those who came first had to stay there over two weeks, as the police authorities were waiting till all the bear-leaders on the list should arrive, in order to accomplish the execution at one stroke.

The bear-leaders went from village to village, giving their final performances. This was the last chance for the bears to display their artistic skill, so they danced and fought, they gave the familiar representation of how the boys steal beans at the farm, how the young lass walks and how the old woman creeps. It was for the last time, too, that they were treated to a glass of vodka (brandy). Standing on his hind legs the bear would take the glass with the soles of his fore paws and bring it to his shaggy snout, he would then raise his head upwards and let the liquid run down his throat. After this he licked his snout clean and expressed his satisfaction in a succession of prolonged growls, mingled with strange gasps.

For the last time the bears were taken on their rounds to the farmhouses, and where the bear walked in on his own accord there was great joy in the house; the animal was led to the place of honour in a front corner of the room, and everybody in the family felt happy, because it is a sign of good luck. But when the bear, in spite of coaxing and patting, obstinately refused to cross the threshold of the house, the hosts were unhappy indeed, and the neighbours said:

"Something wrong inside. He knows."

Most of the bear-leaders came from the western counties, and had to descend a two mile slope before they could reach Belsk, the miserable little town visible in the valley, with its thatched and sheet-iron roofs, and two or three church steeples.

No sooner did they descry the place of their misfortune than the air was filled with an indescribable howling and wailing of women, crying of children, and, above all, the terrific uproar of the bears, which forced the passing train of waggons to turn off the road to avoid the shying of the horses and oxen, and caused the accompanying dogs to slink with a howl of fear far under the waggons. Was it mere sympathy that made the bears join their masters in the wailing? Who knows? Maybe they became aware from the people's talk of the sad fate in store for them.

At the gate of the Police Captain of Belsk a few old gipsies were in waiting. They were dressed in their best holiday attire to appear before the authorities in a decent manner. They all wore long black or blue coats girdled with belts ornamented with silver, silk shirts with gold-gallooned collars, broad velvet pantaloons, and large boots. Some of them wore long boots ornamented all round with flowers of different colours, and all of them had astrachan caps. This attire is donned for occasions of importance only.

"Asleep?" inquired a tall, thin, old gipsy of the policeman who had just come out from the yard.

"He is getting up; he is dressing. He will call you soon," replied the policeman.

The old men, who until now had sat in silence, began to move more nervously and to speak among themselves in a whisper.

"Nothing will come of it," said the oldest among them. "What can he do? Does it depend on him? Bears are killed now all over Russia."

"We will try, Ivan, maybe in some way or other," answered an elderly man.

"We can try," said Ivan mournfully. "Only he cannot help us."

They were called in to the Captain and thronged the waiting-room. When a man with a heavy moustache, dressed in unbuttoned police uniform, under which a red shirt could be seen, appeared before them, the old gipsies bowed their heads low before him—many of them wept.

"Right honourable sir," said Ivan, "think for yourself, what will we do now? We had bears, we lived peacefully, we did not offend anybody. It is true, we have had some mischievous boys among us who are carrying on the wrong trade; but, sir, have you not a great many horse thieves among the Russians? We did not do anybody any harm with our beasts, and it was an amusement for all. What will become of us now? We will have to turn beggars, tramps, and thieves. Our fathers and forefathers were bear-leaders.

Digitized by Google

To farm? We do not know how! We are almost all of us good blacksmiths, it is true, and it was well enough when we could go all over the country to find work; but now, when we have to live in one place, the work will not come to us itself. Our boys, sir, out of sheer necessity, will become horse-thieves. As before God, I speak the truth! A great wrong will be done to us and to all the good people by taking away the bears from us. Maybe you will help us? God will repay you for it!"

The old man fell on his knees, and the others did the same. The Captain looked gloomy, with one hand in his pocket, the other pulling at his moustache. The old man took out a pretty thick purse and stretched out his hand.

"I will not take it," said the Captain sternly, "I cannot do anything for you."

"Take it, right honourable sir," implored the crowd. "Perhaps there is some way—you may write somewhere."

"I will not take it," said the Captain more severly. "Not for anything. Nothing can be done. It is a law. Five years were given to you to be ready for it. What is to be done now?" He moved his hands in the air. The gipsies stood silently. The police Captain continued:

"I know myself what a misfortune it is for you and for us; now we shall have to look out all the time for the horses. But what can I do? You, old man, keep this money. When some of your boys fall into my hands with stolen horses, do not expect mercy from me. Keep it, I tell you, old man; you will need it by-and-bye."

"Right honourable sir," said Ivan holding out the purse, "allow me to say another word. Let it be to-morrow" (his voice began to tremble). "Allow us, sir, to do away with them to-morrow. We are tired out with waiting. I have been here two weeks with mine; I have nearly spent all my money."

"Another party of bear-leaders has to come yet, old man. You must wait. The whole town is nearly crazy over your presence here. It must be done at one stroke."

"They are coming, sir! As we came to you we saw them descending the hill. Kind sir, do not torture us any longer."

"Well, if they have come, to-morrow morning at ten o'clock I will be at the camp. Have you rifles?"

"Some of us have, but not all."

"Well, I will ask the Colonel to give you a few rifles from the armoury. You can go! I feel sorry for you."

The old gipsies turned round towards the door when the Captain called them back.

"Hey, there! Turn back! I have something to tell you. You go to the chemist, Foma Fomitch; you know the place, near the cathedral? Go there and tell him I sent you. He will buy up from you all the bears' grease; he uses it to make salves. He may also buy the skins from you. He will pay you a good price for it. Indeed, why should you lose all that?"

The gipsies thanked him courteously, and the crowd adjourned in a body to the chemist. Their hearts were ready to burst, and they gave away for a mere song the mortal remains of their friends. Foma Fomitch bought all the grease at threepence-halfpenny a pound, and about the skins he promised to speak with them later. There they met also the rich merchant, Rogatcheff, and he agreed to take all the hams at three-halfpence per pound.

It was a murky, damp September morning, but the bad weather did not prevent the inhabitants of Belsk from hastening to the meadow to see the extraordinary show. The town looked deserted. All the available carriages, droskies and stages were engaged in carrying off the curiosity seekers to the gipsy camp. The poorer people walked in crowds to the same place, and by ten o'clock the whole town was there.

The gipsies had lost all hope. It was not noisy at the camp, for the women with their little children hid themselves in the tents so that they should not see the execution, and only now and then a cry of exasperation was heard from them. The men, in a feverish state of excitement, made the final preparations. They moved the waggons to one side, put them in line, and chained the beasts to them. The police captain, with the chemist, Foma Fomitch, beside him, passed along the line of the condemned. The bears felt uneasy; the unusual surroundings, the strange preparations, the enormous crowd, the large gathering of their own species—all this made them very excitable. They tossed their chains violently, or gnawed at them, giving out dull and prolonged growls.

Old Ivan stood near his huge, old, lame bear, his son, an elderly gipsy, already grey, and his grandson, with burning eyes, hurriedly chained the bear to the waggon.

The police captain coming near them, said:

"Well, old man, order your boys to start."

A general commotion and tumult began among the throng of the lookers-on, but soon they quieted down, and amidst the dead silence a low, but grave voice was heard. The old man, Ivan, spoke:

"Allow me, kind sir, to say a word or two.

"Comrades, let me be the first to finish. I am the oldest among you. In a year I will be ninety, and have been a bear-leader all my life from childhood. In all the camps you will not find a beast older than mine."

He stooped his curly head over his chest, shook it a few times, and wiped his eyes with his fist. Then he straightened himself up, raised his head, and continued to speak in louder and firmer tones than before:

"That's why I want to be the first to finish. I never thought to live long enough to see such a calamity. I never thought that my beloved bear would live to see it; but it seems such is our fate. With my own hands I have to kill him—my bread-winner, my own benefactor! Untie him, let him loose. He will not go away. It is of no use for us, old comrade, to run from death. Let him loose, Vasia. I do not want to kill him as one would kill cattle—tied up. Don't be afraid," he said to the restless crowd, "he will not hurt anybody."

A young gipsy untied the enormous beast and led him away from the waggon. The bear sat down on his hind legs, the fore-paws hanging down. He swung from side to side, sighing heavily, with a rattle in his throat. Truly, he was very old; his teeth were yellow, his shaggy coat of a faded reddish colour, slightly grizzled. In a friendly and mournful way he looked at his master with his single small eye. Dead silence prevailed. All that could be heard was the clinking of the gun-barrels, and the dull rap of the ramrods upon the wads in charging the rifles.

"Give me the rifle," said the old man firmly.

The son gave him a rifle; he took it, pressed it to his chest, and addressed the bear with the following words:

"In a minute I will kill you, Potap. God help me that my old hand may not tremble, so that the first ball may pierce your heart. I don't want to torture you; it is not such an end as you deserve, my old bear, my dear friend. I took you as a young cub; one eye had been put out, your nose was rotted by the ring; you were sick, you were pining away. I looked after you as after my own son; I petted you, reared you, and you grew up a large, brave, and strong bear. Another like you could not be found in all the camps gathered here.

Digitized by Google

"You grew up, and did not forget my kindness to you. I had not a friend among men as good to me as you were. You were good and gentle, quick of apprehension, you learnt every trick easily. I have never seen a beast better and more intelligent than you. What would have become of me without you? Thanks to your work, all of my family is living now. You earned me three pairs of horses; through you I was able to build a winter hut. You have done a great deal more for me: you have freed my son from the military service. I have a large family, and everyone of them, from the youngest to the oldest, you have fed and provided for. How dearly I love you! I never hit you too hard, and if I have offended you in any way—forgive me. I bow my head to your feet."

He threw himself on the ground before the bear. The animal growled gently and pitifully. The old man was weeping bitterly, his whole body trembled.

"Shoot, father!" exclaimed his son, "do not tear our hearts any longer."

Ivan rose. The tears ceased running from his eyes. He tossed back his grey mane from his forehead, and continued in a firm and clear voice:

"And now I have to kill you. I am ordered to do it, my dearest friend—to shoot you with my own hands. You are not permitted to live any longer in this world. What then? Let God in Heaven be judge between us and these men."

He grasped the rifle with a firm hand, and levelled it at the beast, aiming at the heart, just under the left paw. The bear seemed to understand what it meant. He uttered a pitiful, despairing growl, and raising his two forepaws, as if to cover his eyes, that he might not see the terrible gun, he stood upright.

A heavy moan escaped the ranks of gipsies. Many in the crowd were weeping. With a sob the old man flung the rifle to the ground and fell powerless over it. His son ran to lift him up, and the grandson seized the rifle.

"Enough!" he called out in a wild, desperate voice, his eyes flashing. "Enough! Shoot, boys! Have done with it!"

The young gipsy ran up to the beast, put the muzzle close to its ear and fired. The bear fell down a lifeless mass. Only a spasmodic shudder ran through its paws, and the mouth opened as if in a yawn. The banging of rifles was soon heard in all directions, mixed with the deafening cries of the women and children. The light breeze drove the dense cloud of smoke towards the river.

"He has broken loose! He has broken loose!" was the cry heard suddenly, and in the twinkling of an eye the crowd scattered in all directions, like a flock of frightened sheep. The police Captain, the fat chemist, Foma Fomitch, boys, men, women, girls—all were running in deadly fright, bouncing up against tents and waggons, stumbling and tumbling over each other, and yelling like mad, and the bewildered horses whirled away the carriages. The danger was not very great after all. Maddened with fear the beast, quite a young, dark, grey bear, was running with astonishing ease, a piece of the chain hanging down from his neck.

All gave way before him, and he went like the wind in the direction of the town. Several gipsies ran after him with rifles. The few passers-by in the streets clung to the walls, if they did not succeed in hiding behind the gates. The shutters were closed, all living persons disappeared, and the very dogs vanished.

The bear rushed past the cathedral, up the main street, throwing himself now and then side to side, as if seeking a hiding-place, but the gates and doors were all locked. At the shops he was met with deafening yells by the salesmen, who wanted to frighten him away. He fled past the bank, school building, armoury of the county regiment, and to the other end of the town. He then ran out into the country roads towards the river, and paused.

The pursuers were far to the rear, but soon appeared—a crowd consisting no longer of gipsies alone. The police Captain and the colonel were driving in a drosky with rifles in their hands, and a platoon of soldiers kept pace with them.

"There he is!" cried the captain; "hit him! Fire!" Shots cracked, and one of the bullets wounded the beast. In mortal fright he ran faster than before. A mile from the town, up the river, stood a large water mill, surrounded on all sides by a small but thick grove. The animal took this direction, but, confused by the dams and the arms of the river, he lost his way. There was a broad sheet of water between him and the dense oak thicket, where he might, perhaps, find refuge for a time, if not permanent safety, but he dared not trust to swimming.

This side of the river bank was thickly covered with a strange kind of brushwood which grows only in Southern Russia—the so-called "lichum." The long, flexible, branchless stems grow so close together that it is impossible for a man to get through. Near the roots, however, there are broad chinks and passages by which dogs can make their way; and as they often hide there from the heat, and thus gradually widen the passages, a real labyrinth has been formed in the thicket. Into this the bear plunged.

The millers, looking out of the windows of the upper storey of the mill, noticed it, and when the pursuers came up, breathless with fatigue, the police Captain gave orders to surround the place. The unfortunate bear lay deep in the brushwood, the bullet in his thigh giving him intense pain. With his snout buried between his paws, he lay motionless, deafened, maddened with fear, not even dreaming of self-defence. The soldiers sent one bullet after another at random into the thicket, hoping to hit him and thus cause him to show himself; but it was a difficult matter to get at him in this way. He was only killed late in the evening, having been driven out of his place of refuge by fire. Everyone who possessed a rifle deemed it his duty to lodge a bullet in the poor brute's body, and when the skin was taken off it was so riddled that it was good for nothing.

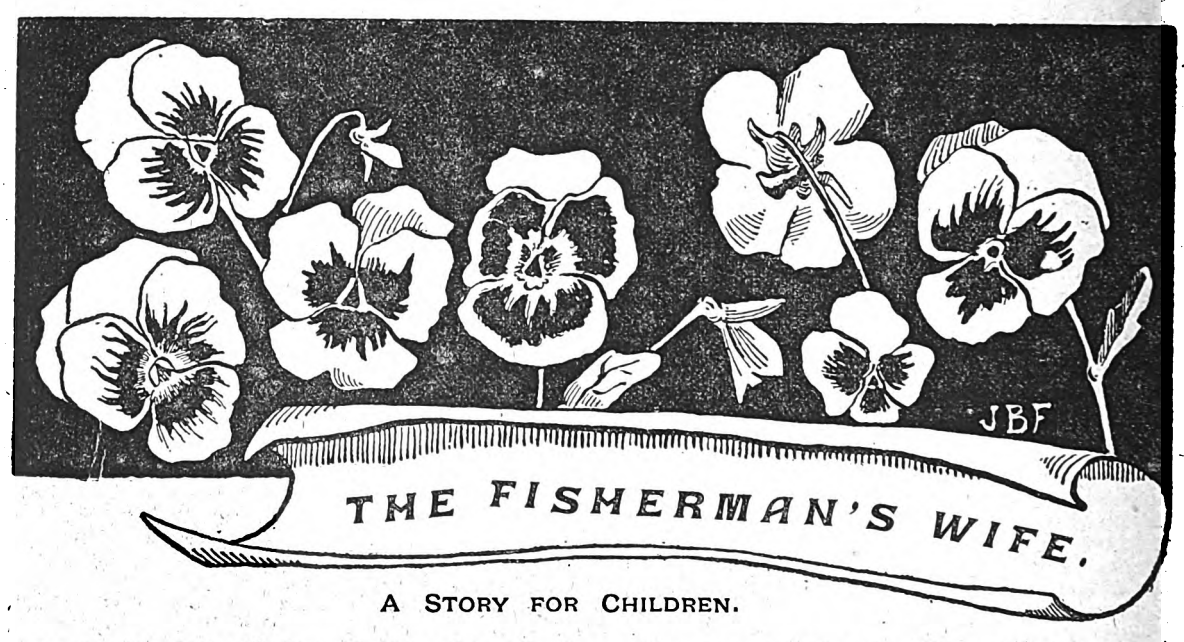
GARSCHINE.

"THE WRECKERS OF SCILLY,"
BY CHARLES EDWARDES,
Commences in SHORT STORIES TO-DAY.

"THE SHADOW-HAND,"
BY LOUIS TRACY,
Commences in SHORT STORIES dated February 20th.

"DEEDS THAT WON THE EMPIRE,"
BY "VEDETTE,"
Commences in SHORT STORIES dated March 6th.

Digitized by Google



A STORY FOR CHILDREN.

A FISHERMAN was living in a humble cabin with his wife, Stora. One day, after having uselessly spent several hours on the river bank, he suddenly pulled from the water an immense fish, with gold scales and a gold crown on his head.

"Ah!" cried he, "here's a fine catch. I will take it to the king. He will certainly pay me generously for it." But the fish said: "Give me my liberty. I am an enchanted prince, and can accomplish any wish you may express."

"All right," good-naturedly replied the fisherman. "This is the first time I have ever heard a fish speak, and that in itself is a proof of your claim."

Dropping the fish into the water, he returned to his cabin to tell the adventure to his wife. "What!" cried she, "and from that fish, who, no doubt, has the power of a fairy, you demanded nothing?"

"No," said the fisherman, "it did not occur to me. Besides, what could I ask for?"

"What!" she exclaimed, "when we are here in a miserable cabin. You might at least have asked for a cottage. Go back! He is under obligations to you. You saved his life. He can refuse you nothing."

The meek and humble fisherman was not at all anxious to make the attempt, but finally, giving way to his wife's determination, he went to the water's edge and called: "Fish of gold! Royal fish!"

"Why do you call me?" asked the fish.

"Alas!" replied the timid fisherman, "I am obeying my wife, who does not always think as I do."

"And what does she wish at present?" said the fish kindly.

"Ah!" he replied sadly, "she is not satisfied with our small cabin, and wishes a larger one."

"Very well, return home, and you will find your wish accomplished."

In fact, in place of the miserable cabin was a beautiful cottage. Stora was sitting radiantly happy on a bench in front of the door. Taking her husband by the hand, she said:

"Just come and see how beautiful it is!"

There was a bedroom with a comfortable bed, a kitchen with a complete assortment of cooking utensils, and near by a low court, from which came the cackle of geese and chickens. Then followed a garden full of vegetables and an orchard of fruit trees.

"Is it not charming?" cried Stora.

"Yes, indeed," replied the astonished fisherman, and both heartily rejoiced in their good fortune. Fifteen days later Stora said to her husband:

"I have been thinking that we were too modest in making our wishes known. This cottage is too small, and there is not a single field joined to the garden. I should like to have a beautiful country residence."

"What folly!" cried her husband. "What would we do with a country residence?"

"Make yourself easy. I know well of what benefit it would be to us. You have nothing to do but to again see your friend, the golden fish."

The poor fisherman, not being able to resist, went out with bowed head.

"Why do you call me?" cried the crowned fish.

"Alas," replied the fisherman, "I come in obedience to my wife, whose wishes are not always in accord with mine."

"What does she want now?"

"She thinks she would like a beautiful country residence."

"All right, your wish is accomplished."

The fisherman, thanking him, turned homeward. To his surprise he found before him a large house, with court, granaries and stables. His wife waiting for him in her loveliest Sunday dress, led him into their new home.

Here was the master's room and there a large one for the servants. The chimney was full of hams. Not far off was the milk house, and near by a granary full of wheat. In the stable were many beautiful cows. There was a pigeon house on the roof of the shed well filled with fat sheep, and a couple of storks on the chimney. Round the house were gardens, fields, and prairies.

"Is this not a delightful place?" enthusiastically inquired Stora.

Digitized by Google

"Yes," replied the fisherman, "see that we live here in peace."

A few days passed, when one morning Stora said to her husband: "It is indeed a good thing to have a country house like this; but we can do better. We can have a château, and live as nobles do. This is what you must demand of your magic fish who is in your debt for life itself."

"No, indeed," said the fisherman, "certainly not. I will not make this additional demand of him. He would be angry, and he would have good cause."

"Oh, I beg of you," implored his wife, "go to him again. He will refuse you nothing. I cannot live in this farmhouse. If I stay here I shall be ill. If I have not a château I shall die."

The apprehensive fisherman again obeyed, and the fish said to him: "Go, your new wish is granted."

When he returned home, what a wonderful change awaited him! In the place of his rustic home, he found a beautiful château with flag waving on the top of its lofty tower; a wide moat surrounded the high walls inclosing the domain, and on its drawbridge stood Stora in a silk gown with a gold chain about her neck. Taking her husband by the hand, she led him to their apartment. Entering the large door, they passed from room to room completely and beautifully furnished with soft carpets, superb hangings, statuary, and pictures. On every side were domestics in livery. In the court stood a carriage with two beautiful horses, a coachman on the seat and a footman up behind. Near by was a garden full of flowers, a conservatory, and aviary.

"Ah!" said Stora with an air of triumph, "what do you think of all this? Is this not better than a country house? Are you not content?"

"Yes," replied the fisherman; "but for the love of all that's good, let us stay here."

A few days later Stora remarked to her husband: "I was on the tower to-day and was astonished and grieved to find how little land we have. It is not enough that you should be a lord. You must have a kingdom. You must be a king."

"What extravagance!" cried the fisherman. "Never, never will I permit it."

"If you do not wish to be king," replied Stora in a resolute tone, "I, nevertheless, am determined to be queen, and I desire you to go and explain my wish to the friend who is under so many obligations to you—to the powerful magician."

"No, indeed," reiterated the fisherman, "he has already been wonderfully generous to us. I do not wish to irritate and tire him."

But the ambitious Stora insisted, begged, and threatened, and the poor fisherman again gave way to her inflexible will. The fish looked upon him in pity, saying sadly: "This time also the wish of your wife is granted."

In place of the lordly château, there was a grand palace with a magnificent façade and four imposing towers. A marble stairway covered with rich carpet led to the first floor, to the reception-room where the ministers, generals, and courtiers were congregated, and where Stora sat on a golden throne, an ermine mantle about her, and a crown of diamonds on her head.

"Finally," said she, enthusiastically, to her husband, "here is a burst of fortune; here is power; here is happiness. There is nothing more I could wish."

"Heaven be praised!" he fervently replied.

A few moments later, with a grave air, she took him by the hand, drawing him into the embrasure of a window that she might talk to him unobserved, and said to him: "I am well satisfied that I am a queen, am contented with the respect of my ministers and the tranquility of my subjects, but sometimes the sun rises too late; sometimes the moon is too late, and sometimes the wind whistles and blows in a manner that inconveniences me greatly. I wish to govern them according to my pleasure. The fairy fish can refuse you nothing. He must grant me this additional favour. It will be the last."

The peaceful fisherman was stupefied. He could not believe she spoke seriously. But when she, in a resolute manner, repeated her demand, he declared he would never take part in any such insanity.

But, alas! the poor man had not the courage to resist the strong will of his companion. After violent protestations, he again acquiesced.

He went in fear and trembling to perform his strange mission. This time the fish regarded him coldly, and said to him in a formidable voice:

"This is enough. Your wife is insane, and you are an imbecile. You will no longer have either château or lands. In pity I will give you back your ancient cottage. You deserve no more."

And the fairy fish disappeared beneath the waters. The fisherman turned homeward with bowed head to find his wife dressed in wretched rags, and sitting upon the door-step of their old cabin, lamenting their lost wealth.

Ella Crim Monnette.

JUMBLED STORY COMPETITION.

NO. 29.

On page 180 appears a story, each line of which is numbered. The lines are all in their wrong position, and the prizes mentioned below are offered to those who write on a sheet of paper the numbers of the lines in the order most nearly correct. The title is jumbled up, and should be correctly given and pasted on the paper containing the effort.

The conditions are jumbled in the following paragraph as an example. The correct order of the lines is given in line 10.

1 SHORT STORIES on or before Monday,
2 awarded to the readers whose solutions first
3 JUMBLED STORY.
4 Four Prizes—one of £5 and three of £1 each—are
5 February 8th, and envelopes must be marked
6 correct. In the event of a tie, the prizes will be
7 reach this office.
8 All attempts to be delivered at the offices of 9 offered to the readers whose keys are most nearly 10 4—9—6—2—7—8—1—5—3—12—11—13—10.
11 a sheet of paper the figures in the order they
12 Competitors in doing the story should write on 13 believe to be correct, thus:

Digitized by Google

JUMBLED STORY No. 29.

H. BARS FAVORITE SEAT

See Page 179.

"An ice," said the girl scornfully. "An ice! when——?"

"When what?" said he.

"And yet at first you talked of eating ices."

"Yes, it wasn't very pleasant. I didn't enjoy it "in spite of the three years that I have been away in the county, and the dancers stood against the stairs that I have not forgotten yet. Would you care for an ice?"

"Oh, I don't know. When you are so cold and you must forgive me if I am still a little awkward." How can you talk of an ice in that calm way when—Don't you see we are stopping everyone."

"No," he said. "The dancing wasn't up to much. Then it becomes more cheerful, and that is how they talked about; what plans I laid before you?"

"But tell me," she said hastily, as was her wont, the part that I love best. Here, when we danced it in the Rockies. We were made for each other, but you dance with them if you didn't care to?"

"How horrible."

She laughed softly.

"Our steps agree, you see, as well as ever," fanning her softly. "Have you forgotten what I sounded when they brought me back again. This is this waltz. Every note of it is engraved on my house, reported that he distinctly heard this extra blushes that rose to her face. "Let us go up. I cried, as we swept the fields behind us, 'I will break soul to you. 'If you do not say you will marry me,'

"You are always so hasty," she said. "You mind. It's the tune the world goes round to. Softly whispered Cauthorpe, bending his handsome head, "There used to be a little nook away above the dance of death with savage bears."

"I have a partner down for this dance," said the the girl, "and now, of course, the music's stopping, you didn't have such dancing in the Rockies?"

"This waltz," he cried, "ah! you must remember that I braved the dangers of the seas, that I braved my neck over this hedge.' But you did not answer, did you want to kill your partners? And why did I care to dance with."

"Stay with me," cried Cauthorpe. "You musn't frame a 'no,' and then I dug my spurs deep in, and and we galloped on side by side, and that great groom close behind me, and I took my second horse, and sadly at first, and that is how the little waves looked at your lips, and they seemed to be trying to less prosaic topics.

"Yes, it is a catchy tune," she said. "I suppose distant I suppose." She laughed to hide the minute to decide in,' I roared. 'Is it yes or no?' I never gave me time. Even now you don't know nothing but what happened three years ago."

"It was for you," he cried. "It was all for you checking the fountains of his enthusiasm, "why tire yourself for the hunting to-morrow."

"Do you remember when we sat here together before, I looked at you, and my soul went out and and rode like wildfire to the station, and caught the seats, completely hidden with palms.

"And you broke your horse's neck," said the girl. My partners were usually a little bit rough. Once that I don't know quite what happened."

"Ah, that was a gallop to remember. The madness of it went to my brain, and I poured out my chance. The babel of many voices came up from the dangers of the mountains, that I danced the wall, and watched them with envious eyes as they met yours. Don't you remember that?"

"You will break it," she murmured. "Men are so careless."

"Oh, bears," she murmured. "How you frightened me. I thought you meant women."

Cauthorpe was dancing with the handsomest girl three years ago?" he said, taking her fan, and mourned for me when they took me away from you. Cauthorpe's heart beat as a sledge-hammer. "After they began to hug you, you felt as though all your hurt feelings. A thousand recollections came just as we are enjoying it. It always does."

Cauthorpe threw himself back in his chair, a stern stair and looked at his partner's face.

"Ah, the hunting. You remember the last gallop went smoothly round to the soft music of the band. Had she no pity?

"Well, I saw you pass me in safety and ride on, found the nook that he remembered so well—two leaped for eternity."

A despairing partner, wandering wildly over the hedge came nearer and nearer. 'You have half a ordinary sentence from behind a clump of palms:

"It wasn't 'no,' but I do not say that it was 'yes.'"

"Wha-at, wha-at," he whispered hoarsely. "Was it 'yes' or 'no'?"

"You are getting into it again beautifully," said whether I said 'yes' or 'no.'"

"Let's go out before the crowd," said Cauthorpe.

Cauthorpe's colour changed. He bit his lip hard. she always checked him in that way.

Cauthorpe led his partner up the broad stairs, and music of the waltz became faster.

Cauthorpe, peering about in every direction, bones were breaking. And then if you couldn't get train to town, and so to America and the Rockies."

Cauthorpe stopped with his foot on the bottom below. Then, very softly the band struck up a sweet, and took her fan from it.

Cauthorpe ground his teeth hopelessly. She was really minded whether they talked of ices or of her rejected suitor. And he wondered whether she wondered whether she was only playing with him as treating him as a cat treats a mouse.

He put out his hand, but she moved away a little, been three years ago.

He leant forward again eagerly, forgetful of his hold of your revolver you were a dead man."

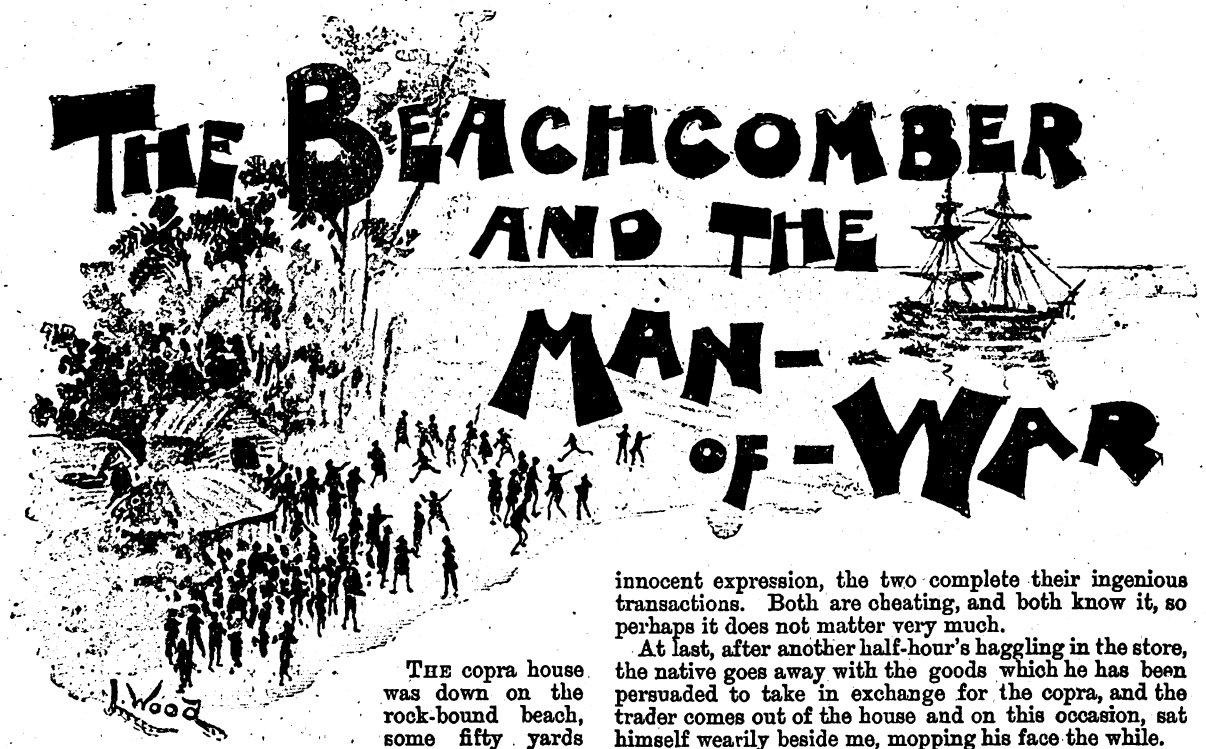
This time she did not try to snub him. She had much. There is only one woman in the world that girl. "I think I ought to go."

When he showed symptoms of becoming passionate she had done three years ago, when he had rushed away. But now she wanted him to talk to her.

Below them they could hear people moving. The look flashing into his eyes. She never gave him his we had together? By-the-way, we seem to talk of and then I scrambled to my feet, and found my away to the Rockies rather than remain at home as strongly upon him that day. It was all as it had been thinking that he had improved since he went dreamy waltz.

Digitized by Google

THE BEACHCOMBER AND THE MAN-OF-WAR



The copra house was down on the rock-bound beach, some fifty yards away from the shore, a stretch of uneven sandy soil, with grass patches here and there and great black rocks showing out from the surface, separating the two places where the trader did his business.

The copra house—the title is a misnomer, but it is always used in Samoa—was but a mere flimsy erection of rough boards, though iron-roofed and watertight. Further, the door was provided with a very substantial padlock, which the trader was at great pains to lock and unlock every time he visited the shed.

For the place held the only merchandise the country could produce—all that there was to trade for. The little bits of oily, brown, evil-smelling copra must be kept dry, or else they would rot long before the time came for shipping them to Europe. And they must be protected from theft.

Therefore, every time a Samoan came, perhaps with but a few baskets of the copra, the old trader, with a weary sigh, would take a key down from its accustomed nail, and plod down to the shed.

The first question that had to be decided was whether the copra was green, that is to say, whether it had been merely warmed in the sun, or whether it had been properly dried by several days' exposure. As the copra is bought by weight, it is, of course, to the native seller's interest to dry it as little as possible; whilst the trader, on the other hand, does not want to lose 20 or 30 per cent. by shrinkage.

At last the trader, grumbling somewhat, purchases the copra, for he knows if he does not, it will go to his rival close by. He is consoled by the reflection that his balances are twelve pounds out in every hundred. Also, he is an expert at weighing, and, by dexterously manipulating the scales can make the copra appear several pounds lighter than it really is.

And so, under the waving palms, by the side of the rippling lagoon, Nature smiling on them with her most innocent expression, the two complete their ingenious transactions. Both are cheating, and both know it, so perhaps it does not matter very much.

At last, after another half-hour's haggling in the store, the native goes away with the goods which he has been persuaded to take in exchange for the copra, and the trader comes out of the house and on this occasion, sat himself wearily beside me, mopping his face the while.

As usual he harked back to the old times.

"Things were different in those days," he said. "Then we could do as we liked with the natives: now they can do as they like with us. We have to cut things fine to make a living at all." And to console himself, he took a long drink of kava, emptying the cocoanut shell, which held about a pint, at one draught.

"The oil days were the times," he began, "before any one invented this copra, and we used to take oil from the natives in payment for everything. Why, even the missionaries used to have a big tank outside the church door and would take the collection in oil. It was gallons of oil instead of dollars then, but they got the money just the same in the end, and the church prospered."

His face clouded as he made this last remark. Perhaps he would have preferred the natives in their original barbaric state rather than civilised and christianised, and educated up to a standpoint of keen bargaining, which rendered it difficult for even the superior intellect of a white man to overreach them.

"I've made more money in a week then than I can do in a year now," he went on. "Forty years ago, when I was but a young fellow, I started trading on the southern side of Upolu. There was not a white man within twenty miles of me, and I could get any price I liked for an old uniform coat, especially if it had brass buttons on it. But a Tower musket, that was the thing.

"I had the place to myself for three years, and you may be sure I made a pretty good thing out of it. Wish I had some of the money left now. Then old Jack Wilkinson came along and settled down near me."

"But who was Jack Wilkinson?" I asked.

"Never heard of Jack Wilkinson—Old Jack as he was always called? Why, I thought everybody in Samoa knew of him. But he was getting to be an old man then, and he's been dead long since, and I suppose you young people have forgotten all about the old fogies.

Digitized by Google

"When he got drunk."

"Well, I'll tell you about Jack. He was a hard case, one of the regular old style beachcombers. He had been I don't know how many years in the group, and had grown to be almost like a native. He used to wear a lava-lava instead of trousers, just like a Samoan, and he could go about bare foot anywhere, even on a coral reef, and that's a thing few white men can manage without cutting their feet to pieces.

"They did say," and he lowered his voice unconsciously, "that he was one of a party of convicts who had escaped from Australia when it was a penal settlement. They stole a boat, and somehow found their way here and made themselves at home amongst the natives. But the story was only whispered between white men, and it would have been as much as one's life was worth to even hint at the thing to Old Jack. He was a handy man with his knife, and there were no police about to call him to account for his actions.

"I got along well enough with Jack, though I must say he had ways of dealing with the natives which I hardly approved of. They were afraid of him, though, and fed him on the best the land could furnish.

"Jack never did anything for them in return; he spent his days lying on a mat in the shade of one of their big, cool houses, open all round so that the breeze could pass through, and Jack could see all that was going on without even moving. Sometimes, when he was particularly energetic, he would go fishing on the reef, at low tide, when coral showed up high above the water, and it was easy enough to spear malauli, with long, three-pronged native spears.

"Still, I soon found it was to my interest to keep in with Old Jack. He got twice as much oil as I could for the same amount of trade, and though he was always abusing and ill-treating the Samoans, strangely enough they would take their oil to him rather than to me.

"I own that I could never quite make it out to this day, and no man knows the crooks and twists of the Samoan character better than I do. I cannot understand what gave Jack his extraordinary influence over the people. Though, to be sure, in the end they killed him on Manono; but I'll tell you about that some other time.

"So it happened that Jack became a sort of sub-trader or assistant, and would buy the natives' oil, giving them, in return, orders on me for so much trade. I paid him a good commission and I could afford to do it, for so long as Jack was sober he was the best hand at bargaining with the Samoans I ever saw.

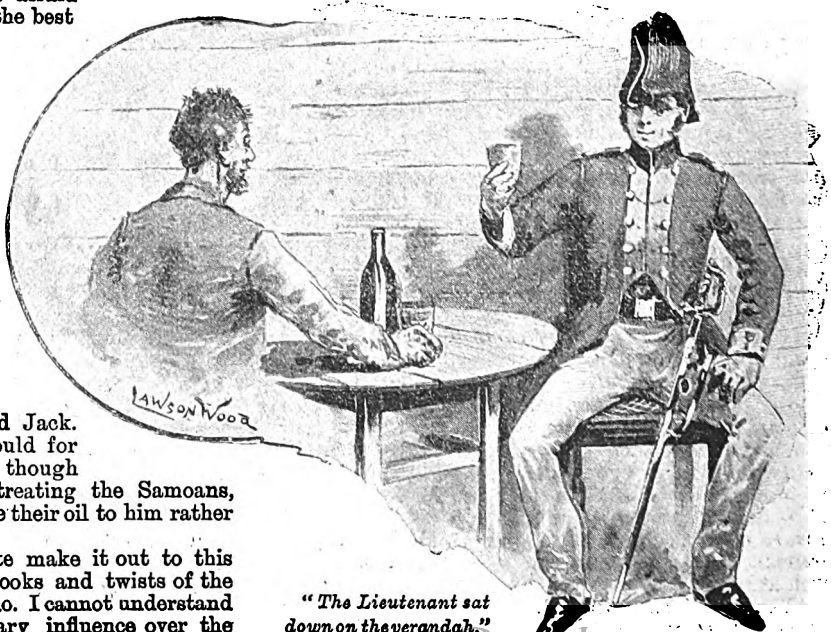
"But when he got drunk there was no holding him. I had to get a case of gin down from Apia now and again, or else Jack would never have stayed with me. Then he would go tearing wild for a week or two until it was all finished, and perhaps wind up by setting fire to a native house, or something like that. I had to pay for the damage, and then Jack sobered down and went along right enough for another month or two.

"It was this failing that had got the beachcomber into trouble at Tanuna, a village about twenty miles along the coast, where he had lived before coming to my place. The natives there had put up with him for a long time, but at last they got sick of the business, and the chiefs of the town turned dead against him, and gave him a week in which to clear out.

"For a long time Jack had been playing off an old beachcomber's bounce on the natives at Tanuna. Whenever they would turn a bit nasty he would threaten to bring a British man-of-war down on them, and have them well punished. This used to scare the people, for men-of-war were scarce in those days, and the Samoans had an almost superstitious awe of their guns.

"It's different now, for the natives have seen so much of modern war vessels that they've grown to despise them.

"They aren't afraid of being shelled either. Why, I've seen them over on Upolu when a man-of-war did actually fire on the rebels, sitting round smoking quite comfortable in the bush behind, whilst the shots were dropping into their villages, and doing no harm at all, except perhaps setting fire to a house or two. And



"The Lieutenant sat down on the verandah."

Digitized by Google

when, by pure accident, a shell did fall into a cook house and kill five men, they said that the victims had been stealing the missionary's ducks, or else they would not have been killed. Shows the benefit of religious teaching, doesn't it?

"Well, to come back to Jack, the man-of-war game at last got played out, because no man-of-war came, and the natives would not believe him any longer. Then he had to clear, but at the very last, when he was leaving, he told them that he would soon come back, with a big war canoe, and make them pay a heavy fine in pigs.

"The Tanuna people only laughed at him, but as it turned out, strangely enough, Jack kept his word. He had been at Salua about six months, when a man-of-war actually did come, not after the natives, but after Jack himself.

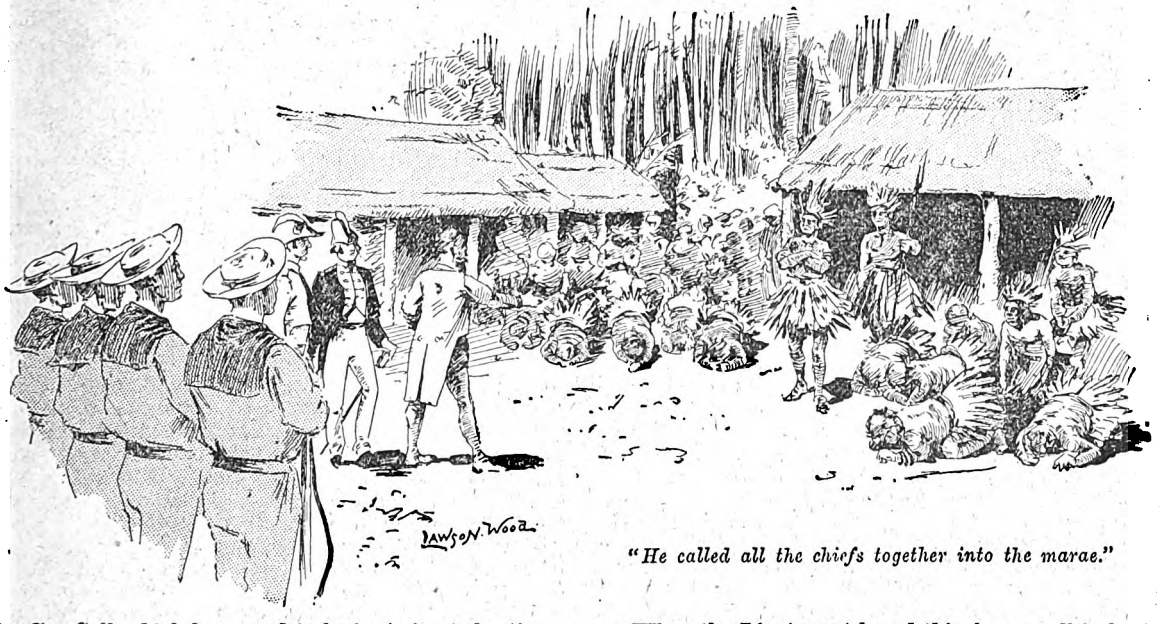
"The consul had, at last—for news travelled slowly then—heard of Jack's pranks at Tanuna, and had sent

"'Yessir,' said Jack, 'glad to meet you; step right in and make yourself at home.'

"So the Lieutenant sat down on the verandah, and Jack fetched out a bottle of gin, and they had two or three nobblers, quite sociable. The officer explained that he had come with a warrant for the arrest of John Wilkinson, whom the British Government wanted for murder, arson, and a whole host of other crimes.

"'Do I know the man?' says Jack. 'Why, he's the greatest scoundrel unhung, and he's ruining my trade by the lies he tells the natives. I only wish you would clear him out of Samoa.

"'Help you to catch him? Why, I should think I would, and so will every native in the town when they see the man-of-war here to back them up. The fellow was here last week, but he's gone to his old place, Tanuna, to try and get some pigs.'



"He called all the chiefs together into the marae."

the Sea Gull, which happened to be in Apia at the time, down to arrest him. It was a bad look-out for Jack, for there were enough crimes charged against him to hang a dozen men.

"I was out away in the bush, hunting wild cattle, when the Sea Gull arrived, and that saved Jack. That and his own smartness. The vessel dropped into the lagoon at Salua, early one morning, and anchored about a mile from the shore. Jack, from his own hut, saw her come in, and guessed what she was after.

"Presently she lowered a boat, and a lieutenant, all gold lace, came ashore in style. Of course, he went to my place, for it was the only papalangi house about, and I suppose they thought I would be able to tell them the whereabouts of Jack, having heard that he had been seen about Salua.

"When the Lieutenant opened the gate, there was Jack, as bold as brass, sitting on an easy chair upon the verandah, reading an old newspaper, and looking very much at home.

"'You are Mr. Williams, I suppose,' said the Lieutenant, as polite as possible, taking off his hat.

"When the Lieutenant heard this, he was all in haste to get away.

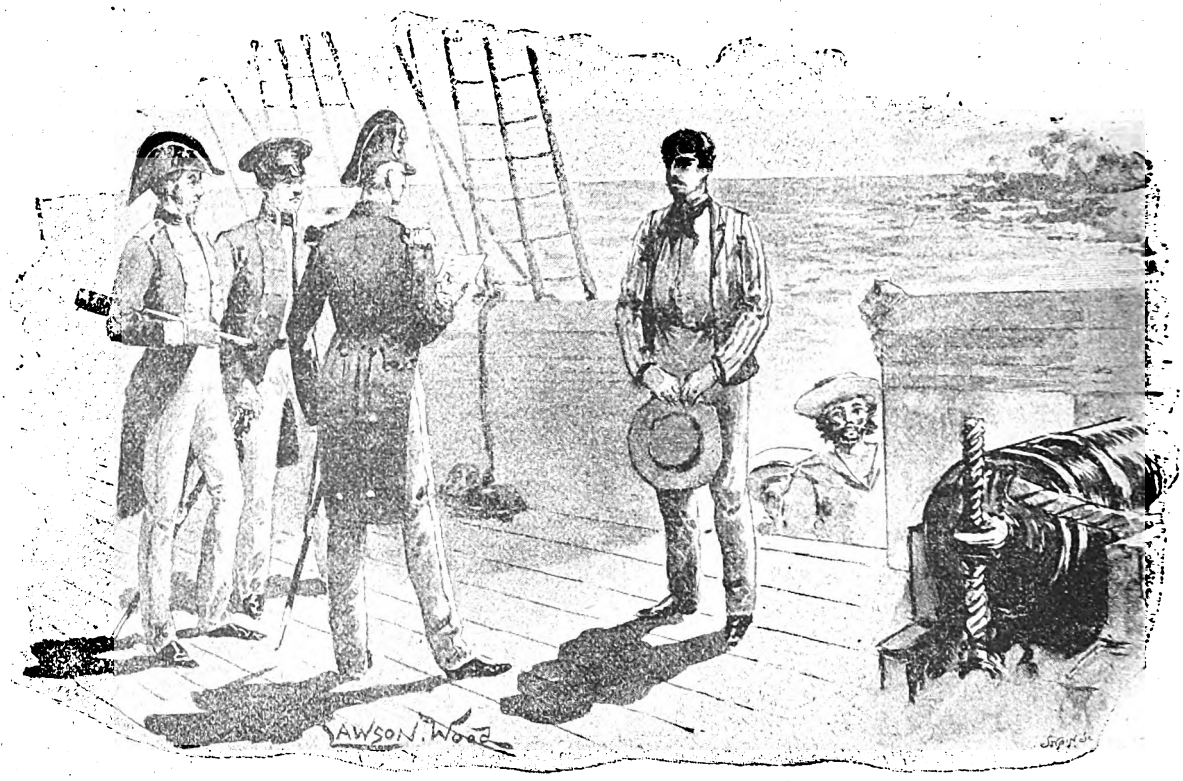
"'Don't be in too much of a hurry,' said Jack, 'you'd better go slow; it's a most dangerous passage, and the chances are ten to one you'll get stuck on a reef. But if you'll wait a minute while I close the store, I don't mind going with you and piloting you round—I'd do anything to get that wretch caught.'

"So, Jack, putting on my best coat, went off with the Lieutenant, and the Captain, knowing nothing of the coast, was very glad to accept him as pilot, and gave £5 for his services too.

"On the passage round Jack spun them a long yarn about the savage natives of Tanuna. They were terribly fierce, he said, always fighting, and Wilkinson would probably stir them up to attack the landing party, and so prevent his arrest. They ought to go ashore with a strong armed force, and, if possible, a field gun or two.

"The advice sounded reasonable enough to the Captain, and it was quite a little army which landed that afternoon. There was a whole barge-load of sailors and marines, all armed to the teeth, and a couple of small

Digitized by Google



"I gave the Captain Jack's letter."

cannons, which they pointed at the big round chief's house in the centre of the village.

"It was Jack's turn now, and he made the most of it. He called all the chiefs together into the marae—that's the open space in the centre of the village where they always do their talking—and held a long fono. The Lieutenant stood by all the time, not understanding a word of what was going on.

"Jack told the trembling Samoans that the great Queen Victoria, in her palace over the big seas, had heard of the way in which one of her people had been treated, and had sent the man who was to blow the village into the air, to hang all the chiefs, and to carry off the rest of the people as slaves.

"Naturally, the chiefs, seeing all these soldiers with their guns, believed every word of the yarn, and grovelled before Jack, imploring him at least to save their lives.

"The rascally interpreter explained to the Lieutenant that the natives wished to pay homage to the Queen, and that they would take steps at once to find out where Wilkinson was hiding.

"On the other hand he told the chiefs that he had interceded for them, and that the officer had promised to spare their lives if they brought, next morning, a whole boat load of pigs and yams and taro and bananas, all the food they could raise.

"After some more talk, just to cover up his deceit, Jack informed the Lieutenant that the man they were after had gone to a place a few miles off in the bush, but that the natives would send after him and bring him back in the morning.

"So the officer, well satisfied, took his men and his guns on board again, and Jack stopped with the natives, being treated now with the greatest respect.

"Next day he had the large village war canoe loaded up with pigs and fresh provisions of all kinds, and went off to do some business with the Sea Gull. As they had had nothing but salt horse on board for a month, the purser was glad to buy the food, and Jack pocketed £20 by the transaction. He didn't give the natives a penny of it, but told them the man-of-war would let them off this time if they would promise to behave themselves in future.

"Then he informed the Captain he had learnt that Wilkinson had gone across the mountains to Salua, and that, if he liked, he would pilot him back there.

"On the way, Jack thought of a new dodge. He knew that, by this time, I would have returned from the cattle hunting expedition, and that, if he went ashore with the officer, they would find out who he was. So he persuaded the Captain it was no use going straight into Salua with the ship, for Wilkinson would only run away again as soon as he saw her coming.

"'You land me,' he said, 'at a point about a mile this side of town, and then stand out to sea for the night. I'll walk into Salua, and tell Wilkinson you've abandoned the search and gone away. I'll keep him there for the night, and the next morning you can slip in quietly and arrest him before he has time to get away.'

"The land to the westward of Salua juts out in a long point, so that a vessel coming from this direction, if she keeps well in shore, cannot be seen until she is right off the bay. The man-of-war lay to on the other side of this point, and Jack, who knew of a handy boat-passage through the reef, was put on shore.

Digitized by Google

"In the afternoon he walked into my house and found me wondering where he had got to, as I wanted him to help salt down a fine cow I had shot.

"'Never mind the blanked beef,' he shouted, 'get the gin quick, or else I shall die of laughing.'

"He just held his sides and screamed for about half-an-hour, and then when he had swallowed a couple of stiff nips he told me all about it.

"I couldn't help laughing, too, though I did not half like being personated by such an old scoundrel, and besides, I was afraid I might get into trouble when the captain found out the trick. He might think I had been helping Jack to deceive them, and perhaps arrest me instead.

"I told Jack this, but he only laughed the more. Then I got angry, told him to clear out at once, or else I would give him up when the ship came back. But he wouldn't go for a long time, not until he had finished the bottle.

"And before he left he wrote a letter to the captain. He wouldn't let me help him, though he was not much of a scholar, said he wanted to have the joke all to himself. I kept a copy of the letter as a curiosity. This is what he wrote:

"Dere Captain—This is to thank you for your kindness in takin me for a passage to Tanuna any times you want a pilet I shall be glad to be of servis ef you want any more pigs my friend williams will suppli them. I am goin back to the bush, ef you want me you must fetsh me from their.—Your grateful servint,

"J. Wilkinson.

"Then he went off into the thick bush which covered the mountains in the exterior of the island, where no white man could catch him.

"Next morning I had to bear my share of the joke. When the Lieutenant came on shore he found me sitting on the verandah, just where Wilkinson had been a couple of days before. He made sure he had got his man.

"It was no use my explaining, so I was arrested and taken to the man-of-war, and I gave the Captain Jack's letter. He was mad when he read it, but then, like a gentleman, he saw the joke, though it was against him.

"'We've been sold,' he said, 'most horribly sold,' and then he told his officers and they all laughed.

"They treated me well on board when they found that I was innocent, and I got them some Samoans to guide the party which went into the bush in pursuit of Jack. But it was no manner of use their trying to catch him, even if the natives had not taken care to lead them astray.

"So, after fooling about in the bush for a couple of days, climbing up and down mountains, and nearly falling over a precipice, they gave it up, and the man-of-war sailed away."

"And did Jack get off, after all?" I asked, for I could not help sympathising with the cunning scoundrel.

"Oh, Jack," concluded the stranger. "He came back to my place after a while, and hung round for a month or two. But Samoa, he could see, was getting too warm, so he took the first opportunity of escaping to Fiji."

J. F. Rose Soley.

NOW ON SALE.

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE.

FEBRUARY, 1897.

6D. 6D

CONTENTS:

The Adventures of Captain Kettle. Cutcliffe Hyne.
No. I.—The Guns for Cuba.
(Complete Story.)
Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood.

The Gobelins. Marie A. Belloc.
Illustrated with Drawings and Tapestry Designs.
An interesting account of the tapestry works at Paris.

The Vagrant. Twells Brex.

Queen of the Jesters. (Complete Story.) Max Pemberton.
No. II.—The Liberty of the Little Red Man.
Illustrated by H. Piffard.

Artificial Eyes. M. Dinorben Griffith.
Illustrated by S. Nation.
The first authoritative account that has ever been written of the manufacture of glass eyes.

I Think of You. Hugh Cayley.

The Army Medical Staff and Corps, and their Work.
Illustrated with Photographs. Robert Machray.

A Prince of Swindlers. Guy Boothby.
(Complete Story.)
No. I.—The Duchess of Wiltshire's Diamonds.
Illustrated by E. F. Skinner.

Which is the Maddest Part of the Kingdom? J. Holt Schooling.
Illustrated with Diagrams by the Author.
Some remarkable statistics showing the distribution of insane people throughout the British Isles.

Please Don't. W. B. Power.

Is the House of Commons Necessary? J. Brand.

The Gentle Art of Killing. Randolph Murray
Illustrated by S. Nation and T. E. Donnison.

Leading Ladies of the Opposition. Ignota.
Illustrated with Photographs.
A bright chatty article, relating much of interest in connection with the personality and lives of the leading ladies associated with the work of the Opposition.

The Hulk on "The Billies." J. Aubrey Tyson.
(Complete Story.)
Illustrated by Frank Feller.

Wisdom Let Loose. W. L. Alden.
Illustrated by Charles May.

Flight-Netting for Wildfowl. L. Stanley Tree.
Illustrated with Photographs from Life by R. B. Lodge.
An account of a particularly exciting form of sport pursued on the coasts of Lincolnshire and Norfolk.

Captains Courageous. Rudyard Kipling.
Chapters V.-VII.
Illustrated by F. T. Jane and I. W. Taber.

Curiosities of our Coinage. R. S. Loveday.
Illustrated with Examples.
All the most curious coins that have ever been struck in this country are reproduced in this article, together with interesting particulars about them.

The first two volumes, each containing six numbers, bound in handsome covers, will be supplied post free for 6s. 6d. each. Cloth cases, price 1s. 9d., half Morocco 2s. 3d., post free, can be obtained on application.

Back Numbers can always be obtained through Newsagents, or direct from the Publisher.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER X.

The Verdict.

The secrets of the jury-room are little understood. Doubtless this is because all the more intellectual classes are exempted, by a beautiful provision of our law, from serving on juries, and the remainder have not yet produced a man competent to chronicle his experiences.

The Mynyddshire jurymen were very much like their brethren all over the country. They had sworn a solemn oath to well and truly try, and true deliverance make, between our Sovereign Lady the Queen and the prisoner at the bar, and they honestly tried to act up to their obligation.

Mr. Jenkins, the Queen Street stationer, was among them, and his first words, after the door was closed on them, were:

"Well, I don't know what you think, sir, but I couldn't make out whether he was for her or against her."

The person addressed was the foreman, a rich building contractor from a large seaport at the end of the county. He was a man of judicial mind, a model foreman, and wisely abstained from committing himself at this early stage. He turned round and asked his next neighbour, who happened to be the farmer from near Porthstone, whose remarks to Mr. Jenkins were given in the fourth chapter:

"How did it strike you, sir?"

"I thought he was against her," was the answer. "Didn't you hear him say: 'The prisoner must suffer by that line of defence?' And then he didn't say nothing about reasonable doubts."

"No; but the young barrister did—the one that prosecuted," observed a tall, thin man, a tailor by trade.

"He's got nothing to do with it," said the farmer. "I thought him a fool all along. I know his whole family, and they're all alike."

"What a terrible speech Mr. Tressamer made," ventured a fifth juryman, a short, stumpy watchmaker from Porthstone itself. "I believe he's her lover."

"What!" cried the foreman, losing his calm demeanour in the presence of this interesting revelation. "How d'ye know that?"

"Oh, it was common talk in Porthstone," was the answer. "They knew each other ever since they was children, and he used to come down every summer and go about with her. That's what made him so fierce against Mr. Lewis, you may depend."

"And did you know her?" "What was she like, really?" "What did you think of her?" broke from several voices as the whole jury clustered round the little man.

But he drew in his horns at once.

"Don't ask me anything," he said. "I've mended her watch, and I always thought she was all right up to this, but the Lord only knows whether she did it." He paused, and then, as if there were some vague connection in his mind between this charge and the general disposition towards acts of dishonesty, he added: "She always paid me regular."

Perhaps the jury scented an underlying distrust in this. At any rate one of them said:

"I watched the judge carefully all through, and I saw him frown at her several times. To my mind he meant us to say guilty."

The word came with a little shock to the men. They instinctively realised its terrible gravity as falling from their lips. The tall, thin tailor put in his word again:

"Anyhow, he said there was no evidence of motive."

"Except the jewels," corrected the farmer.

"Ah, but there was nothing came out about them."

"Phoo! that there was. Didn't you see how her counsel was fighting to keep it back? You may depend she knew all about them, and could tell us where they are now if she liked."

Digitized by Google

"You seem to have made up your mind," said another man, who had been talking aside to a little knot of three; "but for the life of me I couldn't make it out one way or the other. What did you think he meant about that latchkey?"

This was offensive. It was reminding them of their weak point. It threw the whole room into confusion. Eight or nine of the jury all began to speak at once, and four or five could find no listeners.

When the hubbub had a little subsided, the foreman said: "Gentlemen, it's no use talking it over in this way. We must argue it out one at a time. I propose that we all sit round the table, and the one that has anything to say stands up and says it properly."

This suggestion was well received, but it had a fatal effect on three of the jury, who were wholly unable to attempt anything so much like a set speech as this course involved.

As soon as all were seated the foreman commenced: "Gentlemen, this is a doubtful case, a very doubtful case. Talk of reasonable doubts, there's nothing but reasonable doubts, so far as I can see, from beginning to end. Now, it would have been a great help to us if the judge had showed us which way he thought we ought to go, but I confess I couldn't tell to which side he meant to lean. If any other gentleman thinks otherwise, we shall be glad to hear him."

But no other gentleman thought otherwise. The man who had thrown out the suggestion about the latchkey, and who was a fishing-boat proprietor from a seaside suburb of Abertaff, murmured from his seat: "I call it a shame. I should like to know what a judge is for. We might as well try the case ourselves as this."

"So we are trying it, aren't we?" rebuked the man who had been the first to blurt out the fatal word, and who was a farmer from near the same place.

"You may be, Mr. Rees," returned the boat proprietor, with what was intended for biting sarcasm.

"Come, gentlemen, gentlemen," said the foreman impressively, "let us remember that we are engaged on a case of life and death. We have got to come at the truth somehow, and we must do what we can by ourselves."

"They should have given us more evidence," objected Mr. Jenkins. "What did they want to make so much fuss about those jewels for?"

"Aye, and there was another thing," said the Porthstone farmer. "Did you notice that when Mr. Lewis wanted to say why he suspected her, the judge wouldn't let un?"

"Well, she's an orphan," said the tailor, "and her father was rector of Porthstone for thirty years, and I say we ought to let her off."

"For shame, John," said the watchmaker, who happened to be his next-door neighbour. "Don't you know we've got to decide according to the evidence?"

The tailor hung his head.

Then the foreman interposed again.

"Really, gentlemen, I think it will save time if we go round the table and let each man express his opinion in turn. Of course, I don't say his final opinion, but just any remarks that strike him on the evidence. Will you begin, sir?"

Mr. Jenkins rose from his seat on the foreman's right and cleared his throat.

"Mr. Foreman and gentlemen, I think this is, as our foreman has told us, a case of very great doubt. At the same time, it is our duty to punish the guilty, and not let the prisoner off simply because she is a woman, and good-looking, and that sort of thing." (Subdued applause. The foreman raises his hand for silence.) "Now, what I look at in this case is the motive, and that is, I take it, the jewels. I don't believe she would have done it simply on the chance of getting something under the will. I don't know whether you remember, but the judge said Miss Lewis might have parted with the jewels, because they weren't found after her death. Now, it seems to me that that points just the other way. I mean, it looks as if she had been murdered for the sake of them. It seems to me the only question is: Who murdered her? Was it Mr. Lewis or was it Miss Owen? That's my difficulty."

He sat down. The farmer, who sat next him, stood up in turn.

"I say what the judge said—let us decide according to the evidence. Now, what evidence is there against Mr. Lewis? Why, you say the judge didn't speak out clearly, but he did say there wasn't any evidence against him. All the evidence is against her, and we ought to act upon it."

The next speaker was a rather young man, who occupied a position of superintendence in a large millinery establishment, exclusively patronised by ladies. With such associations he was naturally disposed to be chivalrous. He said: "I know a lady when I see her. Miss Owen's a lady; anyone can see that with half an eye. As for Lewis, I didn't like the looks of him at all. You know they're a wild lot out in Australia. I heard that he came back for good reasons if the truth was known. Then look how he lost his temper in the witness-box! And then, as Mr. Tressamer said, the very night he got there the murder happened. That looks as if he did it. He said she didn't give him a latchkey, but I believe she very likely did, else why did the barrister ask him? And then look at the hand being cut off. No young lady would go and do such a thing as that, surely!"

The jury were impressed. The next man was of a shy and gentle disposition. He did not venture to get on his feet, but threw out a suggestion as he sat: "I suppose it must have been one of the two. There couldn't have been somebody else, could there?"

A withering look from eleven faces rewarded this disconcerting query. The foreman expressed the general feeling: "Really, sir, I can't think what ground you have for suggesting such a thing. The case is difficult enough as it is, without having fresh doubts raised."

"Ah, there ought to have been a London detective brought down," muttered another juryman, who had taken little part hitherto. "One of them would have puzzled it out, you may depend."

"Well, I don't see what more you would have," said the other farmer, Rees, rising in his turn. "Here is this young woman, sleeping in the next room, going out at night secretly, under some pretence of headaches—why didn't she tell other people about them beside that chemist?—and here you have her mistress murdered, and the blood found on the door of her own room the next morning. What more do you want?"

He sat down. It was now the tailor's turn.

"And how do you know Lewis didn't put the blood there?" he asked. "I believe it's Lewis myself. Anyway, one of them must have done it, that's clear."

But this was felt to be a weak defence, and the next two jurymen shook their heads, and professed themselves unable to throw any light upon the question. Then it was the turn of the boat proprietor.

"Look here," he said, "what's the good of our trying to come to a verdict when we're none of us sure which of them did it? Better give it up, and tell the judge we can't agree."

But the foreman would not hear of this.

"No, sir," he said, "we are here sworn to do justice between man and man, and mete out punishment to the guilty, and we must not shrink from our task. We have heard the case through, and if we are not competent to give a verdict on it, who is?"

This was felt to be unanswerable. Not only were the foreman's words worthy of attention in themselves, but he was a great man, the reputed possessor of twelve thousand a year; he wore a frock coat and a white waistcoat as well, and his word was, therefore, practically equivalent to law.

There remained only the watchmaker. He felt a friendly feeling towards the prisoner, but he was troubled by real misgivings as to her innocence.

"The judge said we oughtn't to go against Mr. Lewis," he said, "and I stand by what the judge says. Besides, I look at what he said when he gave her in charge."

"What was that?" said the foreman eagerly.

"I'll tell you, sir. It was in the paper at the time, and I happened to keep it by me, and so when I was summoned as a juror, thinks I to myself: 'This may come in useful if I should happen to be on the jury that's to try her,' so I just cuts it out and brings it in my pocket."

The other men looked on keenly, as he slowly drew out his pocket-book and extracted a newspaper cutting, embracing some two and a half columns of the SOUTHERN DAILY NEWS. Everyone hoped that something of a decisive character would now be forthcoming.

The watchmaker ran his finger down the columns.

"Here it is!" he exclaimed, and read it aloud.

"'On reaching the police station, of which Constable Smithies was then in charge, Mr. Lewis said: "I charge Eleanor Owen with the murder of my aunt, Ann Elizabeth Lewis. I have made some money, and, please God, I'll spend every penny of it rather than my poor aunt shall remain unavenged."

"'Constable Smithies at once summoned Sergeant——' that's it," concluded the watchmaker, looking up from his extract.

A murmur and shaking of heads followed, and the foreman again felicitously voiced the general feeling:

"That doesn't sound like guilt," he said with emphasis. "May I see that paper? Perhaps it has some other things which we have forgotten."

"Certainly, sir. But I don't know whether we ought to be reading this," hazarded its owner, handing the slip across.

"Why not? We're only doing it to refresh our memory."

This reply was again felt to be worthy of its author. It had a fine flavour of legality about it, too, which gave confidence to the other jurymen. They realised that they were fortunate in their foreman.

That gentleman meanwhile proceeded to glance down the document before him. Presently he stopped, frowned, pursed up his lips, and breathed a stern sigh. The others watched with anxiety. He proceeded to enlighten them:

"Gentlemen, listen to this, and tell me what effect it has on your mind. Sergeant Evans said: 'I arrested the prisoner on the morning of the second. I told her she was charged with the wilful murder of Ann Elizabeth Lewis. She turned pale and said: "It is impossible." I cautioned her. She said nothing more, and shed no tears.' Gentlemen, is that like innocence?"

He laid down the paper. The prisoner's doom was sealed. The waverers among the jury went over at once, and even the friends of the prisoner no longer dared to hold out. The tailor would have resisted if he had dared, but his sense of social inferiority was too much for him. What was he, a humble little tradesman, to set himself against eleven men, headed by a wealthy contractor who wore three spade guineas on his watch-chain.

Then a solemn awe settled down over the faces of the twelve men. They did not hesitate in doing what they believed was their duty, but they felt some natural horror of the result. At last the foreman said:

"Gentlemen, are we all agreed?"

And, as there was no reply, he led them back into court.

They had not been out quite an hour, but the interval seemed terribly long to those they left behind.

When they came in one by one, with drooping heads and set faces, the verdict was read before it was heard. Only the prisoner still held out, with that obstinate unbelief in the worst which is a part of strong natures. Only the prisoner and the prisoner's counsel. He manifested no sorrow and no surprise. Prescott put his stoical calmness down to over-exhaustion, others of the Bar attributed it to his confidence in the point reserved. The public hardly noticed him. Their eyes were fixed upon the dock.

The Clerk of Arraigns stood up, and went as best he could through the tedious process of calling each juryman by name. Then followed the routine question, followed by the awful word, heavy with issues of death, pealing forth through the hushed, agitated hall.

"Guilty!"

The prisoner neither moved nor answered, as the Clerk formally summoned her to declare if there were any reasons why sentence should not be passed upon her. Some of the women whispered that she had gone mad, or that she was going to faint. The judge covered his wig with the sombre square of silk.

Suddenly she looked up, cast her eyes rapidly round the court, and fixing them full on Prescott, who was attentively watching her, she exclaimed:

"I am not guilty."

"Eleanor Margaret Owen, the jury, after a long and patient hearing, and after taking time for careful deliberation, have found you guilty of the crime of wilful murder. What motive inspired you to commit such a crime I cannot say, and it may, perhaps, never be known. It only remains for me to discharge my very painful duty, which I do by declaring that the sentence of the court upon you is——"

The details followed. The words are too familiar to need setting forth. They sounded in unconscious ears. Eleanor Owen had fainted at last, and was carried helpless and lifeless away from the scene of her long martyrdom.

CHAPTER XI.

THE PRISONER'S STATEMENT.

THE day after the trial Tressamer went with confident mien to the prison for the purpose of having an interview with Eleanor as to the appeal of which he had given notice.

The governor at first hesitated about permitting this. The prison regulations forbid intercourse with a convict, except under certain rigorous limitations; but the name and function of counsel prevailed, and a warder was sent to fetch the prisoner.

Presently he returned alone, with the startling message that Eleanor positively refused to hold any communication whatever with her late advocate. Tressamer left the gaol with the air of a beaten man.

In his dismay he bethought himself of Prescott, and hurried to the court-house to find him and get his advice. He was there, but he was busy in a case then before the Nisi Prius Court, and it was not till late in the afternoon that Tressamer could get a word with him.

The case had been decided in favour of Prescott's client, and he strode into the robing-room with a little natural elation. But no sooner did he catch sight of his friend, who was waiting for him there, than his whole manner changed, and a stern expression settled round the corners of his mouth.

It was their first meeting since the result of Eleanor's trial. They were alone in the room, and Prescott at once addressed the other:

"Tressamer, what have you to say for yourself? I told you yesterday that I should hold you responsible. You disobeyed my advice, and that of everybody else. You set the judge and jury against you, and the result is what you were told it would be. I gave you fair warning, and I tell you now that, unless you have some reason for your conduct of which I know nothing, I cannot look upon you as a friend."

Tressamer pinched in his lips hard as he listened to this.

"I might have expected it," he said. "We all know that love is stronger than friendship. The first woman that likes can break up the strongest attachments of some men."

Digitized by Google

"Silence!" cried Prescott. "I am not going to bandy retorts with you. Ever since we were boys I have liked you and befriended you, and borne with your waywardness. You have outraged all your other friends long ago, but I bore with everything till now. But this is too much. Where a life is at stake, to indulge in your freaks of eccentricity! It is murder morally. What are you better than the man who killed that wretched woman?"

Tressamer shook with anger.

"Be careful, Prescott! I will stand a great deal from you, but you are going too far now. You know as well as I do that her life is in no danger. What is old Buller's opinion worth on a criminal case? Wiseman is worth ten of him, and he is in our favour. The C.C.R. will save her."

"Wretched man! Have you no heart, no moral sense, that you talk like that? As if a mere escape on a technical point could give any comfort to a woman like her! One would think you were wanting in some ingredient of human nature. What does Eleanor herself say?"

"I haven't seen her," was the muttered reply.

"Haven't seen her! Then go at once, and get her authority to appear."

"I have been to the prison, but she won't see me. I suppose she is ill."

A look of positive pleasure crossed the face of the elder man.

Eleanor Owen had fainted at last.

"Ill—no, but innocent!" he exclaimed. "I can understand her refusing to see you. You have played with her life for the prize of infamy, and you deserve that she should discard you. This is the best thing I have heard yet. Why, I could almost forgive you now for telling me. I will go this instant and offer my services: they will be those of a plain, honest man."

And, flinging off his wig and gown, he rushed out of the place in a very unwonted state of excitement.

Tressamer was left, bewildered and enraged, to curse his own folly in betraying his defeat to a rival.

* * * * *

When Eleanor was summoned by the gaoler to see Mr. Prescott, she at first thought there must be some mistake.

"Are you sure you don't mean Mr. Tressamer?" she asked.

"No; he said Prescott."

A faint smile rose in her face. She eagerly assented to the interview, and in a couple of minutes the two were closeted together.

At first there was a brief, awkward silence. Then Prescott broke it by speaking in calm, precise words:

"It is nearly five years since we met, Miss Owen, but I hope you have not quite forgotten me."

"No, indeed," she answered; "but you should have forgotten me. I know I ought to thank you for this visit, and for dealing so leniently with the case yesterday, but I cannot find the right words. It is all so strange—so terrible and so strange."

Prescott was afraid to look at her, lest the tears should come into his eyes.

"Don't thank me, please. I wish I could forgive myself for taking that wretched brief at all. I can only say I did so for fear it might fall into the hands of some abler and bitterer prosecutor. The solicitors were your enemies."

"Yes; I refused their services. I have wondered since if I was wise. It was Mr. Tressamer who advised me."

"And why? Why did you trust yourself so entirely to that man? But I forgot. I believe you are or were engaged."

Eleanor raised her eyes, and looked long and searchingly at her questioner. Suddenly she said:

"Before I tell you, why did you come here—for any special object, I mean?"

"Yes. I came, hearing you had refused—and in my opinion rightly refused—to see Mr. Tressamer. I came, taking the privilege of an old friend of your father's and your own, to ask if I might appear for you in the court to which your case is being taken."

"Ah, then there is a Providence. I am not quite deserted!"

She spoke in half irony, and then all at once broke down and began sobbing as if her heart would break.

"Miss Owen!—don't, Eleanor!" cried her friend in alarm and distress. "Do try and be calm. All will end happily yet, believe me. I swear to you I will never rest till your innocence is established by the discovery of the real criminal, and the stain removed from your character!"

For some time she wept on without replying. At last the sobs grew feebler, and she lifted her head.

"Oh, if you knew," she said, "what I have gone through these last two months—no, I ought to say these last two years, since my father died, and that you are the first to speak to me in tones that I can trust, you would not wonder that I weep. Sometimes I have felt it too much to bear, and I have actually thought before now of writing to you to tell you all my troubles."

"To me! Why, do you—are you——"

She checked him gently.

"To you, as to my oldest friend, whose memory I could recall with trust and confidence. I am speaking now of a time that has passed. Now I shall never consent to claim anyone as my friend—if I live—until this horrible stain has been wiped off my name."

"I will wipe it off. Only trust me fully meanwhile, and if you won't claim my friendship, at least so far rely on it as to unburden yourself to me freely. Tell me all, because I feel that you may hold in some way the clue to this mystery. I cannot think that all the circumstances piled up against you were purely accidental, and I must know everything before I can see my way clearly."

She shook her head doubtfully.

"I am afraid that my story will not throw much light on the murder. Indeed, I fear I am abusing your kindness in troubling you with my affairs. It is a father-confessor I want, not a lawyer." And she smiled faintly.

But Prescott was in earnest, and at length he persuaded her to speak. Making allowance for some repetitions and some slips of memory, her story was something like this:

"When my father died I was only seventeen. In spite of his being rector, we had lived a very retired life and seen few visitors. The only people I knew at all intimately were Miss Lewis and the Tressamers.

Digitized by Google

"Miss Lewis had been in the habit of inviting me to her house ever since I can remember. She used to give me valuable presents too. In fact, she treated me more like a niece or some near relation than a mere acquaintance. I can never forget her kindness—never, never!"

She had to stop a moment or two to overcome her emotion.

"I dare say you remember as much about the Tressamers as I could tell you. You know that I was constantly at their house. George Tressamer and I were always friends, and he showed me great kindness when I was a mere child. I remember I used to look forward to his coming home for the holidays. Neither of us had any brothers or sisters, and so we were more ready to seek each other's company, I suppose.

"But I never quite understood him. I could see, even at an early age, that there was something in his feeling towards me quite different from ordinary friendship. And yet it was only friendship that I felt for him—yes, even to the very last, I assure you. I never felt for him any warmer feeling than gratitude and affection.

"When my dear father died, I was at first in despair. Only two people would I listen to—my aunt Lewis, as she liked me to call her, and George. My own relations were all far away. I had never seen them, and they were too poor to do anything for me. So when Miss Lewis offered me a home I had no choice but to accept. And I was very, very grateful for it.

"But in the meantime George had shown me a great deal of kindness. He came down from London on purpose, directly he heard of my father's death. He made all the arrangements for the funeral, and wound up all my father's affairs. I believe he must have paid some money out of his own pocket, as I know my poor father always spent every penny of his income, and was often hard pressed for money. But there were no demands ever made on me. All the things I expressed a wish for were saved, and after the rest were sold, and all debts settled, George brought me a sum of two hundred pounds, which he said was mine."

Prescott frowned thoughtfully, and drummed with the toe of his boot on the floor.

"I suppose he didn't give you any accounts?" he said.

"No; I never asked for any. I felt sure that my father couldn't really have left me so much as that, and I told Miss Lewis I thought so. But she seemed to think it was all right, and I really was too distressed at his death to think much about money matters, one way or the other.

"Well, that wasn't all. Not only did he see to these business affairs for me, but he did everything he could to console me besides. He brought me books to read, he persuaded me to go for walks, and, in fact, he succeeded in making me get over my first grief sooner than I had thought it possible. The result was that I came to rely on him very much. I looked for him constantly, and felt a disappointment if a day passed without bringing him to see me.

"This was in the vacation time. At last he had to go up to London, and left me feeling very lonely. He offered to write to me, and I was glad to accept. We corresponded the whole term, nearly every week, and at Christmas he came down again.

"By this time some months had gone by since my father's loss, and I was beginning to recover my ordinary spirits. George saw this; he gave me more of his company than ever, and finally, before the Christmas holidays were over, he told me that he loved me.

"You will think I ought to have been prepared for this. Perhaps another girl would have been, but I can only say that it took me completely by surprise. You see, I had never known any other young man at all intimately, and George I had looked upon more as a brother than anything else. When he spoke of love, my first feeling was one of annoyance and fear. I shrank from answering, and when he pressed me I asked him to let me have time to think it over. He wisely dropped the subject, and before we got home he was chatting to me as familiarly as ever.

"The result was that I began to think that the love which he offered me was nothing very deep, but only a warm friendship like what I felt for him. Then I reflected on my own position, as an orphan, dependent on one who was no relation and might cast me adrift at any moment. I realised what a loss it would be to be deprived of George's friendship. I had never really felt anything that I could call love for anyone else, and, in short, I reconciled myself by degrees to the idea. At Easter of that year I accepted him.

"In all this I had made one great mistake. I thought George's feeling towards me was a mild one. The moment we were engaged I found the very opposite.

"When I first uttered the words which gave him the right to do so, he clasped me to him with a transport which frightened me. It was actually fierce in its intensity. He lost all that studied control which he had maintained for so long, and fairly gave himself up to the intoxication of his passion. Had I dreamed what his state of feeling really was, I don't believe that I should ever have promised myself to him. But it was too late to draw back. He had obtained a power over me, from which I shrank, but of which I had no right to complain. I became in a sense his slave, and he did with me what he chose.

"From that moment, unhappily, my own feelings towards him underwent a rapid change. I ceased to look forward to his coming. I got in time to actually dread it. Instead of taking pleasure in his society, I feared him. I disliked the little tokens of proprietorship which are common in the case of an engaged couple. I did not even tell Miss Lewis that we were engaged, though I believe she looked upon it as an understood thing. In fact, I suppose it would not have done for me to see so much of George otherwise. Neither did I dare to tell her of the aversion which had begun to replace my former feelings towards him. To tell the truth, I was ashamed of it. In common gratitude, after all George had done for me, I ought not to have allowed myself to feel so. I did try to check it. I told myself of all his good qualities; I recalled how long I had known him, and how friendly we had always been. But it was no use.

"Sometimes he seemed to realise that I was alienated by his passionate displays. Then he would return for awhile to his old manner, and be cheerful and cynical with me. Then my confidence in him returned, and I enjoyed his company. But this would not last long. When I was least expecting it, he would break into a chain of what I can only call love-frenzy, and disturb me more than ever.

"It was impossible for me to hide what was going on in my mind from him always. He began to find out that I avoided him. Instead of openly coming and calling for me to go out with him, he took to lying in wait, as it were, and joining me when I was out by myself. Of course, nothing was said between us. I did not complain of his stratagems, and he did not complain of my excuses; but I think we understood each other.

"Then he managed to get Miss Lewis on his side. He used to come into the room where we both were and give me an invitation for a walk or sail or other excursion in his company, and if I tried to get out of it, he appealed to Miss Lewis to give me leave, and, of course, she then urged me to go. The way in which he went to work inspired me with a queer sort of admiration for him. I thought that he showed powers of intrigue that would have made him a great man if he had been able to apply them on some vast stage."

"Yes, yes," said Prescott, as she paused a few moments for breath; "he has great ability, strange powers in many things, but——"

Digitized by Google

£150 CASH PRIZES FOR £150

SAINT VALENTINE'S DAY.

TO BE GIVEN AWAY to Purchasers of our Celebrated UMBRELLAS (Ladies' or Gents'), made in two qualities only, price, carriage free per return, 2s. 9d. and 4s. 9d.

Our "SCOTT" UMBRELLA at 2s. 9d. is a Marvel of Cheapness, being made of the finest material, the name SCOTT being sufficient guarantee of its durability.

Our "CITY" UMBRELLA at 4s. 9d. (Ladies' or Gents') is made of the Best Austria Silk, with strong handsome handles and framework, and is well known for its excellent wear, being equal to many sold at 10s. each.

SPECIAL SAINT VALENTINE'S PRESENT.

£150 IN FREE MONEY PRIZES.

First Prize, £30. Second Prize, £25. Third Prize, £20.
Fourth Prize, £15. Fifth Prize, £10.

THE REMAINING FIFTY POUNDS

will be given to the person purchasing the Greatest Number of Umbrellas (either "Scott" or "City") before February 14th, 1897.

The above Prizes are awarded to purchasers sending the most correct solutions of the following words representing eight articles of daily food:

1.—B * * * D.	3.—M * * T.	5.—P * * * * * * S.	7.—S * * * R.
2.—B * * * * R.	4.—T * A.	6.—C * * * * * E.	8.—M * * K.

DIRECTIONS.—Fill in the stars, one letter in each star, to represent an article of food. Copy those you can find out on a sheet of paper and post it, together with P.O. or stamps for 2s. 9d. or 4s. 9d., for whichever Umbrella you may select, and a stamped directed envelope for Prize Results, etc., to

J. SCOTT, THE CITY UMBRELLA CO., 1, NOBLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

NOTE.—This Contest closes on February 14th, but orders should be sent as early as possible before then.

Umbrellas will be sent per return, together with a letter stating whether solutions are correct. Prizes will be dispatched on Tuesday, February 17th. The Prizes will be awarded in order of correctness. Should two or more send in correct solutions to the whole of the eight words, the £100 will be equally divided. We guarantee a Prize to every purchaser correctly solving the eight words. Any representative of the Press is invited to call and see the Prizes dispatched.

1/2 A MILLION 7/6 FULL DRESS LENGTHS TO BE CLEARED AT 6S

BLACK, NAVY, GREY, AND SEVERAL CHARMING SHOT EFFECTS

Patterns of the above, also SALE PRICE LIST, Post Free.

CLEARANCE PRICES quoted for Dress Goods, Mantlings, Suitings, Flannels, Flannelette, Calico, Shirtings, Blankets, Quilts, Sheets, Towels, Gloves, Corsets, Stockings, Handkerchiefs, Umbrellas, etc.

TREMENDOUS REDUCTIONS IN EVERY DEPARTMENT.

FIRST ORDER OPENED MONDAYS, WEDNESDAYS, AND FRIDAYS SENT FREE AND CASH RETURNED.

Send to-day for Sale Price List and list of Lucky Winners.

REMNANT BUNDLES (containing 12 yards), in long lengths—Dress Serge 12/-, Calico 3/6, Flannelette 4/6, Union Shirting 7/9, Flannel 8/9.

LUTAS LEATHLEY & Co., Dept. 130, ARMLEY, LEEDS.

OTTO-FREEZ

BEAUTIFUL TOILET SOAP.

Everyone should use it. It is so nice for the skin. VALUABLE COUPONS with every Tablet. Two Tablets sent post free 1/-.

THE OTTO-FREEZ CO., 66, High St., Camden Town, LONDON, N.W.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20

See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (250 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING Co., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS COCOA.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

WITH FULL NATURAL FLAVOUR.

"DRUNKENNESS"

CURED. A Lady having cured her husband secretly of intemperate habits, will gladly send particulars of the remedy on receipt of stamped envelope.—Mrs. S. S. BARRINGTON, 4, Featherstone Bldgs., LONDON, W.C.

TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, Mrs. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

BLACKHEADS or "Maggots," Pimples, Blotches, etc., immediately and permanently removed by my Skin Cleansing Lotion, "CUTISOLINE." Never fails. Hundreds of testimonials. Post free with directions, 1/6, 3/- and 5/-. AUSTIN LENNOX, Skin Specialist, 1, Shoe Lane, Fleet Street, LONDON.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free. Address L. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

JOLLY'S 'DUCHESS' PILLS.

POSITIVE CURE FOR ANÆMIA,

POVERTY OF BLOOD, etc.

A box containing 60 doses post free on receipt of 2/6. Address—

BRITISH DRUGGISTS LTD., 219, Oxford Street, LONDON, W.

Digitized by Google

He shrugged his shoulders, and turned a pitying eye on Eleanor. He had known Tressamer well enough to be able to understand her experience.

She went on again:

"Strange to say, you were the cause of our first open quarrel, about six months ago."

"I? How?"

"You know you had not been to Rivermouth for some four years or more. But I remembered you perfectly, and used always to ask George about you when he came down from London. At last, on this occasion, he happened to say he had a recent photograph of you. I got him to show it to me, and then I wanted to keep it. He objected; I persisted, and finally his jealousy was aroused.

"'You always liked Prescott better than me,' he said.

"'I haven't even seen him for five years,' I said. 'I remember him as an old friend, and I don't see why you should mind my taking an interest in him.'

"'Taking an interest!' he scoffed back. 'I wish you would take an interest in me. You have never asked me for my photograph, that I recollect.'

"But I needn't tell you all that we said. It ended in his accusing me of not loving him, and in my saying that he was at liberty to find someone else, if he was dissatisfied with me.

"But he—he would not take the release. He altered his tone all at once, and fell at my feet, protesting that he loved me above all others, and that nothing should ever separate us.

"So things went on, he alternately courting me and threatening me, I turning from coldness and dislike, and from dislike to detestation. But I hadn't the courage to break my bondage, intolerable as I sometimes felt it. Perhaps I should never have shaken myself free but for his own action in bringing things to a crisis. Our letters had been friendly for some time, and, at last, in the month of May, he threw out a suggestion in one that it was time to think of our marriage.

"I took no notice of this. He repeated it more distinctly. Then I wrote, objecting that I was far too young to think of such a thing for some time to come. He took the alarm, came down by the next train, and sought me out. We went together to a lonely part of the shore, and there we came to a full explanation.

"Don't ask me what passed between us. He may be able to tell you. I never can. Enough, that after four hours' agonised entreaty and storm on his part, and agonised endurance on mine, we parted. I told him I could never hold intercourse with him again on any footing, and left him apparently resigned. That was just two days before my friend was murdered.

"He left the place next day, and I did not see him again till after I had been lodged in prison.

"There he came to me, asking no return to the old relations, but simply the privilege of befriending and defending me in my fearful trouble. I was crushed by his generosity, and freely gave myself to his guidance.

"But even in that first interview he threw out a suggestion which shocked and repelled me. He seemed to take it for granted that the jury would convict me, and to rely upon getting me off on a law point. I told him that life would not be worth anything to me under such conditions, and in reply he hinted that his devotion would still be mine, if I cared for it.

"Since then you have seen how it has happened exactly as he foretold. Now, it seems a dreadful thing to say, but the suspicion has forced itself into my mind, and I cannot get rid of it, that he wished all along that I might be blighted in my reputation, and just be saved at the last from actual condemnation, so that I might be driven to take refuge with him."

She spoke these last sentences in a whisper, as if afraid to hear such suggestions even from her own lips.

Prescott gave a groan.

"Would to Heaven I could contradict you!" he said, "but I believe it myself."

And he related to her what had passed between his friend of old and himself. Then he went on to ask:

"By the way, can you tell me anything more about that night than what came out in court? It was you who went out the first time, I take it?"

"Yes, I had been quite unwell for some time, owing to my trouble with George Tressamer. After our final meeting I had a terrible headache, and could not sleep at all. I went out each night about the same hour, but I haven't the faintest idea where I wandered to or how long I was gone. I got a little sleep after I came in, towards the morning."

"And what do you think yourself of this man, Lewis?"

"I can hardly say. He has shown himself my enemy, and, of course, I cannot like him."

"But as to suspecting him?"

"Oh, dear no. I suspect no one."

"Not one of the servants—Rebecca for instance?"

"No. I haven't any inkling whatever as to who committed the crime."

"Well, I suppose I must leave you. I will do whatever is in my power for your deliverance, not merely from danger, but from disgrace, and if I fail I will never venture in your sight again."

(To be continued.)

RESULT OF "PICTURE STORY" COMPETITION, No. 1.

The winner of the £5 prize is Mr. W. Power, 123, Gordon Road, Castle Hill, Ealing.

£1 has also been forwarded to each of the following: T. D. McMurdo, 7, Walworth Terrace, Glasgow; Miss M. Cocks, 35, Pascoe Road, Lewisham; R. H. Lloyd, 24, Station Road, Northwich, Cheshire; E. J. Morgan, 17a, Selwyn Road, Upton Manor; Miss Armandale, The Vale, Polton, Midlothian.

RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION, No. 3.

The two guineas has this week gone to Mrs. E. Price, of 5, Acworth Street, Old Kent Road, S.E.

POST-CARD COMPETITION, No. 5.

Two guineas will be given to the reader who sends on the back of a post-card the best anagram on the words: Post-Card Competition. Date of closing, Monday, February 8th.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

A SOLID SILVER WATCH ABSOLUTELY GIVEN AWAY.

Can you read this:

A	S*L*D	S*LV*R	W*T*H	I	GN
*F	I	GU*SS	R*G*T	&	B*Y	A	CHN.

In order to introduce my name and catalogue into every household in the Kingdom, I undertake and guarantee to give away one of my "World-famed £2 2s. Silver Watches," Ladies' or Gentlemen's, to every reader who sends me the correct reading of above Rebus.

CONDITIONS.

That your answer to the Rebus is correct, and that you further undertake, if correct, to purchase one of my Solid Sterling Silver Chains.

N.B.—Please do not confuse me with any of these so-called manufacturers. I do not give rubbish, but my watches are warranted for 5 years, and are Sterling Silver, not partly silver, or as is known in the trade as 800 silver, and the chains are the best made, and of Pure Silver. Money returned if dissatisfied. Send at once, and address:

W. W. WADE,

Watch Manufacturer,

KING ST., HAMMERSMITH, LONDON.

FRILLED BUTTER MUSLIN.

FOR ARTISTIC HOME DECORATION.

White, Cream, Ecru, and 12 Art Shades. CURTAINS, frilled two sides and bottom, 3yd. long, 58in. wide, 6/9 per pair; 3½yd., 7/9 per pair. May also be had by the yard, 58in. wide, frilled both sides, 11½d. per yard. Sample Book of Plain & Figured Muslins sent on approval. ROLLER-BLINDS, edged with Lace or Fringe, from 5/6. Sample Book of Materials on approval. CRETONNES, TAPESTRIES, PLUSHETTES, ART SERGES, etc. Patterns on approval. Table Covers, Cushion Squares and Mantel Borders. Picture Book of Lace Curtains, Lace Blinds, Post Free.

H. GORRINGE & CO., 20A DEPT., NOTTINGHAM.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5, Sept. 1, £5, Oct. 1, £5, Nov. 2, £6. Dec. 1, £6. Jan 2 1897. £6.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

DEAFNESS CURED.

On receipt of stamped envelope, a lady who cured herself of Deafness and Noises in the Head, after fifteen years of suffering, will send to all afflicted free particulars of the Remedy, which is simple, safe, sure and inexpensive. Address—Mrs. C. E. AUSTIN, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

A SUM of from 10s. to 20s. per week offered for spare time to either sex, everywhere; work can be done evenings.—Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 92A, Aldersgate Street, London.

CORPULENCY CURED

By a simple inexpensive self-treatment, effecting a rapid and permanent reduction without change in diet. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. G. A. BOYD, 14, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 97, Strand, London.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 183B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.: 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

TOO STOUT

If you require a reliable remedy for the relief of superfluous fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills. No starvation required; you may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5lb. to 7lb. weekly. They are a harmless vegetable preparation; successful in the most stubborn cases, and improve health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, tasteless, and highly recommended. Prices, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., post free, plain wrapper. PROFESSOR F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full, perfect, natural Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. Highly approved and recommended by the Medical Profession. For testimonials, press opinions, and free particulars, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J." Oriental Toilet Co., 57, Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 29, Belvedere Rd., Lambeth, London.

All Wool Underclothing.

HAWICK HOSIERY is the BEST. Lamb's Wool Shirts and Pants, 3/6 each. Men's Socks, 1/6 each. Ladies' Stockings, 1/6 and 2/- each. CARRIAGE PAID.

THE TEVIOT TWEED CO., HAWICK, N.B.

JOHN JACKSON,

Skittle and Skittle Ball Turner,

113, PENTONVILLE ROAD, LONDON, N.

Hornbeam Skittles; Sycamore Skittles; Four Corners; American Pins; Cheese Ball, Warranted; Round Ball, Warranted; Lawn Bowls.

FRAMES LAID AND REPAIRED.

Price List on Application.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 10d.; ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; 2lb., 4s. 4d.; including tin and postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

THE GREAT COUGH REMEDY, # BRONCHONIA.

A Marvellous Remedy for Coughs, whether arising from Consumption, Bronchitis, or Asthma. Its efficacy is testified to by Eminent Physicians. Of all Chemists, 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per bottle. Post free, 2s. 9d., 4s. 9d., and 11s. 6d.—J. HOWARD & Co., 20 and 21, Queenhithe, LONDON, E.C. One Trial will prove its Efficacy.

IT WAS NOT THE CLIMATE.

"I have been well as to my general health"—so wrote the late Dr. O. W. Holmes a short time before his death—"but have had a good deal of asthma. The climate is cold and rough, but I have found much that is delightful about my residence in Boston (America). Perhaps, after all, the fault is not so much in latitude 42 as in age 82."

That was it. The wise thinker did not deceive himself. He knew that it is the wasting muscles that complain of the steepness of the hills, and the thinning blood that fancies the winters are colder than they used to be.

And it was not because Mrs. Amy Harvey had lost interest in her domestic affairs that she was led to say everything was a trouble and a burden. No; it was because she had lost her strength. Whether a duty is a burden or not depends on the back which has to carry it. Ah, dear me, how constantly experience enforces that lesson upon us. Then what keen concern we feel in the answer to the question: What will strengthen the quivering limbs? What will restore the vigour of the mind?

"All my life," says Mrs. Harvey, "I have suffered off and on from indigestion and weakness. I felt low and languid, with a disagreeable sinking sensation after taking my meals. I had no energy; everything was a trouble and a burden. As soon as I had partaken of food, no matter how light, I felt a fulness and a gnawing pain at my chest, as if something were tearing it.

"I also suffered much from nervous headache, and was often dizzy. My breathing was short, and if I exerted myself I was quite out of breath. As time went on I got extremely weak and could not attend to my work.

"I saw doctor after doctor, and was told by them that my ailment was owing to my food not digesting."

[The doctors were right. That was the trouble, and the only one. Yet instead of being a comparative trifle, as many shallow persons say, it is the most serious of all diseases. Of course, some of her food digested more or less fully; otherwise she could not have lived a fortnight. But the nourishment was never enough for the wants of the body. Hence the nervous headaches, the asthma, the sinking sensation, the dizziness, the gnawing pain, and the disabling weakness. The body under these conditions is like a house abandoned to decay. All goes to rack and ruin.]

"I took the doctors' medicines," continues this lady's plain account, "but my case was an obstinate one, and none of them seemed of any avail.

"In May, 1891, a neighbour told me of the benefit she had derived from Mother Seigel's Syrup. I got a bottle from Messrs. W. Fox and Son, Chemists, Bethnal Green, and when I had taken it two days I felt much relief. I continued taking it, and could eat and enjoy my food without having pain. I now gained strength and felt brighter than I had ever done in my life.

"Since then I have kept well, taking a dose or two of Mother Seigel's Syrup when I need it; and I find it always puts me right. You can publish this statement if you think fit. (Signed) (Mrs.) Amy Harvey, 19, 'J' Block, Dufferin Street, Bunhill Row, London, June 26th, 1896."

"In March, 1894," writes another, "I had a severe attack of influenza which left me extremely weak. I was troubled with indigestion and want of appetite. Having read of the wonderful cures made by Mother Seigel's Syrup I decided to try it. I got a bottle from Mr. Wm. Hy. Jones, the chemist in Caledonian Road. In two days I felt great benefit. I could eat, and food agreed with me, causing no pain. In a few days I was completely cured and well as ever.

"Since that time I have kept Mother Seigel's Syrup in the house as a family medicine, and it always relieves when any of us suffer from indigestion, etc. I have pleasure in making this statement, and you can publish it if you wish. (Signed) Geo. H. Barker, 44, Montpelier Road, Kentish Town, London, N.W., June 9th, 1896."

These excellent letters call for no explanation. Their sincerity and truth is plain on the surface. And when we remember that what the writers affirm of Mother Seigel's Syrup is also declared by thousands of others, the value of this remedy is established beyond question.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 424. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 13TH, 1897. [ONE PENNY.

AH! AH! THE MILDNESS OF THE SEASON HAS DONE THIS.

100,000 LADIES' LUXURIOUSLY HANDSOME, RICH DARK BROWN

OPOSSUM FUR NECKLETS.

The SHORT STORIES SPECIAL NECKLET COUPON. 13/2/97. On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above (carriage free this week only) to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

REDUCED Sale Price 3/6 each. Worth Double.

With Life Imitation Natural Head combined; a most elegant and soft fur, quite equalling in style anything offered at 15s. 6d. each, and for durability not to be surpassed. Similar to illustration.

All Orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post.

F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, Woodsley Road, LEEDS.

Telegraphic Address—"Eclipse, Leeds." Telephone No. 948.

1897 PROCLAMATION.

"OH, YES, REVENUES FROM ECONOMY ARE ENORMOUS."

The richest provision in knowledge made absolutely easy for the accumulation of this income. Write to Messrs. F. HODGSON & SON, Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds, who will provide you with full information, posting you free (if, when writing you mention this paper) a large, amazingly interesting, valuable, instructive, and detailed illustrated "Pioneer" Reduction Catalogue, showing you what you can save, what to buy, and where to buy Carpets, Mats, and Hearthrugs of every manufacture, including Wilton, Plush, Brussels, Velvet, Antique, Foreign and Furs, also QUEEN'S ROYAL HOUSEHOLD, PRUDENTIAL, ECLIPSE, and ALARM CARPETS and HEARTHRUGS (REGD.). Also Blankets, Curtains, Sheetings, &c., and a thousand other articles wanted in every household. (Copyright.)

REMARKS.—A lady customer writes complaining that we send out too large a Carpet for the money. Be this so or not, we send out no Carpet measuring less than 6ft. by 9ft.—even for 2s. 11d. TEST THEM. THEY WILL SURPRISE YOU.

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ALARM" CARPETS

(Registered). GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Sale Price 2/11 EACH. This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. WE WILL FORWARD DIRECT FROM THE LOOMS TO ANY ADDRESS ON RECEIPT OF AMOUNT. A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, THE LARGEST EVER SOLD AT THE PRICE.

Suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom. Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. A Rug sent with Carpet, 10d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER { 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs ... ... 7s. 3d. / 4 Carpets and 4 Rugs ... ... 14s. 3d.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly Examine and Compare these Carpets.

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON. 13/2/97.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom.

Cash returned in full if not satisfied. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post.

F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason, HYSON GREEN WORKS, Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ¼lb., 10d.; ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; 2lb., 4s. 4d., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEV N.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

10/6

THE JOHN NOBLE
Costumes & Dress Fabrics.

Worn by Ladies of every degree. Universally admitted to be

SUPREME VALUE FOR MONEY.

Two Gold Medals.

MODEL 647—Latest Half-Guinea design. Full fronted bodice shaped to back. New fashion sleeves. Tailor-made skirt. Price 10/6; safely packed and carriage paid 9d. extra. Skirt only 5/6, carriage 6d. extra.

NEW SEASON DRESS FABRICS.

Rich in colourings and designs. Serges (260 varieties), Homespuns, Tweeds, Velveteens, etc. A box containing 1,000 Patterns sent free. Ladies should send a post-card for JOHN NOBLE'S Latest Catalogue of Costumes, Linens, Dress Goods, etc.

GENUINE BARGAINS.

All purchasers during the next few weeks will be presented with a Special Art Souvenir, designed by Raphael Tuck & Sons, The Queen's Art Publishers.

COLOURS.—Black, Brown, Navy, Bronze, Ruby, Cinnamon, Myrtle, Petunia, Fawn, or Grey.

SIZES IN STOCK are 34in., 36in., and 38in., round bust (under arms). Skirts being 38in., 40in., and 42in. long in front. Larger or Special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

Bankers: London and Midland Bank.

Please mention "SHORT STORIES" when ordering.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

HAIR DESTROYED.

On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 26, Belvedere Rd., Lambeth, London.

DEAFNESS CURED.

On receipt of stamped envelope, a lady who cured herself of Deafness and Noises in the Head, after fifteen years of suffering, will send to all afflicted free particulars of the Remedy, which is simple, safe, sure and inexpensive. Address—Mrs. C. E. AUSTIN, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

CORPULENCY CURED

By a simple inexpensive self-treatment, effecting a rapid and permanent reduction without change in diet. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. G. A. BOYD, 14, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

February 13, 1897.

No. 8.

S.S. S.S.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 8.

Feb. 13, 1897.

NEWSAGENTS

S.S. S.S.

REGD.

ONE BOX

Dr. Mackenzie's Improved

HARMLESS COMPLEXION WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire; clear, fresh, free from blotch, blemish, coarseness, redness, freckles, or pimples. Post free for 4/6.—S. HARVEY, 5, Denman St., London Bridge, S.E. Half Boxes, 2/9. Use Dr. MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL TOILET SOAP. Deliciously and expensively perfumed, at all Chemists' and Stores, 1/- per tablet, 3 in box, post free 2/6. Absolutely harmless. Beware of imitations. Have Dr. Mackenzie's or none.

CAN YOU WRITE?

Of course you can! Why not then emboss your Notepaper, etc., with a pretty Monogram? using the

Patent Pocket Monopresse

Every Initial and Monogram kept in stock. Monograms of one or two letters, 9d. each, post free. Apply—

CHAS. ROMPLER, 7, New Basinghall St., London, E.C. Agents wanted.

OUR EYES! OUR EARS!

THEIR DISEASES

CURED WITHOUT OPERATION

NEW TREATMENT.—For Cataract and all Diseases of the Eye; Deafness in all its forms; Noises in the Head and Ears; Discharges from the Ears; Deafness from Influenza and Catarrh cured. Nine cases out of ten cured without personal interview. The special remedies forwarded to any part. Hundreds of letters in testimony. Bleeding, Blistering, and all other obsolete and violent treatment avoided. No "Ear-Drums," "Ear-Cornets," or painful instruments employed. Write for Testimonials and Printed Form of Questions to answer; forwarded free.—Mr. T. ISON, Eye and Ear Dispensary, Leeds. [Estab. 1871.]

WHY SUFFER FROM CORNS, BUNIONS, OR ENLARGED TOE JOINTS, when a packet of Thompson's Celebrated French Corn Plasters will cure you? It is thin as silk, and can be worn with tightest boot. Post free for 14 stamps from M. F. THOMPSON, Homœopathic Chemist, 17, Gordon St., Glasgow. Thompson's Guide to Health post free

THE DEAF HEAR

The New Patent

SOUND DISCS

Completely overcome DEAFNESS and HEAD NOISES, no matter of how long standing. Are the same to the ears as glasses are to the eyes. Invisible. Comfortable. Worn months without removal. Explanatory Pamphlet Free.

The L. R. WALES CO., 62 & 63, New Bond St., London, W.

Digitized by Google

No. 424.—One Penny. February 13, 1897.

SHORT STORIES

THE SNAKE-BITE.

The midday train was hurrying onward as though, like a high-bred horse, the locomotive felt in its iron frame a fresh impulsion from the frosty air. The passengers themselves seemed inclined to enjoy the sunshiny February day, rather than to grumble at the cold. And there was one of their number that attracted a certain amount of attention from the gay exuberance of his spirits. He appeared to be literally overflowing with happiness, like a man who is nearing the fruition of a hope long cherished and long delayed, and at last on the point of realisation. He was too restless to sit still, or even to keep silent. He was a tall, lithe, sharp-featured man of about forty years of age, naturally of a fair complexion, but with his skin tanned of that peculiar mahogany-brown which betrays the parching of a tropical sun.

From that deeply bronzed visage a pair of bright blue eyes looked forth upon the world with a cheery sparkle in their depths. Of genial aspect and eager to talk, he found no difficulty in entering into conversation with his next neighbour, who was also communicative, a kindly-looking country doctor, who was returning home from a visit to town, where he had been laying in a stock of scarce drugs and had been picking up some of the latest ideas in medical science. A remark of the doctor's concerning a deep, white scar on the side of one of his travelling companion's sinewy hands furnished the latter with a pretext for talking, of which he was not slow to avail himself.

"It isn't pretty to look at," he remarked, holding up his hand as he spoke, to afford a good view of the livid-looking triangular-shaped mark, "and it was anything but pleasant in the making; for, at first, the place was cut out with a sharp knife, and then the wound was cauterised with a red-hot iron. But for all that the pain was worth enduring, for it saved my life."

"The bite of a mad dog, I suppose?" said the doctor.

"Not a bit of it. It wasn't anything one could take the chances on like that. It was a snake-bite, and the fellow that set his fangs into me was the handsomest-marked reptile you ever saw—all yellow and black, and striped like a tiger. It was out in South Africa that it happened. I had gone to the Kimberley Mines to do a stroke of business, and went off prospecting a bit on my own account. I had studied geology in my odd moments, and I had a theory as to the whereabouts of some of the big stones. So I took a trip into the interior, with a single Zulu for my guide. And one evening, while getting some sticks together for the camp fire, I was fool enough to run my hand into a tall patch of weeds; and I pulled it back fast enough, I promise you, with a tiger-snake hanging to it by his fangs."

All rights reserved.]

"And what did you do?"

"First I killed the snake. Then I cut the place out as deep as I could manage with my very sharp hunting-knife. Next I put the blade of a smaller knife that I had with me into the fire, and as soon as it got red hot I cauterised the wound thoroughly. I was weak and sickish for two days afterwards, but it came all right at last. My Zulu Jack said it was the only time he had ever known of a person bitten by a tiger-snake to recover. I've brought home the skin and the venom from the snake's poison-bag. Jack showed me how to prepare them, and I'm going to forward them to the Zoological Society as soon as I get settled at home."

"And how did you fare in your search for diamonds?"

The traveller laughed gleefully.

"Badly enough at first," he replied. "I had just telegraphed to my poor little wife that I was dead broke and that I was coming home a good deal worse off than I went away, when a great stroke of luck—No, I'll not give you any of the details. It's a thing that might happen a second time if the person that knew about it were wise and could hold his tongue. At all events, it happened once to me; and I've come home with £20,000 to my credit, all safe and sound in the bank. So here I am, on my way to the girl I left two years ago with just enough money to keep our little house going; and I shall walk in and say:

"'See here, Kate! Ruined, am I? Just put on your bonnet and we'll be off to London this blessed minute. No need to pack your trunk. Plenty of fine clothes to be bought in London. Or, if not there, we'll e'en push on as far as Paris to buy some.' And then I'll throw this little sparkler in her lap, just to prove that I'm telling the truth."

As he spoke he took from his waistcoat-pocket a large diamond, set clumsily, but not ineffectively, in a massive ring. He held it up so that the bright sunlight might show off its rainbow lustre.

"Pretty, isn't it?" he remarked, slipping the ring for better security into an inner pocket in the breast of his coat. "Kate's eyes will shine brighter than that diamond when she first gets a sight of me. For, you see, I have planned my home-coming to be a great surprise. And I've been the only friend and comforter that my sweet little wife has ever had. It's just five years since she came with a variety show to Pineyford. A poor, half-starved, sickly little thing she was, and soon broke down in the dance and song act she used to do. She felt ill—typhoid fever, nothing less—and the manager went off with his troupe and left her to die or to recover, as Providence might decide. There was just one thing to do: I had her doctored up and fed up, when she began to get better; and I married her as soon as she was strong enough to stand up at my side and to say, 'I will!' Rather too dainty and delicate a creature for a poor man's wife, though always gay and merry and amusing. And now that we are rich——"

Digitized by Google

"Westbrook Station! Change here for Pineyford!" shouted the guard, in stentorian tones, while the train slackened speed preparatory to coming to a full stop.

"Here's my jumping-off place, I declare! Good-bye, doctor. Think I've most talked you blind, but you'll excuse a man that's just brimming over with happiness for being something over-talkative. And if you ever come to Pineyford and will ask for Joel Denton and his wife, and we happen to be at home, you'll find a hearty welcome waiting for you—that's all!"

And picking up his bag, and pulling his soft travelling cap well over his eyes, the joyous traveller swung himself down from the platform just as the train gave symptoms of moving on.

The sunshine of the winter's day had departed, and the sky showed, amid the faint rose-flush overspreading it, no luminary more dazzling than a slender-curved thread of gold, with a single planet sparkling just beyond it.

Mr. Denton was not exactly in a mood to enjoy the beauty of the evening, for, greatly to his disgust, he found that the Pineyford train—the only one that the evening hours afforded—did not depart till nine o'clock. To the gleeful anticipations of the homeward bound traveller this delay was most vexatious. However, there was no help for it; so, after comforting himself as well as he could with a good dinner, he lit a cigar, and started off for a stroll down the line, to pass away the time, and to meditate over the coming meeting with his idolised wife.

On he walked, plunged in pleasant meditations. He had gone quite a distance, and was in the act of turning to retrace his steps to the station, when in spite of the gathering shades of twilight, he caught sight of a woman standing at the top of the embankment, opposite to the one on which he found himself. She was leaning forward and listening intently. Just then the noise of a coming train became audible. She sprang down the side of the way, and, crouching on the lines, she buried her face in her hands, and remained motionless, waiting for the death that would be so surely dealt to her by those terrible, hurrying wheels, the sound of whose coming had already swelled into approaching thunder.

Joel Denton was as quick-witted as he was athletic, and without a moment's delay he swung himself down the bank, caught the kneeling woman in his arms, and literally swept her from her perilous position into a place of safety. His aid came none too soon. As he staggered back against the bank, still grasping the rescued woman, the train rushed past with a shriek as though of fury in being balked of its prey, so close that the fiery breath of the engine fairly scorched his hands.

As the last carriage vanished round the curve, Denton released the struggling woman, and half pulled, half led her to the top of the embankment. She was very weak from the shock, and inclined to be hysterical; but Joel Denton had no sympathy with what, in his own mind, he denominated as "deuced foolishness." So when she had sunk down exhausted on the comfortless seat afforded by a big, flat stone, he looked at her severely and remarked:

"Now, what did you do that for? We might both have been killed, and if I hadn't come along at the nick of time, you surely would have been."

She looked up, showing a pale, wan countenance, set in a mass of black ruffled hair, and a pair of great, wild, dark eyes blazing with a feverish lustre.

"I wish I were! Oh, I wish I were!" she moaned, rocking herself to and fro, as if in an agony of intolerable suffering. "Why didn't you let me be? It would have been all over by this time, and now I've just got to begin again."

"And what's the reason you want so badly to kill yourself? Just tell me your story and what it is that troubles you," said Denton, his kindly heart softening before the youth and piteous words and the despairing woe of the speaker. "Mayhap I can help you to find some way out of it all."

She shook her head hopelessly.

"There is only one way out of my misery for me, and that is death."

"Anyhow, won't you tell me what is the matter?"

"Desolation!—desertion!—heartbreak!" she cried. "Look you: I had but one person to love in all the world, and that was my husband. Both my parents are dead, and I never had a child, and I loved him—no, it was more than love that I felt for him—it was idolatry! I knew he wasn't the kind of man I ought to have married. He was a gambler and a hard drinker; but he was handsome, and just as fascinating as a serpent to all women. I ran away from home to become his wife, and I do believe that the misery and disgrace of my elopement broke my poor mother's heart. I've never been happy with him, never; but just so long as I could be with him, and try to coax him back to something like what he was when we were first married, I got along, for I always hoped that some day my love and my patience would win him back to me. You may have heard of him, perhaps—the professional gambler, Martin Jackson. He is quite a celebrity in sporting circles, they say."

Joel Denton shook his head and took a furtive glance at his watch. Only a little after eight. How slowly the time lagged, when he was longing to be hurrying onward towards Kate, and the perfect bliss of their reunion.

"I might have suspected something when he decided to settle down at such a dull town as Pineyford for the winter, but I never dreamt of the real attraction of the place. It seems that there was a woman there that he had known and fancied some years before. He had tried acting for a while, and she was a member at that time of the same company with himself, and they got to be very fond of one another, I've been told. To be sure, she had married and settled down, but she wrote to him, while we were in London, to tell him that her husband had deserted her, and that she was very unhappy, and longed to see him once more.

"He came on at once to Pineyford, and we stayed there for months; and at last there came a telegram from the woman's husband saying that he was totally ruined, and that he was coming back as fast as possible. It seems that he had never deserted his wife at all, but he had gone away to try and make money, in some new enterprise or other, and when all his hopes failed he sent word that he meant to return. Why do you look at me like that? Do you think I am not telling the truth? Here are all the letters that creature wrote my husband. I found them in his room after he went away. For he and she have run off together. They would not wait until the man they had both wronged got back to face them. They have gone to London, and on Saturday they are to sail for America."

"Her name—the woman's name?"

Digitized by Google

So hoarse and broken was the whisper in which this question was uttered, that the hearer failed to comprehend it until it was once more repeated.

"She used to be known on the stage by the name of Kitty Forrest. Her husband's name is Joel Denton. And now you can understand why it was that I wanted to kill myself, for I have nothing on earth left to live for."

"You have."

"And what is that?"

"Revenge!"

She laughed drearily.

"And how could I avenge myself, I should like to know? I, a feeble, friendless woman. Who would help me to secure that last sweetness life has still to offer?"

"I will."

"And why? What are Martin Jackson and Kitty Forrest to you?"

"The former, nothing; the latter, all the world. I am Joel Denton!"

* * * * *

The manager and the cashier of the Hotel de Tours in Liverpool—a small tavern not far from the quay, where the steamers take their departure—were somewhat puzzled by the aspect and the movements of a man who came thither to take a room on Thursday morning. He had a wild look about his eyes, and seemed strangely absent-minded; moreover, he had no luggage, except one small bag; but as he paid in advance for three days' board and lodging, and was not too particular about the position of his room, he was accepted without question as an inmate.

As he asked for the direction of a maker of surgical instruments, he was set down as a physician, somewhat dazed with overwork, and then nobody thought any more about him. He went to the shop indicated, but his purchases were unimportant. He merely bought two small lancets, being extremely particular about the fineness of the steel and the sharpness of the blades. Having selected and paid for the little instruments, he returned to the hotel, went to his bedchamber, rang the bell, and ordered—not the inevitable whisky and water—but a jug of hot water, which, after a short delay, was brought to him by an attendant.

Then, had any spy upon his movements been peering through the keyhole, he might have witnessed a curious process. Drawing from the inner recesses of his coat a large pocket-book, the inmate of the room proceeded to take from one of its compartments a folded paper, from which he extracted a long band of scaly skin, speckled and striped with black and yellow, in hues dulled by drying, and a second very small folded paper, from which he shook upon the table two little discs of what looked like thin, semi-pellucid horn.

Then he took from the washstand a tumbler, which he turned upside down, and in the shallow hollow of its base he placed the two discs, dropping on them, with infinite precaution, a few drops of hot water. When they were nearly dissolved, he carefully anointed with the thick, viscous liquid thus produced the point and one-third of the length of the blade of each of the lancets he had just bought. After thoroughly washing the bottom of the tumbler with warm water, he calmly proceeded to smash it to pieces on the hearth, gathered up the fragments, and wrapped them in a piece of newspaper, afterwards ringing the bell, announcing the breakage, and asking that the broken glass should be taken away.

* * * * *

Two days later the steamship Perseverance lay at her wharf, her engines throbbing with the suppressed energy of approaching departure. There was the usual bustle and animation on the dock, as well as on the deck of the great ship. Passengers were hurrying to and fro with their wraps and handbags; porters were toiling along under weight of state-room trunks and steamer chairs; messengers were arriving with bouquets and devices in hot-house flowers, and with baskets of choice fruit, and all was pleasurable stir and excitement.

Among the latest arrivals came a pair that attracted universal attention by reason of their personal comeliness. The man, tall, broad-shouldered, black-moustached and dark-eyed, was decidedly handsome, though in a coarse, dissipated style, while his companion—a laughing, dimpled blonde, with the bluest of eyes, and the yellowest of locks, was, as a bystander audibly remarked, "as pretty as a pink." No friends or acquaintances of the striking-looking couple had come down to the wharf to see them off, but, absorbed as they were in each other, they did not seem to need or to care for the presence of anybody else.

"All aboard!" came the warning cry. There was a rush towards the gangway, and a certain degree of crowding and confusion ensued, in the midst of which the pretty blonde uttered a sudden cry.

"What's the matter?" queried her companion.

"Just look how something has scratched me!" she answered, holding up one slender, ungloved hand, across the back of which a long, deep scratch, or rather cut, formed a scarlet line.

"By Jove! You have scratched yourself. And see here! There is just such another mark on my wrist. I wonder what could have caused it! or could anyone——"

And he glared round with wrathful eyes, but, failing to fix the outrage on any person in the crowd, he contented himself with remarking: "A pin in some one's sleeve, I suppose; it's not much after all." And in a moment more the throng of departing travellers were safe and sound on board, the gangway was withdrawn, and the mighty screw bore away the huge steamship on the first stage of her voyage.

The trip was a swift and prosperous one, lasting just eight days from shore to shore. It was saddened, however, by a tragic and inexplicable incident. Two of the passengers, Martin Jackson and the charming woman who had passed as his wife, both died within a few hours of each other during the early morning of the second day out. The ship's surgeon could only conjecture the cause of the mysterious and fatal event. He suggested suicide by poison, or a peculiarly malignant type of blood-poisoning, this last supposition being warranted by the irritated and inflamed condition of a scratch on the lady's hand, and one on the wrist of her companion. But the science of the young doctor failed to discover the reason of the simultaneous development of such a condition of the blood in the veins of two different persons. However, neither of the deceased were of sufficient importance to make much fuss about.

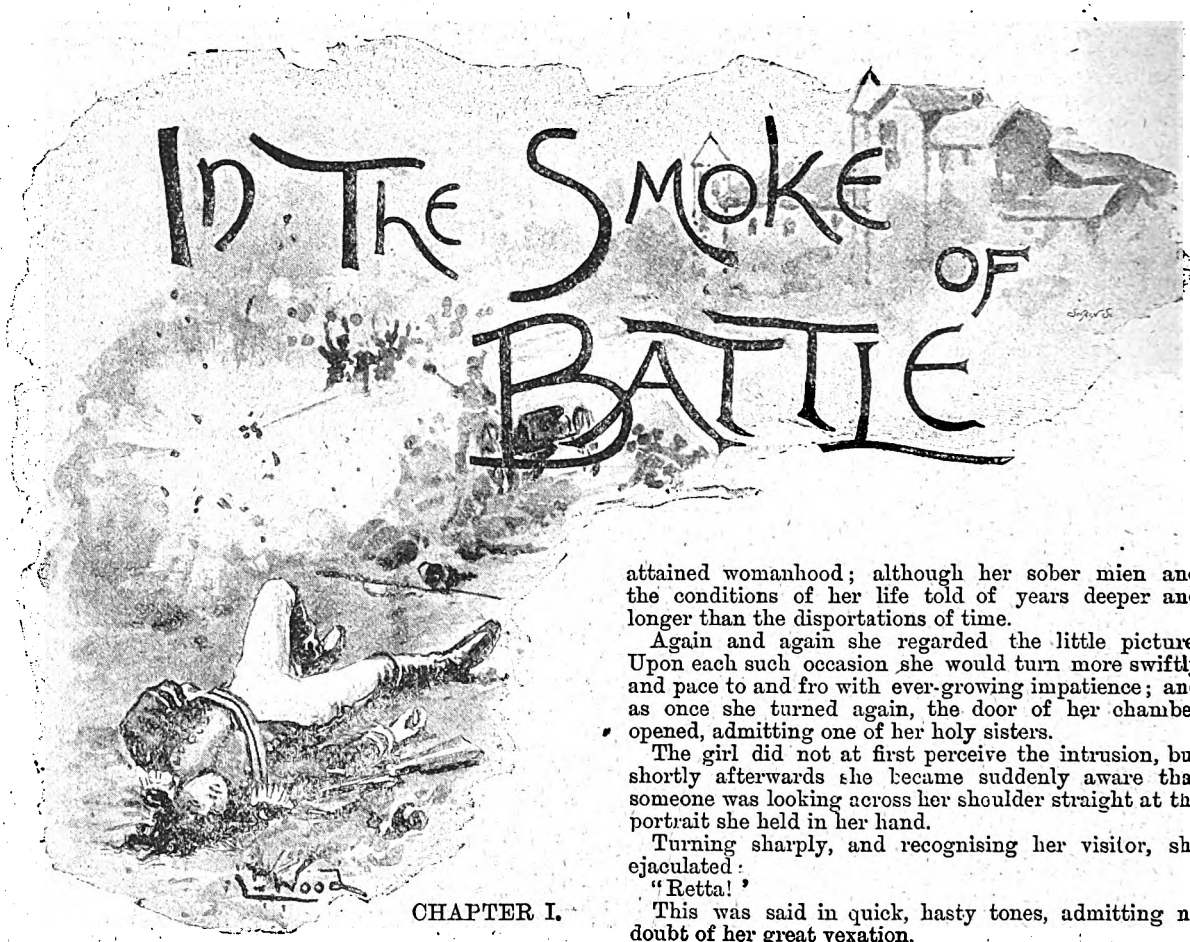
The solemn ceremonial of a burial at sea afforded a mild, if dismal, distraction to the surviving passengers. And Joel Denton, when the cable dispatch of the Perseverance's arrival came with the additional tidings of the two deaths that had taken place on board, looked grimly down on the deep, white scar on the side of his hand and muttered between his teeth:

"It was worth while the danger and suffering, and all, to have brought home with me the death-dealing venom of the tiger-snake!"

L. H. H.

Digitized by Google

IN THE SMOKE OF BATTLE



CHAPTER I.

CLOSE beneath the southern border of the Pyrenees, overlooking the memorial field of a present century war, lay the Convent of St. Ursula.

It crouched like a thing decrepit with age. It reared its black towers fearfully towards the sky, as if pleading for light and help, or forgetfulness of the scenes it had witnessed.

From the time of Corunna, down past the memories of Vigo, Lugo, and Lisbon, down to the end of Vittoria, it had watched the dispatch of human life. The woe of Napoleon, the requiems after Moore, the wild, triumphant cries, as laurels showered upon Wellington, were all known to the heart of St. Ursula.

One eventide, in the heart of this eventful time, a lovely girl paced to and fro within her lonely chamber.

From her bearing one might have seen how unaccustomed she was to the confinement of those shambling walls, and how little the old quaint hangings impressed her. Essentially she was as indifferent to the cold, half mystic fascination of convent life as to the antique beauties elaborating her room.

She walked with a firm, hurried tread that bespoke impatience; yet about it there was a hesitation proclaiming something of womanly indecision, and a consideration for those her restlessness might disturb. One or twice she faltered in her passage, stopping to draw from her vest the photograph of a man.

Judging by appearances, she could not yet have attained womanhood; although her sober mien and the conditions of her life told of years deeper and longer than the disportations of time.

Again and again she regarded the little picture. Upon each such occasion she would turn more swiftly and pace to and fro with ever-growing impatience; and as once she turned again, the door of her chamber opened, admitting one of her holy sisters.

The girl did not at first perceive the intrusion, but shortly afterwards she became suddenly aware that someone was looking across her shoulder straight at the portrait she held in her hand.

Turning sharply, and recognising her visitor, she ejaculated:

"Retta!"

This was said in quick, hasty tones, admitting no doubt of her great vexation.

"Ah, my sweet child!" the other returned gently. "Don't speak so hastily to me. Do I not love you—are we not sisters? Lalage, tell me you love me, that you want me, that I may sit by your side and talk!"

"Yes, yes," the girl hurried to reply. "I want you, I love you, but there are times ——"

She stopped, and as she bowed her head her long black hair drooped over her face, concealing the look of angry impatience in her eyes. Her foot beat noiselessly on the floor with significant jerks.

Retta spoke again.

"There ought to be no times, sister Lalage, when I should be excluded from your presence. You would not be happy here unless I were with you. You have no other to love you, dear, but me."

Lalage bent her head still lower, half in shame, half in anger, endeavouring at the same time to conceal the miniature she held.

Retta continued:

"We have been friends and sisters—think of that! Ah, you turn from me hastily again. Lalage! Lalage! Look at me—look and listen!

"Throughout our lives we have been fondly drawn together—you the child and I the woman. Hitherto we have lived in peace, loving one another very, very deeply, but now—now when I am hourly expecting the news of his terrible sentence being fulfilled, in this time of perfect pain, you turn from me and are cold. Oh, child, you don't know the agony, the barrenness of wasted years—when love is plucked from the life, like the scent from a rose. You don't know how hard it is to live—how hard to avoid self-destruction; and were it not for you—you, my darling sister—my Lalage, my life would long since have flown. Think of it, Lalage, and love me!"

Digitized by Google

Her golden hair escaping the coil, here fell upon the black tresses of the wayward girl, and the two commingling might easily have suggested the contrast in their respective natures: Gold amongst dust — sunshine amongst darkness—life amongst death.

"Retta!" exclaimed the girl, suddenly raising her head, and stroking the other's hand almost fiercely, "am I unkind to you—very unkind? Tell me that, Retta?"

"No, darling—not unkind, but sometimes inconsiderate. You are young—very young, and consequently a little wayward; that is all."

"But you forgive that, don't you, Retta? I am a child to you, am I not?"

"Yes, Lalage!" said the other earnestly.

"You spoil me," continued the girl. "You indulge me, there is nothing you have not done, or would not do for me, is there, Retta?"

"Nothing, my Lalage, for you are all I have to live for now."

"Supposing," the girl continued, with a strange heat glowing about her face, "supposing your Victor—your own true Victor—was pardoned and became a free man again. Supposing he sought and found you in your retreat here, where you are mourning his loss. Would you leave me alone here and return to him? Do you love him so much and me little enough for that, Retta? Would you do that?"

Retta hesitated. A world hung at her heart upon this issue, and it was in scarcely audible tones she replied:

"No! I must remember my vow."

Lalage sprang up, and, in her excitement, let the photograph fall unheeded to the floor.

At this moment Retta's eyes, wandering from her companion, chanced upon the photograph at her feet.

She stooped and secured it.

A short, sharp exclamation of surprise escaped her as she turned the face uppermost.

"What, Lalage, what is this?" she asked at length.

The girl sprang towards her, wresting the photograph from her grasp.

In so doing the picture was damaged, seeing which Lalage laughed hysterically, almost madly.

"This!" she cried, holding the picture above her. "This is the portrait of your Victor—yours! I was keeping it for the time when you regretted your vow, so that you might have one little token of your discarded love, one little token to console you. I will keep it still!"

"What made you do it!" Retta breathlessly inquired. Then, as if struck with a sudden fear:

"Lalage—Lalage—Lalage! Surely you cannot mean—you dare not mean."

"I mean nothing! I dare everything for—for your sake, Retta."

Saying this, the girl fell suddenly calm, and, after a short struggle, Retta decided she must have been mistaken in her fearful conjecture.

"I thought you could not have meant anything, Lalage," she said, with a low, nervous flutter in her voice.

"No, no, Retta," returned the girl. "I mean nothing, only that I love you, and would do anything for you. You should not suspect me."

Then after a pause:

"Retta, you are beautiful. You are beautiful in your soul, beautiful in your body, beautiful in your whole being. How I envy you!"

"Envy, Lalage?"

"Yes, I envy you. Why not, Retta? What have I to be proud of? I have no beauty such as yours; I have no love such as yours; I am not even loved as you are. I am a child—a mere child—a useless, powerless child."

"Lalage, don't talk so. You will have womanhood and its blessings before long."

"What is womanhood without beauty, without love?" the girl questioned fiercely.

Then suddenly falling again into her strange, calm state, she playfully continued:

"Retta, you might be loved for the golden glory of your hair. Perhaps you are. Supposing now—only in play, mind—supposing, like the woman in the Bible, by whom Sampson was shorn of his locks and his strength

Someone was looking across her shoulder.

at the same time, I was to cut off your hair? What then?"

"Lalage! Lalage!" the other interposed, "you must not say these things."

"I'm only in play, Retta—only in play, remember that. And then supposing, like Jael, I was to strike the nail into Sisera's temple—you being for the time Sisera."

"No more, Lalage; my blood runs nearly cold to hear a child talk so."

"But"—Lalage laughed in return—"I am only in play. It struck me that, shorn of your hair, you might not be worth the loving; and, on the other hand, shorn of your life you could not love so freely and well, if at all. But it was only in play I said it, Retta; that was all." Then she kissed her.

A dp se e*d, a*d Ra, fg s*e kw h*r c*e fy, a*d b*g wt s*e sd, qy dd h*r in at t*e g*s wd ws. In t*e il L*e gw r*s, a*d a qk or mt he dd an en un h*r l*y fe, in ft, a s*g at h*r we mn, i*g a sr of i*e fr.

Her cheeks pulsed and pulsed again. Her fingers worked spitefully, and some hidden passion, becoming at last so utterly uncontrollable, impelled her to seize a veil lying close beside her and savagely rend it into strips.

Digitized by Google

By that time Retta had unconsciously fallen into a gentle sleep.

With a vacant, far-off look in her deep black eyes, Lalage knotted the strips of veiling and twisted them into a species of thong.

With intuitive stealth she attached an end to each wrist of the slumbering woman.

Then she deftly withdrew herself, and an instant later was rapidly binding the astonished Retta fast to the chair. Her actions spoke of a strength bordering upon the strength of madness. A pent-up fury burst like a cyclone in one sudden impulse, and she panted like a hound.

Fixing her victim beneath her own weight, kneeling on her, thrusting her roughly into position, she tied the thongs with cruel swiftness, and a few minutes later her guardian angel—now her victim—was at the mercy of her merciless heart.

Thoroughly awakened to the girl's malignant fury, Retta struggled and writhed; but her efforts were all of no avail. So dexterous and certain was the power of the girl's wrath, that Retta felt the trammels were fastened upon her like the grip of death.

Try as she might, she found it impossible to escape. Hope and fear alternated in the possession of her mind. She tried to fancy her captivity as the result of a mere girlish freak, but upon each recurrence of this thought her eyes wandered towards her captor, and she visibly trembled.

She could utter no word; she could neither think nor plead. Agonising grief, rather than anger, filled her heart at the merciless ingratitude of her deeply loved Lalage.

Then Lalage placed her arms akimbo and spoke:

"Retta, you are beautiful. Your virtue is rewarded with martyrdom. Go still farther and deny your love for Victor. Say your vows and your love for me exclude all thoughts of him."

Approaching her victim she laved her hands in the bath of tresses, and, withdrawing them, she smiled as she saw some of the burning threads entwined about her fingers.

"Lalage—Lalage," Retta complained in low tones, broken by the weight of her suffering, "I cannot deny Victor. I have been mistaken in my vows. He is dear, very dear, to me, and I have made a promise I could never fulfil were he but to return."

"You say that?" mockingly questioned Lalage. "Then you are a wicked woman. Why don't you deny him and be eased of your pain?" Saying which she drew the tensioned knots still tighter.

The tortured woman groaned, but even then her heart was full of forgiveness, and she would utter no cry lest it apprised the other inmates of her loved one's treachery.

"Deny him, deny him! Even say you deny him!" urged the girl maliciously.

"I cannot. Release me, Lalage, release me, and I will kiss you—I will kiss you now!" And her beautiful face looked upwards in expectant hope.

Lalage kissed her fiercely, and then echoed a shrill, hard laugh.

The kiss so stung Retta that she perceptibly winced. The girl laughed again—this time more harshly.

"Deny your love for Victor and you are free!" she said with a strange commingling of entreaty and spite.

"Never, Lalage, never! I cannot!"

Again the hands sought the captive tresses, and again the fingers withdrew intertwined with the golden threads.

Great scalding tears—more of grief than of pain—rolled down the beautiful face, but still the tongue was silent.

"If I had a knife," mused Lalage deliberately, her tones more terrible for being suppressed. "I would rob you of your hair—your life—your all."

"Lalage!"

This one short cry sped from the martyr's heart like the cry of an angel in the clutch of fiends. To her reticence in blaming her torturer, may be attributed the other's steadily developing fury.

Raising her clenched hand, she savagely struck her victim across the eyes.

A cry of agony followed the act, but not for an instant did Lalage waver in her deadly purpose.

As Retta's eyes, shot with blood, slowly opened in a long, appealing look Lalage snatched the photograph again, kissing it passionately. Then tearing it into a hundred pieces, she showered them upon the agonised woman; and at last, losing all mortal restraint, advanced and struck her—struck her several furious blows upon the body.

A resounding shriek rang loudly.

In an instant all the inmates of the convent were awake and flocking to the scene.

Retta by this time was quite unconscious, and might have been taken for dead, save for a troubled heaving of the bosom.

With merciful, womanly instinct, a few sprang to the captive's release.

The remainder, forgetting their sanctity, fell like furies upon Lalage; but she, with marvellous dexterity, struck her way fiercely through the crowd, and, without a look behind, made hasty escape.

Dashing through the corridors, she came to a window overlooking the convent wall.

Flinging it open, she took the plunge, and by the help of that inscrutable Providence, ever guardful of abandoned sinners, landed safely on the summit of the wall.

Another leap and she was lost to sight.

The pale faces, looking out from their shrouds behind her, sickened and turned away.

CHAPTER II.

A few months after the above event, the roar of battle broke thunderously over the Convent of St. Ursula.

Musket shot pelted like leaden dust about the shambling walls.

Smoke and fire panted from the muzzles of cannon—thick steaming crimson sparkled on every sword—the very horses seemed charged with inflammable hate. Ever and anon a black enveloped cloud swept by with a whirr and a rush, telling of a deadly charge.

This and more was watched by the pale-faced sisters of St. Ursula. Foremost amongst them, with divine pity gleaming in her eyes, was Retta.

Throughout the day—far into the night—she listened to the terrible uproar, and each woeful cry found echo in her heart.

At length, after long dragging hours of conflict, a wild hurrah! swelled mightily upon her ear, and the atmosphere, hitherto so heavy, seemed to become suddenly lighter. Crisp, sharp shouts, some of rage, some of victory, resounded from the field in different tongues, and the heaving fire of iron stomachs grew less frequent. Horses gulped and snorted in terror, stumbling as they flew, spurred and goaded by the conquered.

Digitized by Google

Again, and with super-added power, the hurrahs fell quickly upon the thickening gloom; and, looking forth, Retta saw a green-coated, white-breasted, star-bangled column of cavalry flying directly towards the convent.

At this juncture a yellow-faced moon mounted the sky, shining clemently down upon the retreating line.

Immediately in the centre Retta descried two figures keeping steadily together.

Why these two so forcibly attracted her attention she could not then say; but no matter where she looked, or how general a conception she tried to get of the situation, her glance immediately reverted to this particular pair.

Moving to a more convenient position, she peered forth, scrutinising them intently. On they came, their swinging pace gathering impetus with every stride—their flying horses neighing with terror, their manes entangled, and their flanks bleeding from the deeply-driven spurs.

With each thud of hoofs the two horsemen became ever more prominent, and at length Retta was able in some degree to distinguish their faces.

One appeared to be a black-haired youth, whose helmet had been lost in the conflict. His figure was exceedingly slim and effeminate, and he rode with an easy lightness most unusual in a soldier.

The other sat like a soldier; he was a soldier; there could be no doubt about that.

By reason of his wearing a helmet the eager woman behind the casement was not able to discern his features, any more than to feel they were handsome and perfectly fearless.

"But where," she asked herself abruptly, "where had she seen before that figure sitting with imperial stateliness upon the gaunt black horse? How was it every action of the arm, every movement of the muscle, seemed familiar to her?"

Two figures keeping steadily together.

The cavalcadé by this time was very near. Resolutely tensioning her nerves she looked again.

The figure, with its embodiment of stately power, swept on and on; the other, that of the slim, effeminate youth, struggling to keep up.

So sure as the former applied the spurs and lashed his charger, the other did likewise. Each extra effort was followed in a similar, though more brutal manner, by the youth; and by dint of this, the pair eventually headed the column by an appreciable distance.

Faster and faster they flew, leaving a veil of dust in their wake, and very shortly were hard upon the convent.

Approaching a little closer, they wheeled suddenly round to the quarter where the wall was within leaping distance of the corridor window.

Digitized by Google

Retta flew as Lalage had done, arriving just in time to see the horsemen rein in their foaming steeds and dismount.

Clattering behind, she could hear the column, apparently making for the pass, and at an increasing distance the shouts of the victorious pursuing redcoats.

Hastily unfastening the window, she flung it open. Simultaneously the figure, which had so strangely arrested her eyes and thoughts, turned full towards her.

The face turned upwards, and she recognised the man who was truly the sole and only hope of her life.

Having eyes for nothing and nobody, having no fear, forgetting for the moment even her sympathy with the sufferers, she beckoned him frantically.

He saw her, and a moment later had mounted the convent wall. He was preparing to spring, when a rifle shot rang sharply behind him, and staggering, he lost balance, falling back again to the base of the wall.

Retta just had time to see the youth's rifle descend from firing position when the thunderous cavalcade dashed passed.

Instantly the youth was prostrated beneath the flying tread of the escaping horsemen, and a thousand steel-clad hoofs pressed and crushed the life from his fragile form.

Mad with desperation, Retta leapt from her coign to the wall, and a second later was breathlessly kneeling by the body of her lover.

Falling back again to the base of the wall.

Raising his head so that it might rest upon her arm she found the wound was comparatively slight, and that the bullet had nowhere lodged itself.

Almost unconsciously Retta breathed her lover's name, and, glorious with love and reverence, the soldier's eyes opened, drinking in the radiant beauty of his guardian angel.

"Victor—Victor!" she whispered passionately.

"Retta!" said the soldier lover. "I live, and am free—free! Rescued on the eve of war, I came and fought my hardest. Providence in the shape of a youth has preserved me from many a shot and sword thrust—but," raising his glance inquiringly, "but where is he? He was close beside me awhile ago."

Retta's tears flowed still faster as she answered:

"He lies yonder, trampled to death by the flying line of cavalry."

"Poor Lal!" exclaimed the soldier, slowly rising. "I must go to him."

"Lal?" repeated Retta, with a sudden twitching at her heart strings.

"Yes," returned the man. "We called him Lal because he was so girlish. It was my pet name for him."

Something prevented Retta from telling her lover how she had seen the youth's rifle raised in menace against him, and a nervous fear gnawed at her heart, as she supported him towards the body.

Somehow she was prepared for what she saw. The black wealth of hair was not to be mistaken, and the contour of the lovely figure had at one time been too dear to her to escape recognition, even in its present marred state.

No start shook her as she gazed upon the pallid face, although her thoughts were very, very heavy and sorrowful.

She had seen and loved that which then lay stark and cold before her.

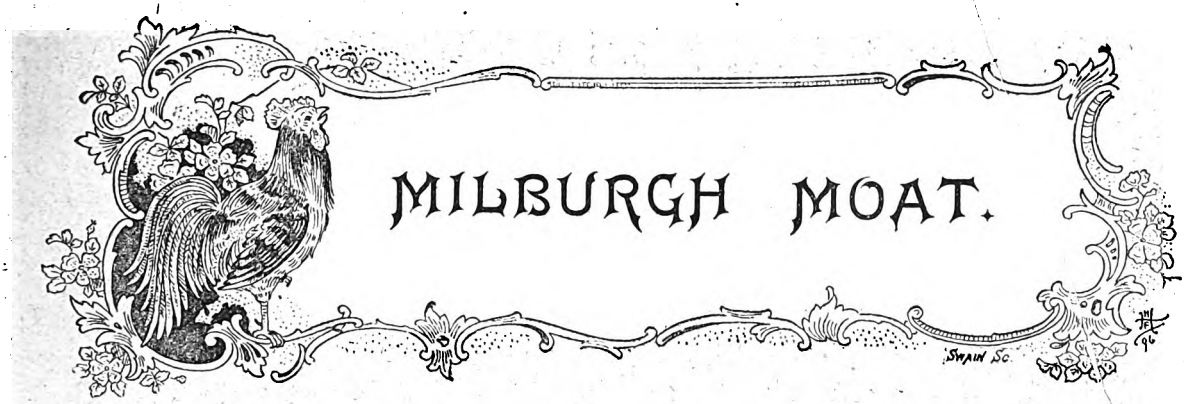
Her thoughts went momentarily back to the incident of the lonely chamber when this poor, mangled body had towered above her in ungovernable fury.

She stooped and kissed the lifeless face and, lingering for a moment, prayed.

Then turning the sods, they heaped them tenderly upon the body.

Dunstan Denn.

Digitized by Google



MILBURGH MOAT.

I have been asked to tell a ghost story. But I don't believe in ghost stories, so how can I tell a story without conviction? Besides, old sceptic as I am, if I knew—I do know one—a well-authentic story, I should never have any real faith in it. I should always imagine some hocus-pocus, some modern magic was at the back of it.

What has one to say who has firmly disbelieved and as firmly scoffed at the supernatural all his life, when he is brought face to face with a fact for which he can vouch soberly and truthfully, and of which he can give no solution.

It is one of the spiteful idiosyncrasies of those feebly-constituted ghosts, who are so little satisfied with spirit worlds that they must return to this, always to hanker after the most picturesque of human habitations.

Milburgh Moat is a perfectly-appointed house in Kent, of the time of Henry VIII., grey with age, except where green ivy or orange lichens had draped its walls with colours. The elms and beeches which hid it from the high road had served to shade the Druids; and the very rooks as they cawed seemed to choke with awe for the antiquity of their branches.

The moat itself, which gave its name to Milburgh home, being supplied with springs, was always full in some parts and known to be very deep. Yellow and white water lilies starred its surface, and elderly carp, which history said had been placed there by Anne Boleyn, were seen to solemnly follow each other round and round when flies were giddy enough to flit there.

Nothing could be more attractive to an artist's eye than the Tudor towers, with their crenulated walls; the bridge without a parapet which crossed, with its broad causeway, to the stone gateway where once drawbridge and portcullis had effectually forbidden an entrance; and the massed ivy that entirely concealed many of the turrets, or threw a shadow over the casements beneath.

Within, the carved oak, which adorned beam and joist, staircase and balustrade alike, gave an antique and ghostly look to every room except to those in the added wing which was beautiful as art could make it, in style and furniture as modern as a mansion in Belgravia or Fifth Avenue. The two drawing-rooms, which opened into each other, flanked by a long conservatory of Persian tiles and Bohemian glass, were so nineteenth century in comfort and attractive luxury that no one who sat there on the brocaded ottomans, or flirted among the blossoming orchids, could imagine that a ghost would have the supreme bad taste to intrude where it was not wanted.

But that Milburgh Moat was haunted was a popular legend, not only to the yokels round, who hated being caught by darkness in its neighbourhood, but to the family of Lord Carwinkle, all the members of which had heard noises and seen sights quite inexplicable to the modern conjuror.

The present inhabitants of the Moat were all sensible people, and hospitable to a degree.

Lord Carwinkle was a young man of thirty, having only succeeded to the title since his father's death, two years previously, just after his own marriage to as sweet a girl as can be found in a month of British Sundays.

She had a boy a few months old, bright and beautiful, and the idol of his father. Lord Carwinkle's three sisters were staying at the Moat, and two or three eligible young men on the army list, a bachelor lordling and the parson made up the guests I had been asked to meet.

There was lots of sport in the neighbourhood, a fair pack of hounds, and of an evening all the charms of pleasant conversation with accomplished women or cultivated men.

But the subject of ghosts so often introduced at Christmas was tabooed. If any man verged on the brink of ghost land he was profoundly shut up by a chill response, or the conversation as abruptly changed to something more congenial by our host.

Though I had met Lord and Lady Carwinkle often in their London house, this was my first visit to Milburgh Moat. I had, however, heard something about some mysterious warning that was supposed to be connected with deaths in the family, and I had naturally avoided anything that might hurt the susceptibilities of such amiable friends.

I had no belief in supernatural admonitions, and certainly I little expected to be a medium between the spirit world and my host.

It was Christmas Eve: after the most charming evening in Lady Carwinkle's drawing-room; after the dear old English games, without which no Christmas is complete; and after a country dance for which the old hall was used, and at which, I remember, the shadows thrown by the yule-log seemed to fill the roof with the shades of fantastic ancestors; that having bid good-night and a merry Christmas to visitors, guests and family, the few men who finished their day with a weed in the billiard-room came together without their host.

The fact was that his baby-boy had been taken suddenly with something like croup, and both father and mother were anxious and restless. I recall the fact that Lady Carwinkle bade us good-night, leaning over the gallery that ran round the beautiful hall.

It was Tom Calliber, of the Hussars, who spoke:

Digitized by Google

"I never saw such a place faw galleries, by Jove! I adore old oak carvings somehow. Must have been a monastery once, don't you know."

"Yes," added Charlie Freake, "and the nuns came into the galleries to throw pillows at the monks, I dare say."

"By-the-way, Captain Rattler, you're in the blue room, I think?" said young Lord D'Oonuthen, the bachelor lordling who was expected to carry off one of the sisters.

"Well, I was only put in there to-day. There seems to be something wrong with the roof of the room where I have been, and Carwinkle asked me if I should mind changing for a night. Knowing he felt more intimate with me, as I'm an old traveller, of course, I made no objections, but I have not been into the—what do you call—blue-room, yet."

"Hum," muttered the parson. "I don't envy you."

"By Jove!" broke in Charlie Freake. "There's a carved oak gallery there that would delight South Kensington."

"My bedroom large enough to support a gallery?"

"A regular organ loft, my boy; only no one knows how to get into it without a ladder."

"Perhaps no one wants to get into it," suggested Tom Calliber. And then the conversation drifted into generalities.

A pool was made up, and as there were enough present to reach spot brown I had plenty of time to indulge the parson by answering all his questions. Among others he asked me if I had any fixed belief in the supernatural.

To my diplomatic "why?" he answered that the family was averse to sleeping in the blue-room, as something disagreeable was supposed to follow.

"Oh! dear no! Only the family!" he added. "I have slept there in summer and was never annoyed; but then, I belong to the church, and may be respected."

To which I replied: "That, though no churchman, I trusted that phantoms would respect my slumbers, if they did not me."

The game finished, we all found our way to our rooms, my old friend, the parson, bidding me good-night at the door of my bedroom with a sort of compassionate tenderness in his voice that surprised me.

Apologetically he informed me before we parted that the room I now occupied was the oldest in the building, and was supposed to have some mysterious communication with the moat.

"But our good host," he allowed, "would not ask you to rest in any uncomfortable room, so I wish you a very good-night and pleasant dreams."

I opened the door and went in. My candle was not blown out by a chill gust; nor did bats fly round the apartment, and no uncanny life seemed to be present even in the form of moths or crickets.

But the room was far too large for a bedroom. There was a fire burning briskly; an excellent four-post bed; a dressing-table, on which all a man could want was carefully laid out; a sofa; books on a small table; logs of old oak to throw on the fire; comforts of the snuggest kind in the cosy boudoir, but only making this immense room look friendless and dreary by comparison. The ceiling was of darkest oak, and only here and there, where the firelight caught the colour of an armorial bearing, could its existence be perceived. The walls were hung with fine specimens of Arras tapestries, while at intervals sombre full-length portraits of ancestors frowned from their ebony frames.

At one end of the room was a carved oak gallery which, at an elevation of about twelve feet from the floor, ran across the entire room. Two doors opened apparently on to this—one in the wall, at right angles; the other at the end of the gallery and parallel with it. From the location of my room I had fancied this wall, in which was this second door, was the outer wall of the castle, but evidently I was wrong.

I lighted two candles in massive silver sticks on the mantel-piece and two more on my toilet-table. But their united illumination only made the ancestors glare more fitfully, and just throw out the twisted colonettes of the gallery balustrade in a sort of bluish mist. All beyond was darkness. Somehow or other—strong tea I suppose, did it—I did not feel sleepy in the least. But the loneliness of that big, dark place was intense. I would have given anything for a chum to talk over old times, or a wife to quarrel with.

Faute de mieux, I mixed myself a weak grog, and taking up a book (I remember well it was Mrs. Crowe's "Night Side of Nature") I was well immersed in some tale of a Paris murder and its supernatural revelation, when I was rather astonished at being interrupted by the distant tones of an organ.

There was nothing surprising in the fact of organ-playing in Milburgh Moat, for there was a chapel attached to the house, as in many old Catholic family castles, but at such an hour it seemed scarcely probable that any one of the ladies who had gone to rest would get up after midnight to practise an introit in such a locality.

The music was sad and fitful: the notes moaned like a departed organist's spirit, and seemed to harmonise with a wailing wind which was sighing outside.

My ears were painfully on the alert, and all my senses seemed to be at abnormal tension. I had used my last logs on the fire, and a bluish flame had taken the place of a yellow blaze.

I heard a door slam, apparently in the distance, and then my nostrils were offended by a mouldy smell, as of damp, upturned earth.

I looked round at first without moving anything but my eyes. Something seemed to tell me I should see what I did not want to see.

The far end of the room was invisible; in absolute darkness. Nearer, the blue hangings of the great bed loomed like the trappings on some catafalque. On the glasses on my table, on the mirror's silver frame, the blue frame was reflected and danced like wisp-lights over a grave.

In spite of a strong will, my head now turned towards the gallery, and as I turned I became instinctively conscious of a presence there.

As my eyes pierced the darkness, I could see that a figure was sitting at the balustrade, with both elbows on the rail, two long, white hands pushing back the hair that hung, dead and grizzled, over the forehead.

The blue flames of the log began to multiply. By the ghastly light I could distinguish a greenish-yellow face, drawn as to the skin over prominent cheekbones, looking straight at me with dull, staring eyes. The stare was that of a galvanised corpse; horrible but fascinating.

My mouth dried up. I felt that awful shiver, that fear of the supernatural seems to give to the body, beginning with a chill in the ankles and rising up till it seizes the roots of your hair. If I could have spoken I would have addressed the thing, but my tongue refused, and only clung classically to my jaws. "Vox faucibus hoesit."

The fingers long, and, oh, so thin! brushed the hair back spasmodically; the wizened lips drew back and up across the yellow teeth in a diabolical grin that would have chilled a gravedigger. The laugh was there, but no sound except the moaning diapason of the distant organ.

Digitized by Google

Then the figure rose, spreading her arms and tossing the tangled dead hair over her meagre shoulders.

With a movement like the vapour that rises from a marsh at night, the vision passed on along the gallery, turning three times to fix that stony stare and hideous smile on my scarcely beating heart; when, with a scream like a night hawk, she opened the door in the wall, and, still looking at me, walked out into the rays of the moon, when the door seemed to close of itself behind her.

No sooner had the presence disappeared, than with a violent shake I recollected myself. It must be some mad woman, some family skeleton, broken from confinement. Follow her I must or there might be some dreadful tragedy before the morning.

But how? I had no knowledge of the moat's topography, and I could not wake all the household at such an hour. Necessity is the mother of invention. Dragging rapidly the tables and chairs on to the top of a walnut cabinet I managed to get a firm grip of the balustrade, and without much difficulty succeeded in getting over the oak into the gallery. The planks were rotten and thick with dust, and even gaped ominously beneath my feet. How the maniac could have passed as she did was incomprehensible. It was only by striding across chasms in the broken floor that I reached the far end.

When I arrived there the door was locked.

What was I to do?

But no. The key was inside. It could not be locked at all.

Seizing the twisted iron handle of the door, I prepared to wrench the key, when lock and all came off in my hands, rusted with age from out the rotten wood. The door swung slowly open, and as the moonbeams struck me I saw that the door in the wall opened on to an abyss!

At forty feet below was the still waters of the moat without a ripple, reflecting the bridge that crossed it in the winter brightness of the full moon.

Horrible! The wretched creature had been drowned!

Closing the door, and climbing swiftly back to my room, I seized my light, and, putting on my dressing-jacket, rushed off to Carwinkle's room, feeling some step must be taken ere it was too late.

As luck would have it, as I got into the corridor leading to his room, he came out and, seeing me, put his finger on his lip, saying:

"My poor baby is worse. I cannot sleep."

"So sorry, my dear Carwinkle; but there is worse than that."

"What can possibly be worse?" he said, with a tremulous lip.

"Some woman has drowned herself in the moat."

"Woman? Drowned herself?" said Lord Carwinkle.

"Yes. I saw her pass along my gallery."

"Good Heavens! Then you have seen her? My poor babe will die."

* * * * *

The baby-boy did not die; but a day or two after I left Milburgh Moat I heard that Carwinkle's beautiful wife had stepped over the causeway of the bridge, and met death by drowning just beneath the blue-room door.

How do they account for it? JOHN PORLEY.

The Way It Came About.

BLANCHE BARTON walked over to the window before she answered. She seemed to be counting the tops of the trees in the park.

"You are in love, my dear boy," she said at last without turning—"infatuated, and naturally you think her all you say. You may be right, of course; there is always a chance of that——"

"You are jesting," he said stiffly. "I had hoped, at least, to have your serious attention in this matter, considering our long-standing friendship——"

"My dear boy!"

"Or perhaps it didn't amount to friendship, after all?"

"Why, of course it did, George. How can you be so childish?" she said, coming towards him with outstretched hands. "Dear friend, it is only because I am anxious for your happiness that you have mistaken my little bit of misplaced pessimism. I am sure she is all you think her. I know her so slightly that I cannot possibly be expected to do anything but agree with you, which I do. Everyone knows, of course, how beautiful she is——"

"I sometimes wish she weren't," he said, half sighing; "it gives a man like me such a very poor chance. You see, her people expect her to make a brilliant marriage, so how can I dare——?"

"But you must. 'Faint heart,' you know; and, besides, if she is all you think her—and I'm sure you are right—you are doing her a great injustice in supposing she would ever marry just for the sake of making a brilliant marriage. You say you have reason to believe that she has somewhat singled you out, and that were you not so poor a man you would have dared some time ago. Don't you think you are giving your money-powerful rivals a very good start if you avoid her, and are afraid to go near her, and won't show how you feel and won't speak? You aren't behaving like a man in love, even if you believe you are acting unselfishly and honourably, and she may think so too. Besides, don't you think you are just a little selfish in all this?"

"Selfish?"

"Yes! You say you are afraid to think it, but you dare to hope she cares for you. If that is the case, and she is the woman you believe her to be, her only hope of happiness in life will be with you. It isn't necessary to dwell upon whether money would make up for the lack of sympathy and love, is it? If you are mistaken as regards her feelings towards you—oh, I am only saying if—why, at all events, you will have been chivalrous enough to have sacrificed—shall we say your vanity?—in the chance that you may be doing what she most wants in the world."

Digitized by Google

"You are right, you are right, you are always right," he exclaimed, pressing both her hands earnestly.

"I think I'm right—I don't know why; I only feel—and I'm a woman," she supplemented softly as she wiped a tear from her cheek, and smiled through others that gathered in her eyes and threatened to follow.

"You are an angel." He said it tenderly.

"Go, there is a dear boy, and do what I say—no, don't mind about my foolish tears; they'll be over in a minute—and George!" she called after him as he was closing the door, "come back here as soon as you can—I want to congratulate you, you know."

"Yes," he said. "God bless you, Blanche," and he was gone.

Then she put her hand to her throat, to try and stop the lump that was rising there, and called "George, George, come back!" but he was beyond the sound of her voice by then. She buried her face in the cushions of a settee, and cried out all her poor, lonely, breaking heart. Then she pulled herself together, straightened her dress, and went to a glass.

"Ugh," she said, smoothing her hair, "a pretty picture, truly! And he will be coming back, but not for a time, a very long time. I ought not to have made him promise to, poor boy, but he will forget, with her—Oh! my hateful red eyes—I'm going off, I'm losing my looks—no wonder he comes to me for advice about his love for another woman. I hate him," she cried fiercely. "Ugh! I hate him!" and she stamped her foot passionately, and cried a little more.

"I'll burn his letters," she said, going over to an escritoire, and unlocking it with a key hidden in the folds of her dress. "I'll burn his letters, and his photograph, and everything that reminds me of him. I'll not be at home if he comes back. I'll never be at home to him again——

"His letters!" and she laughed bitterly, and a little wildly, at the packet held at arm's length with his photograph on the outside, all so carefully tied with pale blue ribbon. "His letters! Only friendly little notes, kind and all that, but not a word that signifies love, and yet I always fancied I read it between the lines. What an imaginative fool I was! I'll open the packet and pick one out just haphazard, and see if I can find a meaning between the lines to-day."

She burst into a peal of laughter, and tore the sheet of paper into shreds; then she read another, and another, tearing them up as she read.

"What a splendid blaze these will make!" she mused, with a bitter laugh, looking at the heap in her lap. "Still, the very chilliness of them would, I should think, damp the ardour of the fire. Now for the photograph!" and she scrutinised it carefully, critically, and coldly. "Poor thing! and I have wasted my life for you! This is the first day I have seen you just as you are. Good eyes—yes, the eyes are good—irritable nose, weak chin, cruel mouth—— Heavens! is that the bell?" and, eventually realising the situation, she prepared for a rapid exit, lifting her dress as she went to prevent the torn letters and photograph from falling to the floor. But before she accomplished her flight the door opened quickly, and George Cranstoun was there.

"Oh!" she cried, horror-stricken at the sight of his face, and forgetting the general absurdness of her appearance. "How white you are—— George! she hasn't——" but he had sunk on the settee and buried his face in his hands. "Dear boy!. I wish I could comfort you," and she sat beside him, forgetting all about the miserable letters in her lap. "George!" she said softly and soothingly, "George, dear!" and she knelt before him, letting the bits of paper and photograph and everything scatter about the floor.

He moved his hands from his face and looked at her helplessly, scarcely noticing the litter about him which she was trying, with little hysterical laughs, to pick up, or cover up, or hide in some way.

"George, dear, don't look; I mean, tell me about everything," and, in her excitement, she put her two little hands over his eyes; but before she had done this, he saw, to his bewilderment, his own face staring at him from the carpet.

She put her knee on it, and said coaxingly:

"Now dear, dear George, don't be unhappy! I will comfort you, console you, help you! Let me try. We won't talk about her any more," and she still kept her hands over his eyes.

"She's engaged to old Ingram—she's preferred a peer to a pauper!—small shame to her! You don't care now, do you, now you know she has no heart?"

He didn't answer, but he moved her hands gently from his eyes, and kissed them, and tried to raise her; but she laughed hysterically:

"Please don't, George, I'd rather stay here," and she looked anxiously round at some far-off bits. But he put his arms about her and lifted her up beside him, and she sat staring down at the murder which was out.

"Now I will pick up this débris," he said quietly, "and my poor self, who has been so ignominiously trampled in the dust. And my letters, too, I see—I can't help seeing."

He piled the fragments in a heap and laid the photograph upon it. "We can hardly have the funeral pyre in here!" he said laughing. "Where shall it be?"

But she only stared helplessly at the heap with wide, red-lidded eyes.

"Blanche," he said softly, taking both her hands, and looking into her face very steadily, "Blanche, you said just now that you would comfort me, console me, help me. I know you said it, hardly knowing what words you used in your desire to hide this," pointing to the heap on the floor. "Was it the more sincere because of that? Tell me, Blanche, tell me!"

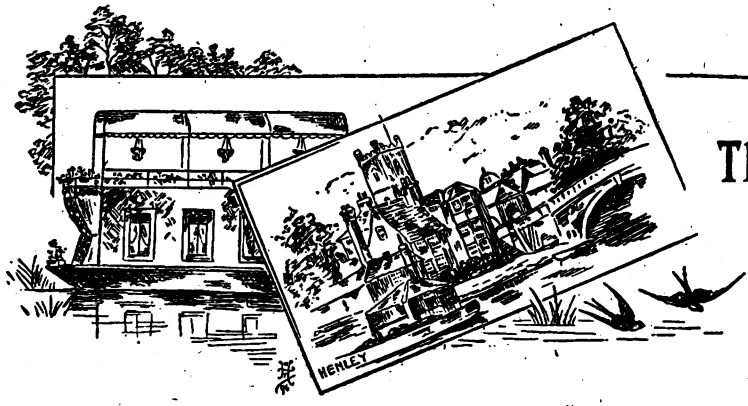
"Why do you want to humiliate me more?" she answered, turning her face away.

"I don't want to humiliate you, dear, but everything in the world now depends, for me, upon whether you meant those words or not. Tell me, Blanche."

"We will have the funeral pyre first," she answered, "before I tell you." And she cried a little more, and he tried to comfort her, and they had the funeral pyre, and she told him.

Mary Keegan.

Digitized by Google



The Ransom of Wealth.

It was a glorious Sunday in June. Boulter's Lock was full—so full that it was a matter for wonderment how the boats could all have got in. Launches, punts, canoes, and rowing-boats jostled one another unceremoniously, while the sun smote down upon the confused, hot, struggling humanity who occupied the various crafts.

There was but one house-boat in the lock—a gorgeous floating palace, resplendent with gold paint and luxurious hangings: on board a collection of ladies and their knights, lolling at ease in deck-chairs beneath an awning as white as the clouds that chased each other across the summer sky.

The owner of the boat—a wealthy stockbroker, by name Tester—sat in the middle of his guests, by his side a girl, clad in some soft, white, clinging material, that only heightened the delicate beauty of her face.

Her eyes rove round over the mass of boats below her. Suddenly a faint colour rose to her face as she bowed smilingly towards a Canadian canoe where two men lay, comfortably enough, amid all the turmoil of the lock.

One of the men raised his hat. The other looked curiously at the house-boat and the girl who sat there enthroned upon it.

"Who is it, Dick?" he muttered.

"Lady Evelyn Tremayne," answered his companion curtly. "Look out, man; the gates are opening;" and in a few minutes the canoe had shot out into the sunlit river, while the house-boat swept on behind the fussy little launch, its tug.

Dick Harwood followed the craft with his eye until a bend of the river hid it from view. He had grown very silent all of a sudden—so silent that at last his brother officer, Captain Peterson, of the 43rd Dragoon Guards, felt constrained to fathom the mystery of his quietude.

"Stunning sort of girl Lady Evelyn Tremayne looks!" he remarked. "I never knew you were a pal of hers. Daughter of the Earl of Purdock, isn't she?"

"Yes," answered Harwood shortly. He didn't seem communicatively inclined, but Peterson was determined not to be thus put off.

"Where did you meet her?" he went on. "Come, let me into the secret! I'll be as dark as the grave."

"I met her first at a soirée, at the Earl's house. My father and he—the Earl—were old college chums; I have been round there three or four times since. That chap sitting next to her was Tester, one of the richest men in London. Old Purdock is jolly hard up, and I believe that he wants to recoup himself by selling his daughter to him! Ah, it makes me sick!"

Peterson whistled softly. "By Jove, Dick!" he said, "I never knew you had an affair. I thought you were above such things. Never mind, old chap——"

"It's all over now," broke in the other savagely. "Thank goodness we're ordered off to India on Wednesday. Perhaps Jubbulpore and the station life will knock it out of me! Anyhow, I don't mean to think of her any more."

And so the matter ended for the present, but it was with an aching heart that Dick Harwood leant over the taffrail of the outward bound troopship, a few days later, reviling the fate that kept him from England and the side of the girl who held his heart, who was as far away from him then as he was from Tester's riches.

James Tester himself was one of a class by no means uncommon. The son of a country lawyer, he had, by means of a clear, though by no means unscrupulous brain, pushed himself into the front rank of the army of the nouveaux riches.

Gold, he had found, was the "Open Sesame" to many an otherwise unattainable end. Gold brought luxury, luxury begat friends, among them the Earl of Purdock, who, in the rich stockbroker, saw at length a means whereby his slender purse-strings might be enlarged.

A mansion in Park Lane, a shooting-box in the Highlands, a steam-yacht. These and more did Tester own. Neither was he, like so many of his class, a blatant, overbearing Crœsus. Indeed, he was possessed of a certain amount of good looks, could speak the Queen's English, was in every way an ideal son-in-law. Yes, for Harwood was right. The Earl had chosen him as the future husband of Lady Evelyn.

Poor Lady Evelyn! Poor Dick Harwood! Love had entered their lives from the first moment they had met. Yet Dick was poor, poor at least among those in whose society he moved. The 43rd was an expensive regiment, and now he had gone to India. He had seen her, perhaps, for the last time, and she was to marry James Tester, though hope still lingered in Dick's heart.

And so six months rolled away. Tester had declared his love, and had been accepted. The Earl was jubilant, and everyone congratulated Lady Evelyn to her face, and sneered at her behind her back.

The wedding-day was fixed. Then came the first bolt from the blue, in the form of an impassioned letter from Harwood, telling Evelyn that his love had grown to such dimensions that he felt he must write to her, bidding her try and wait for him, to at least write and assure him of her love. A mad, hopeless letter, which was never answered, though the reading of it brought a blinding mist of tears into the girl's eyes, as the full truth of what this marriage of hers was dawned upon her.

Digitized by Google

But she thrust the letter away among her most cherished possessions. It was only a dream, only a sweet, sad, hopeless dream.

The marriage was a most gorgeous affair. The presents were numerous and costly. Everyone was loud in praise of the bride's beauty, envious, too, of the thousands that would now be hers.

The honeymoon was to be spent in Scotland, at Tester's own Highland seat. And now came the second blow to Mrs. Tester's happiness, that happiness so well assumed, and, therefore, by so much the more a cruel mockery.

She had bade adieu to her father, who, flushed with champagne and heartfelt relief at the end to his own straitened circumstances, had kissed her with more than usual warmth. Suddenly a cablegram was brought to her. Outwardly calm, she took it and thrust it into the pocket of her travelling-dress. What could it mean? Dick! It must be Dick! What could it mean?

On the first opportunity she opened it. And as she read it, she realised to the full what it meant. Her heart seemed to stop still within her. Merciful heavens! It was too cruel! For these are the words she saw, and they seemed to burn into her brain till they were stamped upon it in letters of liquid fire:

Uncle dead—Left me fortune—Coming home—No need to wait now.—Dick.

"Too late! Too late! Oh, Dick! Dick! What will you say? What will you say?"

* * * * *

October had come. The Scotch moors were glorious with purple heather, the hills beyond golden and red with the tints of autumn, and at Glenarchy—such was the name of Tester's mansion—was assembled a goodly company of "lords and ladies gay" come thither to assist in the slaughter of Tester's grouse.

And among the guests was Dick Harwood, late of the 43rd. It had been a tremendous blow to him, this marriage of Lady Evelyn. He had left Bombay in a fever of joyous anticipation, chafing at the weary miles of ocean that still lay between him and his love.

In the blindness of his devotion all thoughts of Tester had fled. His Evelyn would never have been coerced into marrying the stockbroker, Crœsus though he were. No, no. Speed on, good ship, speed on to home and happiness!

Tester had been profuse in his invitation.

"My wife and I will be only too charmed to see you," he had written. "I can offer you good shooting, and I don't think you will be bored, at least, not if Evelyn and I can help it."

And so he had accepted Tester's cordiality; he felt he must see Evelyn—though it could but mean pain for them both—must feast his eyes for a few short weeks upon her face. Then it would be good-bye to his hopes. He was rich now—pah! what good were his riches?—and he would be off away into the world, he and Tammil, there to try and forget the one real passion of his life.

Tammil would make an excellent companion—an Indian whose life Harwood had saved in a hill raid, and who had from that event followed his master like a dog, sworn to serve him till the death.

The pallor seemed to have deepened on Evelyn's face, and in Harwood's eyes she was more lovely, therefore, than ever she had been before. He longed to see her alone, to speak to her for a few moments unobserved, to tell her she had wrecked his life, but for days no chance was given him.

At last, one evening, the opportunity came. It was a lovely night, warm as it sometimes is in October, and Harwood had asked Evelyn if she would care for a short stroll in the garden that flanked the house.

She had looked up at him piteously and then, with a forced smile, consented.

Harwood lit a cigar, and together they paced the trim walks that ran between the shrubs and bushes dotted here and there. For a while neither spoke.

"Dick!" It was Evelyn who first broke the silence. "Dick, forgive me. I——"

But the next moment her voice died away, for she was in Harwood's arms, and he was kissing her madly, breathing out the while heartbroken words of love, the love pent up within him now so long.

But presently she broke away from him. The tears were streaming down her face. "Dick! Dick!" she murmured. "This is wrong, wrong! You forget——"

"Forget," broke in the man, his voice trembling with his passion, "I wish to heaven I did! Forget! Is it forgetfulness to hunger for you for years, to think only of you, to make you more than anything else in heaven or earth? Ah, you can't understand. It is all one to you whether a man's life is blighted or not so long as you have your every whim gratified. But what—forgive me, forgive me! I am a brute—worse than a brute! Don't cry, Evelyn, don't cry, or you will drive me mad."

There was a gentle rustling sound in the bushes behind them. But neither heard the noise, nor did they see the little dusky figure that stole away, to be swallowed up in the gloom.

* * * * *

It was an ideal day for the grouse. And the birds were plentiful, and every one of the men were keen sportsmen. Luncheon was to be in the woods that decked the hills behind Glenarchy; there the ladies were to wait the coming of the men.

They were nearly at the appointed place, when suddenly Dick Harwood, mounted on a sturdy Highland pony, dashed up to them, his face white with horror, his eyes only for one, the woman he loved.

"Mrs. Tester, I must speak to you for a moment, in private; ladies excuse me!" There was a ring of authority in his voice that was not to be withstood. He led Evelyn apart: "You know Tammil, my servant; he has shot Mr. Tester—killed him; and he has himself committed suicide. On my honour I had no hand in the affair. But he is an Oriental! He acted according to his lights! He must have overheard——" But Evelyn had swooned away.

* * * * *

The following is from the Times some sixteen months later.

"At St. Paul's, Knightsbridge, by the Right Rev. the Bishop of London, assisted by the Rev. John Jones, Evelyn, only daughter of the Earl of Purdock, to Richard Gordon, eldest son of the late General Harwood, K.C.B."

J. le B. Martin.

Digitized by Google

PASSING ACQUAINTANCES.

When I was about thirty years old, I went fishing one day on the banks of the Cher, near Saint-Avertin. It was in the autumn, a little warm, but quite pleasant near the water. I had installed myself in an excellent place. At my feet the brownish-green water wound tranquilly in and out between grassy banks, daisies and field-flowers grew on either side close to the water's edge. I had a long day before me, and no unpleasant neighbours to disturb me in my enjoyable occupation.

I had unhappily reckoned without my host. About three o'clock I saw appear, behind the poplars, a couple who placed themselves on the other side of my rod about ten feet distant.

They were a middle-aged man, and a lady young and very pretty. The gentleman, clean shaven, clothed entirely in black, had a very correct air and a very severe countenance; the lady, in a grey dress and straw capote trimmed with blue ribbons, was blonde, plump, and very lively. They carried a fishing-rod, and the husband made his wife sit down while he adjusted the rod and arranged the bait.

Without appearing to watch them, I soon perceived that they were novices in the art.

"Good!" thought I. "They are amateurs and will not trouble me unless they frighten away the fish with their chattering."

They caught nothing. On the other hand, in less than an hour I had my basket half-full. My neighbours were still unsuccessful. Finally, the young woman, disgusted, threw down her rod and slowly strolled towards me. At the moment she reached me, I landed a large perch, and I took a mean pleasure in leaving him flopping about on the grass before putting him into my basket.

"Oh," cried the young woman, "what a beautiful fish!"

Then, in an insinuating voice, she added:

"Monsieur, how do you catch so many fish while we have not been able to get even a bite?"

I was young then, and, though I was always timid in the presence of women, I was not insensible to a pretty face. I replied, therefore, as gallantly as I could:

"Oh, madam, it is only that you do not understand. To fish with a line is a more difficult art than one thinks. But if you will follow my advice I will show you how to fish. Here, seat yourself, and I will prepare your hook."

I showed my pupil the tricks of the rod, of which she seemed to be entirely ignorant. After a few instructions she did fairly well. The spot was a good one, and the fish allowed themselves to be taken.

At each lucky pull of the line, the little lady laughed like a child, turned towards her husband, who, gravely smiling, seemed very happy in his wife's joy and thanked me with ceremonious politeness.

At last the afternoon waned. About six o'clock we stopped fishing, and I was about to take leave of my companions, when the young woman ran to her husband and whispered to him. He listened with a thoughtful air, evidently a little startled. After a moment I saw them coming towards me, but it was the lady who said to me:

"Monsieur, you have been so kind to us that we cannot leave you in this way. It is owing to your goodness that we have caught these fish, and it is but right that we should eat them in company. Will you give us the pleasure of dining with us?"

The gentleman added his invitation to that of his wife. They urged me in such a cordial way that I accepted, and we went to Saint-Avertin.

At the "Three Pigeons" the husband asked for a private room and ordered dinner. We were pleasantly served in a room where windows opened wide upon a garden filled with flowers.

The fresh air had sharpened our appetites. Besides our fish we had roast fowl, asparagus, a tart, and Vouvray wine. I was seated at the right of the pretty lady, who laughed constantly, and she did not leave my plate or glass empty for a moment.

The husband was less jovial; he wore a constrained smile, and even the wine did not have the effect of loosening his tongue. At certain moments he seemed almost embarrassed. I had taken upon myself the duty of carving the fowl, and sharpening my knife, I cried gaily:

"Pass the fowl to me, I know how to carve, and I can cut off heads in great style."

I was astonished at the small success of my pleasantry. The husband reddened to his eyes, his wife turned pale, and a dead silence reigned in the room.

They were very reserved about their affairs. I had put adroit questions, because I was anxious to know with whom I had dined, but they answered in a very evasive way. All that I could learn was that they were staying at Tours, and that they lived at Orleans.

When we had taken our coffee, night had fallen and it was time to depart. I had done justice to the repast, and was very gay. Before leaving I thanked them warmly for their hospitality, and declared that I had never enjoyed myself better than in their society. That made the young woman smile, and I cordially extended my hand to her husband, who, after a moment's hesitation, gave me his. I shall never forgot the strange sensation I experienced when I grasped that icy hand.

"I hope that we may meet again," I said, "when I may have the pleasure of returning your hospitality."

"I do not believe that," he said, with a singular accent. "We leave Tours to-morrow. Adieu, monsieur."

In fact, I never did meet them again at Saint-Avertin, although I went every Sunday. I often thought with pleasure of the good dinner which I had eaten at the "Three Pigeons."

* * * * *

Three months passed. One day I was exceedingly busy at my desk in the office, when someone entered and presented at the wicket a cheque. In those days we frequently had cheques presented for payment for public services. I took the paper, without looking at the person who handed it in, to my chief to sign. Returning I was curious enough to read it.

It was an order for three hundred francs to be paid to the bearer M. Bleiger, "High Executioner."

What was my horror when I reached the wicket to recognise in the "high executioner" my host at the "Three Pigeons" and the husband of the pretty lady.

I then remembered that an execution had taken place at Tours the day before my fishing excursion.

I had dined with the headsman!

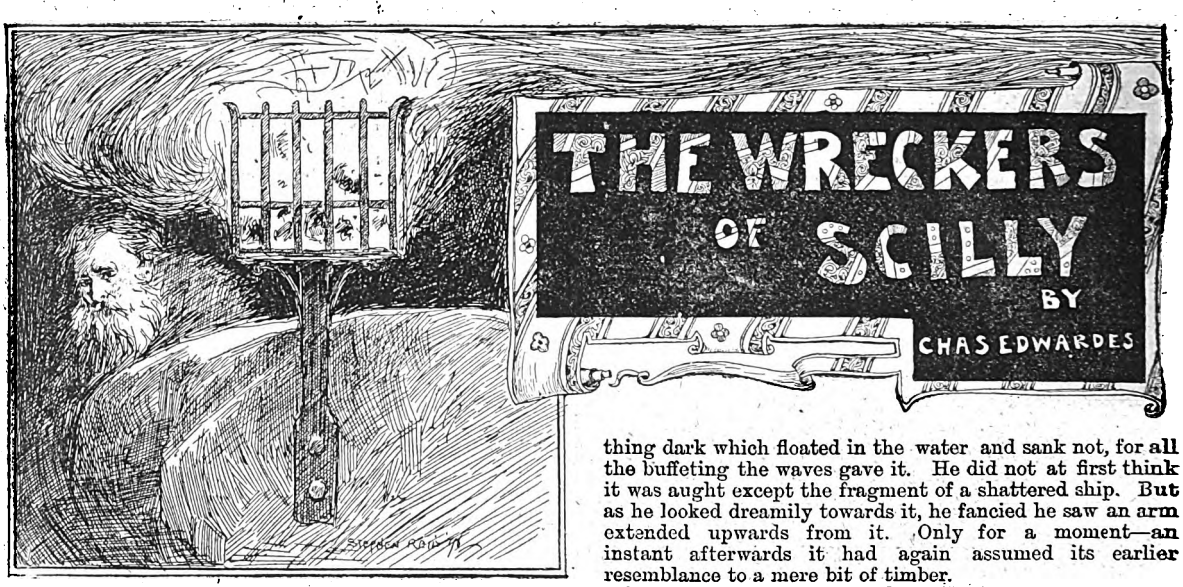
A. D.

Digitized by Google



SUMMARY.

The scene is laid at St. Agnes, one of the Scilly Islands. The inhabitants live by the booty obtained from vessels wilfully led to destruction by false beacons. The only two exceptions are Nigel Prideaux and Damaris Nance, his sweetheart. Manuel Nance, Damaris' father, is Nigel's greatest enemy. The King Hal, a warship laden with Spanish plunder, is lured to destruction, and wrecked off Troy Town.

CHAPTER V.

Cast Up by the Sea.

From high ground above St. Warna's Bay, Nigel had seen how his fellow-islanders treated the miserable castaways from the wrecked ship.

He watched them with gasping breath, and his hands clutched as if he were trying to hold something hard against opposing forces.

Over and over again he ejaculated the words: "By St. Nicholas!" or, "By St. Martin!" and made as if he would leap down the rocks and join the others. It was his uncle who had taught him to think highly of the saint that was held in such great esteem in the French town of Tours.

There was something almost frightful in the expression of his young face, as he looked down upon all this bloodshed in the pale morning radiance. His brows were ribbed like an old man's, and when he was not muttering to himself the words that seemed able to relieve and restrain him, his lips closed tightly with the firmness of one who held mighty duties which he meant to fulfil.

Yet what could he do? Nothing, simply nothing. He had to acknowledge as much to himself; and so, with a sigh, he turned away from the sickening scene, and let his eyes range over such of the sea and the coast-line as was within his vision.

"I will not dwell longer in this accursed isle," he murmured. "If only we twain, and none others, could get from here, then, for aught I should pine about it, the Almighty might overwhelm St. Agnes from Priglis Bay to the end of the Gugh, even as he did Sodom and Gomorrah. And I misdoubt me if Sodom and Gomorrah at their worst did such deeds as these I have seen this day—with womenfolk and children gazing the while too, as if it were a revel. Troth! There must be a sorry reckoning against Manuel Nance in the books of the Archangel—may his daughter's innocence stand in abatement of his eternal doom!"

Thus letting his eyes roam here and there over the surf in the coves, it chanced that anon they were held by something dark which floated in the water and sank not, for all the buffeting the waves gave it. He did not at first think it was aught except the fragment of a shattered ship. But as he looked dreamily towards it, he fancied he saw an arm extended upwards from it. Only for a moment—an instant afterwards it had again assumed its earlier resemblance to a mere bit of timber.

But this one instant sufficed for Nigel.

"If I may this day save one poor soul from the fate of those others, I will account myself happy, and St. Agnes less sinful," he said impetuously to himself, as he hastened down to the inlet towards which the object was little by little being impelled.

Happily this inlet was quite sheltered from notice by the islanders in the larger bay. The whole headland of Troy Town intervened as a screen.

Nigel's joy was much intensified when, after watching for several minutes, he again saw the thing, this time but a few yards out. He bared his legs quickly that he might rush to it, and wrest it from the water ere another receding wave should delay its landing. Fortune favoured him. A stupendous inrush of the sea lifted the thing high towards the beach; and, at manifest peril to himself, the youth leapt forward, caught it in his arms, and, even thus burdened, resisted the backward sucking of the wave.

It was a man bound to a slab of cork.

There was a recess hard by, just above high-water mark; and thither Nigel carried his booty.

There he laid the body on the stones and examined it. At first he did not doubt the life had gone from it. The lifting of the arm in the water was probably the last effort against the doom that seemed inevitable. The face was so pallid that it argued of death almost as eloquently as a fleshless skeleton.

But Nigel knew better than to be convinced by tokens, even so strong as these. He hastily stripped off the wet doublet from the man's body, careless of the fine lace with which the velvet was fringed. Then he took off his own jacket, and, having stretched the man on the ground where it was smoothest, he alternately gave him what warmth his own warm body could afford by contact, and did his utmost to excite the lungs to revive their operations.

A violent spasm in the man was the first sign of returning vitality. Then Nigel waited with an incredible pleasure. He continued his exertions, and was more delighted than ever when, after a recurrence of these convulsions, the man vomited some sea water, and thus gave his lungs the moving space they demanded.

For half-an-hour the youth did not relax his efforts. By that time Sir Francis Seymour—for it was he—could sit up and ask questions in a weak voice. But Nigel discouraged him from this by at first refusing to answer, and signalling him to be quiet.

Digitized by Google

After, however, he saw that the life was again growing vigorous in him, he told him briefly and as softly as possible that his eventual safety depended entirely upon his prudence. If he would rest content to obliterate himself for a while, means should be found to transfer him to the island of St. Mary's, if not to Cornwall. Otherwise, he (Nigel) would not answer for his security one hour.

"And the others, good youth?" whispered Sir Francis.

"Are with their Maker, fair sir, or elsewhere."

"Then how—by what chance——"

But here Nigel interposed. Having at length persuaded Sir Francis to his own profit, he drew him yet farther into the inlet, where a small cave ran at right angles to the passage.

"Rest here, in faith, sir, and unless I be impeded I will speedily return with the wherewithal to aid the strength in you."

"I am content," was Sir Francis' reply.

It was, however, no easy task that Nigel Prideaux had undertaken. When he returned to the village he found the men and women in a tumult of excitement. Already an iron-banded box had been cast up by the waves, and the bursting of it had declared the gold pieces with which it was stuffed as tight as the hair in a firm cushion. Moreover, the box had the number "5" painted roughly upon it, which argued an unparalleled amount of plunder eventually for the islanders.

Manuel Nance was issuing orders and restrictions in a sharp tone.

"There must be no idling this morning, good friends. Every man of you has his appointed task. Ha! And thou too, shuffler that thou art, Nigel Prideaux!" he added, catching sight of our friend. "By all the saints, we shall none of us lack money in our purses as long as we live, if we act stoutly."

The men were meantime collecting as much rope as they could accumulate from their houses, and splicing one piece to another. As for the women, they seemed to have forgotten the scenes of an hour or two ago. They were rinsing their dishes or cutting up potherbs, or feeding their poultry, as if sticking knives in the hearts of shipwrecked men were an everyday affair with their relations. But while they attended to these domestic labours, their tongues wagged loudly about the good things all this gold would bring.

To hear them you would have looked to find in a month or two all their cottages transformed into palaces like that of Westminster, and they themselves clad in silks and lace, with ropes of pearls round their bronzed necks, and each with a jewelled watch pendant from her waist.

"Come, lend thy hand, Nigel," said one of the men, passing a rope towards another. "'Tis time thou hadst work of some sort on thee."

He laid the body on the stones and examined it.

"Good James," whispered our friend, "spare me for a while. I will be with thee in a trice."

"Go, then, and see what the Captain will say. I dare thee do it."

Nigel himself saw that he was in some difficulty. In spite of the argosy that had come upon St. Agnes, he could mark the animosity of Nance's look towards him. Perhaps it was heightened by a sort of envy of the youth, that he alone of the men had no share in the remorse for the bloodshedding that would some day, if not now, be their portion. More like it was but the old hatred which a bad man at his worst can hardly help feeling for one whose deeds and disposition are good rather than evil.

But the thought of the poor fellow in the cave, doubting what his fate was to be, emboldened him.

"I shall hazard it, come what may," he said to the other, and he passed on towards his own dwelling.

Digitized by Google

The strident voice of Manuel Nance was, however, upon him ere he had made five steps from the workers.

"Didst hear my words, sirrah, or hast peas in thine ears? Get thee to work."

"I will not evade the task, Master Nance," replied Nigel. "I do but desire a bite of bread."

"Then be quick, thou guzzler. By my faith, we have borne with thine airs and reservances too long. Thou art a very crow among a set of eagles. Gramercy for it."

At this there was a laugh. But Nigel cared not. He entered his cottage at once, and called Ban "the idiot boy."

"For Mistress Nance, Ban, you understand," he said as he took a leaf from a tablet book that was on the shelf, and wrote some words on it.

The lad's dull eyes acquired a gleam of cunning intelligence, as he nodded his head and pushed the tablet under the folds of his doublet.

"Yes, thou catchest my meaning perfectly," added Nigel in response to an inquiring look in the boy's face. "Be shy of Dame Cochran chiefly, and speed thee by the yard door."

Having thus done what he could in aid of Sir Francis, Nigel rejoined the other islanders with as ready an air of goodwill as he could assume. It mattered little that he did what he was able to bring the treasures of the wrecked ship to land. That, at any rate, was no wrong to his conscience.

But it was a difficult business, even with the calming of the sea, as the day drew on towards eventide. Their aim at first had been to tether the ship, to prevent, or at least obstruct, its removal by the tide when this was strongly on the ebb.

This design, however, they abandoned when, from the overhanging rocks, they could see how little of the framework of the vessel remained in its place. The hull had been torn to pieces, and only the forepart still clung entire to the rocks which had impaled it.

After many trials, however, a cable was made fast between the shore and the ship, to be used as a thoroughfare for the adventurers who dared to get on board the wreck. These, thanks to the subsidence of the wind and tide, were able to descend into the hold, and, after much stumbling and risk they came upon what they held to be the ship's treasure chamber. There were swelling bales of mercery, half or more spoiled by the sea, but still worth removing. Also cases of seeds, and packed leaves which none of them knew for tobacco. But best of all were the boxes of Spanish loot, church ornaments of gold and silver gilt, patens, chalices, and monstrances, some studded with jewels, ill cut, but precious. And with these, in a chamber, in a closet adjacent, were distorted figures of men and monsters, some as tall as an arm, and of solid silver, with coarse streaks of paint on them. Sacks of feather-worked dresses, and shields, spears, bows, arrows, and knives, also decorated with feathers of different colours, were further witness that the King Hal, in transhipping the booty of the Santa Trinidad, did but deprive the Spaniard of much that she had no claim to except by the right of conquest.

All these valuables were hauled ashore by the cable, and as they were deposited and opened, the women folk greeted them with cries and babblings of delight.

But it was not until evening that more of the gold pieces, which were of the best the King Hal could offer to her spoilers, came ashore. With the return of the tide two other boxes showed themselves. These, added to the first, made a barrel full of the coins.

Of the more miscellaneous articles washed up there seemed no end, from empty casks and spars to such trifles as the leathern purses in which the soldiers aboard had kept their silver pieces.

Of corpses, too, there were not a few. These were at once buried in another grave dug by the side of the greater one. It was left open, too, for the sea was not likely to give up all its dead in an hour or two.

The evening of this eventful day closed so fair and serene that it might have seemed as if nature meant to mock the skeleton of the King Hal, swaying faintly on the rock that had killed it.

The sea lay like a silver pool, and the black teeth of the islets set in it were like tourmalines embedded in the silver. The sun descended in a coral flush, and for long after its disappearance the lovely twilight lingered over the islands and the silent water.

The plaintive lowing of the St. Agnes kine, and the songs of birds, gave the crowning touch to a scene that appeared all idyllic and innocent.

But the islanders themselves held a carouse when the stars were out that was not wholly in keeping with their fair surroundings.

It was felt by all but two or three that such unexampled good fortune, and such arduous and memorable labours to secure it, deserved to be exceptionally celebrated.

The women folk greeted them with cries of .... delight.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER VI.

The Comedy in the Cave.

Meantime, little Damaris had been entertaining Sir Francis in the cave under the headland of Troy Town.

When the milking of Mary and Nell had been done, and the cream of the previous day had been set aside for shaking, the girl's thoughts turned afresh to her lover. She had not seen him since they had parted after the salute he had pressed upon her.

Then, as it happened, word ran up to the village of the finding of the gold and other treasures.

Dame Cochran's joy now almost exceeded the bounds of decorum. She ran to and fro, singing snatches of song, and telling briefly how so rare a day's sport recalled the time of her youth, when on one night a whole fleet was wrecked between the Gugh and Annet, and gold was so common that the children played chuck-farthing with the pieces.

"Go to thy chest, wench," she cried, "and get forth thy richest bravery. If ever there was a white-silk day in the calendar, this is one."

Damaris was about to make objection when she saw the idiot boy, Ban, prowling about the fence of wrecked timber which parted the fowl-yard from the garden, in which the potherbs and roots were grown. The old woman also espied him.

"First," she added, "send that loon yelling with a box on the ear. By my troth, 'tis an evil hour when his fool's face was licensed to show where it lists. He and his master are a pair, and a wise man were needed to say which of them is the greater ninny."

"Of that, nurse," said Damaris hotly, "methinks thou art no efficient judge. Even were Nigel Prideaux the fool you term him, 'tis said none but the wise may judge of a fool."

"Saucy thing, go to——"

Damaris needed no further bidding. For she had a thought that Ban might, as at other times, have come with a message for her.

In effect the message was soon and deftly delivered. Though short of wit, the idiot had craft enough. And making a pretence of stooping to see to the hens in their house, the girl read Nigel's lines, and learnt his bidding.

"Of thy courtesy and love, sweetheart, hie thee to the cave with a bend on the Annet side of Troy Town, and take with thee milk and meat for him thou shalt find there. He is, or I am deceived, a man of rank. Thy Nigel was happy enough to save him, but thy father has put it out of my power to do what is still needful for him. Thy Nigel."

With the echo of this injunction in her mind, Damaris now, with maiden eagerness, undid the chest in which her finery was wrapped.

"A white-silk day, thou saidst, sweet nurse! I would not foil thy wishes, and so it shall be a white-silk day."

"Marry, and thou art strangely obedient. It half inclines me to make thee keep to thy stuffs. After all, thou wast not in the making of the day, and it does not beseem thee to flourish as if thou, too, hadst cut men's throats."

"I pray you, nurse, speak not of such deeds. I care not how I be tired."

"A plague on thee, girl. Was ever such a gad-about! Dress thee as I said thou shouldst, and let's have an end on't."

Even the cross, ill-bred old woman could not stay her tongue from admiration when Damaris had duly put on the white silk gown she had taken from the chest. It was puffed at the sleeves with crimson satin, and embroidered in front and across the bosom with silver lace. The girl's heightened colour did but add to her loveliness.

"Well-a-day, well-a-day," sighed the dame. "That Nance should be dad to such a daisy! Get thee gone, child, or I shall be envious of thee. But be shrewd not to mire thy finery."

"That I will, sweet nurse," answered Damaris cheerily.

He trod towards her with parted lips.

She tripped into the dairy on her way out, and hid under the old mantle she threw over her shoulders a pot of new milk and a small cake. Further, she took with her the breast of a capon and a flask of French wine, of which her father had good store.

Then, as fleet of foot as a St. Agnes sheep, she bounded up the slope behind the house, and by a devious path reached the cave.

Here her heart began to beat within her. He was a stranger, and she was a veritable house-bird. What should she say to him; and in what way should she conduct herself to a man of rank? Once, she minded, the steward of the isles had rowed over to St. Agnes, and she had been bidden curtesy low to him, and offer him a posy of flowers from her garden. But that was when she was a barelegged little lass, but twice as old as young Obadiah. She would not curtesy now to any man—except perhaps to Nigel, and that more in merry mockery than from reverence and awe.

But while she stood thus questioning herself near the cave, Sir Francis had set eyes on her.

"Queen of Heaven, what's here?" he ejaculated, and he trod towards her with parted lips.

When she turned to go to him therefore she met his gaze.

"I give you good-day, sir," murmured the girl; "and I have been bidden bring you that which shall keep you from hunger."

"And right welcome it is, fair damsel," said Sir Francis. "Yet the sight of such as thou in such a place is even more abundantly gladdening. I entreat thee—who art thou? Has Scilly also its Virgin to whom men's knees should bow? By my soul, had I but known it, the worthy ship need not have thus gone to the bottom with all her gold. Thou wouldst have made intercession for us, or I read not mercy and sweet compassion in thine eyes."

Digitized by Google

Damaris moved away with a short curtesy.

"What wouldst have me do, sir?" asked Damaris, looking at the knight with flushed face. She did not entirely comprehend his flatteries, but her maiden instinct bade her be on the alert.

"Art thou of Scilly?"

"Surely, since both my father and I were born here on St. Agnes."

"Is this then the horrid isle of St. Agnes, where the men live by misdeeds, too foul for thy coral-tipped ears to hear tell of?"

Damaris drew herself up, and looked at the knight. For all his stately air and the spoilt splendour of his dress, she would not hear her birthplace spoken ill of, much though it might deserve it.

"Thou thyself, sir," she said, with panting bosom, "art a witness of our doings. Hadst thou lived to say such things if a St. Agnes youth had not saved thee from the sea that desired thee? There is none nobler nor more comely in all the world than Nigel, and it sits ill with such magnificence as thine to abase us who are thine hosts."

"I cry you mercy, lady," rejoined Sir Francis, now more than ever astonished.

But Damaris interrupted him.

"I am no lady, sir. My father is plain Manuel Nance, of St. Agnes, and I am his daughter. It was sorrily done of you to be so ungracious to our Nigel."

"Marry, and how could I have known what wrath I was exciting, pretty wench?"

"How now, sir? I may not be a lady, but neither am I 'pretty wench' for such as thou. My nurse, when she is sour, may call me that; but I know not you, sir—save that Nigel desired me to tend you."

With a shrug of the shoulders, Sir Francis extended his palms, as if to show the jewelled rings upon his fingers.

"Damsel of St. Agnes, I know not what to say to give thee pleasure. I would fain not show myself ill-bred; but me thinks young Nigel—be he whom he may—has absorbed all the kindness from thy tender heart. For this meat, I give thee cordial thanks; the hands that bore it have sauced it as no French master-cook could. And now, of your charity, maiden, admonish me, if thou canst, how I may arrive at Plymouth. Tell me, too, of my shipmates and men. Are all lost but I? Heaven was under no great compulsion to be so hard to them and kind to me. Enlighten me, that I may have somewhat to think upon in this my melancholy dwelling-place."

The knight's attitude while he spoke had so touching a semblance of distress in it that Damaris's eyes filled with tears.

"Pardon me, fair sir," she replied tremulously. "I am simple-bred and cannot talk aright with gallants. Nigel shall come anon and give thee news. I know not what may happen, but from what they tell me it would be unwisdom in thee to appear without word from Nigel. And even then"—and she sighed—"I doubt if he could save thee; for between Nigel and the rest there is but scant goodwill, and all because he is of nobler make than they. As touching the other voyagers, I know not, fair sir, save that they lie buried in rows where the grass is saltest."

"May their souls rest in Paradise!" observed Sir Francis mechanically.

"And ours follow them," added the girl. "And now, I pray you, excuse me, sir, and may you break your fast with appetite."

Damaris moved away with a short curtesy. Something in the expression of Sir Francis' face made her feel ill at ease.

But the knight detained her. Even the irksomeness of his temporary confinement in the cave seemed to him as nothing compared to the pleasure the sight of Damaris's beautiful young face and form gave him. An hour ago he was in the humour to throw himself into the Atlantic, and see if a second time he might trifle successfully with it. But now he had forgotten his misfortune. There was that in his heart which told him that Cupid (a divinity with whom he was on good terms) was again domiciled within him. And he welcomed the visitation. For Sir Francis was one of the multitude of men who, surpassingly bold in war, are of very inflammable affections. He was therefore not at all disposed to lose sight of Damaris all at once, and perhaps for ever.

"I entreat you one moment," he replied, making as if he would half bar the entrance. "Tell me if I may look to be gladdened again by your coming."

"I do not doubt, sir, that Nigel will attend to the needs of thy body," replied Damaris, with a little scorn.

"You misread my meaning. It is thyself I would see again. Thy fair eyes, sweet lips, dear heart, have stricken me to the soul. I could endure the lack of these (pointing to the milk and eatables), but without sight of thy angel face methinks I must surely starve, though Nigel spread me a table daily as fat as the one let down from Heaven for the feeding of the Apostles. Dost take my meaning, beauty?"

The girl had listened with heaving bosom.

"I am not so dull, sir, but I understand something of all thou hast said. Fair sir, be advised. I know not why I should interpose my weak body (though there are weaker ones) behind thee and danger, for thou art stout of arm. But I tell thee if Nigel comes and catches thee saying words like these into mine ear, he will be tempted to befriend thee no more. And what thou wouldst do without him I trow not. For thou surmisest aright, fair sir: they are cutters of gullets and men of stony hearts on this island, and they allow no tale-bearers to wander where heed may be given to what they say. And so, for thy profit, I conjure thee to look not at me with such eyes, and be less honied in thy language."

Digitized by Google

"Marry, my pearl, I love thee the better for this homily," exclaimed Sir Francis. "But since thou lovest Nigel, I may e'en put on sackcloth."

"Troth and you may, and say no more about it. But I'll bide no longer, and so farewell."

This time the knight made no offer to detain her, though he followed her with eyes of undisguised admiration.

Nevertheless, he was not to lose her that moment. She reappeared in the cave, with a finger across her lips:

"'Tis Nigel himself," she whispered. "I know his manner of striding by the sound. Beware how thou conductest thyself."

"Incomparable creature——" began the knight, but the youth's coming put a period to the ardent compliment that began to break from his lips.

"Ah! I find you so. It is well," Nigel exclaimed. "And I have this to say, that if thou'rt willing, as doubtless thou art, this very night, two hours after sunset, I will row thee to St. Mary's."

"Thy hand, my bonny Nigel," and to his surprise the knight drew from one of his fingers a sapphire ring, which he put upon the youth's hand. "By the token of this blue stone, know that Sir Francis Seymour will never fail thee and thine at a pinch. Let it be done to-night, in the name of heaven. I weary of this cave. Moreover, worse may come of it, I fear, and of that I'd make confession in the presence of this fair maid who loves thee so."

"I said not that I did," broke in Damaris, with a show of indignation.

"It recks not. 'Tis a matter in which the eyes speak for the heart. But hear me out. I, too, would fain be out of reach of so much beauty, for I come of a hot-blooded race. Dost catch my meaning, good Nigel? I see thou dost. And so all things conspire to urge thee to get me off thy island without delay. I tremble to think of what might happen didst thou hide me here a week, and daily send me such a victualler. There, I've eased my mind."

To moor his boat.

Nigel had listened impatiently to this rigmarole, and his discomfort was increased by the smile on the knight's face, and the gradual brightening of the countenance of Damaris. But when the girl turned her gaze upon him he was won to humour the man in his strange speech.

"I am glad, fair sir, to hear thee speak thy mind so candidly," he said. "For the ring I thank thee, though I need it not."

"And I," added Damaris blithely, with an arch look that renewed the knight's passion, "rejoice to think thou art not what I took thee for. There be they, as Scripture tells us, which vaunt of doing right, and go straight and sin; but there be also others who make a pretence of foolishness, and lo! act wisely after all. Your magnificence is not among the fools."

"Come, come, Damaris; they will look for thee at home," interposed Nigel. "Nor was it needful, sweetheart," he added in a whisper, as they went together towards the mouth of the cave, "to deck thyself like a queen for such a ministration."

"It was to do thy bidding, Nigel," she replied, with a proud look that made her match her apparel.

"So then, noble sir, be ready," exhorted the youth, returning to Sir Francis, who had watched this brief confabulation with a touch of bitterness at the heart. "I will not fail thee, except all things be against me."

"And as I live, get me to England, and thou'lt find no surer friend at Court or elsewhere, within his ability, than Sir Francis Seymour."

"I give Sir Francis Seymour generous thanks," said Nigel with a bow. "But if thou hadst been Sir Francis Seymour's scullion, I would not have ventured less than I have to save thy life."

This said, Nigel dallied no longer, but went away to moor his boat somewhat nearer the cave.

(To be continued.)

NEXT WEEK

will appear the opening chapters of a new serial story, entitled,

THE SHADOW HAND,

By Louis Tracy,

author of "The Final War," "An American Emperor," etc., etc.

A STORY WITHOUT WORDS.

£10 in Prizes.

On page 214 four sketches are given in their proper order. £5 is offered to the reader who sends us the most appropriate wording to go under each sketch, the whole to form a story descriptive of the illustrations, and £1 will be given to each of the senders of the next best five attempts.

It is not necessary for competitors to have any literary ability. If you have a good idea, surely there should be no difficulty in putting it down in words. The whole of the story is limited to one hundred words, which may be distributed under the sketches according to the judgment of the competitor.

All that you have to do is to write in the order of the sketches the wording that you think most appropriate, enclose your attempt in an envelope (which should be marked "Picture Story"), and forward it to this office before Monday, February 15th.

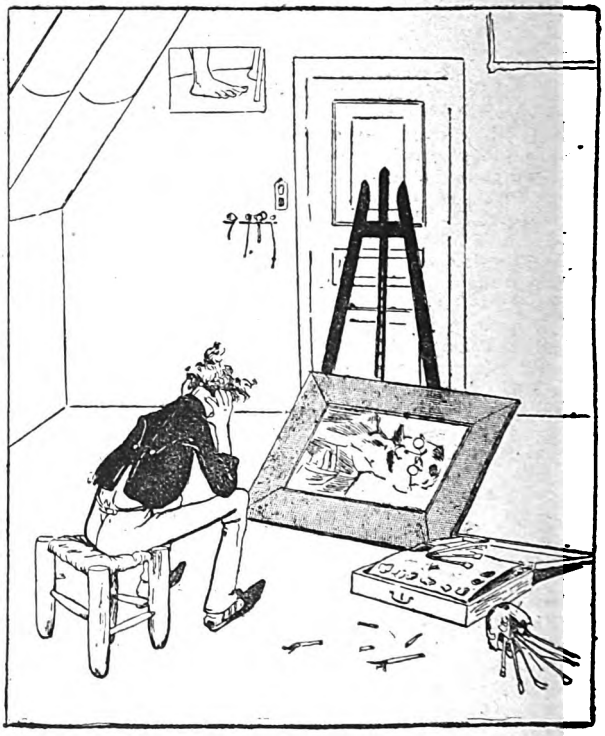
Digitized by Google

A STORY WITHOUT WORDS.—No. 3.

See page 213.

1

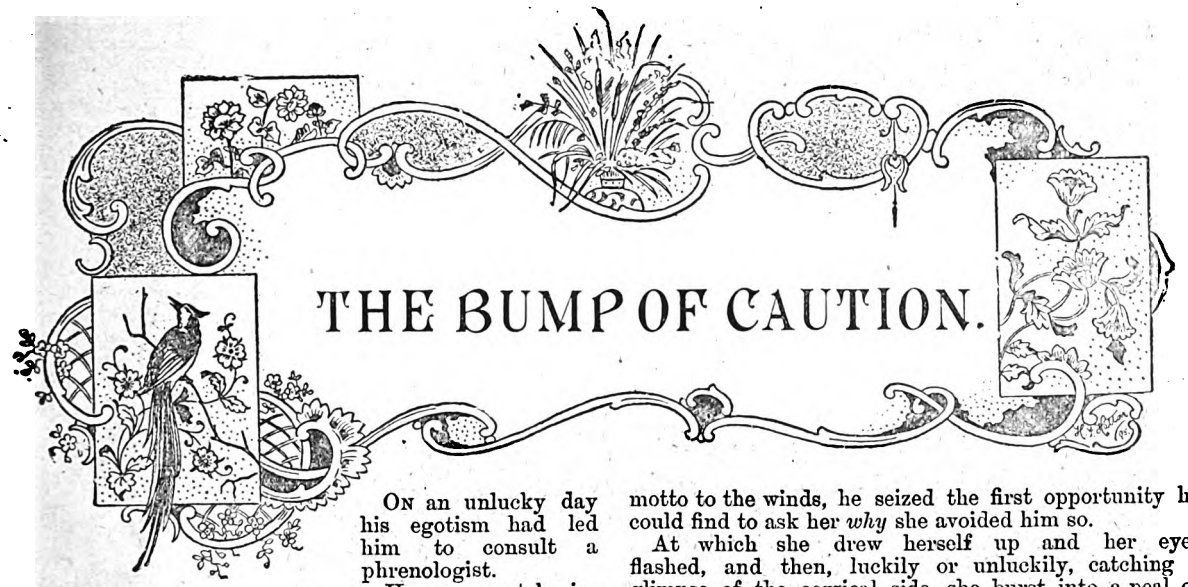
2



3

4

Digitized by Google



THE BUMP OF CAUTION.

On an unlucky day his egotism had led him to consult a phrenologist.

He was acutely interested in what he heard, although he thought he had known it all before.

One thing, however, astonished him much—he lacked caution.

Now, caution was a quality he had many times despised in others. Caution and cowardice he used to think fairly synonymous when he had considered the subject at all, which was seldom. Had anyone hinted to him that he was cautious, he would have been highly indignant.

However, when the phrenologist suggested the absence of it, it was as if cold water had been suddenly and unexpectedly thrown over him.

Evidently, from his tone, the phrenologist looked upon the absence of the quality as a serious want.

"Humph!" he ejaculated moodily as he walked home. "Humph!" he ejaculated again in the midst of solitude and tobacco smoke.

Now, he was a very good fellow, there was no question about that, and he was as open-hearted, open-handed a man as ever lived.

It could not be said that no one spoke ill of him, for he had his slanderers, but they were few. His friends were many, and some of them loved him.

"Caution!" he muttered as he threw away the end of a cigar and proceeded to pick out another. "Caution!"

It must be explained to his credit, or discredit, that he was in love—very seriously in love indeed—but he had not yet asked the all-important question which was expected and awaited with unseemly impatience.

"Suppose she only means to make me ridiculous, and a topic for afternoon tea—the sort of thing she's done to poor old ——" he thought in the middle of a big puff. "By Jove, I'll not run the risk of that! Forewarned is forearmed. Henceforward 'Caution' will be my motto."

The next time they met his manner struck her as being distinctly chilling, and she froze accordingly.

For days, even weeks, she avoided him pointedly. She flirted desperately with another fellow, to that poor fellow's undoing. At last our would-be cautious friend could stand it no longer, and, throwing his self-imposed motto to the winds, he seized the first opportunity he could find to ask her why she avoided him so.

At which she drew herself up and her eyes flashed, and then, luckily or unluckily, catching a glimpse of the comical side, she burst into a peal of irresistible laughter and left him feeling very small indeed.

However, she avoided him less, and her smile for him had more warmth about it.

He was a man and therefore weak, and his attentions became more marked than ever again.

One evening he came upon her alone in the conservatory, sobbing her very heart out. Forgetting everything he rushed to console her, and, in seeming to fail to do so, he was just on the verge of pouring out his whole heart at her feet when, in his agitation, he grasped his head, unwittingly, but much after the fashion of the operatic tenor. Alas and alack! quick as lightning his brain ran. Head! Bump! Caution! Good Heavens! What a narrow escape!

He rushed and got her a glass of iced water. He meant to tell her one day, of course, for he loved her very dearly, but he wanted to be quite sure about things first. He didn't know what he meant, but that was what he thought. And so, lest he should run into the mouth of danger again, he decided to go away and think it over.

* * * * *

She wondered what had become of him; she neither saw him nor heard from him.

Then someone told her he had gone away, but no one knew where.

He was never seen in any of those eminently civilised quarters of the globe where people go. Where could he be, and why, why had he behaved like this, she thought as the weary months dragged themselves, oh, so slowly away.

What was it? — why was it? Her woman's instinct had told her so plainly that he loved her. There were prettier girls than she was she knew, but most of them had no brains. He had liked clever women—and then she could boast of being attractive as well. Surely, surely he had not gone away after some mere physical beauty. If so, he would come back to her in the end, she thought. But, oh, how the months dragged! Each one seemed like a year, and as such seemed to add so many years to her age.

She was beginning to look quite old, she thought, going off dreadfully. Oh, what a blessing! Her brains, at least, were left her.

Digitized by Google

Then she began feverishly to write a little, then a little more. At last the feverishness subsided somewhat as she began to be more interested and put it into her work.

It soothed her marvellously.

* * * * *

Meanwhile he was spending the months in a little out-of-the-way Breton fishing village, alone, and getting more and more morose each day.

Perhaps she was married, he thought. Oh, very likely. She had probably never cared for him, but was not averse to a little flirtation with a fellow who was not a bad sort of a chap after all. And he drew himself up to his full height and thumped his chest and smiled in a satisfied way.

He was not a prig, oh, dear no! but Caution had brought him to this. A poor, badly used, good fellow he thought himself as he puffed away at his pipe in the seclusion of his bare little tile-floored room in the village inn.

He snapped at people in the most inconsequent way, and the children about were half afraid of him. He had a dog, though, a faithful fellow whom he looked upon as his only friend, and in whose long, expressive, silky ears he unburdened himself from time to time.

After about eleven months had crawled themselves away, and the spring had come round again, his old self began to stir once more.

"We'll go back again to civilisation, old fellow," he said, as "old fellow" yawned very widely up in his face and licked his hand; "we'll go back to town and see what the world looks like. What do you say, eh?"

And "old fellow" wagged his tail and pricked up his ears, and that very day they were off.

The journey seemed interminable. He was all suspense and anxiety mingled. Put her out of his mind he could not, think ill of her he could not; but his gladness at the thought of seeing her, his fear lest—— Great Scott! would the journey never end? Why, in Heaven's name, had he come away so far? Why, why had he stayed so long?

He paced up and down the floor of his carriage, reviled the slowness of the train, roared at the guard in very bad French, and behaved generally like a savage.

However, there is an end to everything, material at least, so he arrived in London.

He drove like a madman to his chambers, where he had wired his return, changed his clothes, blackguarded his man, and though it was then late in the afternoon, our once so cautious friend rushed off like a fond schoolboy to the object of his first affections.

The chilling "not at home" had the effect of a bucket of cold water, and he went down the steps very much like "old fellow" would have done after a sound chastisement.

This frame of mind did not last long, however. When he got back to his rooms he raved at his man again, and behaved in a manner so extraordinary and unusual that his Solomon-like and forbearing servant humbly suggested he might be hungry, and behold! like mists before the sun, suspicion and bad temper vanished. A-a-h, yes. He would dine.

Then he wrote and asked her when he might call.

At last her answer came.

* * * * *

She met him without the least change of colour, and her slim hand was held out with a friendly good-fellowship air about it.

He had expected her to be different somehow. He had pictured her blushing under his look and a general sort of tremulous, shy gladness at his return after so long.

From her manner they might have parted yesterday.

He was far more disconcerted. She was certainly prettier, though, he thought.

She was politely inquisitive as to what he had done. His hand trembled so that he could hardly hold his cup.

She chatted away about people they both knew, and laughed merrily now and then. He tried very hard to laugh, but somehow he could not. Something seemed to be gripping his throat. He became conscious that he must be staying a very long time. He had made up his mind to speak, but, somehow, nothing seemed in any way to lead up to it, and she was so dreadfully matter-of-fact.

But he could not bear the suspense any longer.

"Do you—do you——" he stammered.

She held out her hand for his cup. "Do I mind giving you another cup of tea?" she smiled, affecting to help him out.

"Do you care for me at all?" he blurted out desperately.

"Care for you!" she echoed, her eyes and voice expressing blank surprise.

"I love you so much!"

She raised her eyebrows incredulously. His desperation and the awful suspense made him blind to these telling details.

"Yes, I love you, and I have loved you so long. If you knew how I am suffering, you would not keep me in this suspense." He would have taken her in his arms, but she waved him slowly back.

He was frozen.

"I will not keep you in suspense," she answered in a low voice. "I do not love you—I loved you once," she continued, growing more earnest and speaking rapidly, "loved you as I think never to love again, and you—well," with a bitter little laugh, "you didn't appreciate it, to say the least; so after a good deal of trouble I've cured myself, and nothing in the world will ever bring it back—no, not even your thoughtfulness in returning to me after a year!"

Her eyes were blazing scornfully now. "Do you see these papers?" with a little wave of the hand. "I am beginning to work! I am in love with that now, and have no room for any other. I am sorry," she added, her tone softening as she caught sight of an expression of awful pain in his face. "I am sorry if you are suffering, for you have made me suffer, and I have known what it is to feel for many months what you are feeling now. You were forgiven some time ago. Will you forgive me now?"

"Yes," he said brokenly, "for, God help me, I have brought it on myself."

"Work," she said to him earnestly, "and you will find what I have found—peace—the best of all."

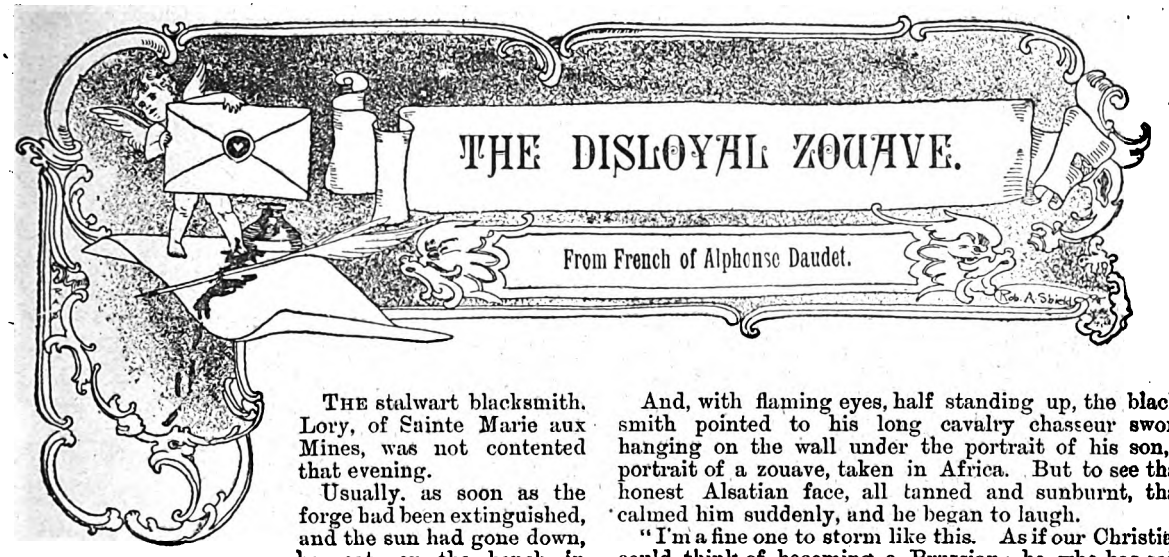
When she was alone a lump came into her throat and she could work no more that day. M. K.

ASTERISK LETTER COMPETITION.

On page 197 will be found a sentence in which the central letters of each word have been dropped, and an asterisk substituted.

Two guineas will be given to the reader who sends in on the back of a post-card the paragraph which most closely resembles the original. All attempts must reach this office by Monday, February 15th.

Digitized by Google



THE DISLOYAL ZOUAVE.

From French of Alphonse Daudet.

THE stalwart blacksmith, Lory, of Sainte Marie aux Mines, was not contented that evening.

Usually, as soon as the forge had been extinguished, and the sun had gone down, he sat on the bench in front of his door, and enjoyed that comfortable lassitude which results from hard work and the heat of the day; and before sending the apprentices home he drank one or two long draughts of fresh beer with them, while superintending the departure of the fabrics. This evening, however, the good man stayed in his forge until it was time to sit down to supper. Then he again returned to it as if with regret.

Old Lory's wife was thinking as she watched her husband: "What has happened to him? . . . Has he, perhaps, had bad news from the regiment, which he will not tell me? . . . Perhaps my eldest son is ill. . . ."

But she did not dare ask anything, and only occupied herself in silencing the three little fair-haired children, who, laughing round the tablecloth, were devouring a good salad of black radishes à la crême.

At last the blacksmith, pushing his napkin away in anger, exclaimed:

"Ah, the cowards, the wretches!"

"Of whom are you speaking, Lory?"

He fired up with anger.

"I am speaking," said he, "of five or six scoundrels whom I have seen since this morning lounging about the town, dressed as French soldiers, arm-in-arm with the Bavarians. They are again those who have—what do they call it?—sacrificed themselves for the nationality of Prussia. And that every day we should see these untrue Alsatians return!"

The mother tried to defend them.

"What do you want, my poor husband? It is not altogether their fault. Algeria, where they are sent, is so far! They are homesick over there, and the temptation of returning is very strong—not to be a soldier any more."

Lory gave the table a great thump with his fist

"Be quiet, mother! You mothers—you women—you understand nothing. Forced to live always with the children and living solely for them, you repeat altogether their babblings. Ah, well! I tell you that those men are blackguards, renegades, the worst of all cowards, and if by ill luck our Christian were capable of such infamy, as sure as my name is George Lory and that I have served seven years in the Chasseurs of France, I would pass my sabre through his body."

And, with flaming eyes, half standing up, the blacksmith pointed to his long cavalry chasseur sword hanging on the wall under the portrait of his son, a portrait of a zouave, taken in Africa. But to see that honest Alsatian face, all tanned and sunburnt, that calmed him suddenly, and he began to laugh.

"I'm a fine one to storm like this. As if our Christian could think of becoming a Prussian; he, who has said so much against them during the war!"

Put in a good humour by this idea, the blacksmith succeeded in dining gaily and soon after went to empty a couple of tankards at the "City of Strasburg."

Now old Madame Lory was alone. After having put her three little children to bed, who one could hear murmuring in the next room, like a nest settling to sleep, she took her work and sat darning in front of the door by the garden.

From time to time she sighed and thought to herself:

"Yes, I only wish it. They are cowards—renegades. No matter! Their mothers are very happy to see them again."

She recalled the time when her son, before leaving for the army, was there, at that same hour of the day, in the midst of looking after the little garden. She looked at the well where he came to re-fill his water-cans in his blouse, his long hair, those bonnie curls which they cut when he entered the zouaves.

Suddenly she started. The little gate at the bottom, that one which led to the fields, was opened. The dogs did not bark, although he who had just entered crept along the wall like a robber, gliding between the hives.

"Good-day, mother!"

Her Christian was at last before her in his uniform, his breast uncovered, ashamed, troubled, his speech thick. The miserable one had returned to his country with the others, and during the last hour he had prowled round the house, waiting for the departure of his father, in order to enter.

She tried to scold him, but she had not the courage. It was so long since she had seen him. She embraced him! Then he gave her such good reasons—that he had longed for his home, the forge; to live always far from them, amid that discipline, had become so hard, and his comrades called him "Prussian" on account of his Alsatian accent. Everything he said she believed; she only had to look at him to believe.

Still talking, they entered the room below. The little ones, awakened, ran down, with their feet bare, in nightdresses, to embrace their big brother. They tried to make him eat, but he was not hungry. He was only thirsty—always thirsty—and he drank great gulps of water on the top of the beer and white wine which he had had since morning at the cabaret.

Digitized by Google

But listen! somebody was walking in the court. The blacksmith had returned!

"Christian, here comes your father! Quick! hide yourself, so that I may have time to talk to him—explain to him——" And she pushed him behind the earthenware stove, then began to sew afresh, her hands trembling.

By ill-luck, the zouave shakko was on the table, and it was the first thing that Lory saw on entering. The paleness of the mother, her embarrassment—he understood all.

"Christian is here!" said he in a terrible voice, and, taking down his sabre with a mad gesture, he threw himself towards the stove where the zouave was cowering, pale and sobered, leaning against the wall, for fear of falling.

The mother threw herself between them.

"Lory! Lory! don't kill him! It was I who wrote and told him to come back again, that you needed him at the forge."

She clung to his arm, dragged him, and sobbed.

In the darkness of their room the children were crying to hear those voices so full of anger and tears, so full of bitterness that they did recognise them again. The blacksmith stopped and looked at his wife: "Ah! It was you who made him return. Good, let him go to bed. I will see to-morrow what is to be done."

The next day Christian, waking from a heavy sleep full of nightmares and causeless terrors, found himself in the room of his childhood. The sun, already hot and high, streamed through the little panes of glass framed with lead, crossed by the hop-flowers. Below, the hammer rang on the anvil. His mother was sitting by his pillow. She had not left him the whole night, so much anger on the part of her husband had frightened her.

The old man had not been to bed either. He had been walking about the house till morning, crying, sighing, opening and shutting cupboards. He entered his son's room, gravely, as if for a journey, with his high leggings, large hat, and his solid mountain staff with its spiked end. He advanced straight to the bed: "Well, get up!—dress yourself."

The boy, a little confused, wished to take his zouave uniform.

"No, not those," said the father severely. Then the mother, quite afraid, said:

"But, my husband, he has no others."

"Give him mine, I—I have no more need for them."

While the boy dressed himself, Lory folded the uniform carefully, the little vest, the large red trousers, and, the parcel finished, he passed the cord of the case containing a road map round his neck.

"Let us now go down," said he at last, and all three descended to the forge without a word. The bellows were roaring. Everyone was at work. On seeing the shed quite open, the zouave recollected his childhood. How he had played there so long, between the heat of the road and the sparks of the forge, quite brilliant in the black dust. An access of tenderness seized him, a great desire to have his father's pardon; but on lifting his eyes, the same memorable look met them.

At last the smith decided to speak: "Boy," said he, "there are the tools, the anvil—everything is yours—and all that also!" he continued, pointing to the little garden bathed in the sunlight and full of bees, which was framed in the scented porch. "The bee-hives, the vine, the house, all belongs to you. As you have sacrificed your honour for these things, the least you can do is to look after them. You are master here. I am going. You owe five years to France, I am going to pay them for you."

"Lory, Lory, where are you going?" cried the poor woman.

But the blacksmith had already gone, walking quickly without turning.

* * * * *

There has been, for some few days, in Sidi-bel-Abbe's, at the depôt of the 3rd Zouaves, a re-engaged voluntcer of about fifty-five years of age.

A COMEDY OF ERRORS

is included in the second part of Pearson's Shakespeare, the first number of which was issued on Thursday, February 4th. It is profusely illustrated with sketches drawn expressly for the volume by Sir J. Gilbert, R.A., and the illustrations are considered to form the great work of his life.

Pearson's Shakespeare will be published in thirty weekly parts, each part consisting of eighty pages and costing 6d.

If you appreciate a work of art of this sort, put at once with your newsagent an order for the complete set, and he will deliver them regularly every week without any trouble to yourself.

RESULT OF JUMBLE STORY.

No. 28.

THE BEST THING TO DO.

The Key.

12	55	11	121	51	101	115	102	82
19	122	5	32	84	83	45	111	50
26	3	24	54	86	113	78	92	13
10	1	15	27	20	107	77	118	124
42	8	52	18	95	71	127	110	106
46	75	93	65	125	117	60	81	41
85	21	57	73	74	70	36	109	66
64	22	28	40	91	126	37	116	119
35	30	38	14	25	104	76	89
61	6	128	87	34	69	58	120
105	33	4	88	90	99	108	31
62	23	16	112	100	97	67	48
68	39	114	63	94	9	59	49
98	7	42	44	96	80	79	123
2	29	72	56	103	53	47	17

£2 has gone to Ireland, and the remaining £8 is divided among the following competitors, all of whom were correct:

M. A. Gill, 35, Newlyn Road, Lordship Lane, Bruce Grove, Tottenham.
A. B. Maclachlan, 4, Mildenhall Road, Clapton.
J. Burton, 102, Glenpacke Road, Forest Gate.
Miss Barrand, 13, Oriental Place, Brighton.
G. F. Hill, 83, Anderton Road, Sparbrook, Birmingham.
Mrs. E. A. Holland, 46, Clapton Road, Peckham.
W. H. Fitzgerald, 9, Oudine Road, East Dulwich.
M. E. Burns, The Mall, Sligo, Ireland.

Digitized by Google

The Queen Against Owen

BY
Allen Upward
Author of "Secrets of the Courts of Europe," "The Prince of Balkistan," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XII.

The C.C.R.

The Court for Crown Cases Reserved is a modern institution, whose workings are not always quite understood by the public.

In every case which is tried before a jury there are two questions to be decided. The first is whether the evidence produced by the plaintiff alone is sufficient in point of law to justify a verdict. The second is whether the balance of evidence at the end of the trial is in favour of the plaintiff or the defendant.

The first of these questions is for the judge, the second for the jury. From the verdict of the jury there is, strictly speaking, no appeal. From the decision of the judge an appeal may be carried right up to the House of Lords.

But in criminal cases, where the Queen is treated as plaintiff, there was anciently no such method of reviewing the judge's decision. Now a special court has been established, embracing all the common law judges of the High Court, who sit in a body to decide these questions. It was to this tribunal that Tressamer had intended to resort.

But though the prisoner's legal advisers, both her former and her present one, looked to this court for their client's deliverance from the extreme penalty of the law, the general public turned to a very different remedy, that of agitation, to be exerted upon a very different authority—an impressionable politician in the Home Office.

Up to the hour of her conviction public opinion had ru[illegible] strongly against Eleanor. Whether this was deliberately aimed at by Tressamer or not, it was the consequence of the policy adopted by him. But no sooner had the law pronounced her doom than the tide turned with startling rapidity, and a gigantic agitation was at once set on foot for a reprieve.

Clergymen of mild manners and susceptible hearts went round canvassing their parishioners for signatures to petitions. Legal gentlemen, whose practice did not yet correspond to their own opinion of their deserts, rushed into print with gratuitous opinions on the evidence and the various points in the case. Newspaper reporters, sensitively alive to the first symptoms of a "boom," wrote up the tragic situation with graphic pens. They described the youth and beauty of the prisoner, her gentle bringing up, her desolate condition. Even her relations with the counsel for the defence, of which some inkling had transpired, were freely glanced at, and the reader was invited to sympathise with the despair of the lover as well as of the beloved.

Then the illustrated journals took it up. They had already given pictures of the scene of the crime, of the deceased, and of other characters, including the prisoner. But they now threw away the blocks representing Eleanor, and which had originally done service in America, where they represented a female temperance lecturer of moderate attractiveness, and came out with full-page illustrations, taken in one case from the portrait of the most charming actress on the Parisian stage, and all calculated to feed the growing flame of sympathy with the victim of what was now boldly referred to as a "miscarriage of justice."

The sporting fraternity, too, rallied round Eleanor almost to a man. A tremendous number of wagers had been made as to her fate, and those whose success was involved in her escape neglected no means of bringing about the desired end. And as public sentiment has not yet sunk quite so low as to tolerate petitions and meetings against clemency, the natural effect of all this was to make it appear that the suffrages of the whole community were on one side.

Even the jurymen began to repent their verdict. Several of them allowed themselves to be interviewed by pressmen, and went so far as to state that they had given their verdict with much misgiving, and hoped that a commutation of sentence would follow.

Digitized by Google

Petitions flowed in upon the Home Secretary. Meetings were held, not only in Porthstone and the neighbouring towns, but all over the country. Finally the excitement culminated in a monster meeting in London itself, in one of the largest public halls of the Metropolis, at which the chair was taken by a nobleman, and the speakers included a canon of the Church of England, a Roman cardinal, a leading light of the Wesleyan denomination, a major-general (on half-pay), and an ex-colonial judge.

The office of Home Secretary happened to be held at this time by an experienced member of the legal profession, and it is well-known that trained lawyers are far more cautious in condemning, and usually milder in punishing, than laymen. The Home Secretary wavered. He sent for the judge who had presided at the trial, and Sir Daniel Buller, who had had time to recover from his little pique against the prisoner's counsel, infused his own doubt into the Home Secretary's mind.

At last the Minister issued a decision. It was a thorough specimen of the not-guilty-but-don't-do-it-again order of judgment. It stated that the Home Secretary saw no reason to doubt the substantial guilt of Eleanor Owen, but that as, in his opinion, the evidence was of an imperfect character, and failed to throw a clear light upon all the circumstances of the case, including the motive for the crime, he had advised Her Majesty to commute the sentence to one of imprisonment for life.

The very day that this unsatisfactory announcement appeared, thirteen judges sat side by side at the Royal Law Courts to consider the point reserved.

Charles Prescott represented the prisoner. If the judges felt any surprise at this change of sides they were careful not to express it. Young Mr. Pollard appeared on behalf of the Crown, but he was led by the great Appleby, Q.C., and, as a matter of fact, was not allowed to open his lips once during the proceedings.

Begged Prescott to take her to a seat.

Prescott's argument was long and elaborate. A crowded bar were present to hear the celebrated case, and the feeling was universal among them that he had never shone so conspicuously on any former occasion. He took up the history of the law of murder from its earliest stages, and along with it he traced the gradual evolution of circumstantial evidence. He showed with what suspicion and reluctance the latter had been gradually admitted into our courts, and how succeeding judges had been careful to fence it in and restrain its application. Then he turned to the particular rule of law which Tressamer had relied on in the Assize Court, and repeated and emphasised the arguments made use of by him. He wound up with an impressive appeal to the judges to lean in the prisoner's favour, reminding them of the old maxim that a statute must be construed in favour of life, and asking them to apply the same principle in expounding the common law.

Then Appleby, Q.C., addressed the court. In reply to Prescott's last observations he said that imperfection of evidence was a good ground for commutation of sentence, but none for releasing the prisoner altogether. This was, of course, a reminder to the judges of the Home Secretary's decision, announced that morning. Then he proceeded to argue the case on general lines.

He began by stigmatising Hale's precept as a mere piece of advice to juries rather than a maxim of law. He went on to say:

"The most serious difficulty in following this rule is to know how far to apply it. How much of the deceased's body is it necessary to produce in order to justify a conviction? If the head had been discovered, surely my learned friend would not venture to argue that that was not sufficient. It seems clear that it must be a question of fact in each case, and a question of fact is eminently one for the jury, and where they are satisfied that a death has taken place, it would be the height of folly for their verdict to be set aside because there was not exactly what would enable a coroner to hold an inquest.

"In the present case, however, as a matter of fact, an inquest has been held. The proceedings have gone on all along on the assumption which every reasonable man must have formed, namely, that the body of the deceased had been committed to the waves. To set aside the conviction under such circumstances is simply to encourage crime, and to hold out a guarantee of safety to every murderer who will take a little trouble to conceal the remains of his victim."

When Appleby had finished, Prescott made a brief reply. He confined himself to saying that this was a case of interpreting the law, and not of framing it anew on the ground of expediency. But, he added, even if the court had to decide without reference to authority, he should still be prepared to urge that the danger of convicting one innocent person must always outweigh that of granting immunity to any number of felons, and he reminded their lordships how very rarely such a circumstance as the present occurred in actual experience.

When the judges came to give their opinions it was at once evident that the court was divided. In accordance with old etiquette, the youngest judge delivered himself first, and he, with some hesitation, declared in favour of the prisoner. But the next three all took the opposite side, and did so with great firmness. After them came another who supported Prescott's view, and then one who sided against him. Sir Daniel Buller repeated his decision at the trial, and Sir John Wiseman dwelt with elaboration on the reasons which swayed his cautious mind to the opposite view.

Digitized by Google

But the member of the court who was listened to with most attention by his brethren was Sir Stephen James, who had made a European reputation by his studies in criminal law. His works on the subject were in every library, and his mere dictum carried almost as much weight as a decided case. When it began to be evident that he was going in the prisoner's favour, Prescott took courage again.

His Lordship's decision was brief and to the point.

"When I am asked to apply a rule of law to a state of facts," he said, "and it appears doubtful whether or no the facts are included in the strict wording of the rule, I think it rational to look behind the words to the meaning, and to ask whether the reason for the rule applies with equal force to the facts now before me. Now, the reason I am able to discover for Sir Matthew Hale's rule is the danger of condemning anyone on a capital charge when you cannot be quite sure that a capital crime has been committed. It is no use to say to me that the jury believe this, that, or the other. The jury may believe it will be a fine day to-morrow, but that does not justify me in condemning a man to death on the assumption that it will be a fine day. The question is whether the jury are justified in coming to their verdict by cogent and decisive evidence. In this case I can see nothing of the sort. An eccentric old lady, with a mania for hoarding jewels, has disappeared in the night, carrying her jewels with her. A hand, identified as hers, because of the rings on it, was found on the beach next day. On those grounds, practically, we are asked to say that she is dead. I can only say that I decline to come to any such conclusion, and, furthermore, I am quite satisfied that if Sir Matthew Hale were sitting on this bench to-day he would be in favour of quashing this conviction."

Two other judges at once subscribed this judgment, and finally, when all but the Chief Justice had spoken, it appeared that the court, so far, was evenly divided, and that Lord Christobel held the fate of the prisoner in his hands.

Possibly his Lordship was not ill-pleased at this. He was a past master of dramatic effect, and in his hands the ancient dignity of Lord Chief Justice of England lost nothing of its imposing character. It may be added that it lost nothing of that higher dignity conferred upon it by the Gascoignes of another age. Lord Christobel had shown on more than one occasion that all ranks, even the highest, were equal in the eye of the law as administered by him. He was the scourge of truckling magistrates, and a thorn in the side of those petty tyrants whom our peculiar system allows to flourish in rural districts in the degraded robes of justice.

He did not long keep the court in suspense. In a gracefully-worded judgment he endorsed the arguments of the prisoner's counsel, and pronounced the conviction of Eleanor Owen to be void in law. The prisoner was to be discharged forthwith.

Hardly did Prescott wait for the closing words of the judgment before rushing out to the telegraph office at the entrance to the Law Courts, and despatching a message to Eleanor, who was still in Abertaff gaol.

He followed this up by thrusting a few things into a bag, cashing a cheque, and hurrying to Paddington, where he caught an express for the county town.

Within four hours he was in Eleanor's presence. She had waited for him in the prison, and now put on some outdoor things. He led her to the door, where the governor took a courteous leave of them, and they passed through the gates.

When she found herself for the first time in the open air, Eleanor's limbs shook beneath her. She looked wildly round, as if fearing to behold some disagreeable object, and then begged Prescott to take her to a seat.

They had emerged into a wide, dirty street, formed by the prison wall on one side and a row of shabby little houses and shops on the other. A few boys were playing marbles on the path, and Eleanor never saw the game afterwards without remembering that evening.

The sun was about to set as they took their way by the quietest route to a little public garden in the neighbourhood, where was a grass plot and some seats. There they stopped, and sat down for a short time to decide on Eleanor's future steps.

Eleanor's first words fell heavily on the ears of her companion.

"I almost wish myself back again. Where am I to go now?" And she shivered slightly.

"Oh, Eleanor, don't say that! To-night you must go to some hotel in the town, but to-morrow we will go up to town together, and I will find you lodgings for a time."

She turned and looked at him sorrowfully, not reproachfully, and shook her head.

"No, no. You forget what I said to you before. I have accepted your friendship, and I need not tell you how grateful I am for it, and for your efforts in obtaining my release. But I am still where I was, as far as the world is concerned. They will go on believing me guilty, and while they do I cannot let you associate with me."

"Oh, why not? Surely you know by this time what you are to me? Need I tell you, Eleanor——"

She put up her hand.

"Hush, Charles!"

The word sent a thrill through him. He looked round. Some children were engrossed in a game a hundred yards and more away. The sunlight was fading from gold to crimson across the roofs and chimneys beyond. The whole scene was still and Sabbath-like. A great peace seemed to speak to him, and bid him take courage and hope for better things. He turned again to Eleanor.

"Thank you," he said, in acknowledgment of her tacit confession. "But oh! if I am satisfied, what need you care for others? Listen: I have some money—more than enough to keep us for some years. We will go to Australia, where they have not heard of us; or, if they have, we will change our names. I can join the bar there, and do as well as here. Are you not my only happiness? What are other things compared to that?"

Again she looked at him sorrowfully. Again she shook her head. Then she turned and gazed into the green and crimson of the sunset while she spoke.

"You would not speak like that if you knew me. Do you suppose I have not thought of all these things during my weary prison hours? I have done nothing else since I saw you, since I saw you and know you loved me, Charles. But I must be strong where you are weak. I must decide in this matter without heeding your wishes. I must decide as your mother would, if you asked her. Would she wish you to marry a convicted murderess? I have to speak plainly, because I want you to understand me at once, Charles, and spare me the pain of further talk like this. I shall go to London by myself, and I shall let you have my address on the strict condition that you are never to come and see me till my character stands clear again. You may write to me sometimes, not often, but if you break the condition and come to me, I shall move somewhere else and hide myself from you altogether. Now let us go and find a hotel for me, different from yours."

She made a movement to rise. Charles looked round once more. The children had finished their game and disappeared. The brilliancy of the sunset was dropping into dusk and grey. They were alone in the twilight, beneath the faded trees.

"Eleanor, one pledge that you will not forsake me!"

She turned. Their eyes met; then their lips. The silent, close embrace lasted but a minute, though to both of them it seemed longer than the whole of their previous life. Then they arose and went forth out of their poor paradise, like Adam and Eve, with the world lying empty and desolate in front of them.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER XII.

Under the Great Seal.

Shortly after Prescott had returned to town, he was surprised to get a letter from Tressamer to this effect:

"I want you to give me Eleanor's address. I must see her once more, as I have something of importance to say to her."

Without an instant's hesitation, he sat down and wrote an answer, in which he said:

"You have no further claim on my friendship, nor on Miss Owen's. Fortunately, she is now under my protection, and in a place where you are not likely to find her. Do not expect for one moment that I shall do anything to bring her again within the reach of your dangerous character. Only the memory of your old kindness restrains me from writing in a very much stronger way. I am sorry that I must ask you never to hold communication with me again."

Meanwhile Prescott had been doing his utmost to obtain some further light upon the mystery. But neither his inquiries, nor those of the skilled detective, whom he sent down at his own expense to investigate, had resulted so far in finding the smallest clue to what had happened on the night of the first of June.

He had not seen Eleanor since they parted at Abertaff. He now received a letter from her, in which she fulfilled her promise of letting him know her address. But her letter was so despondent, and showed her to feel her situation so deeply, that Prescott was greatly shocked and grieved.

Two days after he was roused by seeing in the papers this announcement:

"The Porthstone Murder: Discovery of the Lost Jewels.—Last night, while dragging for fish along the shore of Newton Bay, some fishermen brought to land in their net a chest which had evidently been in the water some time. On being opened, it was found to be full of valuable gems. The police were at once communicated with, it being supposed that they were those missing since the night of the murder. They sent for Mr. Lewis, but as he was unable to speak to their identity, Mr. Williams, of Abertaff, who had supplied deceased with jewellery, was wired for, and he came down by the next train and identified the contents of the chest as the missing jewels. It will be remembered that a part of the body was discovered at or about the same place.

"The importance of the discovery is in negativing the theory that the crime was committed for the sake of robbery. But it cannot be said that the mystery which has enshrouded this murder from first to last is in any degree dispelled by this new incident."

While Prescott was still pondering over this discovery, and its bearing on the position of Eleanor and the facts in the case, he received a second letter from Tressamer.

His first impulse was to return it unopened, but he thought this might be doing an injustice, as the letter might contain some explanation, though hardly any excuse for his strange conduct. He therefore opened it.

The letter was a long one, taking up many sheets of paper. After the opening words, it went on:

"I know not what opinion you have formed of me and of my conduct towards Eleanor Owen. Neither do I write in any hope of excusing myself. I am past that now, and I shall soon be past the reach of your anger and of hers.

"Let me begin at the beginning. You remember our childhood, and you know, none better, the bonds between Eleanor and myself. But you do not know that, as children, we were united by those pledges which children sometimes make in imitation of the serious engagements of later life. Of course, as we grew older that passed more or less out of sight, but the memory of it remained—at least, with me.

"I think it was you who first came between us, even at that early age. I used to think she liked you better than me. But why dwell on these things? Let me come on to a later time, the time of her father' death, when I had passed into manhood, and she was passing into young womanhood.

"That was my first opportunity of showing her my devotion, and I did so. I paid off her father's debts, and by the time I had settled everything, and handed over a little sum to her, I had spent some hundreds of pounds of my own.

"Eleanor was grateful. Whether she had any warmer feeling for me at that time, I cannot say. But I thought then that she had, and that she returned my love—not in the degree that I gave it; no, that could not be. Still, the pleasure she took in my company, the trust with which she seemed to lean on me, certainly filled me with the hope of some day winning her.

"I went to work cautiously. I dreaded her being afraid of my passion if I let her see its whole force. I never did. I chained it up when I was with her, and played a mild and cheerful part. I had my reward. At last, the Christmas after her father's death, I ventured to speak. She heard me with no delight, but yet, it seemed, with no great repugnance. Time soon reconciled her to the idea, and before long I had the rapture of hearing her consent to be mine.

"Then it was that I betrayed myself. I let my mad passion peep forth for an instant, and in that instant I was undone. I saw I had terrified and shocked her. I would have given worlds to recall that volcanic outburst, but it was too late. Her feelings, mild hitherto, were soured by the lightning of my intense love. From that hour she turned from me with deeper and deeper aversion, and from that hour my passion grew and grew upon me with the force of mania, till it usurped the functions of reason, morality, prudence, and every motive that guides and controls the life of man, and left me with but one dominating, desperate idea, that I must possess Eleanor Owen or perish.

"I need not dwell on what happened during the next year. How I saw her turning from me with a sickening heart, how I hungered for the tokens of even that mild friendship she had shown me of old, and how even that was denied; how I brooded upon my wrongs till I scarce knew whether I loved or hated her, whether it was passion or revenge that inspired my mad resolve to kill her rather than forfeit my right to her.

"You, yes, you came between us again. God help me! I sometimes think she must have loved you all along, unconsciously. She asked me for your portrait; I refused. She persisted. Then my wrath broke out in an ungovernable transport of jealousy, and I showed—I must have shown—something of the black stuff that was working in my heart. I saw her lose colour. I saw her tremble, and I rushed away to calm myself if I could.

"From that moment I could see that all friendly feeling was at an end between us. She hated me and I hated her; but I would not give her up. The very animosity between us seemed only to feed my fierce desire to have her and make her my slave. Am I writing wildly? Do you start back and shudder at all this? Go on; you have not yet come to a glimmering of the worst!

"I began to grow impatient for a final end to this state of things, and I pressed her to name a day for the marriage. She replied, putting me off. I went down by the next train to have it out with her. And then at last we spoke freely.

"I accused her of having ceased to love me. She said she had never really felt love for me, but only affection, and that I had extinguished that by my own behaviour.

"I asked her what behaviour. She was silent. Then the flood-gates of my wrath broke loose, and I put all my weakness and wickedness before her. Ah, how I spoke! You may think you have heard me eloquent. But you never have. I was that afternoon as one inspired. I stood there on the bare sands alone with her, with the wind rushing past us and the sea roaring in front and the wild seabirds

Digitized by Google

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS IN THE TREATMENT OF OBESITY.

Our corpulent readers will be glad to learn how to positively lose two stone in about a month with the greatest possible benefit in health, strength and muscle, by a comparatively new system. It is a singular paradox that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto, yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight 11b. to 21b. daily, as the weighing-machine will prove. Thus there is no suggestion of starvation. It is an undoubted success, and the author, who has devoted years of study to the subject, guarantees a noticeable reduction within twenty-four hours of commencing the treatment. This is different with other diseases, for the patient in some cases may go for weeks without being able to test whether the physician has rightly treated him, and may have derived no real or apparent improvement in health. Here, we repeat, the author guarantees it in twenty-four hours, the scale to be the unerring recorder. The treatment aims at the actual root of obesity, so that the superfluous fat does not return when discontinuing the treatment. It is perfectly harmless. We advise our readers to call the attention of stout friends to this, because, sincerely, we think they ought to know. For their information we may say that on sending two penny stamps, a book entitled "Corpulency, and the Cure" (256 pages), containing a reprint of press notices from some hundreds of medical and other journals (British and Foreign) and other interesting particulars, including the "recipe," can be had, post free, from a Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn house, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.—Belfast News Letter.

CORPULENCY THE THIEF OF TIME.

That procrastination is the Thief of Time is a truism so obvious that it has no claim to be regarded as an epigram. To more practical purpose it may be urged that Corpulency is, in very many respects, the parent of procrastination. The putting off till to-morrow what can be done to-day certainly becomes a mental habit, but it is unquestionably very frequently begotten by physical conditions which render exertion irksome. That, in the majority of cases, procrastination is easily curable, is one of the considerations suggested by a perusal of Mr. F. Cecil Russell's "Corpulency, and the Cure," whose remarkable popularity is evidenced by the recent issue of the 18th edition. The enormous mass of correspondence which this expert has accumulated, and many extracts from which are included in the 256 pages of this little book, forms the most valuable addition which has yet been made to the literature of obesity. It is specially notable that a very large proportion of Mr. Russell's correspondents who have undergone his course of treatment for the reduction of obesity, emphasise the renewed vigour which they have experienced after passing through the process—a wonderfully rapid one, according to this method—of banishing the superabundant fat. The universal adoption of Mr. Russell's system by corpulent persons of both sexes would increase, by a stupendous percentage, the working capacity of mankind. The rapidly growing popularity of the treatment is due, doubtless, to the author having discarded all the obsolete notions about semi-starvation being requisite to insure comely and comfortable slimness. It is certain that the more the marvellous possibilities of Mr. Russell's system become known, the less will be the tolerance for the laziness of people who decline to reduce their overweight by the pleasant and facile means which are described in this little book, which can be had, post free, by forwarding two penny stamps to Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.—Liverpool Daily Mercury.

WASTE ACCUMULATIONS OF FAT.

What is described as an important medical discovery was recently made by F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Bedford Square, London, who has given long and intelligent study to the origin of the disease of corpulency. Mr. Russell has discovered—or rather invented—a medicine for the reduction of fat, which, from a long list of testimonials now before me, appears to be attended with the most remarkable curative results. His remedy differs in essential particulars from the Newmarket, Dusseldorf, and other well-known thinning systems. Its effect is not merely to reduce the amount of superfluous fat, but, by affecting the source of obesity, to induce a radical cure of the disease. Moreover, it entails no unpleasant restriction in diet, no exhausting "constitutionals," and no sudorifics and high temperature vapour baths. Here is a man who practically meets you with a handful of simple British herbs, and has performed the very extraordinary task of removing 14lb. of waste accumulation in seven days. It is merely a vegetable medicine, agreeable to the taste, and possessing such valuable tonic and invigorating qualities, that its use is often continued by the patient when the prime necessity for its administration is past. Mr. Russell makes no secret of its composition. His book is only two stamps—cheap enough indeed—send for it.—Leeds Times, January 9th, 1897.

CURIOUS EFFECTS IN THE TREATMENT OF CORPULENCY.

The old-fashioned methods of curing obesity were based upon the adoption of a sort of starvation dietary. Would any reader now believe that by the new orthodox treatment a stout patient can take almost double his usual quantity of food, and yet decrease one or two pounds of fat daily for a time? This is very singular, and directly hostile to previous opinions held by medical authorities, yet it is a fact. The author of the comparatively new system in question explains that the person under treatment is restored to a healthier state in the small space of 24 hours, having lost probably two pounds of superfluous deposit, the organs display great activity, and more food is required. By standing on a weighing-machine the proof of reduction is incontrovertibly shown daily. In serious cases, a pound to ten pounds weekly loss is registered until the person approaches his or her normal weight; then the diminution becomes less pronounced, the muscles firmer, the cure is effected. Compiled reprints of medical and other journals, and interesting particulars, including the book entitled "Corpulency, and the Cure" (256 pages), containing the "recipe," which is quite harmless, can be obtained, post free, from Mr. Russell, of Woburn House, 27, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., by inclosing two penny stamps.—Dublin Weekly Freeman.

Digitized by Google

wheeling and screaming far away. Oh, it was a grand hour for me! The frenzy mounted to my brain. I felt like a destroying angel. I took her miserable girl's heart in my hands and rent it in twain and cast its miserable pretences to the earth. I showed her myself, my manhood, my ardour, my passion, my devotion. I terrified her, awed her, fascinated her. For a time I think I had almost won upon her to yield.

"But my power forsook me. No sooner did I see the first symptom of returning tenderness in her, or what I mistook for it, than my hatred and rage departed; I was melted in a moment; I flung myself in front of her on my face, and implored her with sobs and tears to give me one little spark of love. Fool that I was! Fool! Fool!

"She took advantage of my weakness. Doubtless she despised me for it. She made me one of those mincing, lying answers that women know how to make to us in our madness, and she took courage at last to rise and leave me lying there—lying there with my face upon the wet sand, and the wet rain beating down upon my head, and the moaning tempest rising over me in the heavens, like the awful eruption of maniacal hatred that was working its way into my being within.

"I got up at night and came away. I suppose I still looked and acted as if I were sane. At all events, the people I passed said nothing to me. I packed up and left for Abertaff that night.

"With me I took an object which I had picked up on the sands where Eleanor had sat. It was the key of the house where she lived. When I caught sight of it it seemed like an inspiration. In an instant I resolved to make use of it to execute my vengeance. Since I could not marry Eleanor, I would kill her.

"But in the train a more subtle scheme presented itself. If I killed her she would be lost to me for ever, and I still longed for her as madly as at any time. The new idea which I had got was this. I would kill, not Eleanor, but her friend and benefactress, and I would do it in such a way as to cast the stain of guilt on Eleanor herself. You see the plot. Her life was to be in no real danger. The body was to disappear, and hence she was to escape a trial. But the horror and condemnation of the whole world were to be turned upon her, and then, in her hour of blackest misery, I was to come forward and say: 'I love you still. I believe in your innocence. Come with me to a foreign land as my wife, and I will make you happy.'

"I need not tell you much more. I came back by road for greater secrecy, and did not arrive in Porthstone till eleven at night. I was not tired. Some superhuman power had taken possession of me, and in all I did I felt as if I were but a passive instrument in its hands.

"I approached the house at twelve, expecting all its inmates to be asleep. Just as I was about to enter it the door opened, and to my astonishment Eleanor herself emerged. I gazed at her retreating figure with a sort of stupid fascination for some time, and then recovered myself, and went in. I had taken off my boots outside, and hence, I suppose my footsteps sounded light as I went upstairs.

"Well, do you want more? Do you care to hear how I killed her; how I stabbed her in her sleep, lowered her through the window, and came down with the jewel chest in my arms? I had to mutilate the corpse; the weight would have been too great for me at once. As it was, I made three journeys before I had disposed of all, and thrown everything, including the latchkey, into the sea.

"Then I walked back to Abertaff—twenty miles it was, and I got there before ten the next morning. I had breakfast, and was still walking the streets when the news came that the murder was discovered.

"It overwhelmed me. I assure you, Charles Prescott, on the oath of a dying man, that I knew not what I did till that moment. I was possessed as surely as any of the Galilean sufferers of old. Madness, your modern science calls it. It is all the same. I passed out of it into my ordinary state with a terrible shock, and then I set about playing the part I had looked forward to, of delivering Eleanor, and carrying her off.

"But it was not to be. I had forgotten that she was not mad, too; I had made no allowance for her, and now I found that my protection, my confidence, was of no value to her, when she had lost the good opinion of the world.

"Of the world, do I say? Verily, I believe it was you; I believe you unconsciously thwarted me then, as before.

"I gave way to my frenzy again in secret. Again the demon came back and resumed his sway. He has held me ever since. He holds me now.

"Yet I can act my part. I deceive all. I just rang for my clerk, and told him I should want him to carry this to your chambers. Fool! He had no suspicion that he was never going to hear me speak again.

"Good-bye. 'Twere folly to ask you to forgive. I do not wish it. Yet, Eleanor—Eleanor——"

The letter ended abruptly at this point. The reader put on his hat and rushed round to Tressamer's chambers. It was too late. He found him sitting in a chair, stark and dead, with a dagger driven through his heart.

* * * * *

When a year had elapsed, a quiet wedding took place, in an out-of-the-way city church, between Charles Prescott and Eleanor Owen. The only dowry brought by the bride was her restored beauty, and a parchment under the Great Seal of England, pardoning her from all accusations that had been or might be raised against her on account of the tragedy which had so nearly involved her in a felon's doom.

THE END.

WHICH IS THE MADDEST PART OF THE KINGDOM?

THE reply is given in an interesting article by MR. J. HOLT SCHOOLING which appears in PEARSON'S MAGAZINE for February. Now on Sale. Price 6d.

WHERE THE SCRAP-BOOKS HAVE GONE.

As announced in the Christmas Number of Short Stories, the Scrap-books forwarded in connection with the Christmas Competition, No. 6, have been sent to a charitable institution. Below is given the letter of acknowledgment from Mr. John Kirk, Secretary of the Ragged School Union, to whom the volumes were sent:

"We are truly grateful to you for the beautiful collection of scrap-books which you have been good enough to place at our disposal from the competition amongst the readers of Short Stories.

"We shall use these joy-giving volumes for lending among the sick and hometide children who form our Home Cripple Bands in all the very poorest districts of London.

"I am sure that the nimble, industrious fingers which have been at work so tastily in the volumes will not regret that their efforts are put to so good a use. In the name of all concerned do I heartily thank you, and through you all the donors of the charming books."

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

1/2 A MILLION 7/6 FULL DRESS LENGTHS TO BE CLEARED AT 6S

BLACK, NAVY, GREY, AND SEVERAL CHARMING SHOT EFFECTS

FIRST ORDER OPENED MONDAYS, WEDNESDAYS, AND FRIDAYS SENT FREE AND CASH RETURNED.

Send to-day for Patterns, also Sale Price List and list of Lucky Winners.

CLEARING PRICES quoted for Dress Goods, Mantlings, Suitings, Flannels, Flannelette, Calico, Shirtings, Blankets, Quilts, Sheets, Towels, Gloves, Corsets, Stockings, Handkerchiefs, Umbrellas, etc.

ORDER EARLY. STOCK DECLINING RAPIDLY.

SALE CONTINUES FOR A SHORT TIME ONLY.

REMNANT BUNDLES (containing 12 yards), in long lengths—Dress Serge 12/-, Calico 3/6, Flannelette 4/6, Union Shirting 7/9, Flannel 8/9.

LUTAS LEATHLEY & Co., Dept. 130, ARMLEY, LEEDS.

OTTO-FREEZ

BEAUTIFUL TOILET SOAP.

Everyone should use it. It is so nice for the skin. VALUABLE COUPONS with every Tablet. Two Tablets sent post free 1/-.

THE OTTO-FREEZ CO., 66, High St., Camden Town, LONDON, N.W.

WHY BE FAT?

When a Lady (who has discovered a simple means of self-cure) will be happy to send particulars of same to any sufferer from this distressing complaint, free, on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Address, Mrs. TREVOR WELLS, 327, High Holborn, London, W.C.

TOO STOUT

If you require a reliable remedy for the relief of superfluous fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills. No starvation required; you may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5lb. to 7lb. weekly. They are a harmless vegetable preparation; successful in the most stubborn cases, and improve health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, tasteless, and highly recommended. Prices, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., post free, plain wrapper. PROFESSOR F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

"DRUNKENNESS"

CURED. A Lady having cured her husband secretly of intemperate habits, will gladly send particulars of the remedy on receipt of stamped envelope.—Mrs. S. S. BARRINGTON, 4, Featherstone Bldgs., LONDON, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F.T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BLACKHEADS

or "Maggots," Pimples, Blotches, etc., immediately and permanently removed by my Skin Cleansing Lotion, "CUTISOLINE." Never fails. Hundreds of testimonials. Post free with directions, 1/6, 3/- and 5/-. AUSTIN LENNOX, Skin Specialist, 1, Shoe Lane, Fleet Street, LONDON.

TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, Mrs. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS COCOA.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

WITH FULL NATURAL FLAVOUR.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/-. P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (250 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope.—Address, Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 179, Westminster Bridge Road, London.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

NOSE

A RADICAL PERMANENT CURE Medically approved, for Red Noses, 3/9, post free, under cover. Pamphlet, "Red Noses, Cause and Prevention," 1/-; Machines for Ugly Noses, particulars for stamp.—LEES RAY, Specialist, Wavertree, Liverpool.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5, Sept. 1, £5, Oct. 1, £5, Nov. 2, £6. Dec. 1, £6. Jan. 2 1897, £6, Feb. 1, £6.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

A SUM of from 10s. to 20s. per week offered for spare time to either sex, everywhere; work can be done evenings.—Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 92A, Aldersgate Street, London.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87, Alexandra Road, Norwich. — Gentlemen,—I have had some boxes of your Tablets for my wife, and she has derived great benefit from them. Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Bretton West, near Wakefield.—"Miss L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.—Mr. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.—Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

127, Out Gang Lane, Old Radford, Notts.—Miss E. P. PARSONS says: "I was 16st. before taking Tablets, and am now 15st.—going on nicely."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full, perfect, natural Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. Highly approved and recommended by the Medical Profession. For testimonials, press opinions, and free particulars, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

BLUSHING.

Particulars of a self-treatment for a permanent cure, as prescribed by eminent physicians of the U.S.A., forwarded free to all sufferers on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. B. F. FIELD, 15, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London, W.

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free. Address L. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"KOKO"

1/- 2/6 4/6

OF ALL CHEMISTS &c

ERADICATES SCURF AND DANDRIFF, PREVENTS HAIR FALLING, PROMOTES GROWTH, & IS ABSOLUTELY THE BEST DRESSING FOR THE HAIR

ROYAL TESTIMONIAL.

"Alsenstrasse,
"Berlin,
"Feb. 25th, 1896.

"'KOKO' is the best dressing I know, it keeps the head cool, promotes growth, and is in every way excellent.

"PRINCESS "HOHENLOHE,
"Oehringen."

ROYAL ORDER!
From H.R.H.
Princess Victoria
of SCHAUMBURG-LIPPE (Granddaughter of the Queen): "I beg you to send by return six bottles of KOKO for the HAIR."

"KOKO"

is an invigorating preparation for the Hair, it eradicates scurf and dandruff, prevents hair falling, promotes growth, cleanses the scalp, allays irritation, and is delightfully cooling. Its unique testimonials prove it to be undoubtedly the best dressing for the Hair.

Old People Like It for its wonderful power to INVIGORATE DECAYED HAIR, and induce an entire new growth when that is possible.

Middle-Aged People Like It, because it PREVENTS THEM FROM GETTING BALD, and keeps dandruff away.

Young Men Like It because it is an elegant preparation for DRY, HARSH, and BRITTLE HAIR.

Young Ladies Like It as a Dressing, because it gives the Hair a Beautiful Glossy Lustre, Ensures a Luxuriant Growth, and Enables them to Dress it in whatever Form they wish, where it will remain.

Everyone Likes It, because it is perfectly colourless, contains no poisonous substance, grease or dye, and does not soil or colour THE SCALP, FACE, OR MOST DELICATE FABRIC IN CLOTHING, produces a wonderful, pleasant, and cooling effect on the head, and NO OTHER DRESSING IS NEEDED to give the hair the most elegant appearance possible.

1/-, 2/6, & 4/6. Of all Chemists, Hairdressers, &c., or Post Free from Koko-Maricopas Co. Ltd., 11, Gray's Inn Rd., W.C., & 233, Regent St., W.

THE SHADOW-HAND," by Louis Tracy, commences on page 229.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 425. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 20TH, 1897. [ONE PENNY.

MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH — Sample Box Post Free, Two Stamps.
Produces beautiful, white, glossy linen. Saves time and labour. In 1d., 3d., & 6d. Boxes. Name this Publication.

BROMLEY'S COFFEE ESSENCE — Sample, 2d. to cover Postage.
Delicious Coffee at One Farthing per cup, prepared in two seconds. In 6d., 1/-, 2/-, 3/6, or 5/- Bottles. 6d. Bottle, Nine Stamps, Post Free.

RISIN' SUN METAL POLISH — Sample Bottle Post Free, Two Stamps
Gives to all metals a beautiful, soft, brilliant polish. In 1d., 3d., 6d. & 1/- Bottles.

C. CHANCELLOR & CO., LONDON, E.C.

"No flaw in its claim to be ABSOLUTELY PURE." MEDICAL ANNUAL.

FRY'S
Pure Concentrated
COCOA

Awarded Highest Honours. | "Strongest and Best." HEALTH.
Over 200 Gold Medals and Diplomas awarded to the Firm.

10/6 HALF-GUINEA 10/6
COSTUMES
Allen Foster & Co
THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

DESIGN NO. 100.

COSTUMES 10/6

THE ALLEN FOSTER HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES
Are utterly unrivalled all the world over.

PATTERNS FREE.

THE ALLEN FOSTER HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES
Are acknowledged by thousands of delighted purchasers to be the very best Half-Guinea Costumes ever offered to the public. Made in the Allen Foster SPECIALITE CHEVIOT SERGE, renowned for its durability and wear. COLOURS—Black, Navy, Electric, Myrtle, Brown, Bronze-Green, Ruby, Fawn, Drab, Cinnamon, etc. WRITE FOR PATTERNS. This attractive model, Design No. 100, consists of a tight-fitting bodice, prettily trimmed. The saddle and sleeves are lined. The skirt is cut full and fashionably. PRICE COMPLETE, 10 6. SKIRT ONLY, 5 6. REGULAR STOCK SIZES are 34in., 36in., and 38in. round bust (under arms). Skirts being 38in., 40in., and 42in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra. When ordering please mention Short Stories. Each Costume securely packed and sent carriage paid, 9d. extra. Skirt only, 6d. extra.

Bankers: London and County, Aldersgate Street, E.C.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., The London Manufacturers.
17, ROSCOE STREET, GOLDEN LANE, E.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

RED WHITE & BLUE

FRENCH COFFEE.

Delicious for Breakfast or After Dinner.

In making, use rather less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary Coffee.

SOLD EVERYWHERE.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

A SUM of from 10s. to 20s. per week offered for spare time to either sex, everywhere; work can be done evenings.—Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 92A, Aldersgate Street, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

TOO STOUT

If you require a reliable remedy for the relief of superfluous fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills. No starvation required; you may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5lb. to 7lb. weekly. They are a harmless vegetable preparation; successful in the most stubborn cases, and improve health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, tasteless, and highly recommended. Prices, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., post free, plain wrapper. PROFESSOR F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
February 20, 1897.
No. 9.
S.S. S.S.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 9.
Feb. 20, 1897.
NEWSAGENTS
S.S. S.S.

REGD.

Dr. Mackenzie's
ARSENICAL TOILET
SOAP.

Prepared with special ingredients as a beautifier of the skin and complexion, and guaranteed to contain a small but absolutely harmless quantity of arsenic. Produces a lovely skin and complexion, and cures spots, pimples, redness, and freckles. The finest and purest soap made. Absolutely harmless. But beware of the many worthless imitations. Have Dr. Mackenzie's or none. Deliciously and expensively perfumed, at all Stores and Chemists', 1s. per tablet, 3 in box 2/6, or post free from S. Harvey, London Bridge, S.E. This soap can also be had without arsenic.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

OUR EYES! OUR EARS!

THEIR DISEASES

CURED WITHOUT OPERATION

NEW TREATMENT.—For Cataract and all Diseases of the Eye; Deafness in all its forms; Noises in the Head and Ears; Discharges from the Ears; Deafness from Influenza and Catarrh cured. Nine cases out of ten cured without personal interview. The special remedies forwarded to any part. Hundreds of letters in testimony. Bleeding, Blistering, and all other obsolete and violent treatment avoided. No "Ear-Drums," "Ear-Cornets," or painful instruments employed. Write for Testimonials and Printed Form of Questions to answer; forwarded free.—Mr. T. ISON, Eye and Ear Dispensary, Leeds. [Estab. 1871.]

THE EYE THE EAR
ISON
OPHTHALMIST & AURIST

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full, perfect, natural Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. Highly approved and recommended by the Medical Profession. For testimonials, press opinions, and free particulars, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

BLUSHING.

Particulars of a self-treatment for a permanent cure, as prescribed by eminent physicians of the U.S.A., forwarded free to all sufferers on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. B. F. FIELD, 18, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London, W.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 425.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending February 20th, 1897.

MR. VANDERNEST'S VALENTINES.

"I NEVER, never saw anyone quite like you, Clare. So persistent, so insistent. Always money, money, money! I should think you thought I was made of money!"

Perhaps Clare had seen too little of her father to let her think him made of anything else.

"Well, aren't you, papa?" she said roguishly, looking up into his sour face, and hugging herself, while the wind whistled round her bare head.

"Really, Clare is the only one who can do anything with her father," said Mrs. Vandernest, looking down cautiously from the drawing-room window, left open by the maid, to the street where Mr. Vandernest had been arrested on the way to the carriage by Clare's fluting voice, hiding herself, meanwhile, behind the curtain which blew about her, threatening to disclose her, do what she would, and not daring to drop the sash lest her husband should glance up and see her.

"Take care, Emma," said her sister, who chanced to be spending the morning with her. "If he sees you, it's all up with Clare's hopes. What a gale it must be out at sea; a regular dry storm! Here, let me hold down the curtain. There! He's getting to be a regular curmudgeon. Who would ever have dreamt it of Sydney?"

"It's too bad," sighed the wife. "It's really too bad. But it's wrong for me to let you talk so, Helena. He is my husband and——"

"Nonsense! I should have to be blind and deaf, as well as dumb, and a senseless woman besides, not to appreciate Sydney for all he's worth——"

"He's worth more than a hundred thousand. He never used to be so," whimpered Mrs. Vandernest, whether in reference to the money or the curmudgeon.

"Clare's indifference doesn't trouble him; Gerald's despair—and Ruth is such a lovely creature! If all the Gulnares of the sea looked as she does in that last picture of Gerald's, we should have very few young men above water."

"But really. Look, look quick!—I do believe——"

"He certainly is—hush!" exclaimed Helena in a whisper. "If Clare hasn't carried the day! He's putting his hand into his pocket! He's taken out a note! Oh, be careful, don't let him see us—it's a crucial moment."

It was indeed a crucial moment. "I don't approve of a young girl having so much money," Mr. Vandernest was saying petulantly.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"What was it you said you wanted it for?" suspiciously and still holding the note by one end between thumb and finger.

"I didn't say, papa," she cried gleefully.

"Well you had better if you want it."

"It's—it's rather a secret," she said hesitatingly, the colour coming and going like a flame. "You know that lady—I shall catch my death of cold out here!"

"Then run in at once. What lady?" as she didn't run in.

"Why, the pale one with the brown eyes and the white hair, with the lovely lame girl—that exquisite creature whose lameness is only a beauty, she uses her crutches in the way a swan does his feet in the water—that sits behind the big pillar in church——"

"You want to spend my money on those beggars!" he roared. "You want to give away what it has cost me years of labour and struggle to get together! Those people I've forbidden Gerald to go near again! You——"

And just at that instant a great puff of wind came sailing and swirling about them, and snatched the bit of paper from his thumb and finger, and went careering up and away with it, up, up, up, over the bare tree-tops, over the houses and into the clouds themselves.

Mr. Vandernest looked after it one long moment. As if he could not believe the evidence of his senses, he glanced at his hands, at the steps, made a motion towards his daughter as if he would like to shake her, and then dashed down to his carriage like one of the swine into whom the evil spirits betook themselves. But Clare had already fled the place, and she darted upstairs and into the front drawing-room, where Aunt Helena slammed down the window.

"Oh! oh! oh!" she sobbed, as much with excitement and apprehension as with disappointment. "When I all but had it! And what, what do you suppose he will do and say when he comes back?"

"He—he can't kill you," said her mother.

"He can shut me up in my room——"

"He never did."

"He can forbid me to go out, and refuse me a new bonnet for a year, and bring me to shame by disputing the dressmaker's bill——"

"No," said her Aunt Helena, smoothing the tangles of yellow curls where the wind had played havoc, "he will do nothing of the sort. He'll just fret about the waste of butter, and the surplus of the pudding-sauce, and threaten to put Gerald to work as a day-labourer on a farm."

"It's a dreadful life, oh, it's a dreadful life!" sighed her mother.

And although anyone might have seen that Mr. Vandernest's family was in what is politely called an insurrectionary state, no one would have supposed that he really loved them with all the heart he had, be the same much or little, and that they lived in a house little short of a palace, provided by his money, even if every separate article in it had been wrung out of him as if at the cost of his life's blood.

"Well," said Clare, ruffling all her curls again, "that's the end of Ruth's worsted. If she ever has her foot straightened, it will be by no means of ours. And I did so want to help her, and I made up the work and offered her the price—I must take it, anyhow, mamma, and I must pay her; I shall sell my pearl earrings. Just think what papa might do for people if he only would! There's the postman. Oh, yes, James has his hands full! Valentines! Oh, what a deadly waste of money!"

It was odd that just at that moment Mrs. Paul, the pale woman with brown eyes and the white hair who sat behind the pillar in the church, should be making the same remark about Mr. Vandernest. "Just think what he might do with his money, if he only would!"

"Well, as his daughter Clare would say, he only won't," Ruth answered her. "And that isn't the worst of it!"

"No," said her mother. "He only will—when it comes to this question of demanding his own. And it is his own, I suppose, but your father always told me he had rendered Mr. Vandernest good and sufficient service for the money represented in that note; and the moment we were left defenceless that note is presented, and we have nothing to do but to pay it, or lose the house over our heads. I am thankful there is only £20 more to pay on it."

"I should be more thankful," said Ruth, "if I knew where the £20 was coming from. You see, stitch as I can on this embroidery of Clare's, I can't finish it yet."

"If it were done and paid for," said the mother, "I had meant that money to go for the straightening of your foot."

"Not with that debt hanging over us. I forget my foot isn't straight—Gerald never remembers it. I only submitted to taking the fancy price she promised in order to pay the debt to her father, and I don't see what we can do."

For all the look of trouble on her face, she was as beautiful as King Cophetua's beggar maid, as she sat there with the sprays and wreaths growing under her needle like frost on the pane, the dark hair accentuating the perfect pallor of the face, whose red lips were its only colour, the features perfect as an antique, the great black-lashed, sea-grey eyes shining like aquamarine jewels. The mother thought if Mr. Vandernest once saw her, once heard the music of the brook-like voice, he might feel a pride and pleasure in his son's choice. She felt almost angry the next moment to think that Gerald was her daughter's choice.

"I am going out," she said presently. "I shall go to his office and ask him to take less this time. He can but turn us out, and he will do that way, without scruple. What a storm there is blowing up! But I suppose you will know nothing about it. Gerald will come while I'm gone, and when he comes, it's all sunshine!"

"I wish there were a little sunshine now," said Ruth. "It's so dark for such fine work. I wish that shutter would swing back. Hold the mull, mother, please, while I open the window and fasten back this blind." But the wind blew in as she opened the sash, and in spite of the mother's hand, mull and patterns and thread went whirling every way at once, and suddenly, while Mrs. Paul was hurrying to gather them out of the wind's way, the girl's voice cried: "Oh mother, mother, look; but do look!" And as if a bird had flown into her bosom she had clasped her hands across something nestling there, a great white leaf, a fresh, crisp £20 note.

"If this isn't a valentine sent from Heaven, there never was one!" cried she. "And what a valentine! A £20 note! I never saw such a note before, and I never had a valentine," she cried, letting the window fall. "Oh, I will never doubt Providence again! A £20 note!" And the girl's joy transformed her into a sort of radiance.

Mrs. Paul took the note and examined it, even to the daub of red ink where someone had started to scribble initials on the back and then smeared them out. "Yes," she said calmly, "some one has lost it—poor soul. It was not a kind Providence to that person. We must advertise it, I suppose. It isn't ours."

Digitized by Google

Ruth looked at her a moment, first in amazement and then in horror, hiding her face in her hands. "Oh!" she cried, "how wicked I am! How good you are! I am no better than—than—any bad person! I would have kept it, but it wasn't ours!" And when she went back to her needle she could hardly see it for the tears that kept coming.

Mrs. Paul folded the note away in her purse, wrote out a brief advertisement, which she put beside it, and presently stood before Mr. Vandernest's desk, briefly stating her errand.

"It's very extraordinary, very extraordinary, indeed," he said fussily. "Women never seem to have any idea of business. A most improper request of a business man. Business is business. And to ask a man to receive partial payment when the whole is due——"

"It is all I have," said Mrs. Paul, with a gesture of something like despair. And then she remembered herself and opened her purse and took out the £5, and laid the little pile before him. "In three months," she said, "I hope to be able to pay the remainder. But to-day it's all I have."

"Madam!" said Mr. Vandernest, peering over his desk suddenly, "why do you make such a statement as that, when I saw plainly, very plainly, a bank-note in your purse? Not that I want it, but that I see it! A five—a ten——"

Mrs. Paul took it out instantly and opened it before him. "It is a £20 note," she said, "but it is not mine. It blew into my window less than an hour ago."

"It is mine," he said quickly, his dark face flushing purple. "It blew out of my hands less than an hour ago as I stood talking at my door with my daughter. I know it by the mark and smear of red ink—it caught my eye then—there it is——"

"If as you say, sir," said Mrs. Paul quietly, "there can be no doubt about it. The note is yours." She tossed the advertisement into the waste-paper basket and laid the note on the desk. "I am glad to be able to restore it to you," she said, and waited a moment for his decision of her own affair.

He opened a drawer, dropped the note in and closed it, looked out of the window a moment, and then up at the ceiling, and then examined his finger nails. "Well, no, Mrs. Paul," said he, "I don't feel called upon to administer charity in this case. I have already been more than lenient. I will give you what I may call the customary three days' grace, and then if you are not able to pay me the rest of the money, I shall feel obliged to put an attachment on your property." He would like to repel her so that she wouldn't let her daughter marry Gerald. But no danger of that, he thought.

"Death is a great leveller, I have heard it said, Mr. Vandernest," said Mrs. Paul, after a moment's silence, "and my husband's death has shown me the truth of the saying. If I had come into your office during his lifetime you would have sprung to offer me a chair; you would have placed your purse at my disposal. Now, you have not even asked me to be seated, and you make yourself the oppressor of the widow and the fatherless in my person and my child's. Good-morning."

And feeling glad at any rate that she had been able to give him that piece of her mind, she left the place, and left him full of astonished silence; for Mr. Vandernest was not a man of violent language, and if he had been, he was quite too much amazed to use it. He, the courtly Mr. Vandernest, accused of incivility. He, a church member, called to his face the oppressor of the fatherless. He felt as if he were turning to stone.

He sat so for perhaps half-an-hour, not consciously thinking of anything at all.

Then he rose and put on his great coat. Let the wind blow. He must pay a visit to his solicitor.

He glanced over one or two papers. There were others he must have, but they were with certain of his securities in the safe which was built into the library wall at home. The carriage had gone back; but he could call a cab and go for them.

So Mr. Vandernest drove home, and let himself in and mounted the velvet-covered stairs to the library where were the papers he sought. As he noiselessly opened the safe, a hum of voices on the other side of the curtain caught his ear, and mention of himself arrested him.

"I shouldn't feel so," Clare was saying, "if papa was like other men."

He! Mr. Vandernest! Not like other men!

"But just look at the contemptible parsimony with which we are treated."

Contemptible parsimony! Oh, Miss Clare, you have sealed your fate! Mr. Vandernest looked about him at the old Indian rug on the floor from the palace of a Ramapootra prince, for which he had paid £600; at the Jules Breton on the wall, the Diaz, the Merle, the Corot full of dreaming; at the Vibert on the easel with its every dainty detail and its scorching moral; at the velvet divans, the bronze Perseus, the silver lamps, the sweeping purple velvet curtain, the books, marvels of tooling, the screen, the vases, the crystal jar of red roses—these had cost nothing less than 5s. apiece—he knew—had he not paid for them? And parsimony! He, who liked to have everything rich and fine about him! His heart stood still a second.

"Yes," his wife was saying, "he could trust me with the right use of his children all their lives, but not of his money. The house is a palace, but I feel like a caged bird in it. I can't spend a penny without accounting for it. I can't have a penny without asking for it like a beggar and telling what I want to do with it, and then it's like drawing teeth to get it. It's been so for years. I might have an immortal soul in my charge, but not a cheque-book."

"Somebody had to have the immortal souls in charge," said Clare, "and I'm sure papa doesn't even know if we were made with souls or without them. He has never spent enough time with us to find out. He doesn't know that Gerald has genius enough to make his name known when that of every mere millionaire is forgotten. He doesn't even know he has a painting-room at the top of the house. I'm sure if he were to open a studio he would have orders enough in a year to let him marry Ruth Paul, the dear beauty, instead of breaking their two hearts as they are doing now! I think the best thing we can do is to go off by ourselves, mamma. You've a little money, and that would pay our room-rent, and I could get a school, and run the house, and then nothing could be expected of us, and at all events we should have some peace from papa——"

"Clare!" said her mother, drawing a long breath of astonishment.

"And I'm sure that as for him he'd be a great deal happier rid of us, and never seeing us again——"

"Oh, you don't think so!" cried the mother, horrified and aghast.

"Yes, I do. And so would we, once we were used to it. At any rate, we'd be free. Why, mamma, what in the world are you crying for? I do believe—why, mamma, it isn't possible you love papa?"

"Yes, it is!" cried his wife, in a volcanic outburst.

Digitized by Google

"Yes, I do," she sobbed. "I've loved him all my life—and I can't leave off now—because he—isn't—he isn't—all I wish he was. I love him all the more because he needs love all the more! He—he—has a great deal of right on—on his side—from—from his point of view, too. I'm very inefficient, or I should never have allowed you to go on so. Your father, your dear father—he was handsome, he was kind, he was tender once—I don't care if he is occupied with making money now, I can wait, I am waiting, I have been! By-and-bye he will come back to me."

Mr. Vandernest's face grew very white as he listened. It seemed to him all at once that the speaker was a young wild rose of a girl, in a briary, blossomy land of summer evening, and he for the first time pressing his lips to hers, drawing her soul into his own, with his arms about her there under the swinging branches, the purple heavens, the hazy stars, his heart full of high purpose, his will of endeavour. He sank for a moment into the nearest chair. "He was really undergoing a good deal to-day," he said to himself; he felt faint.

A sort of mild Day of Judgment, this, on which he had fallen, not St. Valentine's day after all, and he laughed grimly and silently. Here was his wife waiting for the happiness she had never had since the first year of their married life; and his children feeling this way.

Clare, the little ringleted, rosy creature who—who—well, if he lost her, life wouldn't be worth a toss up; and Gerald—his boy—no time to win them back, to take the pleasure which he had always felt was waiting ahead, ready when he was ready! Why, he was past fifty now—when was he going to enjoy it?

The voices rippled and ejaculated and wept on, but he heard no more. He sat there, again lost in an abyss of thought, and only roused himself and went to his safe and his table when the chimes struck out the half-hour. One would not have needed to be eavesdropping to have heard a singular sound shortly after that, a sound like a child with an ear for a tune trying to blow a piccolo.

"Hush!" exclaimed Clare. "Hush! What's that? I declare, if that isn't papa whistling! Oh, what do you suppose he's at home for at this time of day? And whistling! it frightens me! Is he going to make a fuss about that bill blowing away?"

The curtain parted at the word, and Mr. Vandernest stood there, hat in hand and overcoat on arm, a smile on his lips, and a parcel of papers in his fingers.

"Well, Emma," said he, looking at his trembling wife, "I suppose you're wondering what I'm at home for at this hour? What if I had said the firm had failed, and that I am a ruined man, and we have to begin all over again?"

"Oh, Sydney!" she cried, running forward with clasped hands, "I should be so glad!"

"The deuce you would! Well," he returned, laughing, "I'm sorry you can't be made glad—I mean I'm glad—that is, oh, well, it would be a lie if I said so. But the fact is, it's St. Valentine's day, you know, and I thought I'd do a little of the old saint's work for him to-day. Don't you remember when we used to make much of the day, thirty years ago or so?"

"Oh, Sydney," with a pretty girlish motion. "I——"

"Well, in the first place, here's a valentine for you, my love, not so pretty as the old valentines used to be when you lifted the lace paper and saw your own pretty face in the little mirror there. But more useful," said Mr. Vandernest, "more useful," and he handed her a big envelope. "There are bonds and certificates of stock, coupons attached, which will give you an independent income to spend just as you please, and give account to no one. And if there's more than you want to spend all at once, put it in a bank. And there's a cheque-book. And that's your valentine. Clare! Here! What are you slipping away for? Didn't you say that note this morning would make the foot straight for that girl?"

Clare only stared at him, open-eyed. "Well," said he, "that note blew away. But this cheque is just as good. It's for several times more. And you can tell her to get her wedding clothes ready with the rest of it. And I'll send Gerald along to her after a little talk. Where is he? Top of the house? In his painting-room? I've about decided that if he wants to go to Paris and study, he'd better; and I'd rather he took a wife along with him than go without. It's no use having all our money and letting people fret their heart out for what money 'll do. Well, that's her valentine. And—and—wait a minute, Clare, here's another envelope; that's for the old lady, the mother, Mrs. Paul. It's a cancelled note. You give it her with my regards; that's her valentine. And I protest, Clare: there isn't any valentine for you, unless," —and he held his arms wide, and Clare sprang into them.

"Oh, you're my valentine, papa," she said, "when you're like this! I don't mean giving but living, and being one of us, and making us love you."

"And now, my dear," said Mr. Vandernest, holding Clare in one arm and reaching the other for his wife, "no matter about the gale. 'It's an ill wind that blows nobody good.' Do you remember going to see a Midsummer Night's Dream, thirty years ago to-day with me? Well it's on again now, and if there's anything in the house for lunch, we'll have a bite and be off to it, you and I. We may as well have a season of theatre going and concerts together while we can. I dare say I'm as big an ass as Bottom was, to be as much in love with you now as I was almost a generation ago. No, that isn't what I mean, of course. But it seems to me to-day as if I'd been an ass for a good while. Well, we'll begin again; and if you'll seal the compact with a kiss; well, that shall be my valentine!"

R. Baird.

Digitized by Google

PROLOGUE

The afternoon sun of an autumn day was among the leaves of Chisholme Park, a small estate in Dorsetshire.

It was setting for the last time upon the owner of the compact estate, who lay dying in the rather diminutive square grey house standing on a lawn in the middle of the park. The Honourable Ernest Wentworth, the younger son of a great family, lying abed, could see the red beams making bars on the carpet, and, in his loneliness, reflected on the failure of his life—his short life of thirty-six years—till tears rolled from his eyes.

He would have been still sadder if he could have risen from his bed, walked down an avenue of limes, and seen two persons, one of them his wife, sitting on a bench within a bower.

Ernest Wentworth, a year before, had made a mésalliance in Paris with one of the artistes at the Théâtre des Variétés. His brother, Lord Hilton, had not been hasty in discarding his own flesh and blood. In a curt letter to Ernest he had said that he was willing to receive the couple at Hillcrest Lodge; but he took care that the house should be empty of visitors on their arrival. The newwedded pair were not slow to accept the invitation; for they almost entirely depended for supplies upon the bounty of the elder brother, and felt that they must not slight his will. But an hour of Julie's company was enough for Lord Hilton; he decided that she was "impossible"; that his brother had, in truth as well as in appearance, disgraced his name. He would have no more to do with him.

Chisholme Park, however, remained to Ernest in his own right.

And now, after a year, he lay dying of consumption; and Julie, for whom he had braved obloquy and loss, sat in the bower; and her hand lay in the hand of a stranger.

In the woman's eyes was a strange look—a look almost like mesmeric subordination.

And yet she had only met the man some four months before. It was in the middle of the whirl and gaiety of a county hunt-ball. No such function to which she could gain admission did her light, pleasure-loving nature ever permit her to miss; and in everything upon which she set her wayward heart the Hon. Ernest Wentworth was bound, for the sake of peace, to indulge her. At this ball she had happened to meet Dr. Lemaitre, and at the first look into his eyes Julie knew that she had met her fate and her master.

"Money!" she said now, with a little playful scorn; "you are always wanting money."

"Money and you," he said, drumming a tune with his fingers on her hand.

"I have got myself to give away," she said, and rubbed her face against his shoulder, "but where am I to get money from?"

Lemaitre took up her hand, and set to examining her nails. He was a very large, tall man, with dough-like, coarse skin, heavy moustache, and a great tuft of imperial falling over his chin. The top of his high and massive forehead was somewhat bald, though he was quite young.

"Where am I to get it from?" he said, mimicking her. "Where I got it from before, to be sure! Rather neat nails, now I come to think of it; but this little finger is a leetle bit crooked in the top joint."

She snatched her hand free and pouted.

"But, Julie," he went on, "this money business; it is serious, you know. I am fearfully pumped, and I only want fifty pounds, but it must be to-night."

"Not to-night," she said, with firm-set lips.

"May I ask why?"

"No—not to-night."

"But I say to-night, Julie."

He was frowning a little behind her with a most intense kind of effort at the back of her head. Her dark face wore a flush of crimson.

"If it comes to that, you have no right to command me—to order me about, Armand," she said half-angrily, half-nervously. "I am nothing to you."

"But you profess to love me, Julie."

"Oh, yes; that I don't deny."

"Then why not to-night?"

"Armand, be reasonable. My husband lies dying. Is it fair to steal from him just at this moment?"

"But you don't seem to realise that I want the amount."

"Oh, I know that you want it," she said; "but must you have everything you want just at the moment? Do, I beg you, wait two days—three—till he——"

"My child, you are talking nonsense."

All this time Lemaitre had been frowning, frowning, unseen by her, at the back of her head, suggesting, implanting obedience into her brain. A vague, dreamy look gradually overspread the eyes of Julie.

She heaved a soft sigh.

"Oh! I feel so faint, Armand. And I do love you."

"Good girl! go now, then."

Slowly she rose; and slowly, steadily, she walked away from him over the green sward without a word. It was not difficult to see from her carriage that she was unusually perturbed.

Digitized by Google

Dr. Lemaitre, looking after her, smiled to himself, and said:

"Poor Julie! I believe I am genuinely fond of the child."

He was some few years older than she, she being hardly nineteen; but her richly-flushed, black-eyed face had the look of a much more mature age. As she passed over the threshold with her fine, free step, a servant said to her:

"I think the master has been calling for you, mum."

Julie did not reply. She went toward the dying chamber, but not into it. Instead, she turned off, and entered a small room separated from the other by a door.

Her step was soft, all her actions were stealthy, as she took a bunch of keys from a writing-desk, and fitted one into the door of a bureau.

At that moment she heard a faint voice call:

"Julie, is that you?"

She did not reply. She plunged her hand far into the drawer, and seemed to grope with he fingers, half-kneeling. At last she drew out a small bundle of notes. She counted some, which she held in her right hand, while she replaced the others with the left. She was just rising to lock the bureau, when she heard a sound behind her.

The door had opened, and there stood Ernest Wentworth, tall, and white-robed, pointing silently at her with the forefinger of his outstretched arm.

There stood Ernest Wentworth . . . pointing silently at her.

From his white and working lips no sound came.

Suddenly he swayed forward, then backward. His arm dropped, he tottered, righted himself again, and fell sidewards, dead.

Julie rushed from the room, her face white and haggard. She did not stop. Straight across the lawn, down the pathway of the park she fled, the notes in her hand.

Lemaitre came slowly from the bower to meet her.

"Why, what is the matter——" he began.

"Here—go—go," she panted. "He is—go——"

She hurriedly handed him the money, and ran back towards the house.

The manner of her husband's death, and the circumstances of the moment under which it occurred, had given her a sharp shock of affright.

There is in us all a deep instinct that wrong must be punished. In the evil-doer's sky is a cloud.

Julie was very frightened. And her condition was one in which small events have big effects. That night she bore a daughter, considerably before the expected time.

Ernest Wentworth had left her practically without an income. He was an improvident, happy-go-lucky fellow, who had always lived from hand to mouth. Julie had fears that she would have to go back to the stage, even if she married Lemaitre; and under the circumstances she had strong objections to the inconvenient new arrival. In writing to Lemaitre, who had returned to Paris, she studiously refrained from mentioning the coming of the little girl, fearing that he too might show disapproval at her advent. When, after three months, her lover summoned her to France with a view to their marriage, she was at her wit's end what to do with little Edith. The one thing she was resolved not to do was to present the child to her new lord. She dreaded like death his least frown.

But Providence cut the knot for her. Lady Hilton, hearing of her poverty, induced the Earl to adopt the little one, and at the critical moment the proposal came to Julie to give up the child to them on the strict condition that her connection with it should thenceforth cease.

She jumped eagerly at the offer, and, on the same day that she handed the child to Lord Hilton's messenger in London, left for Paris.

CHAPTER I.

The Murder in the Train.

A little more than nineteen years after the death of Ernest Wentworth Edith came home finally to Hillcrest Lodge from Paris, where Lord Hilton, who was a Roman Catholic, had placed her in the Convent of St. Julienne to be educated. Lord Hilton had long been dead—so long that it was Lady Hilton only whom Edith knew as her guardian.

She reached Hillcrest Lodge about three weeks before Christmas. Lady Hilton put her two hands on the girl's shoulders, and held her away from her, looking into her face for some little time before she spoke.

"Why, child," she said at last, "how much lovelier do you mean to grow? It will be positively dangerous to have a party of men in the house with you."

Edith smirked.

"I suppose the Convent of St. Julienne is hardly a likely place for love affairs," continued Lady Hilton, "or I should ask if you haven't had an offer yet."

"Auntie!" the young cheek went rubbing against the old one, "why, I abominate men—all of us in the convent—and despise them. You should hear Cécile—oh, you will like Cécile, Auntie, when she comes! Cécile says——"

"But who is it you are like?" said Lady Hilton, holding her off again. "Not your—your—mother, I think. I saw her once, you know. And not your father either. That portrait there is your father at twenty-five. You have his nose, you know—that narrow nose with wide nostrils panting like a thoroughbred's; but still, you are not like him a bit."

"I had an idea that I was like—like—mamma," said Edith.

"No—oh, no—don't think that. You are not nearly so dark, for one thing, and your mother had a much bolder, more precocious aspect, with features beautiful indeed, but not nearly so refined. But come—tea!"

Digitized by Google

That was three weeks before Christmas. There was to be a great party at the Lodge that season; and presently the arrivals began to drop in.

Hillcrest Lodge is a vast demesne in a beautifully-wooded valley. Its name of *Hill*crest was in no way due to its position on a hill, but to the name of a collateral branch of the Wentworths and Hiltons. The mansion itself is very large, built in the style of a French château, the lawn being cut into a long series of terraces.

Hillcrest is about five miles north of Seaborough. The express from King's Cross stops at York, then comes a small station further north, then Seaborough. From Seaborough to Hillcrest is a fairly level carriage drive.

At five o'clock on Christmas Eve the train arrived at York station, containing some dozen of Lady Hilton's guests. Captain Arthur Musgrave, turning to a lady at his side in the carriage, said:

"You must be frozen. What shall I get you in the way of refreshment?"

"I? Frozen!" she replied with a strong French accent. "At least, my teeth are not chattering as yours are! Men are self-conceited, eh? Three times since we passed—what you call it?—Grantham, you have shivered down the body, so; and once, three minutes and a half after we left Doncaster, you have tried to put a point to your moustache and could not."

"Dreadfully observant you are!" said Captain Arthur.

"Ah, I am a woman. A woman must keep her eyes open in the world. I think nothing of her if she can't."

"But as to refreshments?"

"Stay where you are, poor man. You can't move for the cold in you. I will——"

She had the carriage-door open before he could stir to help her, and was gone, running like a doe towards the bar in a moment.

This was Cécile, Edith's second self.

She was a small, slim creature, without hips or bust, all movement and sauciness and vivacity. She was fair-haired. One of her eyelids drooped a little over the left eye, the only fault in a very pretty face. Yet even the fault was pretty, giving her a piquant, artful charm when she perked her face sideways, as was her manner in speaking.

Captain Arthur languidly got out, stretching his stiff limbs, to follow her. But Cécile was soon returning loaded, followed by a waiter also having both hands full.

"This is for you, sir," with a curtesy; "and the wine for you, Professor Queech, and the brandy for you, Mr. Jack, and the biscuits for—everybody."

Mr. Jack, which was short for Mr. Jack Heathcote, as he took his brandy, tried at the same time to touch by accident her little finger with his forefinger, but missed his aim; while Professor Queech, a little old man with a bald head, said, looking at his wine:

"A most extraordinary thing, now—the colour of this wine reminds me of it—yes, perhaps none of you ever considered the relation between colours and musical sounds."

"I have, dear Professor!" cried Cécile.

"Ah? Then we must discuss the question between us. Dark purple, now—how akin to the diapason of an organ——"

"Only not to-day, Professor; it is so cold, eh?"

Cécile leapt in. The Professor, who had travelled in Siberian snows on colder days than this, hunting for proofs of his theories about musical sounds, made room for her beside him, but Cécile somehow managed to drop into a seat next to Jack Heathcote.

"I shall have the pleasure," said Professor Queech, "to read you, at some future date, a short pamphlet on——"

"Oh, but I say," broke in Cécile, "did anyone note the lady in the next compartment?"

She looked at Arthur, who had got out for a moment.

"No. I don't think I noticed," said Arthur.

Cécile was soon returning loaded.

Just then the train moved on.

"So droll!" said Cécile. "I am sure she is French, too. Stop!—her face put me in mind of someone—who is it? I can't think. But she looked pretty cold, I can tell you. And what do you think she was doing? Drinking spirit out of a flask, and up and up went the flask, and up and up went her little finger as she drained it. I thought it so droll!"

"The present shape of the modern flask," said Professor Queech, "is due to a fact, not, I believe, generally known——"

"It's to be hoped she was alone," said Jack Heathcote, with his shy, blue Yorkshire eyes fastened on the rug. What he was really thinking in his heart was this: "She has sat down beside me!"

"Alone?" said Cécile, wriggling on her seat. "No—that is, she was at the time; but she has somebody with her—I caught a glimpse of his back in the refreshment room—a very large, tall man. I believe she was drinking while he was away—what you call it—'on the sly.'"

"But however did you know?" began Jack Heathcote.

"Oh, you men! You are going to ask, how did I know that that particular gentleman was the gentleman she has with her, isn't it?"

"Yes," confessed Jack.

"Why, it is very simple. She was sitting on a thick Khorsedabad rug made of long dark red hairs; and in the view which I had of his back I saw three of these hairs hanging to his light-coloured mauve overcoat."

Captain Arthur Musgrave, who had stretched out his long legs, and closed his eyes, rather tired of Cécile's chatter, looked up a little, and dreamily said:

"What remarkable powers of observation, Miss Delisle! No wonder you despise a mere man."

"Oh, men are nothing!" pouted Cécile, "don't you think so, Miss Newton? But what a back! so broad and strong. He was bending over the bar, sipping. A real Parisian back; he is French, certain."

"Which do you like the best—Frenchmen or Englishmen?" asked Jack Heathcote.

Cécile smiled a little to herself.

"Frenchmen, sir," she said.

* * * * *

Digitized by Google

On the other side of the partition—in the next compartment—things went not so smoothly.

"You are half drunk now, I believe," said the man in French.

"Well, that's nothing strange for me, is it?" answered the woman.

"And whose fault is that?"

"Yours, my friend."

"On my word, I hate the sight of you, Julie. I wish to God you were dead."

"I know that, Armand Lemaitre; but I shall live, unless you kill me——"

"That could be done——"

"Unless you kill me. And I'm not the meek lamb I have been. I shall live, and fight you on brandy—brandy—brandy."

Lemaitre was over her.

She took from her pocket another flask and drank it dry—her third within the last two hours. She was hardly the same Julie of nineteen years ago. The semicircles beneath her eyes were nearly black; her flesh was wrinkled, and faded, and drink-besodden.

"You provoke me too much, Julie," said Lemaitre. "You are running a dreadful risk——"

"I know. You are a murderer in your heart. But I will run the risk. Take care I don't spoil your fun with the grand people you are going among, Armand Lemaitre"

Lemaitre smiled.

"Danton—that is my name. Pray, try and remember—Dr. Danton."

"And is it right—I ask you that—is it right for you to be going among these people, passing yourself off, and taking your pleasure, while I——"

"You will be comfortably lodged in the charming town of Seaborough. You know very well that you are not presentable in fashionable society. You have nothing to complain of."

"Oh, no? Nothing to complain of, Armand Lemaitre?"

"Danton—Dr. Danton."

"Nothing to complain of? Well, but suppose to-morrow or the next day I present myself at the Lodge among the grand folk and see whether they think I have anything to complain of or not?"

She had leant forward with glaring black eyes towards him; a puff of her loaded breath greeted his nostrils.

"Horrible hag!" he said to himself, and rose, walking to the window.

He pulled down the sash and looked out. The air was white and thick with snow, wheeling in the parching wind. You could not tell whether the eddying flakes were coming down from the heaven or up from the earth.

The train was passing over a desolate tract of the Yorkshire wolds, cut into, here and there, by vast deep ravines, through each of which brawled a swollen and foaming brook.

Lemaitre stood at the window full five minutes, pondering on Julie's last words: "How if I present myself at the Lodge?"

He turned round with a sudden jerk; and cried:

"What d'you mean, hey?"

"Ah, you are not going to have it all your own way, as you have done, Armand Lemaitre!" said Julie. "I have been a child long enough."

"You fool—can't you understand that I will kill you, if you talk to me like that?"

Lemaitre came near her, his white teeth clenched, his paste-like face inflamed.

"Yes, I say, I know you are a murderer, Armand," repeated Julie; "but however it goes, you don't leave me out in the cold, if I can help it——"

"Be silent this moment, vile hag!"

"Silent? I? You think so——"

Jean Lemaitre cut her short by a blow with the back of his hand across her mouth.

"You beast!" cried Julie, and the flask she held in her hand went flying at Lemaitre's head. It struck him over the brow.

The next moment Lemaitre was over her, tugging murderously at her windpipe.

* * * * *

Professor Queech, on the other side of the partition, was just saying:

"I have written a little pamphlet on that very subject. A most extraordinary thing, now. The musical tones of the Jew's-harp——"

When Cécile cried:

"Stop! Did anyone see——"

She leapt up and flew to the window. It had seemed to her, as she looked that way, as if some large dark object had rushed past the glass outside. But by the time she had pulled down the sash and looked out, nothing was to be seen but snow, snow in the heaven above, and the air between, and on the earth below.

The train at that moment was dashing over a viaduct, bridging one of the great ravines which cut up all this lonely country-side into deep gullies. This one was called Thorgill Beck.

A minute's stoppage was made, a quarter of an hour later, at a small station half-way between York and Seaborough. But none of the party bound for Hillcrest had occasion to get out.

"I am almost sure," said Professor Queech as the train moved out again, "that I some time ago heard a—what shall I say?—a scream, it seemed, coming from that direction. I have ever since been considering the precise tone in its blending with the rattle of the train. Did you, Miss Newton, hear it?"

Miss Newton, a thin lady, tending towards old-maidishness, and sharp of tongue, said:

"Your continual effort to note the sounds around you make your ears over-keen, Professor. I am sure I heard no scream. Did you, Miss Delisle?"

"I heard something certainly," said Cécile; "but it seemed to me to come from outside the train."

In ten minutes the train drew up at Seaborough station, where carriages from Hillcrest awaited the guests.

As Cécile passed by the compartment in which she had seen the lady drain the flask, she glanced into it, and, to her surprise, saw it quite empty. Had the two, then, got out at the small station? Her clean-pencilled brows were knitting. She had seen no one pass over the platform there from the train. Her nature was intensely inquisitive. She did not like to be puzzled.

She moved away with the others; but stopped, and deliberately turned back. Surely, she must be mistaken. She could not have looked properly into the dimness of the compartment. The two people, she reasoned, must be there.

Once more she went to look, and this time held up high her little shapely chin, and gazed over the window into the carriage. She saw standing there, just about to come out, a man—a short, heavy-bodied man, with broad, tanned face, and a long goat-beard, such as Yankees wear, a man of the lower classes with foul and ragged clothes—in a first-class carriage.

Cécile turned away, and sped back, half frightened, to the others. It was a very evil face which she had seen. And its appearance there was as mysterious to her as the apparition of a ghost.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER II.

Loved by Two.

Dr. Danton did not arrive at Hillcrest Lodge that night, though he was expected. During the forenoon, however, of Christmas Day, he came in a hired cab from Seaborough. He explained that he had missed his train at King's Cross.

His introduction to the circle at Hillcrest Lodge was due to a sporting relative of Lady Hilton in Paris, with whom Dr. Danton had had close relations on the Paris Bourse. This relative had given Dr. Danton a number of introductions on his coming lately to England, and had written to Lady Hilton that she would do himself a kindness by entertaining the doctor, who was an accomplished man, and excellent company.

Three days after Christmas the house was full of people. Edith, new-come from Paris, was, of course, the centre of interest; and after her, Captain Arthur Musgrave, Lady Hilton's nephew. The Captain's face was brown with the Afghan sun. Till now, Lady Hilton had not seen him for seven years.

"I give him to you, darling," said Cécile to Edith in a corner of the drawing-room. "You know I am not easily pleased in the matter of the male material. But, ma foi, he will do, I think. What a moustache—and legs!"

"He is rather good-looking, isn't he?" said Edith.

"His legs are of incredible length, my dear! And that cut across the eyebrow is an improvement more than anything, I think. He is sure to fall in love with one or other of us, I should imagine."

"With you, more likely, dear."

"Oh, he needn't trouble! My choice is made already."

"Cécile! how you do talk."

"I mean it, really. You see that little man with the white hair and eyebrows, and straggling little moustache, talking to Lady Hilton? That's the man I am going to marry."

"Cécile! Oh, you are joking! You can't mean Jack Heathcote! Why, he is a mere yeoman, and you haven't known him a week."

"Yes, that's the man, darling. And he is dying of love for me, too. Just watch how he is leering round at us through the corner of his eye, while he is talking to Lady Hilton. But he will never have the—what you call it?—pluck to propose, unless I do it for him. The booby is so dreadfully afraid of me."

Gazed . . . into the carriage.

"And what do you think of him?" Edith pointed to Lemaitre, alias Dr. Danton, sitting vis-à-vis with Miss Newton.

Cécile was serious in a moment.

"Who is he?" she asked.

"I don't know, dear. A friend of my cousin Beaumont, I believe."

"What a huge man he is! And do you know that that tuft of imperial of his—is dyed?"

"Cécile! darling! what droll things you find out! and what eyes you have!"

"It is very simple, chérie," said Cécile. "He is old, you know, that man; and he wants to pass for a youth. There are grey hairs under that dye. Dye, you know, does not glint so brightly under the light as the bare hair. You can always tell."

At the same moment, Harry Pendragon, a subaltern in Arthur's hussar regiment, was saying to the Honourable Lily Grandcourt:

"Yes; I agree with you; she is certainly very pretty. Quite a sculpture she looks, talking there to her friend, Mademoiselle Delisle."

"But have you noticed the very extraordinary resemblance between her and the—doctor there? Everyone is talking about it."

"Yes, they are alike certainly," said Harry Pendragon, a gentleman with slender legs and lithe sheer of waist. "One cannot avoid noticing it. That sort of coincidence does happen, you know."

Everyone, in fact, had seen the strange resemblance between Edith and the Frenchman—everyone except the Frenchman and Edith herself. Cécile said nothing on the subject, for it was not every thought that went on in that busy brain which came out from the talkative tongue.

Dancing, all through the Christmas season, was the order of the day. Lady Hilton, a massive old lady, with beautiful silver hair, dimples in her fresh, pink face, and the manners of a queen, despatched Jack Heathcote to the piano, and signalled to Cécile to take her harp.

Jack began to thump out a waltz, and Cécile, sitting by him, plucked the tune from her strings.

A general movement began, and Captain Arthur, opening his wide blue eyes, and standing straight upon his soldierly legs, looked wearily round the room.

There was some amount of hypocrisy in this survey; for before rising he had already decided whom he should seek as a partner. He sauntered lazily toward Edith. She was at the opposite end of the room. At the same time, from another direction, Dr. Danton was walking towards her with a like intention. They were at about equal distances from her, only the doctor's step was not a saunter, but a firm, decided advance. He reached Edith slightly before Arthur.

"If I may have the pleasure——" he said in French.

It was almost the first time he had spoken to her—so close together—alone. The eyes of the man and of the girl met.

Their eyes met—and for the moment could not part. In the man's the girl felt, rather than saw, some memory, some mystery, some strange power, some affinity. In the girl's the man felt an attraction which struck like a pain at his heart.

In the next instant Arthur came up. He was not much of a Frenchman, his ears being little accustomed to the sounds, and though he had heard Dr. Danton speak, had not caught what he said. He guessed, of course, that the doctor had come to ask her to dance, but with his cool, insolent nonchalance, he stepped forward and said:

"May I—Miss Wentworth?"

Danton did not remember to have heard the name distinctly before. Wentworth? The name was not unfamiliar to him. He had known, in his past, someone or other by that name. But whom? The thought passed through his mind like a mist, and faded. He forgot.

Edith glanced from one to the other.

Tall as Arthur was, Danton towered a head above him, though there was a slight stoop in his shoulders. Edith, too, stood high in her shoes; and with either of them would have made good pairing in the dance.

As Arthur spoke Danton glared a moment at him. Then said again, in his courtliest French way:

"Will you permit me?"

"You see you are a moment late," said Edith to Arthur.

He bowed.

"The next, perhaps," she added.

He bowed again, with a suspicion of stiffness.

By this time she was on Danton's arm. He led her away. He had won the first contest.

It was the beginning of a long duel between the two men. And the beginning was a bad prophesy of how the fight would go for Captain Arthur Musgrave.

Digitized by Google

Cécile, plucking the air of the waltz from her gilt harp, glanced round, and saw Edith flitting in the arms of Dr. Danton. She lifted her eyebrows a little and said:

"Do you know Dr. Danton at all?"

"I?" answered Jack Heathcote. "Not I."

He was bending low over the piano, in the seventh heaven; yet flurried and shy, seeing her so dangerously near him.

"Don't you like—the dance?" she said, after a little.

"I?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Middling, you know. All depends if I have the right partner."

"What do you call 'the right partner'?"

"Someone that I like very much, you know. Someone small——"

"I see. You don't like tall ladies."

"No. Someone small, and——"

"But playing for other people to dance is dull. You don't like that, do you?"

"I don't mind it—not a bit. If I have someone that I like very much to play with me——"

"Suppose the person you have playing with you is not small—what then?"

"Oh, well, but—I say—she usually is, you see."

"But can you dance really well?" said Cécile. "Can you dance like a Frenchman? Because, if so, I mean to have a dance myself presently."

"Is that so? Yes, I believe I can dance, if I can't do anything else. And do you mean that you will have me for——"

"A partner? Yes, I mean. But doesn't the loss of the middle toe of your left foot interfere at all with your movement?"

"There now!" cried Jack Heathcote, "however did you know?"

"As if one could help knowing!" said Cécile. "Doesn't the leather of your boot always sink in just over the spot when you make a sudden step?"

"By Jove, now. Think of noticing that. I had it cut off when I was a boy. It was crushed by a stone when I was barefooted, bird-nesting."

"And here—just here, at the back of the neck, under your collar—you have a big scar, sir."

"Oh, well now, this is too much, you know!" cried Heathcote. "How do you know that?"

"You fancy me simple, I think? Why, one guesses that by the way you put down your finger behind, and screw your neck irritably, and settle your collar—even by the way you hold the neck sometimes. One is not blind."

"But you—you see everything."

"Then people should hold their neck straight—like so—then one would not know. Straight up, like a Frenchman!"

She laughed. But Heathcote did not see the joke. Two minutes later he said suddenly:

"But I say, which do you like the best, now—a Frenchman or an Englishman?"

"A Frenchman, sir," she said.

"But you don't dislike an Englishman, do you?"

"Oh, no—not dislike him. We must talk of that later; I am going now——"

When the second waltz was beginning, with Miss Newton at the piano, Edith, still on Dr. Danton's arm, looked shyly aside for the coming of the Captain to claim her. As the music began she saw him coming, with his languid saunter, towards her.

"I promised——" she began.

Danton bent his head down to a level with hers, frowning.

"The next—give me the next!" he said eagerly.

"I promised——"

"No; you did not promise," he said, speaking rapidly and intensely. "You said 'perhaps.' Give me the next!"

Edith looked at him, surprised at his earnestness. Once more their eyes met in fixed scrutiny. Then Edith's curving lashes drooped upon her face, and a slight shiver passed through her.

"The next?" he said.

A faint "Yes" came from her lips.

By the time Arthur had approached the spot she was once more out in the waltz. A strangely faint, subdued feeling seemed to have overcome her; her motions, as she danced, seemed to be hardly her own, but to be imparted to her by her partner; a dreamy, rather pleasant langour half paralysed her will. She tried to shake it off, without result.

Arthur's shoulders just shrugged a little when he found himself ousted a second time, and he walked away with his usual unconcern.

On the third day of the New Year came off the great event of the gathering at Hillcrest Lodge, the ball at which Lady Hilton had determined to celebrate in style the return of her nephew from his Afghan campaign, and the final home-coming of her niece-in-law. All the great ones of the county were present, as well as the chief magnates of Seaborough and York. The suites of halls of the château-like mansion were brilliant with thousands of wax candles, and all the guests wore costumes of the period of Marie Antoinette at the time of the greatest splendour of this queen of fashion and of France.

All through the night Cécile was in a bad temper. Something, no one knew what, visibly annoyed her. When Jack Heathcote came nervously bowing before her, asking for a dance, she said:

"Please find a partner who does not mind being bumped about. I had enough at our last waltz together, thank you."

And yet Jack was looked upon as the perfection of dancing form by the village lasses on a certain Yorkshire property not a hundred miles away. He stared, and retired backward. Cécile presently went dancing with Harry Pendragon.

But her soul was not in it. She broke loose from her partner when she saw Edith standing for a moment by herself in an alcove.

"Edith, you make me vexed!" she said. "Why can't you dance with anybody but that heavy brute? People will notice it!"

"Why, darling Cécile, how cross you look!" cried Edith. She was dressed as the Duchesse de Polignac, the friend of Marie Antoinette, in a gown of white satin, with full underskirt, and embroidered all round with gold, turquoise, amethyst, topaz, and brilliant jewelling. The upper skirt was caught back with pale blue, similarly embroidered. She wore her hair high and poudré, and appeared a constellation of magnificent diamond and turquoise ornaments; she was loveliness itself, and her large brown eyes, lit and animated with excitement, outshone all jewels whatever.

Cécile stood before her, tapping the floor with her slipper.

"Do you like this Danton, then?" she asked.

"I! Why, Cécile, no! not particularly. It merely happens that I have granted him most of the dances. I can hardly explain it, dear."

"Don't dance with him any more! Huge bulk he is!"

At this moment there was a movement towards supper.

In the supper-room were a number of little round and oval tables; while in the centre, at a larger square table, sat Lady Hilton, attired as Marie Antoinette, in rich brocade, wearing the Hilton family jewels round her neck as a superb collar; a turquoise velvet cap, clasped with jewels, on her white coiffure, and a bandeau of family jewels under her cap. Her court mantle was fastened at the shoulders with a tiara of diamonds, widened out so as to clasp the cloak from shoulder to shoulder. All the tables were decorated with flowers, some of them from the south of France; while dishes of strawberries, apricots, grapes, and pineapples were in luxurious contrast to the falling snow outside.

Digitized by Google

Sitting with Professor Queech.

The room was illuminated with silver candelabra containing wax candles. At every arched door were immense screens of magnificent Beauvais tapestry, while here and there, throughout all the rooms, were huge church-candles in gilded stands five feet high.

At the central table, side by side, sat Edith and Arthur among the Queen's "Court."

"I haven't once—not once," said Arthur, "danced with you to-night. That is very hard lines, you know."

"You will not die of it," said Edith; "you have not shown very much eagerness in asking me. Procrastination is the thief of partners."

"You do not know whether I will die of it," answered Arthur, feasting his eyes on her down-bent face. "Misery is not a skin disease. I, at any rate, do not wear my sorrows on my sleeve."

"I am sorry if you are sorry," she said simply. "But the night is only half over, and I could dance for days without stopping."

"May I take it, then, that the rest of the night will be mine?" he asked.

"Not all of it?" she said, lifting her brows archly.

"Yes—all."

She looked up into his face, half shyly, and laughed, without speaking.

"All?" he said, near to her ear.

She nodded her head up and down, laughing a soft, gay laugh.

Soon after they rose from the table, and the guests streamed back to the dancing-halls. The suite of rooms led one into the other, so that the vista of magnificent and brilliantly-lighted apartments was superb. Over three thousand wax candles were used, in addition to the electric light, which was made to simulate wax candles. The candles were unshaded, in imitation of the style of the French in the last century.

The great cedar drawing-room was used as the central ballroom. It was so called because panelled in cedar, a perfect background for the fine Vandyke family portraits hung round it.

The ceiling was white and gold, and there were two large arched windows, in one of which the band was stationed, and they, too, wore a white and gold dress of the French court. The room was lighted with five great crystal chandeliers with wax candles, suspended from the ceiling, with a high candelabrum in each corner, and with two smaller ones on each side of the great marble and alabaster mantelpiece. Palms were placed about; and flowers, forming Louis Quinze garlands, were festooned from one point to the other. The principal feature of all was the unshrouded light—it was day at midnight, but a chaster, holier day—the noon of the fairies.

Miss Newton, who did not patronise the dance, was sitting far back near the panelling with Professor Queech, who was dressed very absurdly in a long robe intended to personate Cagliostro. The Honourable Lily Grandcourt, a plump, large beauty, with a classical face rather lacking in expression, happened just then to sail past them in the arms of lank Harry Pendragon.

"Those now," said the Professor, "make a pretty couple. Notice the exquisite timing of their foot-fall with the beat of the conductor's bâton. The laws of sound are of such a nature——"

"But," broke in Miss Newton, "how is it that the two principal guests of the evening, Captain Musgrave and Miss Wentworth, are not seen dancing together?"

"Ah, yes, that does strike one, does it not? She dances rather with the French doctor. There may, my dear Miss Newton, be a lack of harmonious affinity——"

"I don't see her anywhere," said Miss Newton, looking round.

Edith had vanished.

"A lack of harmonious affinity," repeated the Professor. "May I ask you now, dear Miss Newton, if you will do me the honour——"

"Suppose there is a lack of harmonious affinity between us, Professor," said Miss Newton, smirking.

"I hope not, I believe not, if I may be allowed to say so, Miss Newton. From the first hour in which I saw you, I have realised——"

"But look at Mdlle. Cécile! She is apparently not very pleased with her partner, Mr. Heathcote," cried Miss Newton, dreading an outbreak of sentiment from the Professor. "Her eyes are wandering all over the room, and there is a distinct frown on her face."

"I fancy she is looking about for her friend, Miss Wentworth," said the Professor.

"Oh, that is it, without doubt," answered Miss Newton. "Edith is very likely with Dr. Danton in the conservatory, I should think. Have you observed the singular likeness between her and the doctor?"

"A most extraordinary thing, now," said Professor Queech musingly. "I will tell you a fact, not, I believe, generally known——"

"Well, Professor?"

"It has to do with children—children not yet born. I knew a musician who told me that a lady whom he instructed in singing, had a daughter soon afterwards, who greatly resembled him in face. He attributed it to the fact that during the critical time the mother had looked up to him as her instructor, and he had had a certain influence over her mind. What is more, it turned out that, as the child grew up, the musician had the same strong influence over her mind which he had had over the mother's, only to a much greater extent."

"Oh, Professor Queech, what things you do say!" tittered Miss Newton. "And do you mean to imply——?"

"That Dr. Danton may, by some chance, have known the mother of Miss Wentworth at just such a critical time," said the Professor, "and may, by some possibility, have had just such an influence over her mind. Of course, it is a scientific hypothesis. But talking of music and musicians, there is this fact to be noted, not, I believe, generally known——"

Digitized by Google

"You are a singular kind of vermin!"

"Come," cried Miss Newton, starting up. "We will dance, if you will!"

Outside in the conservatory, in a little bower of palms, sat Edith and Danton.

"I never knew my mother," Edith was saying.

"Who was your father?"

"Ernest Wentworth—brother to Lady Hilton's husband."

Again the mist of memory passed through Danton's brain, and faded.

"Why did you not know your mother? Did she die?" he asked.

"No."

"Then why?"

"She—she was not liked by the Hiltons. She—she was not of the same class as they. They did not—approve of her conduct. They adopted me when my father died."

"I see. Is she alive?"

"I—don't know."

"I should have seen her somewhere—or your father," said Danton musingly, smoothing down his imperial.

"What makes you think that?" asked Edith.

"Because you remind me of someone whom I have known. It is strange I can't tell whom."

"Yes, it is strange," she said dreamily.

"From the moment I saw you," he went on, "I seemed to have known you all my life. You were never a stranger to me. I knew you as well as I know my own life, at the first glance. You are part of me."

Her eye-lashes were lying in long curvature on her pallid cheeks.

"I cannot listen to all that," she murmured, ready, she knew not why, to weep.

"You must. You are part of me. Can't you understand? We are made out of the same piece, our two souls."

The man's face was inflamed with passion, his eyes alight, like a serpent's fixed upon a fluttering bird.

"You cannot say 'no' to me," he went on. "You cannot rebel against me. You are given to me. It would kill me—it would kill us both—if you cut yourself out of me. You are part of my soul—part of my flesh and bone——"

"Oh, pray, let me go!" she murmured low. "I feel so faint here. I am very—very—young——"

"Stay and listen to me. Why do you wish to go?"

"I—promised—someone—to dance——"

"Promise me not to dance to-night."

"But—I don't think you ought to ask."

"But I do ask. And it is not so much to ask. Will you do as I tell you?"

"Well——"

"Do you promise, then?"

"As you are so insistent. But I must go—let me go now."

She rose with a sudden effort; stood a moment still; then ran away, casting a half scared glance behind.

At the same moment a figure stood before Danton at the opening of the bower. It was Captain Arthur Musgrave.

He stood looking coldly with his air of languor, at Danton, while Danton squinted up sideways from under one lifted eye at him.

"You are a singular kind of vermin!" said Captain Arthur Musgrave in perfectly cool, speculative tones, as though he were discussing the flavour of a cigar.

Danton sprang, at once, erect, with passion in his eyes. Arthur, the privileged guest of the night, was dressed in his close red hussar regimentals. Danton had on a rich court dress, which made his mighty frame look even huger; his coat was of mauve brocade, full skirted, and embroidered with gold; the waistcoat of mauve satin, embroidered in floral design; while knee-breeches of shot mauve and gold, silk stockings, court shoes, powdered hair, lace ruffles, jabot, and sword, made up a costume, correct in every particular, of one of Louis XVI.'s courtiers.

"A singular kind of vermin!" Arthur repeated.

This time Danton bowed gracefully, with his right hand over his heart.

"I chanced to be passing near," drawled Arthur, "and heard you trying to persuade a lady to break a promise made to me——"

"Trying—and succeeding," interrupted Danton with a smile—a dangerous smile. The man's blood was up.

"Personally, I don't care a curse whether you succeeded or not," said Captain Arthur Musgrave, pulling his moustache. "I merely wish, now, to know whether you prefer to take your departure at once from the company of ladies and gentlemen here, or submit to be caned like the cur you are."

Danton bowed.

"I prefer to be caned," he said.

"All right. I'll cane you. I would do it now, only I don't happen to have the weapon with me. To-morrow will do. You may look out for it."

Danton bowed. He had in his hand a thin, flexible little malacca cane, gold-headed. He held it out to Arthur, and with another bow, said:

"May I accommodate you?"

In a moment the switch was in Arthur's hand and swish, swish, down came the stinging chastisement upon the Frenchman's face. Arthur threw the cane on the ground.

Danton bore it grandly. He did not flinch. When it was over, he bowed.

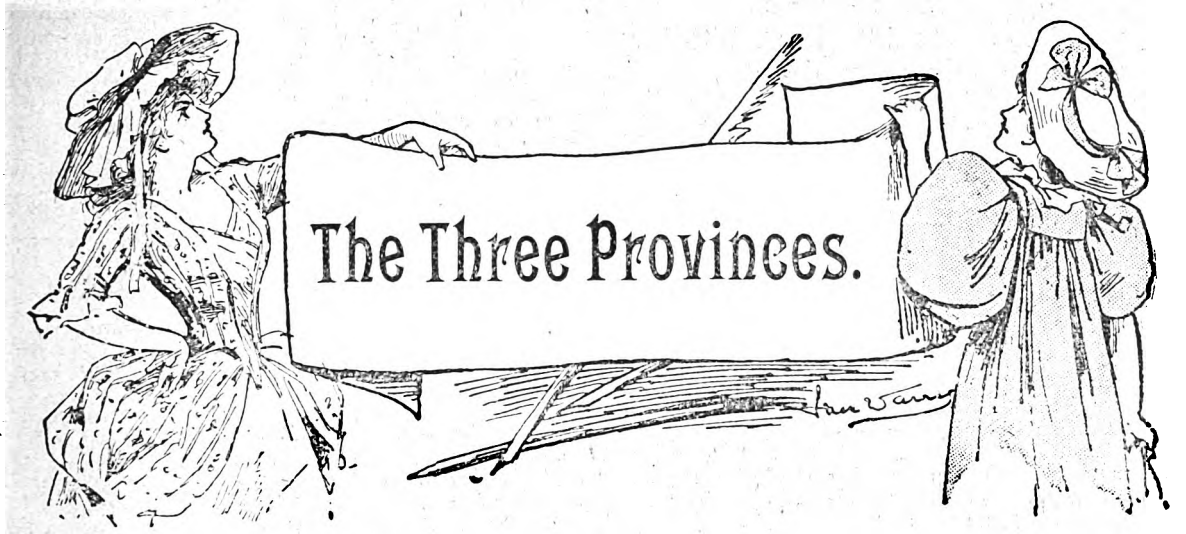
"When may I expect to meet you?" he asked.

"To meet me? In a duel, you mean? Well—it is not the custom, among Englishmen; but as you are a foreigner and wear the dress of a gentleman, I suppose I must do you the honour of permitting you to fight me. I shall appoint a second to wait upon you."

He turned upon his heels and walked away. Danton resumed his seat, put up his hand to his stinging face—and smiled.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google



The Three Provinces.

A little more than seven hundred years ago there arose in Japan a great civil war between two rival families, each of which aspired to the high office of Shogun, sometimes called Tycoon. One of these families was called the Taira, the other, the Minamoto, but this has little to do with the present story.

After a long, fierce struggle the reigning Shogun, a Minamoto, was deposed and forced into exile; and many of the richest and most powerful nobles shared his ruin.

The new Shogun, of course, created a new aristocracy—for thus are written the pages of history.

As time went on, and prosperity and peace spread golden silence over the land, it began to be hinted among all classes that the new ruler was a true father to his people, and that the terrible struggle just past was but inauguration to a period of happiness that should eclipse all memories of previous grief or woe.

Later it began to be rumoured that the new Shogun's love for his subjects was such that he sometimes travelled through the country in the guise of a simple peasant, that he might learn and know the true needs of all classes. This, however, was so totally unlike the course usually pursued by high dignitaries in that land of etiquette, that the report gained but little credence.

Among the noblemen who had suffered most cruelly through the overthrow of the old Shogunate was the Daimyo (feudal lord) Sano Genzaimon. One by one he had seen his possessions devoured by the insatiable fiend of battle. His only son had fallen with a spear snapped deep in his young breast; his daughter, wed before the contest to a noble of the opposing faction, was denied all intercourse with her unfortunate parents; and now that the end was come, and poverty and grief held out lean, eager hands towards them, the aged pair fled by night to a distant province where, at least, they might escape the pity of their enemies.

By the sale of a few jewels and robes of state which they were enabled to retain, they secured a sum sufficient to allow them to rent a miserable hovel of one room, and to purchase from day to day a meagre quantity of tea, rice and millet.

A greater contrast to the luxurious life to which they were accustomed could not be imagined, and only their great devotion to each other gave them strength to suffer and endure.

It was upon a desolate afternoon towards the close of an unusually rigorous winter, that a priest, foot-sore and convulsed with cold, knocked at the unpainted curtain of their little door. All through the morning snow had been sifting and fluttering down from a dreary sky, but now it was coming in great hurtling armfuls; massing against the fences and tree trunks, and laying an effacing sheet over the wavering suburban roads. Twice had the priest knocked without gaining a response; at the third repetition he lifted his voice and cried:

"Open, in the name of Lord Buddha!"

In a few seconds there came from within the sound of a soft moving and bustling, then the curtains were drawn slightly apart, and the worn but aristocratic face of a middle-aged woman appeared in the opening.

"Pardon, honourable lady," chattered the priest between his bows. "I am deeply humiliated at thus forcing myself upon thy hospitality, but indeed I am faint with weariness and can proceed no further."

The woman drew a deep sigh, as, with a voice of exquisite tone and quality, she replied:

"Ah, my poor man, the deep humiliation is that I must refuse thy petition. My husband is absent, and thou knowest that it is impossible for me then to admit a masculine visitor, even a priest of Buddha."

"This custom does not prevail among peasants and labourers, thought the priest," but aloud he said: "When may thy husband return?"

"I have awaited his coming this past hour," she replied, looking anxiously across the waste of snow. "He but journeyed to the nearest village to purchase food and fuel."

"Grant, then," said the priest, "that I await his coming at the doorstep, for no other shelter is at hand and my feet refuse to bear me farther on."

"Willingly, willingly," exclaimed the lady, and, hurrying in, she handed him a teapot filled with boiling water, one of a smaller size containing a pinch of dried tea-leaves, and a little bowl for drinking.

"It is the best I have," she murmured sadly. "There is no rice nor millet with which to knead the cakes."

Thanking her again and again, the priest began to brew the comforting draught. He poured the steaming water into the smaller teapot, from thence also immediately into the bowl; the decoction in the process gained an almost imperceptible tinge and odour; but he drank down cup after cup with famished eagerness. There was no doubt as to the sincerity of his need. After watching him for some moments, the good woman silently rose to her feet, and, wrapping her thin shoulders in a robe of cheap, wadded cotton, she stepped out into the narrow, wind-swept portal.

Digitized by Google

The priest looked up in surprise.

"My poor man," she said, "I cannot see thee suffer. All day I have been housed and sheltered, and now will I yield thee such scant comfort as my poor dwelling can allow. Do thou retire within, and I will remain upon the doorstep until my husband shall return."

"Nay, nay," cried the priest, moved to tears by her noble unselfishness. "Thy soothing drink has warmed and restored me. I am well able to journey on, and should I encounter thy noble husband, I will crave his permission to return with him."

After much courteous parleying the priest hurried away, and the good lady, drawing close the curtain and the paper blind within, sighed and murmured sadly: "For the first time do I rebel at a maxim of the great Confucius. Surely the thought of storms and suffering priests of Buddha had not entered his great heart when he wrote: 'In her husband's absence a virtuous woman may not draw the curtains to a stranger, whatever his age, condition or estate.'" She heaped the little earthenware fire-pot with charcoal, although the last bundle of charred twigs was growing sadly meagre, then she brought forth their slender supply of tea, and drew from its hiding-place a small box of dried orange rinds which are sometimes used among the poorer classes in default of their cherished tea-leaves.

The kettles and the china bowl which the priest had used were frozen to the doorstep as she went to bring them in, and scarcely were they washed, polished and restored to their places, when she heard the sound of clogs at the door.

"Open," cried the priest. "Thy husband is helpless with cold."

With trembling, nervous fingers, she snatched aside the rude blind, and there indeed was the old nobleman, lying senseless in the arms of the priest.

"Do not be alarmed, kind lady," the latter hastened to exclaim at the sight of her terrified face. "It is only the cold and fatigue. Warmth and rest will quickly restore him."

The old wife, as the tears glittered down the wrinkles on her cheek cried: "Thou art sent by Buddha. Hadst thou not gone, he would have perished in the snow."

As the good priest had promised, warmth and comfort soon effected a thorough cure, so that, at the end of an hour, they were all sitting about the brazier, the men smoking tiny native pipes and sipping incessantly the tea-tinged cups of hot water which the hostess so assiduously filled.

With the night the cold deepened. As there was but one room and one supply of bed covering in the poor establishment, it was tacitly understood that they should pass the hours of sleep nodding and dozing about the brazier.

The priest, having felt from the first that his hostess was a woman of no common origin, dared not suggest that she should sleep in the presence of a stranger.

So they crouched in a tiny ring, speaking drowsily of the storm and the cold, and starting suddenly now and then, as a vagrant gust sent a blast through the little house, and rasped from off the roof tiles the masses of frozen snow.

The charcoal and rice which Sano had been to the village to procure were lost and buried in the snow ere the priest had happened upon the purchaser, and now the old wife laid their few remaining pieces of fuel, inch by inch, upon the angry little fire, wondering wretchedly what would become of them when the last fragment had been consumed.

Soon were her fears realised, and while yet the night and the storm were raging without, the blaze died away, and the glow took on a sullen pallor.

Sano looked towards his wife as if to see the reason of her inattention, and the poor woman hid her face to avoid his look.

"It is the last, Sano," she murmured. "There is no more."

"But our guest may not perish with cold," cried her husband. "Is there nothing which we can burn and so defend him from this bitter night?"

He sprang to his feet and hurried nervously about the cheerless room.

Alas! there was nothing but the wooden and paper blinds, and the wooden grooves in which they ran.

"The hovel is not mine," mused Sano, musing over them. "I cannot be a despoiler of other men's property." At this moment his glance fell upon three earthen flower pots, in which were growing the only treasures of his sad and broken life; a plum tree of that rare and beautiful variety in which the limbs droop downwards like a cluster of pliant willow wands, giving the effect, when in full bloom, of a fountain of flowers; a cherry tree not two feet high but of perfect, dainty symmetry; and a pine tree, dwarfed and trained into a fascinating grotesqueness.

The latter was dearest of all. It had been part of his old life of wealth and power, had come down to him from father and grandfather, four generations ago, and its mimic branches were knotted and lichened with the weight of full two hundred years. Without a word he broke the cherry tree to the root, and, snapping it into faggots, laid it on the smouldering coals.

The priest exclaimed in protest, but too late. At the end of an hour the plum tree was sacrificed, and the old dame covered her face with her sleeves.

But when, as the last charred embers of the plum branches faded and fell apart, he rose and moved towards the little pine tree, his wife threw herself upon the floor and in his pathway, crying: "Sano—Sano Genzaimon, not the pine tree also. The souls of thy ancestors forbid it. I charge thee, withhold thy hand from the pine tree."

"And shall our guest, a servant of Buddha, perish of the cold?" He thrust down her clinging hands, but his lips quivered.

"The daylight is close upon us," the poor woman cried. "I will haste to the hills for faggots. Do not, in Buddha's name, sacrifice thy cherished pine tree."

"Heed the words of thy noble lady," broke in the priest. "Do not, in the name of Buddha, ruthlessly destroy the tree of thy ancestor's planting."

Sano stood motionless, and the priest, hurrying to the entrance, drew the curtains apart.

"See!" he exclaimed, his face turned to his host. "The dawn even now is at thy door. Concern thyself no longer; I must be upon my way, and will soon direct some faggot boy to thy dwelling."

The wind had died away; the storm had emptied its full measure of snow upon the frozen earth, and as the priest peered out over the dawn-vague landscape, a grey-blue sheet spread out before him, broken only by the rugged darkness of a distant mountain.

Digitized by Google

To all the entreaties and protestations of his kind host, he made reply:

"I can tarry no longer; it is full time that I should bestir myself." At the moment of parting he turned to Sano and said: "Wilt thou not acquaint me with thy whole name, that I may offer it to Buddha, and thank thee, through him, for thy wondrous kindness of this night?"

With an unconscious lifting of the head the answer was given:

"I am Sano Tsuyeno Genzaimon, once Daimyo of the province of Kaga, in the city of Kinzu."

"Is it possible! Is it possible!" gasped the priest. "I knew that thou wert of fallen estate, but to find thee the Diamyo of Kaga! Art thou an enemy of the ruling Shogun?"

"Nay, my good priest, friend or enemy I am of little consequence. I did but return my knights and my possessions to the master who had given all. I am no rebel; only a ruined and broken man whose one friend is Death."

"To think of it, to think of it," murmured the priest again and again; then thanking them once more in the name of Buddha, he started out upon the waste of snow.

It had seemed but a few moments after his departure, when Sano and his wife, now muffled in ragged bed-covering in lieu of fire, heard a violent knocking at the door. Opening it after some little delay, they found a great sack of charcoal, a measure of rice, a keg of the finest saké (rice wine), together with smaller packets of tea, tobacco and sweetmeats.

There was no sign of human attendance, only a dotted path of fresh tracks leading out over the snow.

"A gift from Buddha!" cried the dame, in a fine quiver of joy and excitement.

"'Tis indeed a swift reward that hath been sent us," rejoined her husband, "but I had no thought of such a wondrous requital when I harboured his pilgrim servant."

* * * * *

Some weeks after this delightful happening, Sano and his wife were thrown into great agitation by the visit of a royal messenger bearing a summons for them to appear before the Shogun at Kamakura.

"Alas! Sano, what can it be?"

"Peradventure it is death," was the low reply. "I had not dreamt that in our poverty and old age it was possible that we should be hounded to further grief and ignominy."

However, despite these gloomy forebodings, Sano recognised the order as imperative, and announced to the messenger his intention of preparing for the journey at once. In three days' time all was in readiness, but what was the astonishment of the old couple to find, awaiting them at their very threshold, two richly lacquered palanquins, gilded with the Shogun's crest, and attended by a goodly number of bearers and running footmen.

"Is this a mockery?" cried Sano, with a passionate gleam of the old fierce light in his eyes.

The servants prostrated themselves to earth, saying that they had been detailed for the purpose of transferring the royal guests to Court. Further than this they knew nothing. With deep misgivings, the pair ensconced themselves in the gorgeous conveyances, and were soon upon the road to Kamakura, then a great city and the seat of the Shogunate.

At last the city was reached. The ponderous castle gates of wood and bronze and polished brass swung open at their approach, and the vast throng of warriors pacing about the wide, pebbled courtyard gave conviction to Sano's fears that he had been brought thither for purposes of revenge. Yet, to the old noble, it was pleasant to see once more the glitter and splendour of armed knights. The play of light upon brazen helmets and imbricated breastplates, the flash of tasselled spears, the glint of curved and polished shields, the clank of metal heels upon the stones, the hiss of moving silk and and steel, the blending of light and colour, of strength and beauty, filled his old heart like wine, and led him back in memory to his own proud castle and his splendid ranks of knight and vassal.

Their palanquins were not set down until the very portal of the castle door was reached, an exceptional honour, it being the custom for all except princes of the blood to dismount at the gate and proceed with retinue on foot to the entrance of the audience chamber.

But Sano no longer questioned "Is it mockery?" Beneath his poor and faded robes the old warrior's heart beat high, and the light of other days was on his face as he stepped into the splendid hall and bade his wife "Fear not, but follow me." There was a great conclave of nobles and warriors assembled, and they sat facing each other in two long rows, forming a glittering vista which terminated in the Shogun's raised daïs of lacquer and cushioned silk.

At their approach the Shogun rose and stood waiting. To the left of his throne was placed a plum tree in dazzling fullness of blossoms, growing from a vessel of bronze and gold.

At the other hand, a little cherry tree shone in a transport of flowers.

As the visitors knelt for the royal obeisance, the Shogun held forth his hand. "Rise, Sano," he said, in tones of suppressed gladness, "and see if thou dost recognise thy guest."

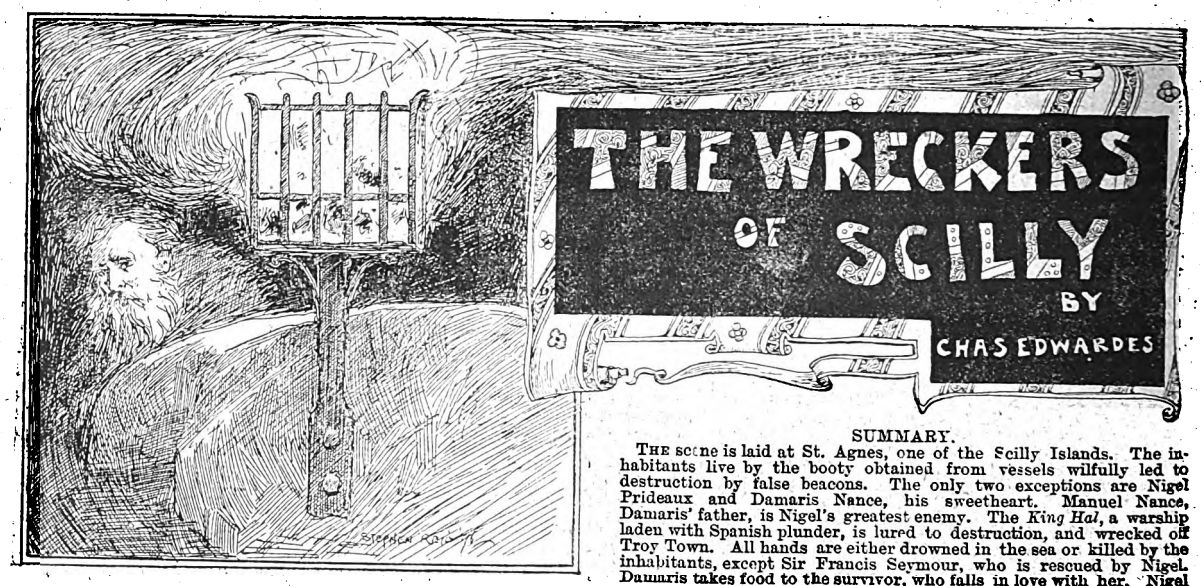
Quicker than her husband, the old dame gave an upward glance and fell again to the earth, crying: "It is the priest, Sano. It is the poor priest."

After explaining to his court in a few brief, glowing sentences the obligations under which this worthy pair had placed him, the Shogun said:

"And now, Sano Tsuyeno Genzaimon, thy castle and thy lands are again thine own. Be but as loyal to thy new master as thou wert to the old, and I will know thee as my truest friend and supporter. For the plum and the cherry tree which thou didst destroy that I might not suffer, behold I return them in kind"—pointing to the trees on either hand—"and, besides, with each will be given thee a new province to rule and govern; Sakurai, on the western coast of Nappon, the province of the cherry tree, Umèdo, in Shikoku Island, field of the plum, and for the pine tree, which thou wert willing to sacrifice also, the broad heritage of Matsuyama (Pine Mountains) that lies near the sacred city of Kyoto."

Mary McNeil Scott.

Digitized by Google



SUMMARY.

THE scene is laid at St. Agnes, one of the Scilly Islands. The inhabitants live by the booty obtained from vessels wilfully led to destruction by false beacons. The only two exceptions are Nigel Prideaux and Damaris Nance, his sweetheart. Manuel Nance, Damaris' father, is Nigel's greatest enemy. The King Hal, a warship laden with Spanish plunder, is lured to destruction, and wrecked off Troy Town. All hands are either drowned in the sea or killed by the inhabitants, except Sir Francis Seymour, who is rescued by Nigel. Damaris takes food to the survivor, who falls in love with her. Nigel arranges to secure Sir Francis' escape from the cave.

CHAPTER VII.

A RACE FOR A WIFE.

THAT night, when the moon was just walking from the cold waters of the Atlantic, our hero guided Sir Francis Seymour to his little boat, and successfully conveyed him to Hugh Town on St. Mary's.

Manuel Nance and two of the men.

One petition he made, and the granting of it was the only one condition Nigel asked in requital of his services.

"Thou wilt say no word of what in my heat I told thee about my brethren here? There must be no thought of avenging the deeds they may have done, for, after all, they are my kinsmen, and the playmates of my infancy."

To this the knight agreed, though it was against the inclination that had grown upon him during the later hours of his imprisonment in the cave. A suspicion had arisen in him that the St. Agnes men were guilty not only of horrid barbarity towards the soldiers and sailors of the King Hal, but that they had made some alliance with the storm to wreck the vessel.

"But, good Nigel," he demurred, "if perchance—I think it not probable, though fortune may rule it so—if perchance a box or two of gold or treasure may be vomited by the greedy sea——"

"And if 'tis so, thou must make no claim upon it. Why, sir, art thou not grateful for thy dear life that thou canst not forego such stuff as that——"

"Right good stuff, too, lad, as mayhap anon thou'lt perceive. But be it so. I will tell the tale that I, by the skin of my teeth, escaped, and not man nor unbroken spar besides."

Nigel landed the knight in the Bay of Porth Cressa, but did not accompany him towards the houses, and thus towards midnight he had returned to St. Agnes, shunning the moonlit water where he could, and reached his pallet unobserved.

The next day Manuel Nance and two of the men in whom he reposed most confidence spent divers pleasant hours in telling over the gold that had come to them.

The Lord of St. Agnes had not drunk so deep with the rest the previous evening but that when he lay on his bed a scheme recurred to him by which he hoped to gain advantage. Wretch though he was, he yet knew something of the pangs of remorse. But he was ignorant of the deeper truths of human nature. He fancied, forsooth, that by the bestowal of money-bags upon Holy Church he could get such absolution for his sins as should make him light of soul and innocent as a child. He therefore designed to visit the holy Abbot of Tavistock, whose fame and importance were unrivalled in all the West country, and to make a barter with him on these premises.

Digitized by Google

Nor was this all. Nance was no fool, and read the times as well at least as most men of the mainland. If he secured the good will of Holy Church, it was well. But he could feel wholly safe only by gaining the interest of the civil arm also.

Here, too, money might do much—that he knew well; for had not he annually sent a present of various rich fabrics and jewels to the acting Lord in St. Mary's, thereby deterring that just-minded worthy from giving air and credence to the cavils that might reach him about the island and its people?

But it were better still if he could have a blood alliance with this governor who exercised nominal rule in all the Archipelago.

And this might be so easy of arrangement. Christopher Layton, the governor in question, possessed a family of six sons. They had no spotless reputation—indeed, in St. Mary's they were a by-word. But what of that? Young blood will gallop after its own fashion; and, besides, these fine youths were not of a temper to bear being penned in an island where their days were passed in inaction and murmuring.

Nance, therefore, leapt to the thought that he could in no way better protect himself against the charges that might some day be cast in his teeth than by marrying his daughter to one of Master Layton's sons. She was full ripe for the alliance. He had marked her beauty and fine growth even before her nurse had warned him of both. Further, he had marked what Nurse Cochran had not—namely, the indignation with which she met his words in dispraise of young Nigel Prideaux, who was confessedly the comeliest youth on the island. This, and the youth's looks towards Damaris whenever they were near each other, was one of the strongest causes of his exceeding violence against Nigel.

And so Nance fondled the idea as he lay abed, and resolved the next day to send a messenger with overtures to Master Layton. It was all one which of the Layton youths was chosen. But he flattered himself the love of five thousand golden crowns would not fail to get Damaris a husband. It was in truth a princely bribe, and out of question the father would be cunning enough to take it in the right light, and be mum about it.

"This arranged," said Nance to himself, "either St. Agnes shall go into other hands, or I will manage it differently. I like not to think of the burdens on my conscience."

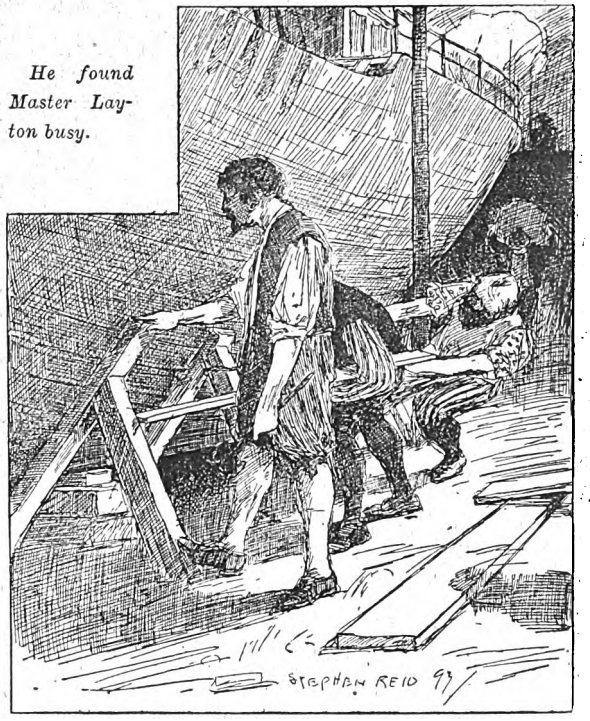
And having thus coaxed a little tranquility into his soul he fell asleep. But for all his self-cozening he had dream visitations in the night which made him in the morning increasedly anxious to clinch the bargains he had planned.

The gold and other treasures were stacked in the very room in which Nance slept. There was no peril of being robbed, for the St. Agnes men were loyal to each other.

Damaris had gone to bed that night with the chink of gold in her ears, and when she awoke in the morning her father was again busy piling the pieces for her marriage portion.

James Pender, the elder, was commissioned by Nance to cross the sound ere the tide turned, and to see Master Layton on the subject. Had he dared, Pender would have refused such a business. He had hoped Damaris might fall to the lot of his own son, for there was little choice on St. Agnes, and was not he the best man in the island after Nance himself? But he was won over to the task, as much as aught else by the hints that the lordship of St. Agnes might be his own in a month or two, if he would but be patient and wait.

He found Master Layton busy in getting out his vessel for a distinguished voyager, who was none else than Sir Francis Seymour. For awhile he could not interfere to explain his mission; but when he told it, uncouthly and grossly enough, the lord of St. Mary's burst into a laugh, and said it would please him mightily.



He found Master Layton busy.

The governor's sons were sent for, and in their presence the matter was again related, more in detail. Truth to tell, but for the golden crowns (of which Master Christopher was to take the half), the youths would have mocked at the idea that any one of them should take a wife out of St. Agnes.

But the money made all the difference. And besides, it needed not Pender's description of Damaris to suggest to them that the girl herself was no ordinary Scilly maiden. The rumour of her beauty had already spread about St. Mary's, and the priests of Tresco had made a fair report of her intelligence and grace.

"I'll have no brawling over it," said Master Christopher, with an affectation of alarm. "Certes, there be no more foolish way of puffing up the pride of wenches than by making them think they be worth fighting about. So settle it peaceably."

But this they were unable to do. Their imaginations began to riot about poor Damaris, until they rated her as a Helen, and the thought of the gold pieces, and what might be done with them, made them look angrily at each other, and discountenance each other's plans contemptuously.

As fortune would have it, however, Sir Francis himself came to their relief.

Told of the dilemma, though not of the prize, he said laughingly:

"My good friend, never saw I stouter youths. Let each strip himself to his smock, and the one who first reaches the island be the winner."

The idea delighted the governor, and was not distasteful to the young men, who were all much at home in the water.

It was thus agreed upon. And the day being unusually propitious, and Master Nance's eagerness for a settlement as great as theirs, they straightway drank a cup or two of ale, and in the presence of a crowd of the islanders and Sir Francis himself, took to the water by the rocks of the Fort hill, nearest to St. Agnes.

Digitized by Google

She saw the boat at length return.

Pender accompanied them in his boat, and a boat of St. Mary's also went with them, that the vanquished might later in the evening return.

Could Damaris have known what was in progress, she would have found diversion in watching the issue of this singular love race. And the more so that she would know in her heart how foolish and futile such an effort to win her affections was bound to be.

But she knew nothing of it until her nurse began to babble to her about the stalwart young strangers who were descending the gorse-clad hill behind the village.

The eldest of the Laytons had won the race, which somewhat allayed the irritation felt by his brothers. With a hot face and expanded nostrils the lucky youth (as he was regarded) strode towards the house, and loudly called for Master Nance. Here he caught sight of Damaris herself, who viewed these lusty youths with curious sensations, and called her to him with such freedom of manner that the girl ran into her own room, and thence escaping by the yard into the open, she betook herself straightway to her kine on the downs. There with her thoughts and maiden fancies she was ever passably content. And there, too, she stayed till evening, especially when she perceived that there was a quest for her.

From her vantage post she saw the boat at length return across the sound, with the unwelcome, forward young newcomers at the oars.

Both the kine and she herself were glad of it, for it was long past the common milking hour.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE HEART OF A MAID.

MASTER NANCE was rarely pleased with the condescension of Master Layton. He had but half thought his suit (for so it was, in fact) would be considered at all. Knowing himself for what he was, he was not shrewd enough to realise that he might yet seem to others more reputable than he really was. The unwonted thoughts of his own guilt had yet more lowered him in his own regard.

When the Layton lads appeared, therefore, and in a brawl told him—though in different keys and some with open sneers at the folly of the contest—how they had swum the sound of St. Agnes in honour of his daughter, he was as proud as a knight whose only child might be the queen of a tournament in which all the combatants were of extraordinary distinction.

"Where hies she? Where hies she?" persisted Eric Layton, the winner of the course. "I did but just see the sparkle of her eye, yet I feel my heart all aflame to become more intimate with her."

"Marry, thou fair son-that-shall-be," answered Nance, clapping the youth on the shoulder, "I give thee permit to go wheresoever thou wilt to find her. Nay, be not modest——"

At this the Layton lads laughed till the sheep browsing near ran from them in alarm. That ever they should be charged with such a weakness!

"No, faith, good father-that-may-be—I keep not a chamber within me for that most excellent virtue to dwell in. Such modesty as there is between us lies among those five varlets yonder."

"And right sensible thou art," continued Nance, though not without a feeling of discomfort at his position. "'Tis a world in which one were better to be bold than backward. And so I say to thee—seek her freely, and if thou art urged to crack the very panels of the door behind which she nestles in her maiden fear, I'll give thee absolution for it!"

"Hearty thanks, Master Nance," responded the lad, and, with a wink to his brothers, young Eric went off on his quest.

But this, as we have seen, was futile. Undeterred by Nurse Cochran, who hurled some strong abuse at him for his unmannerliness, he searched the house from roof to outbuildings. He even plunged his arms into a box of gold, as if he thought she might be there. And he took the bedding of fair Damaris' couch in his arms, and flung it loose into a corner, that she might not remain hid beneath it. This done, he gave the old woman a slap upon the cheek which roused all the bad blood in her, and told her that anon he would crop her tongue for her ere he took her with Damaris into his household.

"Thou dark cub!" cried the nurse at his heels. "Never while I have nails to tear thee from her shalt thou—coarse brute—mate with my white lily!"

But the youth jeered even while he climbed the downs, and took no heed of the angry looks of the other men and women of St. Agnes, who had gathered about the house to see what was in the wind.

"Fair doings, forsooth!" muttered the elder Pender. "There'll be no privilege in St. Agnes if deeds like these be borne with."

"The brawny whelp!" cried one of the women, half in admiration of his figure and half in hate.

But late in the evening young Layton rejoined his brothers, angry and tired. Though he had trodden in every part of the island (so he said), he had not found his bride. Vain was it for Nance to try to persuade him to tarry for the night. He was piqued, and talked loosely of surrendering the prize he had won. Yet at a word from his brothers, who had not spent their strength in idle quests, he was prompt to recant on this heading. For the present, however, he would return home. It was agreed that when due preparations were made for the wedding, Nance should fetch him, and then, without any more absurd prudery, Damaris should resign herself into his hands.

"Why, my wench, didst elude thy lover so?" asked Nance in the evening.

"I know not, father," she replied, "wherefore he is my lover. I like not him, and he misused my nurse, with scant care for her age."

Digitized by Google

"Her age! quo' she," interrupted Dame Cochran. "One need not be so old, child, to be nurse to thee. For all that, he's a bad youth, that Layton, and I marvel, Master Nance, thou canst talk of him and thy Damaris in one breath."

"I repeat it, Dame, notwithstanding; the girl has four days to bring her mind to it. See thou aid'st her, or it will be the worse for thee. I'll endure no opposition under my own thatch and beams."

"Oh, gramercy!" said the dame with an ironical curtesy, Then afterwards, Nance having left the two alone, "I'll see thee dead and buried, like yon shipload of men, Manuel Nance, ere I'll brook words like that from thy mouth. I tell thee, girl, thou shalt not be wife to this governor's chick."

"Of that I am resolved, and so no more about it," observed Damaris, with a decision of tone and demeanour that surprised the old woman.

Each day of the following three Nance put to his daughter the same question:

"Wilt obey thy father, Damaris, in this matter?"

And each day she confessed herself unfilial, and likely to be. It hurt her to grieve her father, for there was much love of a kind between them, yet on this subject she had full assurance from her heart that she was a better judge than he.

Moreover, had she not each day obtained new strength to resist him from Nigel's stouter mind? They twain met on the downs as before, and sat hand in hand in the cave which had lately sheltered Sir Francis Seymour. Their love grew tenfold, until it was as if it had reached a degree beyond which a mortal body could not hold it.

Sat hand in hand in the cave.

At first, Nigel had made as if he cared not so greatly for her when she told him without comment of the bridegroom her father had brought for her. She was plaguing him. Of the distaste she felt for young Layton and of his obvious defects she said nought.

For this reason Nigel, though heavy at the heart as if lead lay there in barrels, said no word either in objection or abuse of his rival.

"Perchance," he said to himself, "she may be of a disposition to love this young gallant even as she has made a show of loving me. I will not bar her!"

Then, when she looked at him in wonder that he said nothing, and opened her pretty eyes wide upon him, he could no longer resist speaking after his own instincts.

"Damaris, my dear," he said, with a quaver in his voice, "you shall do as you like best to do. I will not bind you. We are both young and shall outgrow our troubles, if we have them. If you feel a fondness for Eric Layton, in the name of God and all His saints let me not stand between him and you—if you wish it not!"

But this was more than the girl could bear.

She cast herself upon Nigel's breast and put her arms about his neck.

"How vile thou art, my Nigel, to taunt me thus! Dost thou not see it in mine eyes that I was but trifling with thee? Thou alone art my life, and if I mate not thee I will die a maid—when God shall desire it."

After this, said in passionate tones, and with the girl's clear eyes looking rebukefully into his, there no longer abode any doubt in Nigel's mind.

He clasped Damaris to his heart, and covered her face with kisses.

Then it was too that he made the proposal which had lain near his soul ever since he had heard of this new suitor for his sweetheart.

"If it fell out, Damaris," he said slowly, fondling her hair while her cheek lay upon his shoulder, "if it fell out that no other way remained, wouldst thou confide in me, and depart from St. Agnes, and go whither Heaven would have us go?"

"I'll go with thee, my brave Nigel, to the land of the Turk, or to those uttermost parts of the earth, where the men are no higher than bodkins."

"Thanks, my sweet. Then trust me I will contrive a way."

With these words Nigel had brought back to the girl all the fortitude which her father's question had disturbed and routed.

And at each meeting they felt the surer that Heaven was upon their side, and that Eric Layton and Damaris would never be housed together under one roof.

When he had nought more pressing to do, Nigel spent the hours in fresh caulking his little boat, and hammering leather cuts and sound wood patches upon the weaker parts of the framework. Also he cleansed and scoured it as it had never before been cleansed and scoured. And daily, while he was fishing, he had his eyes quite as much upon his boat as upon the water in which he dangled his line. He was earnest in bethinking how he could improve the thing, and make it more waterproof and worthy of the guest whom he hoped it might by-and-bye receive. Also, without exciting remark, he increased the stock of meal and frogs' flesh in his cottage. Ban, the idiot, likewise enjoyed himself in wringing the necks of sundry fowls, which were afterwards boiled into softness, and highly seasoned to make them keep long without decaying.

Damaris had less to sustain her.

It wounded her sore to bring the cloud upon her father's face morning and night, in response to his "Well, my daughter?" Latterly, she could not hold her tears. And on the evening before the fourth day, when she was to be made a bride against her will, at Master Nance's cold bidding of "good-night" she dropped upon her knees and laid hold of his wristband with the plaintive pleading:

"Oh, father! father!"

Digitized by Google

"I crave a favour of thee."

But he only cast a look at her to see if the old obduracy was in her lips and eyes, and left her with the laconic injunction:

"See thou art ready on the morrow!"

Had Dame Cochran also been against her, it would have gone hard indeed with the girl. But this lady prided herself upon the constancy of her hatreds and the strength of her memory. For all her unfeminine habits and appearance, she had a corner of tenderness in that withered old organ, her heart. And now she was as gentle towards Damaris as erstwhile she had been rough and unfeeling.

"Be hearty, my lamb," she murmured caressingly, as she unstrung the girl's gown from her back, perchance for the last time. "I have a notion it will not come to pass, though we be so near the threshold of it. 'Tis not for nought, beshrew me, that I have found a stripling chick in the two eggs I've cracked this last day of our lives. Marry, my wench, let's go to our beds in faith. How know we not that King Arthur himself shall not come in the night on his great white horse and carry thee off, Damaris, through the black night air to his fair castle and Court. I crave a favour of thee, my duck, if it comes about; make me thy tire-woman there, even as I have been thy waiting-woman here. For mine eyes have become used to the sight of my Damaris' fair face."

"Fond nurse, I will die ere I choose other than thou to wait upon me. But I need no servant, for I am on the brink of much misery."

Yet although she went to bed with these words on her lips and tears in her eyes, no sooner was she alone and in the dark, with her head upon the silken pillow, than the figure of Nigel came before her shut eyes to hearten her. And when she dreamt there was no element in her visions that she would have wished away.

(To be continued.)

THAT AWFUL COMPETITION!

Of course you know all about the Coupon Collecting Competitions. You read the full particulars of them in the Christmas Week Number of SHORT STORIES. You don't believe in this sort of thing. It is a lot of hard work with a very poor chance of success.

Well, it is fortunate for others that you do think so, because it gives them a better chance. But do you realise that working for about an hour a week—that is, fifty-two hours a year—you stand a good chance of earning

A Hundred Solid Sovereigns?

A lot can be done with £100, but, of course, if you are sufficiently wealthy to ignore the offer, pass along to something more exciting.

One of the coupons on the second page of SHORT STORIES will be collected by ordinary people, the other marked "newsagent," by tradesmen of that ilk. Similar coupons appear in PEARSON'S WEEKLY and HOME NOTES. Procure as many of these coupons as you possibly can, and paste them either in exercise books or on slips of paper.

£100 will be given to the reader who collects the greatest number from SHORT STORIES and P. W.; another £100 to the reader who collects from HOME NOTES; another £100 to the newsagent who collects from S. S. and P. W.; and another £100 to the newsagent who collects from HOME NOTES. There will also be numerous Consolation Prizes.

ONE PRIZE OF £25. FIVE EACH OF £5.
TWO EACH OF £10. TEN „ „ £2.
TEN EACH OF £1,
AND HUNDREDS OF SMALLER PRIZES.

Newsagents' coupons must not be collected by readers.

S. S. and P. W. coupons should be kept together: HOME NOTES Coupons should be collected separately.

NO COUPONS TO BE SENT IN BEFORE JANUARY, 1898.

PART THREE
OF
PEARSON'S SHAKESPEARE

Will be on sale on Thursday, February 18th. You will know it by the dainty appearance of its cover. The letters are printed in red on a pale salmon-pink surface, and the contents are as good as it is possible to make them—they consist of excellent printing and of reproductions of illustrations by Sir John Gilbert, R.A.

The volume will be complete in thirty parts, and it will be best for you to subscribe weekly rather than to wait until the whole is finished, as the number of bound volumes will be limited.

Part Three contains eighty pages of letterpress and nearly thirty illustrations, and the play treated is "Romeo and Juliet."

PEARSON'S SHAKESPEARE

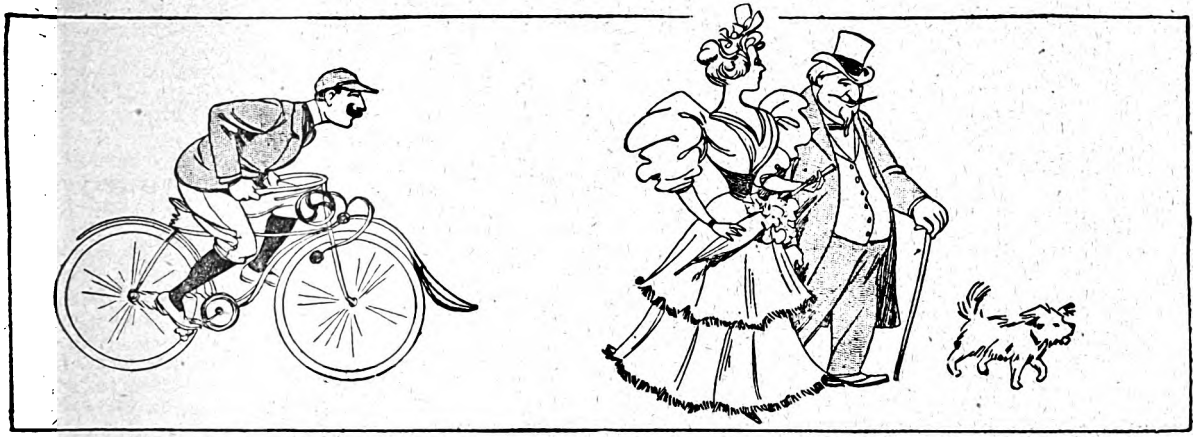
should be ordered through a newsagent, or may be obtained from these offices, post free, for 7½d. per copy.

The winner of the "Small Handwriting Competition" is Mr. J. P. Nix, of 8, Rendezvous Street, Folkestone. He wrote the words Short Stories 2,297 times on the back of an ordinary Government oblong postal card, the title of the story being counted as once. A cheque for Two Guineas has therefore been sent to this gentleman.

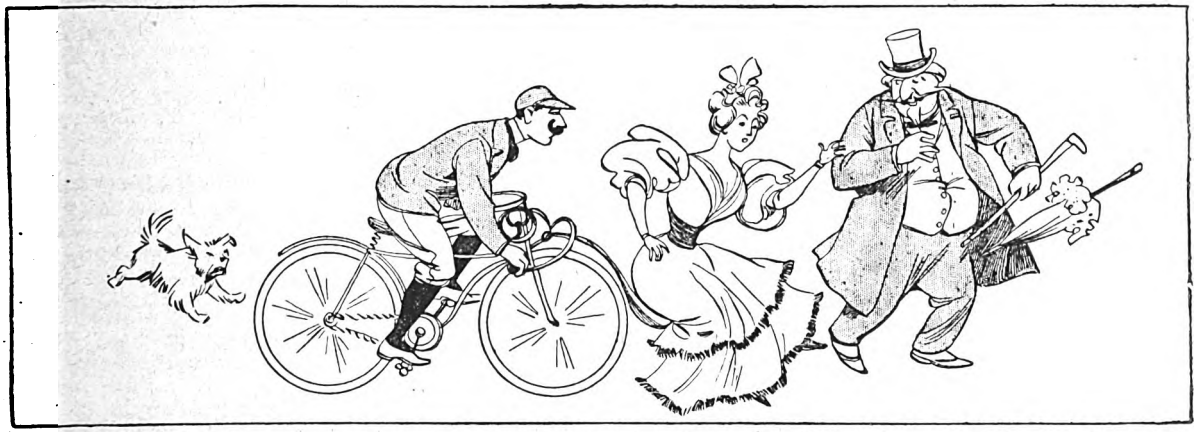
Digitized by Google

A STORY WITHOUT WORDS.—No. 4.

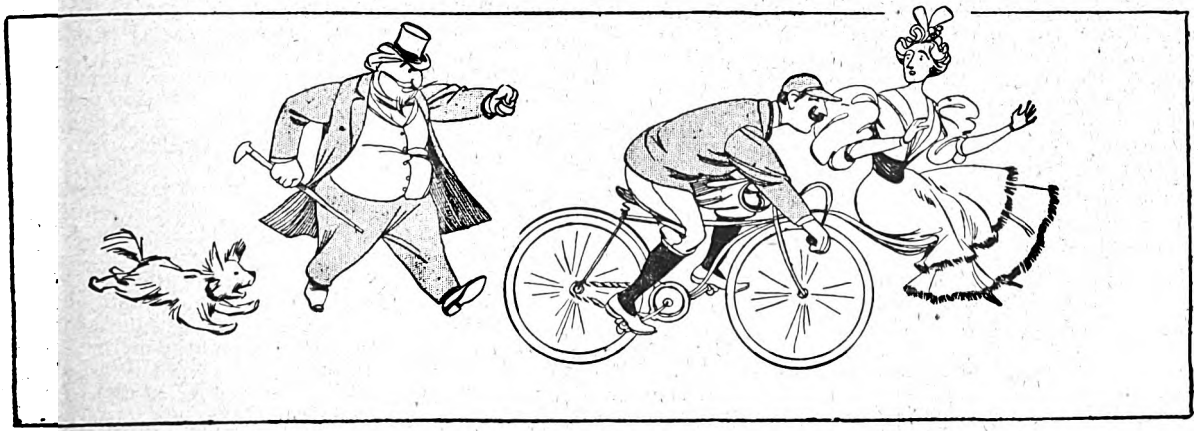
SEE PAGE 252.



1



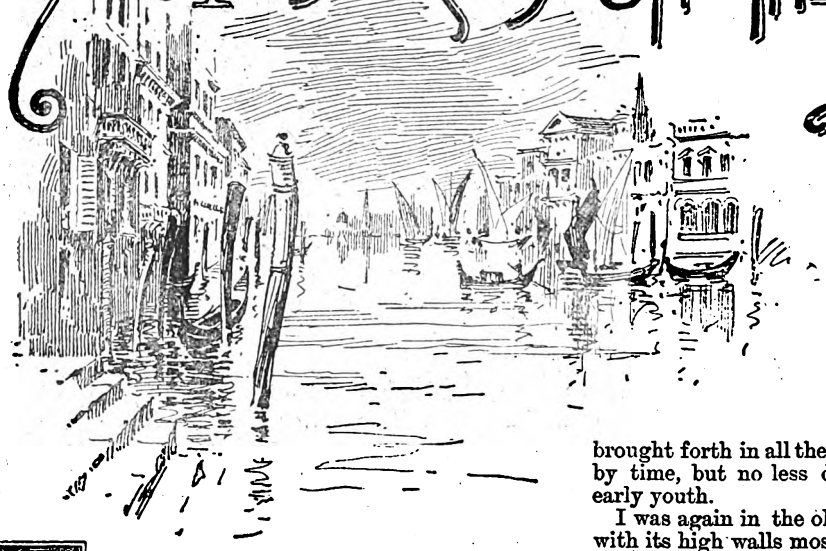
2



3

Digitized by Google

"My Boat is on the Shore"



IN one of her prefaces, Georges Sand tells how, when in Venice, upon overhearing a conversation between two women, the idea occurred to her of writing her romance "Audre." Their gossiping across from door to door reminded her so forcibly of La Chatre that she seemed suddenly to be transported from the spot out into the open country.

One morning in the same Venice I experienced an almost identical impression while leaning from my window and drinking in the fresh silence which is one of the charms of this enchanted city. The spot was propitious for dreaming. The water lapped caressingly against the moss-covered walls that rose from the lagoon; in front of me an old brick house, with high, arched windows and marble balconies, mirrored its blackened façade in the rippling waters below; the terraces blossomed bravely with bright geraniums, and through an occasional opening one caught glimpses of a narrow garden bordering the canal.

Farther down, the canal made a sharp turn, where, at long intervals, heralded by the cries of the gondoliers, gondolas would emerge from the shadow, glide through the dusky water it ruffled into a silvery wake, and disappear under a neighbouring bridge.

This drowsy little nook bore such a striking resemblance to one of the old quarters of my own native village that little by little a strange illusion took possession of me. The matin chimes sounding from the tower of a neighbouring church, added still another link to my retrospective vision. I seemed to have renewed my youth to five-and-twenty years and was drifting down our old canal of Vilette, between the tall, narrow houses of the Rue des Juifs, while the bells of the church of the Augustines rang out the hour of morning mass.

All at once, in the exquisite freshness of this suggestive silence, the voice of a woman floated out from a window hidden behind the railing of the terrace. The voice, limpid and young, hummed a barcarolle—a popular old Venetian air, beginning:

"My boat is on the shore."

Now the hallucination was complete. This barcarolle I had heard in my youth, and how I had loved the voice of her who had sung it!

Just as the cry of a passing boatman had awakened in me a long forgotten memory of the past, the music of this barcarolle evoked in me emotions that had slumbered for years. It dredged the very depths of the still waters of my memory and brought forth in all their freshness, softened and dimmed by time, but no less dear, the buried treasures of my early youth.

I was again in the old quarters of the Rue des Juifs, with its high walls moss-grown and darkened from the humidity of the canal, and as I looked at a certain high window blossoming with red carnations, there appeared the bewildering figure of Juliette Stadelli, who sang—

"My boat is on the shore."

This Juliette was the daughter of an expatriated Italian count, Daniele Stadelli, who, during the earlier years of his exile, had made occasional apparitions in his household, but finally had disappeared altogether.

At the time of which I speak Juliette, or Zulietta, as she was familiarly called, was scarcely twenty years of age; tall and lissom of figure, with an Italian vivacity she inherited from her father, dark eyes that glowed with a lustre like that of our wild cherries, and auburn locks that fell half caught, half free, about her neck. Two things alone marred the beauty of an otherwise faultless face; the chin was too massive and the distance too great between the upper lip and the finely modelled nose, which gave to the lower part of the face an expression a little animale, but when she smiled and showed her little white teeth, one freely forgave this slight detraction.

Notwithstanding this rare beauty, or perhaps on account of it, Zulietta was not well received in our rigid provincial society of Vilette. Her boyish manner and frank speech, her showy, eccentric toilettes, betraying her love of display, displeased the materfamilias, while her striking beauty excited the jealousy of the marriageable daughters who reproached her with being ill-bred and indiscreet. Nevertheless, on account of her wonderful musical talent and rich voice, she was welcomed at all our soirées.

We, the young men of the place, were all bewitched by her. When she sang, we formed an adoring circle round her; when she danced, we fought over her waltzes and contra-dances, and after the ball we loitered at the corners of the deserted streets to get a last glance from those sparkling eyes, as bright as the stars above her.

Zulietta received our enthusiastic homage indiscriminately, as one inhales the fragrance of a bouquet of roses, without attaching more importance to one than to another. She allowed herself to be made the centre of our adoring circle without showing the least preference for any one of us. All of which, for my part, was most exasperating.

Digitized by Google

I loved Zulietta with all the ardour of my five-and-twenty years and with the candour of a man who feels his heart beat seriously for the first time. As everyone does who is passionately in love, I imagined Mademoiselle Stadelli to be the only woman whom I could ever love, and that without her my life would hold no purpose or charm. Her indifference and coquetry, therefore, caused me the most acute suffering.

I could not resign myself to the uncertainty of the relations existing between us, for I was not so calmly disposed as my comrades, and this doubt was more than I was able to endure. A plain situation, however desperate it might be, seemed preferable to the anxiety which I now felt, and in spite of my natural timidity I resolved upon the first occasion to make a frank avowal of my love.

This was not easy, for while the young girl invited us all cordially enough to her house, she adroitly avoided a tête-à-tête visit with anyone.

However, on one particular day I was before the others, and found her alone in the room which served her at once as studio and parlour.

I see it before me now, that large, light room on the top floor of the house in the Rue des Juifs. On the sill of the open window the bright geraniums waved and nodded gaily to the wanton breeze that fanned them, and from the canal below the music of the lapping water mounted on the air. The reflection of the sun upon the water threw upon the wall fair, shadowy figures that floated in a fantastic dance across the room. It was Saturday afternoon, the bells chiming from the tower of Augustines mingled in a strange harmony with the murmur of the flowing water and the fantastic dance upon the wall.

The bewildering figure of Juliette Stadelli.

As, with a beating heart, I closed the door behind me,

Leant her elbow on the piano.

Zulietta, who was seated at the piano, slightly rose, then, perceiving that I was alone, advanced a step, still fingering the keys, and absently extended her other hand towards me.

"Oh, it is you, is it?" she murmured. "You are come at an unfortunate time. I am in the depths of one of my discontented moods. You cannot imagine how wearied I am of stagnating in this hole of Vilette!"

She struck a last petulant chord, then arose, threw back a truant curl with an old familiar gesture and leant her elbow on the piano. "Think," she continued, with evident irritation, "how one lives but once, and I am wasting this life so short and so precious buried at the bottom of this little provincial town."

"But you would not leave us?" I protested timidly.

"I would!" she cried, with flashing eyes and dilating nostrils. "I would go into the world and have a name and live according to my rank and have a mansion and pictures and jewels. To be a queen courted and admired in a circle of artists. Yes, I must have all that, and I am ready to give my soul to whoever will give it to me!"

This declaration held but little encouragement for me, who had nothing but my heart to offer her. I felt myself small and insignificant before this catalogue of ambitious desires. However, I ventured tenderly:

"All this pomp can never equal the joy of loving and of being loved, and if you knew, oh, Zulietta, if you only knew, how I love you!"

She regarded me a moment in amazement, then burst into a mocking laugh.

"You!" she cried. "Oh, my poor friend, my poor friend, you are mad! Let us talk no more about it," she added, and, turning quickly round, seated herself at the piano.

"Let us have a little music to dissipate your sentimental humour. I will sing you a barcarolle that I learnt when I lived in Venice with my father," and, without troubling herself further about my suit, began:

Digitized by Google

"My boat is on the shore."

Her rich contralto voice filled all the silent room. In the intervals of the couplets the sound of the lapping water rose plaintively, like a great sob. The cruel disdain of this proud girl cut me to the quick. Hot, passionate tears rushed from my eyes. I felt that I should weep ridiculously, but I would not have her witness the spectacle of my chagrin.

"Adieu, Zulietta," I managed to say. "Adieu," and fled precipitately, while she, without disturbing herself, continued her barcarolle.

In spite of my humiliation, I still loved Zulietta passionately, but I swore I would never see her again. Under these circumstances one often takes such oaths, but this time Heaven took it upon itself to see that I should not perjure myself.

A few weeks later we heard that Mademoiselle Stadelli was married. She had married an old man, but assuredly a rich one, and the bearer of an aristocratic name. Thus her ambitious dream was realised. Immediately after the nuptial ceremony she left Vilette, and all was over.

I strove a long time to recover myself after this blow. This marriage had turned my life into a nightmare. I lived upon the memory of my shattered hopes that were like the débris of seaweed and broken shells that the ebbing tide leaves upon the strand. I had breathed the bitter perfumes of love, and this tonic of bitterness fortified me against the return of my paroxysms of sentimentality. The following year I left Vilette for Paris. I knew that Zulietta was there with her husband, but I made no effort to see her. I had fought my passion inch by inch and feared a new fall at sight of her.

From time to time I heard others speak of her. She had become a gay woman of the world, and in the Echo I read occasionally of the brilliant receptions given by "the beautiful Mme. de R——"

There were rumours that the affairs of the household of Mme. de R—— did not run smoothly, and that the old husband complained bitterly of the carelessness and gaiety of the young wife.

The next year I heard that Juliette de R—— had abandoned the conjugal domicile, in company with an Italian artist, of whom she had become enamoured the preceding winter in Florence. This, of course, caused a great scandal, and for several months the select world in which she had lived commented upon this esclandre. I next heard that shortly after her arrival in Rome Zulietta had been neglected by her lover, and had gone upon the stage.

Then, as the gay world ceased to regale itself with accounts of absent ones, a silence settled about the affairs of Juliette de R——. Years passed, burying her adventures deeper and deeper beneath their oblivion. With myself also, time had done its work. The memory of Zulietta of Vilette was not dead, but profoundly sleeping, and it would never again have been awakened had it not been for the enchantment of Venice that recalled it after a lapse of twenty years.

This Venetian barcarolle, that I had not heard since my youth, wrought in me a magic resurrection like that of the coming of the Prince to the Palace of the Sleeping Beauty of the Wood. Again, the dusky charms of Zulietta surged across me in all the freshness of those old Vilette days. It seemed to me I must see her appear among the red geraniums on the balcony before me, with her glowing eyes and careless smile. She haunted me all that day as I wandered through that enchanted city.

She followed me over the threshold of the old palaces of the Grand Canal and along the lagoon, where the soft shadows were lightened by the slanting rays of the departing sun. The slender, swift gondolas gliding over the tranquil water seemed to carry, under the black cowl of the felze, the phantoms of my dead youth. When one after another they stopped at the steps of the Lido, I almost expected to see, emerging from the low cabin, the supple grace and proud beauty of Zulietta.

Through the sumptuous halls of the Doges' Palaces, among the mausolia of San Giovani and San Paola, under the arcades blossoming with lilacs of San Lazzaro, this obsession pursued me.

In the evening, after having dined alone in the gay little restaurant of Capello Nero, I went in search of my good Francesco, the gondolier, and told him to take me slowly to the Rialto. As in the barcarolle of Zulietta, the water of the Grand Canal was black as jet, the sky was enamelled with stars, and in the distance, under the first white beams of the rising moon, the islets seemed floating in a silver mist.

Many of the palaces were brilliantly lighted, but those along the bank were enveloped in shadow and stood out against the starry sky a confused mass of black roofs. In this imposing mystery of dusky water and sleeping palaces, the gondolas glided to and fro in ghost-like silence, only the prow and saw-teeth could be distinguished, and the little twinkling lantern swinging from the roof. All this shadowy picture, peopled by dim spectres fleeting and uncertain, aided still more to plunge me into the strange world of delusion.

In front of the old Gustiniani palace, now occupied by the Hotel de l'Europe, a good half of the canal was encumbered by an assemblage of gondolas grouped round a long barque full of serenaders. I commanded Francesco to approach as near as possible to the musicians, whose barque was gaily illuminated with different hued lanterns, which the rippling of the water caused to balance and nod merrily to each other.

The figures of the performers were confused and indistinct under the yellow flare of the lanterns, but I had no difficulty in distinguishing a great fellow in a slouch hat, with cloak draped loosely about his shoulders, who stood in the prow of the boat with a theatrical pose. As I drew near they were singing a popular Neapolitan air, with an accompaniment of violins, guitars and mandolines; then, during the pause that followed the close of the song, one of the musicians, leaping from gondola to gondola, made a collection of small coins, which he brought in his hat to the big fellow in the cloak.

This latter deigned to receive it, and turned and spoke to one of the singers sitting beside him, whom I had not noticed before.

She arose, and after indicating her selection to the orchestra, began the serenade from Don Pasquale. The voice of this woman lacked volume and power, but it was so caressingly tender and pure, and managed with such consummate art, that from the first notes I was affected by it. Although at times the woman seemed rather to sigh than to sing, the articulation was so clear that not one word, even at my distance, was lost.

I caught the lowest notes and they carried me away with their sweet clearness, and touched a responsive chord in my nature that had not vibrated for years. Here was another inexplicable emotion! I sought to explain it by the nervous state in which I had been since morning, and by the influence of my unusual and mysterious surroundings, all of which had worked upon my imagination; nevertheless, I was still troubled, and felt drawn by an irresistible impulse to see the singer a little nearer.

Digitized by Google

When the song was finished, the singer was rapturously applauded, and someone called for a selection from Trovatore. The man in the cloak raised his hat in sign of acquiescence, but the woman shook her head, fearing probably that her voice was not powerful enough for such dramatic music; still her companion insisted upon raising the tone. One could see by his imperious manner that he spoke to the woman more as a master than impresario.

At last she obeyed, but chose another selection, and the orchestra played the opening measures of a Miserere. The poor soul had reason to doubt the violence of Verdi's music; the impassioned plaints of Leonora surpassed the range of her frail voice, and she was obliged to protest. The impresario, on the other hand, shrilled out in a stagy tone, "Addio, Leonora!" scoring a success for himself at the expense of his companion, and at the next pause proceeded himself to make the collection, which this time was abundant!

By this time some of the gondolas had moved away and I profited by it to have Francesco move nearer. He manœuvred so well that I found myself side by side with the orchestra! Upon a closer view, I experienced a sad disappointment.

At a distance the singing barque, with its gaily coloured lanterns, had harmonised appropriately with the fantasy of the Venetian night, but at a nearer approach the scene lost much of its poetry. The singers were common in face and figure, and passed round from hand to hand a flask of Chianti, which they gulped down with coarse pleasantries.

I searched the faces of the company eagerly to find the artiste who had sung the serenade from Don Pasquale, and suddenly I received a shock in good earnest.

In spite of her age—she seemed to have passed forty—and in spite of the drawn features and sallow complexion, which still retained the melancholy traces of beauty, she bore a strange resemblance to Juliette Stadelli. There were the same loose locks of hair waving over a high forehead, the same glowing eyes, the same massive lower part of the face, which the carnous mouth still brightened occasionally by a weary smile.

The sloping shoulders and graceful head were carried as proudly as in the old days, and the small hands were moulded as delicately as those I had raved over and longed to cover with kisses.

Was all this merely a trick of my imagination, too prompt to take its chimeras for a certainty, or had I really before me the proud, disdainful beauty, Juliette Stadelli, whom I had found so lovable and so cruel?

The singer was certainly of the same age as she whom all Paris had at one time called the beautiful Mme. de R——; but the puffy eyelids, the heavy mouth with its sunken corners, the shabby, threadbare appearance of her dress, all told of years of misery and debauch.

Could it be that in the course of a few years the proud young beauty, the admired of all Vilette, the queen of Paris, had sunk to the level of a strolling singer?

I assured myself again and again that I was simply the dupe of a fortuitous resemblance; still, my eyes could not detach themselves from the face of this woman. As the rise and fall of the water brought us occasionally on a level with each other, she divined that she was the object of my persistent attention, and our glances met.

Left standing alone outside the door.

At that moment, the movement of the gondolas brought me closer to her, and I could not resist the opportunity to satisfy myself.

"Juliette!" I whispered; "Juliette Stadelli!"

She started at my voice and fixed her black eyes upon me. A frown contracted her features. She crisped her lips together dolorously and there seemed to be a conflict between her humiliated pride and her excited curiosity. She raised her eyebrows questioningly and I fancied I saw a gleam of recognition, softened by regret.

"I am one of your old friends of Vilette," I added, but just then the man with the cloak came back with his hat full of copper coins. The face of the woman expressed the greatest apprehension. She shook her head negatively, and quickly applied her finger to her lips to impose silence. All this had taken scarcely more than a second.

As soon as the impresario had assumed his theatrical pose, I saw his companion lean towards the musicians, who began to tune their instruments, then, rising and standing under the soft light of the lanterns, she began:

"My boat is on the shore."

Digitized by Google

Her clear, pure voice rose in the silence of the night like a melancholy echo of the past, and after each couplet the musicians repeated the chorus.

The choice of this barcarolle dissipated my last doubt. It was the voice that had charmed my youth, the voice that had shattered the dreams of my first love. I saw again that familiar room in the Rue des Juifs; in the interval of the couplets I heard, as on that former occasion, the plaintive sobbing of the water of the canal, and again my eyes filled with tears and I could have wept like a child.

The song had ceased, but I remained bewildered, lost in the memories of my early life. One after another the gondolas surrounding mine had moved off and disappeared. At last the musicians, too, put away their instruments and set their barque in motion; as it grazed mine I raised my eyes and met those of the singer; she leant towards me and said in French: "Adieu, and good-night."

The tone in which she spoke this wish surprised me, and I gave a sign to Francesco to follow the musicians.

In a few moments they stopped at the Vallaressa and slowly prepared to ascend the steps, after snuffing out their lanterns. I kept within sight of them, and at the end of the long, narrow street the group dispersed.

Three or four of the company, among them the impresario in his cloak, stopped at the threshold of a trattoria, evidently deliberating about entering to discuss a bicchiero di Cipro. The others, carrying their instruments wrapped in green lustrine, disappeared at the end of the street after having said good-night to the singer. The latter was left standing alone outside the door awaiting the pleasure of her lord and master.

I sought a last opportunity to speak to her, but as I approached, the impresario appeared at the door, and in a loud, imperious voice, cried: "Zulietta! come in." She drew herself up with a slight shudder and silently followed the man with whom she had chosen to cast her lot.

With my heart wrung with compassion, I followed their retreating forms, my lost youth vanishing with them.

And with a feeling of utter loneliness, I regained the Rue San Mose, where the electric lights flared with a brutal clearness on the swarming throng of promenaders.

ANDRÉ THEURIET.

What did the Other Fellow Say?

THE following monologue is supposed to take place at one end of a telephone. What did the other fellow say? Two guineas is offered for the best set of sentences which constituted the other man's part of the conversation. All attempts to reach Short Stories offices by Monday, February 22nd. All envelopes to be marked, "Telephone Talk":

Bur-r-r-r-r-r.
Are you there? Number 46,532, please. Hurry up.
Bur-r-r-r-r-r.
Ah! That you, Charlie?
. . . . . .
Jack.
. . . . . .
First-rate, thanks.
. . . . . .
No; really?
. . . . . .
Oh, I say, you had it pretty hot, old man, didn't you?
. . . . . .
Eh! what?
. . . . . .
By Jove! I'm glad it wasn't me. Tell me all about it; go on.
. . . . . .
No, I didn't; I got home fairly early.
. . . . . .
Poor beggar, I pity you; go on.
. . . . . .
Good gracious! You don't say so!
. . . . . .
What in the world did you say? I hope to goodness you——
. . . . . .
Great Scott! whatever shall I do. She'll, she'll——
. . . . . .
Hang you! What a fool you are.
. . . . . .
No, no, no; not yet.
. . . . . .
Yes.
. . . . . .
Well, you are——
. . . . . .
You did.
. . . . . .
But I say you did.
. . . . . .
Oh, be quiet.
. . . . . .
I do, and I never want to hear of you again.
. . . . . .
Oh, you—— Bur-r-r-r-r-r.

Digitized by Google

A GLOWING southern sun bathed the drowsy old garden in a flood of molten gold. The milky pucca blossoms mingled their beauty with that of the flaunting scarlet of the cactus. The orange and fig trees hung their luscious fruit within tempting distance, while over the thick white adobe wall, across the trellis before the house and up to the Señorita's bedroom window, climbed, in a riot of yellow splendour, the superb Gold of Ophir rose tree, famous along the entire coast.

Never was there such another rose tree! Its limbs were as thick as a man's arm, and its blossoms were great, glorious nests of colour and perfume. It bloomed the entire year—bloomed for offerings before Our Lady's Shrine in the old Mission; bloomed for weddings and funerals; for the tourist who paused at the Señorita's gate to wonder and exclaim at the marvel; and for the Señorita herself.

The Señorita was straight and tall and slender. Though the grey was beginning to creep in her dusky hair, and the tell-tale wrinkles were seaming her forehead, she yet was a handsome woman, with the same Andalusian features; the soft, speaking eyes; the clear, olive skin her beautiful mother had brought from Spain years ago.

In the tiny low-ceilinged drawing-room, immaculate as a sanctuary, with its snowy matting, its wooden blinds, its sanded thresholds, among the images of the martyrs and the pictures of the blessed saints, hung a portrait of the Señorita, painted when she was eighteen. She wore, as became her station, a silken gown and a string of pearls about her throat. Over the superbly moulded shoulders a bertha of rare lace was thrown, and in her hand she held a Gold of Ophir rose—the first one ever plucked from the bush before her door.

Every afternoon when the Señorita had finished her household duties, before she sat down to the dainty drawn work which was a part of her daily occupation, and from which she derived a modest income, it was her custom to enter the drawing-room, and, after adjusting the blinds so that the sunlight would touch the portrait gently, to stand before it intently regarding her own lost youth.

"Mother of God!" was the murmured exclamation, "but it was a long time ago—long—time—ago."

There was always a vase of golden roses on a little stand before the portrait. When the Señorita's gaze left the picture it fell upon the flowers. With a gentle sigh, she would pensively touch the petals with caressing fingers, then silently and like a ghost slowly glide from the room.

This was the little shrine at which the Señorita worshipped, loved, and remembered. Every day were these unostentatious ceremonies repeated. Every day her gentle voice murmured: "Mother of God! but it was a long time ago—long—time—ago."

Years before, when the Señorita had been young—a beauty and the belle of the little Spanish-American settlement—up at the Presudio there had been a gallant young lieutenant who fell desperately in love with the charming Spaniard. Their courtship, amid the myrtle and orange groves, under the warm moonlight of the Southern region, in the sheltered nooks along the white beach, had been ideal. Both young, ardent, and madly in love, their affection became a bit of local pride. "May you love as Ygnacia," was the blessing mothers whispered to their daughters, and "May the saints send you another lieutenant!" brought the blood into the cheeks of the Señorita's girl companions.

Once when the lieutenant returned from Santa Barbaram, whither he had been sent on important military business, he brought to his sweetheart a tiny rose-bush, which he planted before her door.

"Ygnacia," he whispered as he caught her slim hands in his and bent his bold, blue eyes upon her blushing face, "my love for you will be perennial, like this bush, and sweet as its blossoms."

But alas for the pledges of passion! The lieutenant was one to love and ride away. Ere the roses had bloomed the third year, he had departed with fervent vows and promises of a speedy return. But the long, burning summers, the slow, dreary winters, drifted by and he never came. The tiny bush grew to be a lordly tree and never did the Señorita cut a rose for the Mission, the bride, or for the dead, that she did not see the handsome face, those bold, tender eyes, and hear again those passionate words: "My love will be perennial, like this bush, and sweet as its blossoms."

She heard of him now and then—the famous Indian fighter, then the major, the colonel, at last the great general, whose name was honoured throughout the land. Then came the news of his marriage to a celebrated heiress.

The rose tree was growing and blooming, but hope was dead in the heart of the Señorita.

Year after year she lived her simple little life in the old cottage abode of her ancestors. One by one her friends passed away. To the Señorita were left only her rose garden and memory. The Gold of Ophir rose tree climbed to her window, and thrust its great yellow blossoms into her room. Each perfect flower seemed to challenge her attention, and to cry: "Look at me, Ygnacia. I am sweet as was his love for you." And the Señorita, growing older and plainer every day, kissed the rose and murmured: "Mother of God! but it was a long—time—ago."

Digitized by Google

It was a great day for the sleepy little Spanish town when the railway came; greater, when the rich syndicate built the magnificent hotel. Then came the electric cars, rushing and clanging before the Señorita's rose garden. Inquisitive tourists poked their noses over her wall and, seeing her wonderful rose tree, begged to be allowed to enter. The Señorita received these visitors with sweet serenity and gracious hospitality. No one went away empty handed. The golden roses were bestowed with prodigality upon any who begged the gift.

Our Lady's Shrine was always decorated with the great blossoms, and ever before the portrait of the Señorita in the tiny drawing-room stood her offerings to her own lost youth.

One evening the Señorita sat under the Gold of Ophir rose tree. In her hand she held a cluster of her favourites. As she inhaled their fragrance her thoughts were as ever busy with the past. Again she saw her lover, straight, manly and tender, standing before her, heard his whispered vows, and felt his kisses on her cheeks and lips.

The garden gate clicked and swung open. Two people advanced slowly and uncertainly through the gathering dusk; a man and a young woman, fashionably dressed, with an unmistakable air of good breeding. The man, stepping forward and courteously lifting his hat, said: "Have I the honour of addressing Señorita Ygnacia Bonaventura?"

He stopped abruptly as a sharp cry broke from the Señorita's lips. She had risen, with her customary courtesy, at the first words of the stranger, and stood now clinging desperately to the trellis, over which the rose tree climbed.

"Santa Maria!" she breathed rather than spoke, "who it ees?"

"I am sorry to have startled you so," replied her visitor gently, "we were told at the hotel that you were quite willing strangers should see this beautiful rose tree or we would not have intruded. I beg your pardon," and he turned as if to go.

"Stay, Señor," she cried, "do not go. I will show you the roses with happiness. But your face it ees which gave me so moocho start. Jesu Christo! but you are like someone——"

"Maybe you knew my father," said the stranger. "He was stationed here at the Presudio, years ago, and I have often heard him speak of this charming town."

"Your fathaire here?"

"Yes, my father, General Saunders; Lieutenant Saunders when he was here."

There was profound silence. The straight, slim figure seemed turned to stone. The great dark eyes looked out from under the folds of the black tapelo with sad intensity and earnest scrutiny. Tom Saunders felt as if he were confronted by some vague, unknown tragedy. His young wife, too, was experiencing a sensation as if she were looking on at a mysterious phase of human emotion, and, drawing near her husband, clasped his arm with both her hands, and turned her sweet face, full of tender sympathy, towards the Señorita. For an instant they stood thus, three souls looking out of their windows to scan each other with searching looks. The Señorita spoke first: "Si, señor," she said in a low, grave voice, "I did know your fathaire long—time—ago. He look like you—ah, I 'ope ees well—si?"

"Did you not know?—but of course you would not have heard," said Saunders sadly; "my father is dead. He died a month ago."

"He ees dead?" repeated the Señorita mechanically.

"Yes," said Saunders, "and before he died he charged me with a sacred commission. He knew that I was coming here on my wedding journey. He called me to him one day and said: 'When you get there I want you to hunt up Señorita Ygnacia Bonaventura. Tell her for me that now, as I am nearing death, I see with clearer vision, and that I regret the past. Tell her that as I lie here racked with pain, I long, oh! I long for the coolness and quiet of her rose garden, and that in the long watches of each restless night I smell again the perfume from the golden rose I planted before her door.'"

There was a sound of sobbing, as Saunders finished his pathetic message. It came from his wife, who was profoundly affected by the situation. But the Señorita did not weep. Her white face was tense in its agony, but not a tear glistened in her sombre eyes. She held out her hand to the son of her old love. He took it in both his and pressed it gently. "She has suffered for my father's sake," was the thought that flashed through his mind, and he bent his head and laid a reverent kiss upon the Señorita's brown, toil-worn hand.

As Saunders and his wife were leaving, their arms filled with branches and clusters of the Gold of Ophir roses, the Señorita held open the gate for them. When Saunders passed her, she laid in his hand the king of all that year's blossoms, a great, royal golden rose. "For the lieutenant's grave," she simply said.

Saunders bowed, too much moved to speak. And six weeks later the remains of that perfect flower were reverently strewn over a grave in Greenwood.

Hours after their departure, the Señorita entered the little drawing-room. Her face was wan and haggard and old. She lifted her flickering candle high before the portrait and gazed steadfastly upon the beautiful young face that smiled down at her.

"Mother of God!" she breathed, "but it was a long—time—ago."

The next morning they tried in vain to waken the Señorita. She lay still and cold on her bed, drawn close to the open casement. Through the window, the great, gay golden roses climbed and looked into the poor little chamber. And one, bolder than the rest, had laid its yellow head close to the dead heart of the Señorita.

Edith Sessions Tupper.

A STORY WITHOUT WORDS.

£10 in Prizes.

On page 245 three sketches are given in their proper order. £5 is offered to the reader who sends us the most appropriate wording to go under each sketch, the whole to form a story descriptive of the illustrations, and £1 will be given to each of the senders of the next best five attempts.

It is not necessary for competitors to have any literary ability. If you have a good idea, surely there should be no difficulty in putting it down in words. The whole of the story is limited to one hundred words, which may be distributed under the sketches according to the judgment of the competitor.

All that you have to do is to write in the order of the sketches the wording that you think most appropriate, enclose your attempt in an envelope (which should be marked "Picture Story"), and forward it to this office before Monday, February 22nd

Digitized by Google

THE LONG-EXPECTED BURGLAR.

Ezra Timmins was a steady man of forty, who had been fifteen years book-keeper for the prosperous grocery house of Ham, Bacon, Lard and Co. He had lived ten years with his wife in the same house in Eddy Street, and had saved money, for his habits were frugal, his pleasures simple, his pains few. His pleasures consisted of an occasional game of whist, at which Mrs. Timmins was always his partner, for the reason that he would not allow anyone else to scold her when she revoked, though he did not mind scolding her himself.

His pains were an unreasoning terror of burglars, and a dire apprehension that his niece and ward, pretty Constance Timmins—who was the only young person in his house—would end one of her many flirtations by throwing herself away on some worthless scamp.

To guard against burglars, he cultivated an acquaintance with a policeman who alternated on the beat, and dropped mysterious hints of munificent rewards in case they caught a burglar in the act. He had a burglar-alarm in his bedroom, and a fowling-piece, from which Mrs. Timmins was in the habit of withdrawing the cartridges for fear he should shoot himself. Many a sleepless night he spent in prowling about the house in the dark in quest of some intruder whose footstep he thought he heard. He read some article in the newspapers about burglaries, and surprised his wife and niece by the extent and accuracy of his information touching the methods of the fraternity. He plunged them into depths of despair by declaring that he knew it was his destiny to wake up some morning and find the house robbed and Constance murdered.

Constance was a lovely girl, the daughter of an elder brother of Timmins, who had gone to Jamaica, bought a plantation, taken the yellow fever, and died, leaving an estate, of which the value was unknown. She was a coquette, and had a host of admirers, who seldom commanded the approval of her uncle or aunt. If they were young, Uncle Ezra said they were snips, and ought to be in the nursery; if they were old, he said they should be in some Old People's Home. Constance laughed at his invectives, and when her uncle forbade this or that man the house, she met him elsewhere, if he had taken her fancy.

Among the few admirers who could not fairly be condemned to the nursery was Colonel Pitblado. He had met Constance at a small party, and he had been struck by her beauty and vivacity. With his usual circumspection, he had instituted inquiries respecting her prospective fortune; from the assiduity with which he pursued her afterwards, it may be inferred that the result of the investigation had been satisfactory.

Much to his annoyance, Constance not only did not ask him to the house, but begged as a favour that he would not come, at any rate not for the present.

"You see, Colonel Pitblado," said she, "I have rather taken a fancy to you, and I don't want to lose you. Now, my uncle, who is the best man in the world, invariably takes a dislike to people who pay me attentions. I have a presentiment that if you came to the house he would quarrel with you, and that would be the end of our acquaintance."

The Colonel argued, but it was of no avail. The only concession which Constance would make was that now and then, say once a week, she would leave the door open after her uncle had gone to bed, and the Colonel might slip in and spend a few minutes with her in the dark in the hall or in the drawing-room.

"I know," she said, "that you are too much of a gentleman to make me regret my good nature; anyway, I think I can take care of myself."

The Colonel's behaviour was beautiful; his speech was eloquent on the subject of his love, but he rarely ventured even to press the fingers of his charmer as they sat side by side on the sofa.

There they sat one night, and Constance, in a subdued voice, was explaining her uncle's extraordinary terror of burglars.

"Has he ever been robbed?" asked the Colonel.

"I believe that when he was a child, burglars broke into the house where he was living, and killed one of the inmates. He was awakened by the sound of the shot, and he has never got over the shock."

"I can quite understand it," replied the Colonel. "There is something peculiarly terrifying in a midnight encounter with a man whom you cannot see, and who has everything to gain and little to lose by taking your life."

"Oh!" cried Constance, "the thought fills me at times with such horror, that I am as afraid of burglars as my uncle. I think that if I saw one in my room, I should die of fright."

"I hope," said the Colonel, laughing, "that I should not show the white feather. But I must say that I do not hanker to meet a burglar in the flesh."

Digitized by Google

At that moment a slight noise was heard outside the drawing-room door. It was the faintest possible creak of a weak flooring-plank under a tread. Both the tenants of the sofa looked up and held their breath with ears on the full strain. Another board creaked, and presently, after a wait which seemed to last for ages, the acute ears of the Colonel detected a muffled tread on the carpet of the room in which they sat. There was a third party in the room. He was shod with wool and was moving noiselessly, and occasionally stopping as if to listen whether he was detected. The long expected burglar had come.

Constance fainted silently on the sofa. The Colonel, in whom the presence of danger had awakened his fighting instinct, rose from his seat and groped his way noiselessly towards the intruder, whom he could not see. He could, by this time, hear the scoundrel's breath coming and going, and instinct prompted him to hold his own. He would have given worlds for a weapon, but his stick was out of reach. He must give battle with his bare hands against one who probably had both pistol and knife. As he reflected, the intruder's foot came in contact with a stool. The Colonel hesitated no longer, with a sudden spring, he was upon the invader. He had thrown his weight into the spring, and felled the burglar to the ground, face downward. Then swiftly seizing his wrists, he held them in a grip of iron, twisted the arms upwards, and sat down on his back.

The burglar struggled, evidently striving to free one hand to use his knife; but the Colonel was now fighting for his life, his clutch of the wrists did not relax. When the struggle grew weaker, and Pitblado got back his breath, he hissed:

"You villain! If you don't keep your hands still, I'll drive my knife through your vitals. One motion, and you are a dead man."

The burglar made no reply. He panted, and sounds came from him which, to Pitblado's ear, sounded strangely like a sob. The Colonel derived a qualified satisfaction from his stillness.

If he had dared to loose his clutch of the fellow's wrists, he would have tried to throttle him; but the danger of a stab in the side, if he moved his hands to the burglar's throat, was too obvious. He thought of shouting for help. But that would have betrayed his presence in Constance's drawing-room after the lights were out, and her uncle was in bed. He would rather risk the knife than compromise her. He supposed that she had flown upstairs, whereas, in fact, she was in a dead faint on the sofa.

What was he to do? Was he to stay sitting on that burglar all night?

While he ransacked his brains for an expedient, a deep groan came from the man under him. The burglar gasped, and, at last, muttered:

"If you'll let me get up I'll show you——"

"Yes, I dare say," said Pitblado; "you'll show us lots of things. That cock won't fight. It's that I am going to show you the door of the other world."

The Colonel could feel a quiver go through the frame on which he sat. The burglar went on:

"I'll show you——"

"Haven't I told you that I am going to do all the showing?"

"If you'll only lift your weight off my lungs, so I can breathe——" said the burglar.

"You'd make use of your breath to drive a knife into me, wouldn't you? Not much. I'm just thinking how I shall kill you so as not to ruin the carpet——"

"Oh! oh! oh!" came from the prostrate body.

"What an unreasonable fellow you are," said the Colonel: "here I've let you live for ever so many minutes while I have been studying how to put you to death."

"Spare my life!" gurgled the burglar.

"Why should I?"

"I'll—I'll show you where the silver is."

"You'll show me," repeated the Colonel, puzzled.

"I will. I give you my honour I will."

"Oh, I see," said Pitblado: "you want to divide. It won't do."

"What more do you want?"

"I don't intend," said the Colonel, "that you shall have a single spoon."

"Take them all, take them all. Only let me keep Connie's christening cup."

"By George!" muttered Pitblado, "you're a romantic sort of chap to be a burglar."

It had by this time become manifest to the Colonel that the situation could not be prolonged for ever. He could not sit on the burglar's back till morning—the tension of the muscles of his arms was weakening. He must, somehow, get him to the nearest police-station. If he only had a ray of light!

At that moment a faint groan came from the sofa.

"Good Heavens!" muttered the Colonel: "he's got an accomplice."

Another sound from the sofa, and Pitblado saw that time was up. The new-comer might at any moment rush to the rescue of his accomplice. Pitblado had noticed a poker and shovel in front of the drawing-room grate. With a sudden spring he regained his feet, let the burglar go, leaped to the grate, and seized the poker.

A wild shriek came from the sofa, and simultaneously the Colonel struck a match. By its flare he saw, to his amazement, Connie sitting upon the sofa, and the burglar lying motionless on the floor. Had he killed the scoundrel?

Another match lit the gas, and Connie sprang to the burglar, took his head in her arms, and screamed to Pitblado:

"You have killed my uncle!"

"Your uncle? Why, that's the burglar."

"It's my uncle, and you have choked him to death. He's insensible. Oh, help me to bring him to."

The prostrate man revived, and, seeing Connie, muttered:

"Let him take all the silver, Connie, except your christening-cup. If he'll spare our lives, we'll not prosecute."

It did not take long to get Mr. Timmins on the sofa, and, as he was not hurt, a glass of wine, administered by the tender hands of Connie, restored him to his senses. His mind was still confused. He murmured:

"I have had a narrow escape, my poor Constance. I seemed to hear a noise in this room, and stepped in, when a man of gigantic strength leapt upon me, and was about to kill me, when you must have appeared and frightened him away."

"That is not quite exact, dear uncle. While you were struggling in the most heroic way with the burglar, Colonel Pitblado happened to pass, entered the house by the front door, which the burglar had left open, drove the fellow away and rescued you. Allow me to introduce you—Mr. Timmins, Colonel Pitblado."

G. P. Harrow.

Digitized by Google

TWANGLES!

☛ THE NEW AND FASCINATING PARLOUR GAME.

No rules, easily understood, an ever welcome and absorbing recreation for the whole year round. A pretty present. Send for one at once. You will be delighted.

Price, including Book of Diagrams and Instructions, together with complete apparatus in handsome box, neatly packed in strong case, post free per return for 2s. only from the Sole Manufacturer, F. WALTON, 33, Barbican, London, E.C. Foreign postage, 6d. extra.

See This! The Last Opportunity of the Season! A Huge Offer!

£120 REWARD

IN FREE CASH PRIZES.

Don't be too late, purchase TWANGLES at once, and endeavour to win one of these valuable prizes:

1st Prize, £30; 2nd, £25; 3rd, £20; 4th, £16; 5th, £12; 6th, £8; 7th, £6; 8th, £3.

To purchasers sending the most correct solutions to the following words:

1. O L N N O D
2. G L G A S W O
3. L L H U
4. D N I B R E U H G
5. L L I P O O V R E
6. D L E E S
7. K O R Y
8. M A H E S E T R N C

DIRECTIONS.—Rearrange the above to represent eight well-known towns. Copy those you find out on a sheet of paper, placing the respective number to each, and post it, together with your order for TWANGLES and remittance (P.O. for 2s., or 25 Stamps), and a stamped addressed reply envelope for result, etc., to

F. WALTON, 33, BARBICAN, LONDON, E.C.

NOTICE.—The £120 is offered to purchasers of the puzzle until the end of February, 1897, and orders from those taking part in the contest should be sent in as early as possible, but not later than Saturday, February 27th, 1897, when the awards will be made, the prizes dispatched, and the result communicated to all competitors by Monday, March 1st, 1897.

If you cannot solve all the puzzle words, do as many as you can, as the prizes will be awarded in order of correctness, and in cases of equality will be added together and divided; thus a prize is insured to every person sending in all eight solutions correct.

TWANGLES will be sent to purchasers per return, together with a notice informing competitors whether their solutions are correct or not.

The prizes are large, and well worth trying for; they will be honestly given away, and as a guarantee of good faith any purchaser is invited to call and see the prize money dispatched to the winners.

1/2 A MILLION 7½ FULL DRESS LENGTHS TO BE CLEARED AT 6S

BLACK, NAVY, GREY, AND SEVERAL CHARMING SHOT EFFECTS

FIRST ORDER OPENED MONDAYS, WEDNESDAYS, AND FRIDAYS SENT FREE AND CASH RETURNED.

Send to-day for Patterns, also Sale Price List and list of Lucky Winners.

CLEARING PRICES quoted for Dress Goods, Mantlings, Suitings, Flannels, Flannelette, Calico, Shirtings, Blankets, Quilts, Sheets, Towels, Gloves, Corsets, Stockings, Handkerchiefs, Umbrellas, etc.

ORDER EARLY. STOCK DECLINING RAPIDLY.

SALE CONTINUES FOR A SHORT TIME ONLY.

REMNANT BUNDLES (containing 12 yards), in long lengths—Dress Serge 12/-, Calico 8/6, Flannelette 4/6, Union Shirting 7/9, Flannel 8/9.

LUTAS LEATHLEY & Co., Dept. 130, ARMLEY, LEEDS.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS COCOA.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

WITH FULL NATURAL FLAVOUR.

"DRUNKENNESS"

CURED. A Lady having cured her husband secretly of intemperate habits, will gladly send particulars of the remedy on receipt of stamped envelope.—Mrs. S. S. BARRINGTON, 4, Featherstone Bldgs., LONDON, W.C.

OTTO-FREEZ

BEAUTIFUL TOILET SOAP.

Everyone should use it. It is so nice for the skin. VALUABLE COUPONS with every Tablet. Two Tablets sent post free 1/-. THE OTTO-FREEZ CO., 66, High St., Camden Town, LONDON. N.W.

TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, Mrs. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

BLACKHEADS

or "Maggots," Pimples, Blotches, etc., immediately and permanently removed by my Skin Cleansing Lotion, "CUTISOLINE." Never fails. Hundreds of testimonials. Post free with directions, 1/6, 3/- and 5/-. AUSTIN LENNOX, Skin Specialist, 1, Shoe Lane, Fleet Street, LONDON.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20

See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

THE

GREAT COUGH REMEDY, BRONCHONIA.

A Marvellous Remedy for Coughs, whether arising from Consumption, Bronchitis, or Asthma. Its efficacy is testified to by Eminent Physicians. Of all Chemists, 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per bottle. Post free, 2s. 9d., 4s. 9d., and 11s. 6d.—J. HOWARD & Co., 20 and 21, Queenhithe, LONDON, E.C. One Trial will prove its Efficacy.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE

Digitized by Google

Answers to Correspondents.

READERS of Short Stories will this week observe that we have commenced an Answers to Correspondents page. So many inquiries are made from time to time on all subjects, the replies to a large number of which are quite interesting, that we fancy the enjoyment obtained by readers from perusing this feature will justify the crowding out of a page of short story. Pearson's Weekly contains a column devoted to reviews of new discoveries and strange inventions. It is not possible to institute such a feature in Short Stories, but if readers are the originators of any invention which they may care to put before the public free of charge, let them send it along, and, if it is of sufficient general interest, a notice of it will appear on this page.

MEPHISTOPHELES. — A lifeboat costs twenty-seven shillings a week to maintain.

MAGGIE.—You are on the wrong track. Queen Victoria seldom, if ever, goes shopping. It is probably the Queen of Italy whom you have in mind. When she enters a shop, the doors are immediately closed, and the public excluded until she has left.

ANNOYED suffers from soreness after shaving.————Try the effect of a preparation formed by mixing glycerine and bay-rum in equal parts. Apply it immediately after your morning scrape.

K. L. AND OTHERS.—Farmer Hayseed's idea was: "I think I'll have a drink."

J. K.—Some time ago there was a great deal of talk about the possibilities of artificially creating rain storms, but the experiments do not appear to have been commercially successful. You can raise a storm yourself by telling your better-half that she will have to get along on one bonnet a year.

H. T.—Here is an idea for you, then: "Lunch Ready. You don't have to wait. We pay men to do that." I hope your restaurant will be a success.

L. S. T. (NEWPORT, MON.)—It is no uncommon thing for one species of bird to imitate the song of another, when they have the opportunity of developing their powers of imitation. The shrikes, for example, enjoy a remarkably retentive memory, and are able to reproduce the sounds emitted by other birds whose nests are near their own, although, on account of the frequency with which they interpolate the copied song with their own notes, their identity may be easily discovered.

E. G. Z.—It is no uncommon thing for second cousins to marry.

M. S. T.—Delighted to hear that "THE WRECKERS OF SCILLY" is so much appreciated in your part of the world. It really is a very excellent story, and well worth following up.

H. G. — There are 2,000,000 trade unionists in the United Kingdom.

K. L. T.—The biggest system of the kind in existence is the distribution of water power in London.

JESSIE wishes to induce me to start a campaign against match-making mammas. She appears to be of an independent spirit, and most strongly objects to the idea of a mother putting her daughters on show, as it were, like so many cattle, offering them to the highest bidder.————I really don't think that JESSIE has any real cause to complain in this direction. My sympathies are really with the mothers. Mothers-in-law are, as a rule, treated with far less respect than is their due. In their capacity as guardians and chaperons of their daughters, they place themselves in most delicate and uncomfortable positions in order to bring about results which their daughters, single-handed, could never accomplish—at least, except those of so independent a nature as JESSIE.

R. S. V. P.—Probably you mean the river Tinto in Spain. The stream petrifies the sand in its bed, and stones that by chance touch one another are rapidly united into one piece. It is impossible for fish to live in this water.

N.—The word "lady" literally means "loaf giver."

GUARD wishes to know which is the longest straight piece of railway line in the United Kingdom.————That between Thirsk and Northallerton on the North-Eastern Railway. It is between five and six miles in length.

G. P.—Theoretically speaking we ought to drink from one-third to two-fifths as many ounces of water as we weigh in pounds. That is to say, if you weigh a hundred and sixty-eight pounds you ought to drink from three and a half to four pints daily.

L. H. EDWARDS (DUBLIN). — I am delighted to hear that your four-months-old baby-girl already appreciates Pearson's Weekly. One of its missions is to keep people quiet and out of mischief.

MABEL has been married only twelve months. She married after a three-years' engagement, and thought at the time that her husband really loved her, but she writes to me in a heart-broken way to say that since marriage his affection has cooled considerably, for "he does not only forget to kiss me before breakfast, but he never thinks of kissing me at night. I am afraid that we are going to be even more unhappy, for Reggie says I'm silly, when I mention this to him."————Really I do not think you have much ground to go on in your complaint. Surely, a moderately affectionate farewell after breakfast on his leaving the house, and another on his return, should be sufficient guarantee of his sincerity. For, after all, you must remember that mere demonstrative affection of this sort is no criterion of the depth of love. If your husband has neglected you no worse than this, you are, indeed, a happy woman.

GERTRUDE TROTTER writes to say that she does not consider the key of the Jumbled Story "half such pleasant reading as the correct story published in full."————The publication of the complete story was dropped because it occupied too much space, and was objected to by the readers who did not enter for the competitions. However, G. T. will have no occasion to complain in the future, for the Jumbled Stories will in future be supplanted by another form of competition, which, I feel convinced, will prove as popular.

NEW preparations for the preservation of boots and shoes are always pouring into the market, but the really good ones are scarce. A bottled mixture produced under the peculiarly appropriate name of "Moonshine," seems to be quite a good thing in its way. It appears that oil is the chief constituent in its manufacture, yet it is so chemically treated that when applied to leather it rapidly dries and leaves a polish. In fact it does for your foot-covers what Short Stories does for your intellect.

MR. HENRY MARLES, of 72, Cobden Road, Brighton, is a man who is capable of seizing an opportunity. The recent development of affairs in Africa has resulted in his producing a capital little penny puzzle, consisting of a sheet of metal cut out in the shape of Africa and scored over with a number of slots through which are thrust the legs of a little lead lion—legs which are larger at the bottom than at the top. It is symbolic of the British lion in Africa. The object is to get him out.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

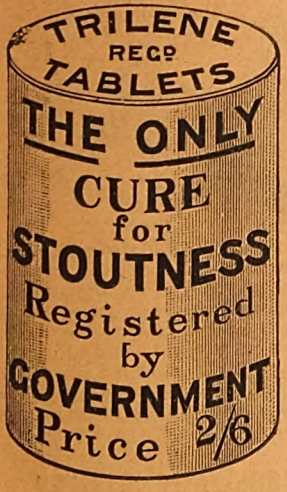
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 70, Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87, Alexandra Road, Norwich.

"GENTLEMEN,—I have had some boxes of your Tablets for my wife, and she has derived great benefit from them.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Illustrated Family Novelist, November 30th, 1895, says: "A great many women who are plump by nature worry about their stoutness. However, there are some perfectly safe remedies for embonpoint, among them being the Trilene Tablets, which are not only safe, but absolutely beneficial to the general health, and speedily produce the desired effect."

MR. TAYLOR, Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "I have lost quite 2 stone since taking your Tablets."

"6, Brighton Terrace, Hull.

"MRS. JOHNSON has much pleasure in saying she has derived great benefit from your Tablets."

"3, Castle Road, Deal.

"MRS. J. PEARSON is glad to say she is much thinner."

Convalescent Home, New Brighton, Cheshire.

MISS S. J. PRITCHARD says: "They have done me good. I am 21lb. lighter already."

"Bretton West, near Wakefield.

"MISS L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of Tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

MRS. HUTCHINSON, 46, Irwell Street, Widnes, Lancashire, writes: "I have taken three boxes and am reduced a stone."

A. D. BILLINGS, Bell Inn, Aldershot, writes: "Have derived great benefit already. Less in size and weight, and breathing greatly improved."

25, Windsor Terrace, Penarth, Cardiff.

MISS M. FLAVELL says: "I have lost 2 stone, and am much better in health."

Extract from Bury and Suffolk Times, June 15th, 1894: "Miss Atherton sings and dances as piquantly as ever, and is a marvel of agility, considering how much flesh she has put on of late. Her friends should induce her to take a course of Trilene Tablets, about which I hear wonderful things. One portly acquaintance of my own by merely a few weeks' use of these little Tablets, has reduced his bulk perceptibly. I am assured the Tablets are harmless and tasteless, and that the Trilene Company in Finsbury Pavement, London, are doing an enormous and ever-increasing trade."

MR. GILLESPIE, 50, Chancer Road, Forest Gate, Essex, says: "I have lost just 3 stone."

2, Chariot Street, Hull.

MR. JUBB, Chemist, says: "My customers speak highly of your Tablets."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.

MR. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17½ stone, and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17 stone, was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15 stone."

Aspern, 29, King's Hall Road, Beckenham.

MISS S. WOODHOUSE writes: "I have much pleasure in stating that your Tablets are really a safe cure for stoutness; they have cured me, and I am a perfect figure now."

MRS. GIBBON, of Radford Cottage, Bitterne, says: "I have derived great benefit from your Tablets, especially abdominal."

The Lady, October 8th, 1896 (giving advice to a reader who complained of stoutness), says: "The Trilene Tablets help to reduce stoutness, if taken daily; they are made of purely vegetable ingredients, and are quite harmless."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 70, FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to the

PEARSON POTTERY CO.,

HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 Pieces for £1 1s.

100 Pieces for £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery. The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful. Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

HAIR DESTROYED.

On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 26, Belvedere Rd., Lambeth, London.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5, Sept. 1, £5, Oct. 1, £5, Nov. 2, £6. Dec. 1, £6. Jan. 2, 1897, £6, Feb. 1, £6.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

DEAFNESS CURED.

On receipt of stamped envelope, a lady who cured herself of Deafness and Noises in the Head, after fifteen years of suffering, will send to all afflicted free particulars of the Remedy, which is simple, safe, sure and inexpensive. Address—Mrs. C. E. AUSTIN, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

CORPULENCY CURED

By a simple inexpensive self-treatment, effecting a rapid and permanent reduction without change in diet. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. G. A. BOYD, 14, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London.

JOHN JACKSON,

Skittle and Skittle Ball Turner,

113, PENTONVILLE ROAD,

LONDON, N.

Hornbeam Skittles; Sycamore Skittles; Four Corners; American Pins; Cheese Ball, Warranted; Round Ball, Warranted; Lawn Bowls.

FRAMES LAID AND REPAIRED.

Price List on Application.

Palatable Substitute for Cod Liver Oil.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 10d.; ¼lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; including tin and postage.

MRS. CONYERS,

KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

THE DEAF HEAR

The New Patent SOUND DISCS

Completely overcome DEAFNESS and HEAD NOISES, no matter of how long standing. Are the same to the ears as glasses are to the eyes. Invisible. Comfortable. Worn months without removal. Explanatory Pamphlet Free.

The L. R. WALES CO., 62 & 63, New Bond St., London, W.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope.—Address, Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 179, Westminster Bridge Road, London.

WHY SUFFER FROM CORNS, BUNIONS, OR ENLARGED TOE JOINTS, when a packet of Thompson's Celebrated French Corn Plasters will cure you? It is thin as silk, and can be worn with tightest boot. Post free for 14 stamps from M. F. THOMPSON, Homœpathic Chemist, 17, Gordon St., Glasgow. Thompson's Guide to Health post free permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 426. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 27TH, 1897. [ONE PENNY.

IT was said of the first Napoleon that one of the canons by which he regulated the correspondence of his high office was this: "A letter that is not answered answers itself." And in many instances this is, no doubt, true. "Silence," we say, "gives consent." Often, again, it means refusal. Much depends on the form of the appeal; and much on the relative positions of the two parties to the communication.

REALLY

business-like people, however, in business affairs, will seldom adopt any of these formulæ of indifference, whether of princely or popular origin. A neglected letter is, in some respects, like a neglected chill, or a neglected headache, or a neglected physical ailment of any kind. Each of these, indeed, is a message—a message from Nature. And it do to trifle with her communications. She is too powerful, and we are too puny; and, when our indifference ruffles her, she has a way of calling us angrily to account. A post-card will often answer a long letter: "A stitch in time saves nine," and attention to a slight physical ailment, or apparently trivial obstruction, may alike save unnecessary suffering and useless regret.

DOESN'T

MATTER

in the wrong place, is a famous definition of "Dirt." Equally is it true (very often, at all events) of Disease. A sluggish liver, an impaired circulation or recurrent indigestion; a bilious attack or a sick headache; nervous disorders and functional irregularities—each of these is often simply caused by "Matter in the wrong place." Of each how often has one heard it said: "It really doesn't matter!" And yet they all do: they are "Matters that do matter!" They are Nature's MESSAGES; and one of the best specifics—one that is always found to ANSWER—is a timely purifying dose of Beecham's Pills. They are to be had of all Chemists; so that, for the purpose, at all events, of obtaining a supply, wherever you may happen to be

IT REALLY DOESN'T MATTER!

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

10/6 JOHN NOBLE

HALF-GUINEA

COSTUMES,

WORN BY LADIES OF EVERY DEGREE.

PERFECT in Fit, Style, and Quality.

TWO GOLD MEDALS.

Ladies should write for latest Sketch-book of Fashions for Ladies and Children, sent FREE.

SPECIAL CALENDARS FREE.

MODEL 647.

All purchasers during the next few weeks will receive an Ornate Souvenir designed by Raphael Tuck.

NEW DRESS GOODS

A Box of 1,000 Patterns, including 250 Varieties of SERGES, sent free on approval.

TWO NEW DESIGNS.

A very smart, well-cut, full-fronted Bodice, shaped to the back. The sleeves are of the very latest shape. The skirt is full made in a recent tailor design. Price complete 10/6. Safely packed and carriage paid for 9d. extra. Skirt only, as sketched, 5/6. Carriage 6d. extra. 10/6

MODEL 648.—Pretty up-to-date Maid's Costume, well-cut Bodice, Fashionable Sleeves, Tailor-made Skirt.
Size 35 38 42 in.
Price 6/11 7/11 8/11 ea.
Size 46 50 in.
Price 9/11 11/- ea.
Carriage 6d. extra.

COLOURS.—All Costumes supplied in Black, Navy, Bronze, Brown, Ruby, Petunia, Cinnamon, Fawn, Grey, or Myrtle.

Sizes in Stock fit figures 34, 36, 38 in. round bust (under arms), skirts being 38, 40, 42 in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure for 1/6 extra.

Please mention "SHORT STORIES" when ordering.

Bankers: "London and Midland" Bank.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

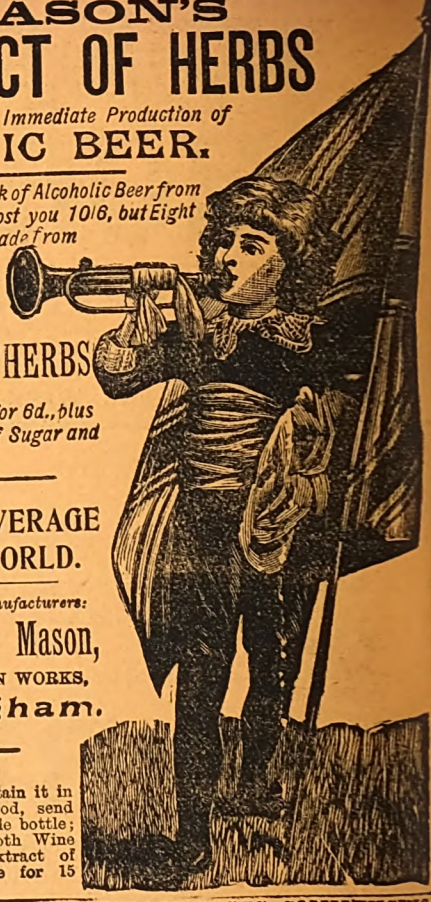
Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.



If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

BLUSHING.

Particulars of a self-treatment for a permanent cure, as prescribed by eminent physicians of the U.S.A., forwarded free to all sufferers on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. B. F. FIELD, 15, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London, W.

ADVERTISERS should write for particulars of Special Positions.

TOO STOUT.

A lady who in a few months reduced her weight from 16st. to 10st. 3lb. by a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment, will willingly send free particulars of same to all who are sufferers, on receipt of stamped envelope. Address, Mrs. G. M. ELLIS, 26, Belvedere Road, Lambeth, London.

DEAFNESS CURED.

On receipt of stamped envelope, a lady who cured herself of Deafness and Noises in the Head, after fifteen years of suffering, will send to all afflicted free particulars of the Remedy, which is simple, safe, sure and inexpensive. Address—Mrs. C. E. AUSTIN, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

HAIR DESTROYED. A lady will, on receipt of stamped envelope, send free particulars of a new French Remedy, which permanently removes all Superfluous Hairs, destroying the roots without injuring the skin. Simple and inexpensive. Address, Madame "F. B.," c/o Fontaine et Cie., 1, Piccadilly Circus, London.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

February 27, 1897.

No. 10.

S.S. S.S.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 10.

Feb. 27, 1897.

NEWSAGENTS

S.S. S.S.

REGD.

ONE BOX

OF

Dr. Mackenzie's Harmless

ARSENICAL COMPLEXION WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire; clear, fresh, free from blotch, blemish, coarseness, redness, freckles, or pimples. Post free for 4/6.—S. HARVEY, 5, Denman Street, London Bridge, S.E. Half Boxes, 2/9. Use DR. MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL TOILET SOAP. Deliciously and expensively perfumed, at all Chemists' and Stores, 1/- per tablet, 3 in box, post free 2/6. Absolutely harmless. Can also be had without arsenic by asking for Dr. Mackenzie's Complexion Soap.

HAIR DESTROYED. An American lady who has entirely destroyed Superfluous Hair on herself will, on receipt of stamped addressed envelope, send free particulars of the Remedy to all those afflicted. Address, Mrs. C. H. McCOY, 2, Lambeth Square, London, S.E.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (32 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

WHY SUFFER FROM CORNS, BUNIONS, OR ENLARGED TOE-JOINTS, when a packet of Thompson's Celebrated French Corn Plasters will cure you? It is thin as silk, and can be worn with tightest boot. Post free for 14 stamps from M. F. THOMPSON, Homœpathic Chemist, 17, Gordon St., Glasgow. Thompson's Guide to Health post free

THE DEAF HEAR

The New Patent SOUND DISCS

Completely overcome DEAFNESS and HEAD NOISES, no matter of how long standing. Are the same to the ears as glasses are to the eyes. Invisible. Comfortable. Worn months without removal. Explanatory Pamphlet Free.

The L. R. WALES CO., 62 & 63, New Bond St., London, W.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

EDITED BY ARTHUR PEARSON OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY

SHORT STORIES

No. 426] For the Week ending February 27th, 1897. [ONE PENNY.

UNAWARES.

WHEN I was introduced to her, I was standing in the balcony of the swimming tank at Santa Cruz, watching the "greenery-yellery" water beneath, and the black human frogs awkwardly gambolling therein. I dislike being introduced to people at or in swimming tanks, but as Mrs. Richbody introduced her, I had to be civil. (Mrs. Richbody has a very good cook—much better than the chef at the hotel where I am staying.)

So I found her a chair, and we sat down.

Out of the corner of my eye I saw her hitch her chair a little closer to mine as she adjusted her skirts.

Before she had spoken six words I murmured to myself: "Ah, that explains it. You are a German."

"Explains what?" she asked sharply.

"You are a German," I repeated. "Pray go on. I am interested in your remarks."

"Most foreigners take me for French," she said.

I merely smiled, and dropped the ashes of my cigar into the upturned eye of my tailor in the tank below, who had had the impertinence to forward me his little account from the city.

"Most foreigners," she repeated.

Caroline frowned, and made a delicious little pucker in her white forehead. (I call her Caroline now; all this was five days ago.)

"The best blood you have is German," she said.

"I think not," I replied; "my grandmother was a Frenchwoman."

"So was mine," she said softly.

The silence was broken only by the barking of a human seal in the tank below—a poor imitation, and much more vulgar than the original.

At length Caroline: "I'm sorry you dislike the Germans."

"I don't. As individuals, I have many friends among them, but as a nation——" I blew a light whiff that vanished into thin air.

"You're not very entertaining or very complimentary; indeed, you're rather rude, and I think I'll go," she said.

She rose and gave her dress a shake.

All rights reserved.]

"Don't go," I said mildly. "I said nothing——"

"I agree with you," she answered cheerfully, and sat down again with a satisfied smile.

Now, I confess, that just for a moment I felt foolish. Never a man, never a child, and seldom a woman, has made me feel foolish. And this woman had made me feel foolish—for a moment. I was annoyed, and, I fear, showed it, for I gave a little start (I was so surprised at her audacity, you know), and dropped my lighted cigar into the swimming tank. It fell on the bald head of my tailor (Stultzwurzel), and made him call out. That was some satisfaction.

"I think we'd better go and take a turn on the beach," said I, rising; "the air seems warm and stuffy here."

"Not at all," she replied, settling back snugly and tapping the toe of a very small tan slipper with the parasol.

"It seems very comfortable here to me. But, perhaps, you suffer from headache?"

"No," said I; "that's not the trouble. My nose is out of joint."

I was proceeding to light a fresh cigar when she interrupted coolly:

"I don't like smoking, Mr. Legend."

I looked at her in amazement.

"But you are German," I said; "surely all Germans——"

"Have you ever been in Germany?" she asked.

Now here she had me again. No, I have never been in Germany, but I wasn't going to confess it without a struggle, so I evasively replied: "I have been in Schleswig-Holstein."

"That's hardly Germany" (this rather disdainfully).

"I'm glad to hear you confess it," said I; "I've always maintained that Schleswig-Holstein is a piece of Denmark which the Germans stole."

"It's false," she burst out with flashing eyes. "Ever since the time of Charlemagne, Schleswig-Holstein has been—but what's the use of arguing with you? You're prejudiced, with French blood in your veins, and you'll never appreciate the Germans."

Digitized by Google

"I think more of them than I did ten minutes ago," said I, gazing at her admiringly. Her colour had risen with her excitement, and with the heel of that little tan slipper she was vehemently beating the floor.

"Thank you," she said, recovering her good humour. (There's nothing fetches a woman like a compliment.) "And, after all, Mr. Legend, it's a matter of perfect indifference to me what you think about the Germans."

"Quite so," said I. "But I like to get at the truth on any subject I investigate, and as you seem well posted, perhaps you'll let me come round this evening and get some more information from you."

"I don't know about that on such short acquaintance," she said. "Nobody's vouched to me for your respectability, and one meets all kinds of queer people at the seaside."

I pointed to Mrs. Richbody, who was on the floor just below us, anxiously watching her only boy take a swimming lesson.

"If that lady vouches for me will you let me come?"

"Of course; I'm staying at her house."

"Mrs. Richbody," called I.

"Yes," replied the anxious mother, with one eye on her darling.

"Am I respectable?"

"What?"

"Am I respectable?"

Little Algernon Richbody gave a yell as he lost his footing in two feet of water and disappeared. His mother screamed also, only louder, and I could get no attention until Algernon had been hauled up from the bottom and carried off howling to his dressing-room.

I hate small boys. What they were ever made for, I can't imagine. Small girls have some raison d'être. They may grow up to be pretty women.

Mrs. Richbody came panting up the stairs, and I repeated my question.

"Respectable? Why, yes; as much so as any of my cousins, I suppose," she said.

Caroline turned her head away quickly. I thought she even blushed, but she has such a fine colour, anyway, that I couldn't be positive of this.

"May I come to dinner this evening?" asked I humbly.

"Nobody's vouched to me for your respectability."

Mrs. Richbody glanced at Caroline and smiled. Caroline gazed steadily at the tank below, and I believe Stultzwurzel thought she was smitten with him, for he immediately attempted a double somersault dive and landed flat on his stomach. This idiotic caper splashed the green water all over the new coat he had just made for me, and I vowed I wouldn't pay him for a year.

"You told me yesterday you were going to Oakland this afternoon to attend Mrs. Moneyton's garden party," said my cousin.

"That was yesterday," said I.

"Then my chef is away for a week's holiday, and no dinner that Bridget could cook would be any attraction to you."

"You seem to think it's chiefly the dinner that brings me to your house," said I crossly, for by this time I was aware that Caroline was smiling—and not at the tailor.

"You've often said so yourself," replied my cousin in a plaintive tone. "I'm sure whenever you come I always try to have that white soup you like so much. But Bridget can't make it."

"Oh, confound—excuse me—bother your dinner," said I, now desperate; "I can get white soup—such as it is—at the hotel. I want to come and dine with you to—to study German."

"Get a grammar," suggested Caroline.

"One can't get the pronunciation from a book," said I. "To catch the true inspiration of that glorious tongue, one must have the living teacher."

"I don't know," said Mrs. Richbody doubtfully; "you certainly don't deserve to come, but I'll leave it to Caroline. What do you think, my dear?"

Caroline hesitated. My heart sank to my boots and I felt the queerest little dryness in my throat. The human seals stopped barking as if by pre-arrangement, and there came a moment of complete quiet, such as sometimes occurs amid the noisiest scene. In the silence I heard Caroline say softly, but very distinctly, "I think we might let him come."

As I said before, that was five days ago. And she now calls me Tom.

L. Du Pont Syle.

Digitized by Google

MY FAMILIAR AND I.

I possess a Familiar. This is much more satisfactory than to be possessed by one, as some of my friends seem to be. I acquired my Familiar in India, where they are wiser than we in many things, though we do not believe it.

But how, or where, or when, I came by this person you will not care to hear, for you will smile at my preface as well as at my story. He showed me many strange things in this world and the other, and proved himself such an amusing and devoted friend that I would not have exchanged him for an angel. Since I became his owner, I have eschewed society to some extent, finding no one more entertaining than my invisible imp of darkness, but this evening the whim took me to return to some of my old haunts. A card for a reception at Mrs. X——'s lay on my dressing-table, and I rose and got into my evening clothes about half-past nine, much to my Familiar's displeasure.

"Why not take me?" he suggested. "If you will let me go, I will give you a rare treat. Listen—here's a bargain. Each person whom you see I will show you in a veritable scene in his or her past. Come, I've done nothing so good as this for you. It will pay you to take me! You will have a succession of surprises. You know you enjoy new sensations, and as for myself I have seen nothing of society here, and I doubt not I shall feel as thoroughly at home as if I were down below."

I took him. As he belonged to me, and was in a measure my slave, he would have been obliged to stay behind had I willed it otherwise, but, feeling in just the mood for the kind of entertainment he promised me, I acceded. I cherished few illusions about my friends, and I could dispense with what I had left. They are uncomfortable property, anyway.

The rooms were crowded, as usual. Mrs. X—— always has a crush. She is a pretty, plump little woman, with a caressing smile and—but why describe her? You know her, as does everyone. I made my way to where she stood, by a big palm, in a dainty white gown, which had, however, to my surprise, long sleeves to the wrist. I say to my surprise, for Mrs. X—— has a famous arm, if I might say so, and she is very proud of it.

"You are looking at my ugly sleeves!" she cried, with a beaming smile. I held her pretty fingers in mine as I greeted her. "Is it not wicked? That stupid John spilt a cup of hot bouillon on me at lunch, and my poor arm is frightfully scalded. It may be cruel, but I dismissed him. I simply cannot keep the clumsy creature after this last exploit."

Suddenly Mrs. X——, smiling, faded away, and I saw her in a négligé in her dressing-room, her white face distorted with fury. Her husband's hulking figure was just passing out of the door, which crashed loudly behind him. She turned up her sleeve slowly from the wrist. On its white surface were the purple marks of brutal fingers.

And then Mrs. X——, waving her great fan of snowy ostrich feathers, stood by me again.

The Familiar laughs. I hear him distinctly, but I——

"Are you ill?" asks Mrs. X—— solicitously; "pardon, but you seemed so white just then—perhaps the heat——"

"Yes, it is the heat," I reply hastily; "if you will excuse me one moment, I think I will go out in the air."

"I like society," said my Demon blandly in my ear; "let us go in society often, will you? I have not seen so many people I could take to my heart since we came over."

I made no reply. I fancied I was hardened and cynical enough to meet any such revelations with composure, if not, it was time I should be.

Returning to the drawing-rooms, I was buttonholed by my old friend S——. He was excessively gay, and looked prosperous. "Well, where have you kept yourself?" said he; "I want you to come down to Guildford and dine with me on Sunday. I tell you I have the sweetest wife and baby in the world. Want to show you the boy. Why didn't you marry, yourself? Oh! there's nothing like marriage, old fellow. Yes, the world uses me finely—making lots of money. Ta-ta till Sunday."

A moonlit sleeping-room. A little child crying long and loudly in its cradle. A woman's form lying, half-dressed, with flushed face, across the bed. A brown stream of brandy from an overturned decanter trickling across the carpet.

Not at present, S——. No marriage for me. And my Demon echoes sagely in my ear; "No marriage for you!"

What? There in the chair, talking to a bejewelled, bewigged old dame, is M——, stouter than of old, but with that same air of perfect rectitude, that expression of dignified frankness that is so engaging; and, after all, a bank manager should be a portly, solid-looking gentleman to inspire the trust and respect of depositors. I will go over and speak to him.

Before I can reach him, he is in a small, dark room with heavily-barred doors: the safe is open, he is fingering a pile of envelopes irresolutely; his face is sickly, yellowish, evil. So, so. The die is cast, and my dear M—— is no longer an honest man. . . .

No. I stop in disgust. I do not care to grasp his hand in mine. I will go home. I have had enough of my fellow-men. Bah! I loathe them all—all! Let me get out of this—the sooner the better.

"Oh, do not go home," pleads my Demon plaintively. "I was just beginning to enjoy myself so thoroughly! This is a great city, and I tell you I never met pleasanter people at home. Don't go yet, there's a good fellow!"

But I turn resolutely, sick at heart. In the hall I catch a glimpse of myself in the great mirror, and pause. I am ghastly white, which is not, perhaps, strange, and—what! . . .

She is lying prone on the polished floor, senseless from the blow of my cruel words, in the circle of light cast by the rose-shaded lamp, and I—I pause to look at her just one moment, and then I turn like a coward and steal away.

We got home somehow, my Demon and I. He has been trying to console me. He tells me it is much pleasanter here than in some places, but my pistol is lying temptingly close to my hand on the table, and I rather think before dawn that I shall have left life and, perhaps, my Demon both behind!

Annie Aldrich.

Digitized by Google

Among my dearest memories of Italy is that of the evenings I used to spend in Venice with the Cavalier Cicogna, as he was known upon the stage. We usually sat in the garden of the Osteria until late into the night, sometimes tête-à-tête, sometimes in the company of old Captain Amati.

Here one could sit quite cool and comfortable, and, when the moon came up over the tall chimney-pots and its silver lines threaded the dense mass of leaves and tendrils and dallied with the bottle of dark Trentino which stood on the mottled marble before us, this very garden became a little world full of poetry. Then was the place well suited to the tales of the Cavalier Cicogna.

One which he had told us repeatedly, as was his custom, ran as follows:

"Are you familiar with Farli? No. Well, it does not lie on the regular route of tourists, and I am not surprised that you are not acquainted with it. But you know it by name, captain, do you not? And you have no doubt heard of Signor Campobassi—but only casually, eh? I knew him well. He was a very agreeable comrade, and it grieved us all to lose him. The ladies adored him, for he was a slender, finely-formed fellow, with the most beautiful eyes in the world, and a moustache, as if the Madonna herself had meant him for a tenor. We men liked him because we had in him a true friend, and one who always stood ready to help with his purse or his dagger, and who had no trace of haughtiness about him, although he was the favourite of the public. He was one of those exceptional men who have not an enemy.

"But I forgot. Farli is in the vicinity of Rome, at the foot of the Abruzzi Mountains, a small but rich and very flourishing town. It was in the fifties that I went thither with a newly-formed company.

"Farli had a very spacious new theatre. We pleased the public, did a thriving business, and, accordingly, were well suited to stay there. But it was our primo tenore, Signor Campobassi, who awakened the most interest. Our impresario smiled contentedly whenever he chanced to mention him, and said, with a knowing look: 'That was the best hit I ever made.' I can still remember well to what straits he had been put for a tenor. He refused to lay out much money for one and tenors, as a rule, are high in their prices. Then, one day, as we were sitting in the café, Campobassi appeared, inquired for the director, and asked him to try his voice. He said he was a peasant's son from the neighbourhood of Areggo, but even as a child he had had such an ear for music that he knew by heart all the airs he had ever heard. It was the opinion among his acquaintances that he could sing finely, and so he had thought that he might make his fortune in the opera. Now he had heard that Signor Mario was looking for a tenor, and so he had made haste hither to offer himself.

"Our impresario was a cunning fox and shook his head gravely at this. 'It would be a great deal of trouble to coach you,' he said. But Campobassi replied that on this account he would be content with a very small salary.

"Signor Mario still shook his head, but he took up his glass, contemplated for a while the dissolving bits of ice, and finally drank the remainder of his sherry with an air of decision.

"'Well, we will try it,' said he. 'Colleagues, if you have any desire to be present at the rehearsal, follow me.'

"We were all curious enough, so we started for the theatre in spite of the midday heat. There Campobassi sang a couple of airs from the most familiar operas, and the more he sang the more significantly did Mario wink at us. His fat, round face fairly shone and glowed for joy; nevertheless, at the end he said rather coolly: 'You will make us much work, Campobassi, but I will give you a trial.'

"As a matter of fact, the trouble he made us was very slight. He had such an extraordinary musical ear that he retained correctly the most difficult passages if they had been sung before him only once. In addition, he had a natural facility for acting, so that he was less awkward than many tenors of long experience. It is true his performance lacked artistic finish; but the crudities in his singing were atoned for by the stupendous "material"—a voice which surmounted everything and was yet of the purest and most beautiful quality. Such a tenor had not been heard for many a day in Farli, and people thronged the theatre only for the sake of hearing him. Campobassi was soon the idol of the Farlese. If two men were found quarrelling anywhere, one might be sure that Campobassi was the subject of the dispute; and if a maiden, lost in reverie, appeared to see nothing, one might stake one's life that she was all the while seeing and hearing Campobassi.

Digitized by Google

"One forenoon, after rehearsal, we were sitting under the arcades of the Piazza dei Signori, drinking our coffee. We had been chatting about everything possible and impossible, and one of us at last turned the conversation to the subject of favourite parts. Each one named his own. I, 'Doctor Bartolo'; Pedrocchi, 'Rigoletto'; Mario said jokingly that his favourite opera was the one in which he had least to do; Campobassi was silent.

"At length we pressed him to confess his own preferences, but he shrugged his shoulders and replied, laughing: 'My favourite part? That is probably my own secret.'

"'No secrets amongst colleagues,' grumbled Pedrocchi.

"'No secrets?' was Campobassi's answer. 'Well, perhaps I will play you my favourite part to-night.'

"'Oh, the Trovatore!' we exclaimed, for we were to bring out the opera on that day for the first time in Farli. Campobassi shrugged his shoulders again, and we broke off the conversation at this point, as our prima donna came towards us under the arcades.

"On the evening of the same day, the Trovatore was placed on the boards. All that Farli possessed of aristocracy and distinction was present at the theatre that night. Not a seat was vacant. The great expectations which were cherished concerning Campobassi's performance were not disappointed. Here he could give himself free rein, and his voice rang through the house, not like a tenor—no, like a choir of tenors. The applause would not cease, and Campobassi was called out repeatedly.

"At last came the Stretta. Now the audience would surely be thrown into ecstasies; and we had not deceived ourselves. Wreath after wreath was flung from the boxes, all the people stamped their feet, clapped, and cried 'Viva!' and 'Da Capo!' Finally, Campobassi, smiling, made a gesture to signify that he would repeat the Stretta. The storm was laid, and it grew suddenly so still in the theatre that one could have heard the buzzing of a fly. We all stood there behind the scenes, and beheld Campobassi step forward to the footlights, a departure from custom which did not strike us oddly, for tenors are allowed many liberties.

"But what was that? He was saying something in an undertone to the orchestra, and the musicians, who had already begun the opening bars, broke off in their playing. Instead of the notes of the Stretta, we heard Campobassi speak—speak words which made the blood stiffen in our veins, which threw such a spell over us that we were unable to stir from the spot, long after Campobassi had finished his speech.

"I can remember it as vividly as if it had all happened yesterday. 'Honoured patrons and citizens of Farli,' he began—and probably at this point he made one of his consummately graceful bows—'I thank you for the affection you have shown for me; the more, since this is my farewell appearance. After to-night you will, I fear, hardly care to hear me again. I beg you will all remain quietly in your seats; for then, upon my honour, not a hair of anybody's head shall be molested. Any movement can only lead to mischief, for my men are patrolling the corridors and all the exits are guarded; nor can help come to you from the direction of the stage, for the enlarged chorus which has to-night sung so valiantly consists, for the most part, of my own people, and they also are well furnished with weapons

"I am Fra Angelo, whom some call a brigand, and whose name is certainly well known to you. I, too, am armed, as you see, and these pistols are well loaded. But far be it from me to inflict any injury upon you who have shown me so much consideration—my word for that. At this very moment a member of the chorus has already taken our honoured impresario in charge; that I shall not exact tribute of my colleagues you will naturally infer. On the other hand, honoured patrons, I have often provided entertainment for you, and it is on that account justifiable that I should require some recompense from you—more especially since our impresario has paid me an honorarium which my sense of shame will not permit me to name. So have the kindness, good people, to deliver your watches, rings, chains, purses, and the like with all alacrity to those who will now pass from seat to seat.

"The exits are guarded, as I have remarked before, and the more generously and quietly you perform your part the quicker will this business be accomplished. In the meantime I will ask the orchestra to play some favourite airs, which may serve as an agreeable distraction for those who have discharged their obligations.'

"In truth, the orchestra did commence to play, and, as we learned later, everything passed off as Fra Angelo had wished. As a matter of fact, all his threats had been superfluous, for the name of the famous bandit had alone sufficed to render everyone helpless.

"Fra Angelo supervised the entire transaction from the stage, said a few words of thanks when it was ended, then turned towards the flies. As he passed us he clapped me laughingly on the shoulder and said: 'Did I not tell you, Cicogna, that I should play my favourite part to-night?'

"With that he vanished, and we rushed terrified out into the open air. The audience streamed out at the doors in unwonted haste, the first among whom had already summoned the guardians of the so-called public safety. A few moments later troops trotted through the streets of the town, but of Fra Angelo and his men not a trace was to be found."

Emile Peschkau.

PEARSON'S SHAKESPEARE,

PART 4,

NOW ON SALE.

PRICE 6d.

POST-CARD COMPETITION.

No. 6.

£2 2s. is offered to the reader who sends in, on the back of a post-card, the best four-line verse, each line ending respectively in "Meant," "Tories," "Bent," "Stories." Competition closes on Monday, March 1st.

POST-CARD COMPETITION RESULT.

No. 4.

£2 2s. has this week been forwarded to Mr. M. C. Craney, 129, Lillington Street, Pimlico, S.W., whose post-card bore the anagram: "Pearson do tip it to M.C.C."

Digitized by Google

SUMMARY.

Prologue.—The Hon. Ernest Wentworth lies dying at his estate, Chisholme Park. His wife, a light, pleasure-loving creature, falls under the mesmeric influence of Armand Lemaitre, who, by force of will power, compels her to rob her husband. While in the act of extracting a bundle of notes from a bureau she is interrupted by the appearance of her husband, who enters the room in his bed-clothes, silently points at her with his fore-finger, and then falls down dead. She shortly after leaves for Paris to join Lemaitre.

Nineteen years elapse. Edith Wentworth, who was adopted when a baby by Lady Hilton, is living at Hillcrest Lodge. Among the guests for Christmas are Cécile Delisle, a school-friend of Edith's, Professor Queech, Jack Heathcote, and Captain Arthur Musgrave. At York, on the journey down from King's Cross, Cécile observes that the carriage next to theirs contains a man and a woman. At their destination, a few miles further on, she notices a strange man there alone.

Lemaitre, alias Dr. Danton, arrives at the house as a guest, and exercises an influence over Edith that arouses the jealousy of Arthur, who strikes Danton, and agrees to fight a duel.

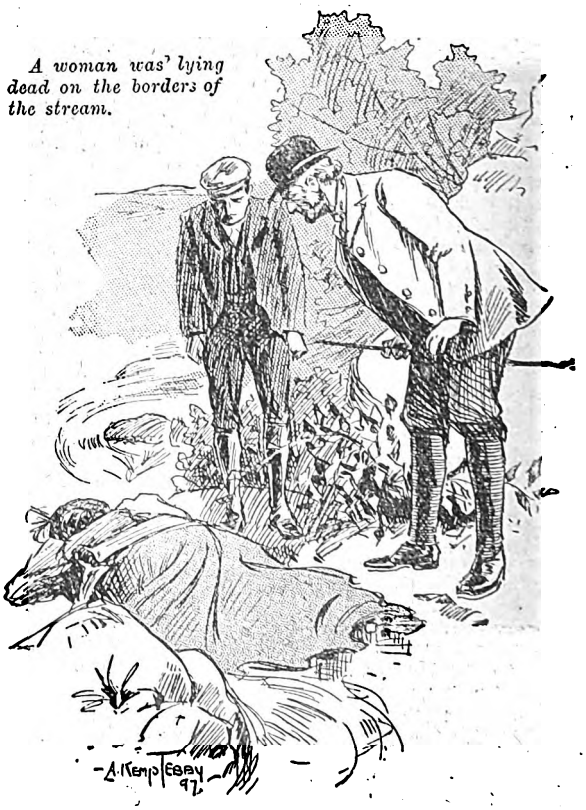
CHAPTER III.

Cécile and Inspector Wheeler.

There was little doubt that a murder had been committed. The whole county of Yorkshire was in agitation about it. It was the theme of the local and of the London papers alike. Scotland Yard was at its wits' end. The whole thing was as mysterious as possible.

Here is an extract from one of the Yorkshire papers when the body was first discovered:

"Everyone living anywhere in the neighbourhood of either York or Seaborough knows Thorgill Beck. It is one of the biggest, the most dismal, and the most desolate of the great ravines which cut up the bleak, flat wolds into gullies between York and Seaborough. In it there appears to be only one inhabitant, the farmer, Wilson, whose finding of the body has now put his name into everyone's mouth. His little farm (if that can be called a farm which consists of little more than a thatched cabin and a few patchy acres holding sheep of the kind known as black-faced half-breeds) fills the valley. The farmhouse stands at a point not far from the spot where the piers of masonry and iron girders of the railway viaduct come down from a considerable height into the semi-darkness of the ravine. Assisted by his thrifty wife and a couple of young sons, Farmer Wilson manages to eke out a living by his half-yearly trips into the outer world behind a flock of the 'half-breeds' and his two sagacious collies. The gully is as wild and inhospitable as can be. Through it flows, from west to east, Thorgill Beck, a black, impetuous streamlet, usually strewn with leaves scattered upon its rough waters by the winds which howl down the echoing cleft. In the depths of the hollow, which is the habitation of the bittern, snipe, and wild duck, the vegetation is unusually rank, consisting of hazel-bushes and holly-trees, while over the banks of the stream droops the weeping willow. A few hardy firs, intermingled with an occasional bright-hued spruce, straggle up the slopes; but as the softer turf merges into the heather of the bleak moorland above, all trace of other vegetation dies away, and the brown and purple ling stretches away for miles over



A woman was lying dead on the borders of the stream.

Digitized by Google

the wolds in one unbroken expanse of dull colouring, which wraps hill and dale in the same neutral tint.

"It was early on Christmas morning, on coming out to look after the sheep, that Farmer Wilson's youngest son made the ghastly find. He ran back and roused his father with the intelligence that a woman was lying dead on the borders of the stream. The farmer immediately went out and found the body lying half in and half out of the swollen and angry rivulet. On drawing her higher up the bank he found the head and face a mere featureless mass of broken bone and flesh, so that even her nearest relative would have been unable to recognise the lady. It was plain, however, from the character of her dress, that she was not a woman of the lower class, though, on the other hand, she had no jewellery upon her person. A handkerchief in the pocket of her torn and bedraggled dress bore the initials 'J. L.' The lady's neck was broken, as well as one leg and one arm.

"It is said that Scotland Yard is at present quite unable to account for the presence of the woman in Thorgill Beck. The broken and excoriated condition of her body may be explained on several hypotheses. She may have leapt into the streamlet higher up the Beck, and been dashed by the raving torrent against the rocks as it bore her down before depositing her on the land; or she may have been first murdered and then thrown into the Beck from its banks; or, again, she may have leapt, or been thrown, from the high railway viaduct above—though this supposition certainly seems wild. It has been discovered that there is no trace of poison in her stomach; that she was not shot; that there are no marks about the body pointing to the commission of a murder. There is, indeed, a deep cut all round her throat; but this has apparently been caused by the collar of her dress eating into the enormously swollen flesh of the throat, puffed out by her immersion in the water. This tragic affair remains, therefore, for the moment wrapped in perfect mystery."

So said the Seaborough Post in its issue of the 30th of December.

It was not till the fifth day of the new year that Cécile Delisle's eyes fell upon this report. She always had a liking for the reading of such details in the newspapers, and would often sit for hours over a few lines of a report telling of the tragedy of some life. Then, with the left eye quite shut, and the other looking far away with a strange intensity, she would grow forgetful of everything around her, till someone roused her from her reverie.

For the past few days she had been distracted by the great ball, and the whirl of gaieties at Hillcrest Lodge, and had not read a paper. She had put aside several, however, as they came in, with the intention of absorbing their contents when she found time. The ball was on the 3rd, and on the morning of the 5th she sat alone in the library, reading.

As soon as she had got to the end of the article in the Post, she rose, stood for a minute with her pretty brows knit, walked rapidly upstairs, along a corridor, and stopped at Lady Hilton's boudoir.

"Come in!" cried Lady Hilton in answer to her tap.

Lady Hilton sat before the glass, while a maid behind her combed down the long white hair.

"Why, you, Cécile, dear?" she said, drawing Cécile to her with her arm round her waist. In an incredibly short time the old lady had grown to love the girl.

"I want to know—something," said Cécile. "Tell me—what is the meaning of 'Scotland Yard'?"

"Scotland Yard, dear? Why, what a question! Isn't that where all the policemen and people live, Mary?"

Mary combing down the silvery fleece, said:

"Yes, my lady, I b'lieve so."

"That is it then, dear," said Lady Hilton. "The policemen live there."

"And the detectives?" asked Cécile.

"I should imagine so, dear. But why?"

"Nothing. I was reading about it, and wanted to know. Where is it?"

"In London, I think. It is in London, isn't it, Mary?"

"Yes, my lady."

"It is in London, dear."

On the opposite side sat Cécile.

"I thought so," said Cécile, "but I wanted to be sure. Good-bye."

She dropped a kiss on Lady Hilton's cheek, and was gone.

She returned at once to the library, took paper, and wrote:

Sirs,—I cannot write fluently English for a long time without effort, and do not mean to try. But if you send a detective to the over address where I dwell now, I think I can tell you something of the affair of Thorgill Beck which will interest you particularly.

Yours truly,
Cécile Delisle.

She addressed the letter to "The Detectives of Scotland Yard," put on a stamp, and went and dropped it in the letter-bag in the hall.

All that day and the next she was unusually silent, and Jack Heathcote, who came to her with the proposal that she should join a party going out skating on the lake in the park, received an answer which rankled in his bosom for hours.

"Englishmen have no idea what skating means," said Cécile.

"No—I suppose not—that is—no, I suppose that is so," stammered Heathcote. "In that case I shall stay behind."

"No, do not stay. There is Edith going, you see—and Captain Musgrave—and the Dr. Danton—and the Hon. Lily Grandcourt, and Lieutenant Pendragon; and there is Miss Newton looking toward you to be her escort. You are—what you call it?—'smitten' a little with Miss Newton, I think?"

"Ah—well—hardly that, you know. Fact is, I always had a fancy for Celtic ladies—French people, you know; and I think, if ever I marry——"

"Go—do," said Cécile. "Miss Newton is waiting for you. The Professor Queech cannot skate: you must take his place this once."

Jack moved off to Miss Newton, and Cécile took up her newspaper and walked to the quiet brown library.

She had not been sitting there half-an-hour, when a footman entered with a card. Cécile looked on it, and saw: "Inspector Wheeler, Detective Department, Scotland Yard."

"Let him in," she said.

She arranged two chairs, one on each side of a small table, and immediately afterwards the inspector was ushered in.

Digitized by Google

He was a big, heavy man, with a clean, fresh face, thoroughly Saxon in colouring and cut. He was dressed in plain clothes, a brown tweed; and sat heavily in the easy-chair, twirling his hat.

On the opposite side sat Cécile, with her elbow on the table, her thumb under her chin, and her forefinger supporting her temple.

She began:

"Have you found out anything about the affair of Thorgill Beck?"

"Little or nothing, miss."

"You come from London now?"

"No, miss: from Seaborough. I was sent down to look into this matter, you know. They telegraphed to me from Scotland Yard that you might have information for me. That is why I am here."

"First of all, you will have some lunch, perhaps?"

"Thank you, no, miss. I have just had something."

"Very well. Then we will go into this affair together."

Inspector Wheeler smiled a little to himself. His intention was to obtain information, not to "go into the affair" with a young lady.

"You say you have found out 'little or nothing,'" Cécile went on. "What does that mean to say?"

"Well, you know, we have formed some sort of opinion about the case. But nothing more."

"You have seen the body?"

"Oh, yes."

"And where is it now, the body?"

"Why, buried, of course."

"So soon; in this cold weather? But I should like to have seen it!"

Inspector Wheeler's eyes opened wide. At her first question he had discerned that this was no ordinary pink-and-white young lady, but her penchant for seeing dead bodies surprised him.

"You are surprised, then?" said Cécile. "But why? A lady is not necessarily of wax, I think. I have seen dead bodies, many. You know the Morgue in Paris? I have seen them there. Twice, when I was a child at a convent school, I ran away to go to the Morgue. You should not be surprised."

"Well, miss, it is of no consequence. If you will tell me what information you have——"

"But first—is it too great a secret to tell me what 'opinion' you have arrived to?"

"Of course," said Inspector Wheeler, "it was either a murder or a suicide; and the fact that the body was robbed leads us to suppose that it was a murder."

"'Robbed,' you say?"

"Yes, miss."

"Of what?"

"Ah, that we don't know. But she was a lady, you know, her dress showed that; and yet there was not a single piece of jewellery found on her."

"But look at me," said Cécile; "I am a lady, yet I think you will not see a single piece of jewellery on me."

"Well, that is true, miss," said the Inspector ponderingly. "Of course, it is only a theory, you see. We are not sure that she was robbed."

"You may be sure, however," said Cécile quietly; "for she certainly was."

"You know that, miss?"

"Yes—I know."

"How, miss?"

"She had on a ring, a locket, a bracelet, and a gold watch, which have disappeared. Therefore I conclude, with certainty, that she was robbed."

"But, good Heavens, miss," cried Inspector Wheeler, "how do you know all these details? Did you know her when alive?"

"No. I think I saw her once, when alive; but only for a moment. I did not notice any of her jewellery. The details of the ring, the locket, the bracelet, and the watch I gather from reading the published facts."

"Well, that's more than any of us have been able to do, then. You ought to be a detective, miss."

"All detectives should be French," said Cécile.

The Inspector smiled.

"And they should all be women," proceeded Cécile.

The Inspector chuckled.

"And they should all, from childhood, be trained in a convent, where they rub with nobody but women," went on Cécile.

The Inspector roared with laughter.

When his merriment was over, he said:

"But about these rings and things—are you sure of what you say?"

"Quite."

"Then how, miss?"

"You had the lady's body in your hands," said Cécile. "You know that she was married."

"Oh, there is no doubt of that."

"Married without a wedding ring?" she asked, with lifted eyebrow.

"Ah, but that is no proof, miss, that she had it on at that time. Women, for instance, may pawn a wedding-ring."

"I know. But this lady had on a rich and fashionable dress. And she would have pawned her locket, or her bracelet, before pawning her wedding-ring. She had not, in fact, any pressing need of money."

"Well—I suppose you are right. But however did you know of the bracelet—and the—the locket? And—the watch?"

"Read this." Cécile handed him a paper some days old, and pointed to a sentence. The Inspector read:

"The fourth finger of the left hand as well as the right wrist were nearly bare of flesh."

"Yes," said the Inspector, "the fact is true enough as stated there. But the whole body was bruised by the rocks, you know. And it is only natural that one part should be more bruised than another."

"But the peculiarity, Mr. Inspector," said Cécile, leaning forward, "of those two parts being mentioned together as being specially bruised. The parts on which one wears the wedding ring, and on which one wears a single bracelet. One naturally concludes that the ring and the bracelet had something to do with the bruising—if she had on a ring and a bracelet. But we have already proved by a different line of thought that she did have on a ring. Therefore, Mr. Inspector, we must conclude that she had on a bracelet."

"Yes, miss—I see what you mean. I see it. That is certainly very clever thinking——"

"As for the locket," Cécile went on, "I can't think, really, how anyone could not guess that. She certainly did wear a locket. Think of that deep cut into the swollen neck. The papers say it was caused by the flesh closing over the neck of the dress. But a woman, surely, never could have thought so absurdly. The neck of a dress would never have had that effect. The deep cut was caused by a string tied round the neck, and something, you may be sure, hung by that string. That something was a locket."

"How do you know, miss?"

"Because I am a woman. I saw the lady, you know. She was French; if I know anything of people from their look she was, or had been, an actress. She had a light character. She was fond of jewellery. It was a piece of jewellery, a locket—certain."

"And how do you know she had a watch?"

"It is clear, Inspector, that you are not a woman!" laughed Cécile. "Don't I tell you she was fond of jewellery? That she had on a valuable bracelet? The first thing a woman fond of jewellery buys is a watch. If she has on rings, lockets, bracelets, you may be sure she had a watch before any of them. Undoubtedly the murdered woman had a watch."

Digitized by Google

"Well, miss, you beat everything I ever heard," said the Inspector. "You know, then, that she was murdered?"

"Don't you?"

"I suppose so, now you have proved that she was robbed."

"But she was not robbed by the same person who murdered her," said Cécile.

"No? And how do you know that, miss?"

"It seems to me so evident! And evident from two quite separate considerations. In the first place, a person who murders another in the open air, and then robs that other, does it in a hurry, always. But this lady was not robbed in a hurry, you see."

"Is that so, miss?"

"But yes—it is so. One knows that from the fact of the handkerchief been found by you in her pocket—the handkerchief marked 'J. L.' The robber must have searched her pocket surely; he must have found the handkerchief, and taken it out, and finding it of no value, he actually took the trouble to replace it in the pocket. He was not a murderer."

Cécile, as she spoke, had that far-away look of scrutiny in the right eye, the left being almost closed, her face perking upward.

"Yes, miss—that certainly seems sound," said Inspector Wheeler. "I follow you at every point. And what is the other consideration, miss, by which you know that the murderer was not the same man as the robber?"

"The cut round the neck!" said Cécile, "the finger bare of flesh, the wrist bare of flesh. The string supporting the locket, which has disappeared, must have remained round the throat for some time after death in order to give time for the neck to swell round it. The finger, too, and the wrist must have had time to swell, for it was the effort to get the ring and bracelet off which tore away the flesh. She was robbed many hours after she was murdered."

"I follow you, miss. But, in that case, how do you know that she was murdered at all? She may have jumped into the streamlet of her own accord, mayn't she?"

"From where?" asked Cécile, with a quick glance at the Inspector.

"From the bank of the streamlet, miss, or from—from the railway viaduct."

"Not from the bank," answered Cécile, again with the far-away look. "for you say 'stream*let*,' all the papers say 'stream*let*.' 'Let,' I think, means 'little,' and 'stream*let*' means 'little stream.' The 'beck' is not a great rushing river. It would crush and bruise a body thrown into it from the bank, among the rocks in its course. But it would not have the power to snap the limbs. It could not break the neck."

"True enough," mused the Inspector, "true enough. But may she not have jumped from the railway viaduct?"

"Yes, that is where she came from, hence the broken limbs. But she did not jump. Do not think that. She was thrown—by a very great force—by a very strong man."

"You are quite sure of that?"

"Quite sure of that. It is perfectly clear. People, you see, when they are about to commit the suicide by leaping from a great height, leap downwards more than outwards. It is of the downwards that they are thinking. That is their aim. But this lady was shot far outwards—horizontally."

"I should like to hear your reason for thinking that, miss?"

"She was found near the wall of the viaduct, was she not?" said Cécile, "and she was half in and half out of the water, I think? But that was not the position and the place where she first fell into the ravine! She was carried there, from farther up, by the stream."

"How do you arrive at that, miss?"

"Oh, but that is clear, Mr. Inspector. Consider the swollen condition of her whole body, of every part of her, of her neck, her fingers. This was caused by the water. The whole of her must have been at one time under the water, and there for hours during the long night. The streamlet in bearing her down towards the viaduct must have jammed her against a rock, and kept her swinging there, all of her immersed for hours. But before morning she got free, and was flung half up on the bank. The point at which she first touched the stream was, therefore, a good way up from the viaduct. So she did not jump. She was thrown by a very strong man. She was murdered!"

Cécile looked round upon the Inspector, and smiled a sweet smile.

"Well, miss, all I can say is," said Mr. Wheeler, "that you have given us great assistance in this matter. The difficulty is to lay our hands on the murderer and the robber."

"The robber, at any rate," said Cécile, "is easily found."

"You don't mean Farmer Wilson, miss?"

"Yes, I mean him," nodded Cécile.

"Well, do you know, I had that very thought myself? But I assure you that you are wrong there. I have been to Thorgill Beck, you know, and seen Wilson. He is a most harmless, decent fellow—one of the religious sort. Of course I pumped him well, without accusing him straight out. But he hasn't the things, I assure you."

"Does no one live in the Beck but him?"

"No one, miss."

Cécile knit her brows.

"Some one has them, you know," she said.

"Well, that we will think out later on. Meanwhile will you tell me the actual information you have to give, of which you wrote to Scotland Yard?"

Cécile briefly told him of what she had seen in the train on the Christmas Eve—the woman draining the brandy-flask in the train, the bent back of the man in the waiting-room with the blood-red hairs of the rug on his light-coloured coat, the sound like a scream as the train dashed over the wolds in the falling snow, and the dark object that seemed to rush past the carriage window on the outside. Then she told of the journey's end; how at Seaborough she had looked into the window of the carriage which the French lady had occupied, and found it empty; then looked again, and seen a squat, heavy man, with bronzed face and long goat beard, in mean clothes, stand as if by magic there.

This was her story.

"Do you think," asked the Inspector, "that the big man who was with the lady could have got out at the little station between York and Seaborough without your seeing?"

"Yes—he may. And yet it is strange, too. I was not looking out, I think. But I was sitting near the window; I should have seen."

The Inspector rose to go, and bowed. Cécile held out her hand.

"Good-bye," she said. "You are sure you will not have some lunch?"

Mr. Wheeler declined, and retired backwards.

"And, Inspector," she called after him, "look out in your search for a very strong man—an unusually strong man! And get that locket—I know it will guide you." Then she added to herself: "Or, I think I shall get that for you."

Mr. Wheeler bowed and was gone.

CHAPTER IV.

The Duel.

Professor Queech found himself involved in a desperate affair. For the first time for forty years he felt that he was being distracted from the study of musical sounds. A hundred times a day he mopped with his handkerchief the beads of sweat on the top of his hairless scalp. Miss Newton, observing him, thought that he was screwing up his courage to the proposing point, but a far more momentous matter it was which was agitating the Professor—a matter which involved the life or death of two men.

Danton, not finding anyone else handy, had asked the

Digitized by Google

Professor to be his second. The Professor had first been astounded, then indignant, and then had begun to preach; but, seeing the thing inevitable, had been attracted by the novelty of the situation, had felt his own self-importance inflated, and finally, with many murmurs, consented. He, the man of art and of science, and of peace, in his old age, was taking part in an illegal act.

So when Harry Pendragon presented himself on behalf of Captain Arthur Musgrave before Dr. Danton, Danton referred him to the Professor. And many were the formal interviews between Lieutenant Pendragon and Professor Queech.

"The final question to be settled between us," said Pendragon, at their last interview in the conservatory, "is the question of weapons."

"Ah, just so—just so," answered the Professor, mopping his scalp.

"You are the challenging party, you know," said the soldier, "you choose."

"Well, now—well—let me see," said the Professor, looking sideways and downwards through the corner of his eyes, "the question is, of course, which weapon is the least dangerous?"

"I cannot help you in your decision, sir."

"Well, well—no—I suppose not. This is a deplorable affair, Mr. Pendragon!"

"Pray, choose ——"

"A deplorable affair, sir. Between us now, talking as friends, can't we do something——?"

"I am afraid you are wasting both breath and precious time, sir," said the officer coldly. "To say that an affair is deplorable hardly makes it less so. Pray choose."

"Swords, now—cold steel—that I consider a most dangerous, a most dangerous weapon——"

"Do I understand you to choose swords, then? Very well, say swords."

"No, no; pray be not hasty, sir! I was remarking that nothing could be more hurtful than a weapon like the sword. The ingenuity of man in that respect has been appalling. There have been two-handed swords, double-edged swords, swords of every curve and calibre. With regard to two-edged swords, I can tell you a fact not, I believe, generally known——"

"But that is not the point——"

"No, sir; the edge, the edge. Two-edged swords, now——"

"Is it swords, then, Professor? All right, I agree."

"No, sir, I cannot but consider you precipitate in this matter. I did not say swords. Pistols, now——"

"All right——"

"The pistol. No one can deny that the pistol is a most deadly and diabolical contrivance. And here again the ingenuity of man has displayed itself——"

The Lieutenant beat his cane against the balcony with impatience.

"Professor, do you choose swords or pistols? I cannot stay here all day. We shall be observed. It must be one thing or the other."

"Well, say pistols—say pistols," cried the Professor in desperation. "The pistol is an engine that may miss its aim; the sword cannot."

Pendragon bowed, and walked away.

But both the seconds were equally inexperienced in the arrangements of duelling details. At nearly the last moment it was discovered that no one had thought of procuring a doctor to attend the spot. It was Professor Queech who remembered it. He ran at once to find Pendragon.

"Lieutenant," he said, "we cannot let them fight without a doctor, you know."

"No, certainly—that is a good thought," said the other. "What is to be done?"

"A doctor from Seaborough, now——" suggested the Professor.

"We mustn't think of that, sir! Remember that this is an illegal act in this country, and there are four people already in the know. We cannot admit any strangers. My principal would not hear of it."

"Then what are we to do? This may be a lucky occurrence. Here is the very loophole we might have sought out of this deplorable affair."

"It is singular that you should still be thinking of loopholes, Professor Queech!" said Pendragon; "our principals are not children, but men in earnest. With regard to the doctor business I think we had each better have a talk with our principal himself. I shall go now to the captain; you go to Dr. Danton; and presently we can compare notes."

It was then near midday. The duel was to take place at four in the afternoon.

* * * * *

All this time Cécile's brows kept knitting, knitting. What was there in the air? Those secret talks between Danton and the Professor, between Pendragon and Arthur, and, above all, between the Professor and Pendragon were all duly noted by those eyes that saw everything. The Professor and Pendragon! Had the hussar, then, suddenly taken an absorbing interest in the theory of musical sounds?

She knitted her brows. She looked thoughtfully upwards through one eye, but there was no clue to guide her to the truth.

She had a journey in her head, and on the first sunny day, when the frost was biting keenly in the pure air, she stood suddenly over Edith, where she lay reading a novel on a couch, bent down and kissed her.

"Bye! I am going to Seaborough!" she said.

"Cécile, dear! Why, how sudden!" cried Edith, sitting up. "And how very old-maidish you look in that broad seal cape, and those—you dear!—those old, torn gloves! If it were not for the sealskin cap, no one would suppose you a girl of twenty! You look like a little, dear, old Russian old maid—sweet, sweet Cécile!"

There was a long lovers' kiss, and then Cécile tore herself away and said:

"Yes—I am going—to Seaborough. One will be back soon to one's own love! The trap and John are waiting in the cold for me. Bye!"

"But what for, darling?"

"Nothing. Amuse yourself with the—you know who, I think—till I come——"

"Oh, here, Cécile, I say." Edith was up, and rushing after her in a moment. "Darling, what do you think he said to me just now?" She whispered into Cécile's ear, and they both laughed.

"Why does the goose not say that he loves you and be over?" said Cécile. "He lacks la spontanéité!"

"But, Cécile, he has known me for so short a period. One must have time, love."

"Bah! A soldier should be bold and abrupt. If he waits long, then will the huge doctor carry you off, wholly."

"Sh—h—h! you make me shudder, dear."

"My Edith! poor little one!" Cécile looked at her for a moment with a mother's pitying eyes, then waved her hand, and ran down the stairs to the hall.

As she entered the trap she saw Jack Heathcote standing a little way off on the lawn, eyeing her with hungry eyes. She called him with her hand. Jack came running up.

"You would like, I think, to come with me to Seaborough?"

Jack said a quick "Oh, rather!" to his knowing heart, and climbed to her side in the trap.

The horse began its run to Seaborough.

"You will have to spend some hours by yourself in Seaborough, waiting for me," said Cécile when they were halfway. "You will find it dull, I think."

"I? Not at all," answered Jack; "but are you going anywhere, then?"

"Yes—I am going on a short railway travel. You must not say anything of it to anybody at the Lodge. I have a reason for wishing it to be a secret."

Digitized by Google

"Oh, very well, quite so. But mayn't I come too?"

"No, sir."

And so Jack was left alone at Seaborough station, and Cécile sped alone westward in a train, until she reached the small station midway between Seaborough and York. Here she got out, and asked the station-master:

"Where can I get a carriage for the hire?"

The station-master sent with her a porter to a little tavern, where she soon procured a trap.

Having mounted on it, she said to the driver:

"How many miles to Thorgill Beck?"

"What, where the murder was done?" said the man.

"Yes."

"A matter of about nine mile, I should think."

"How long does it take?"

"There and back?"

"Yes."

"I could do it for you inside three hours."

"Very well. So we will be back here by half-past one." She looked at her watch. "Make your horse put his feet to the ground. I will pay you double."

They set out—through the town—then out upon the bleak and bitter wolds, Cécile's chin buried in her fur, her face screwed up shrinkingly at the bleak and parching wind. It was a hard and bold journey for her to take. And why did she take it? She hardly knew. Her stubborn, inborn inquisitiveness, and some deep instinct or presentiment which she could not fathom led her on.

The trap drew up at last at the top of a steep footpath covered over with stones and rubble which led down the hill-side. She got out half frozen.

"The path's rather steep, miss," said the driver, "take care you don't slip. Had I better come and help you down?"

"No, I will contrive," she answered. "Wait you here for me a quarter—half—an hour."

She jerked freely down the slope, and disappeared behind a bluff of rock. At the bottom she came to a fairly smooth path, winding among the bracken and heather along the length of the gully. Above, to the east, she saw the high railway viaduct, and toward this she walked some distance. Farmer Wilson's shanty was partly sheltered by the viaduct, and partly by a shoulder of the hillside, which retired a little at that point from the valley. The little house, with its one-slope roof, nestled sheer beneath the perpendicular rock of the crags. Cécile tapped at the door.

Farmer Wilson, with round blue eyes and open mouth, came at once, gazing at her, thinking her a visitant from the other world.

"Wa'a con a' doo for 'oo, mum?" he asked.

Cécile shot a keen glance at the simple and honest old face, and was satisfied.

"You can give me a glass of milk, sir," she said, "and a bit of bread-and-butter. I have come a long way; my driver told me you live here."

"Walk in, mum; walk in. A coald day over the woalds, a'm thinkin'."

Cécile was soon ensconced by the log-fire in the dingy outer apartment of the cabane. Presently, an old lady with white hair combed low over her forehead brought in, with many smiles and curtesies, a brown mug of milk, new milk, from the farmer's one cow, with brown bread and a lump of cream cheese on a plate.

"And you two live alone here all the time?" asked Cécile.

"Aye, mum," said the farmer, "us, and the two lads, 'ee knoa."

"Your sons?"

"Aye, mum."

"Good boys?"

"O aye, soa-soa, 'fur as thot goes."

"How old?"

"T' youngest is fifteen; Jock's seventeen by now, a'm thinkin'——"; he appealed with a look to his wife for confirmation. She was still standing curtesying and bowing.

"And you two live alone here all the time?"

"Well, farmer, I cannot stay long, as my man waits me with the carriage. Your milk and cheese are excellent," said Cécile, quietly laying a sovereign on the mantel, and rising. The farmer, too, rose.

"Thoo's welcome, a'm sure, mum. T' day's bitter cold o'er t' woalds——"

"Still, one must go," said Cécile. "You have here a very solitary life, Mr. Farmer, a pinched life. Good-bye: I hope your boys give you much comfort and satisfaction."

"O, aye," said the farmer, looking sideways on the ground, "they are soa-soa. A' moon't complain. T' elder has gi'en his heart to t' Lord——"

"His what?"

"His heart, 'ee knoa—his heart to t' Lord. But he's a bit lazy loike, and o'er fond o' dallying in bed o' morning. But a' doan't complain."

"He does not rise very early, yes?"

"Noa—t' poor lad. His mother says his lungs ain't that o'er strong."

"And the younger? He, I hope, is a good son?"

"Oh, as far as that goes, a' doan't complain, 'ee knoa. He is a child o' many prayers. In toime, a' hope he'll see the error o' his ways, and turn to t' Lord. Present, he's a bit sullen loike, and bad-tempered at toimes, and fond o' wandering, and cruel to t' cat——"

"Well, good-bye, Farmer. I hope your sons will be all you wish. But where are they now?"

"They? Oh, Jock's behind the wall there in bed with a bit o' coald. Tom, t' yoonger, 's up the beck looking after a few head o' stock, such as they are, 'ee knoa. Can't I come wi' thee a little way?"

"No, pray do not trouble. I know the path. Once again, good-bye."

Digitized by Google

The farmer held open the door and stood looking after her as she went up the path of the beck till a winding hid her from view. When he turned back into the room he said to his wife, who was looking at the bright sovereign in her palm:

"Thot's a seemly young deam, now, woife? Shoo's fro' foreign parts, I'm thinking. And a bitter day o'er the woalds she'll ha' o' it, too."

"Sic a sweet lady 'a never did see in a' my days!" said Mrs. Wilson with enthusiasm.

Cécile, meanwhile, wound up the path until she came to the steep defile by which she had come down. But instead of climbing up she walked on past it, higher up the gully.

By her side brawled and foamed the black beck among its rocks.

Cécile's eyes went through all the ravine, as far as they could see, with keen outlook, peering behind every rock, searching every thicket.

At last she heard a bleat. And thither she directed her stealthy step.

In a little opening among a clump of holly trees, she spied a little flock, thick-fleeced, and browsing.

A dog ran out to her with a low growl, but she bent down to it, patting and pacifying it. It was appeased, and ran back under the brushwood into the glade, wagging its tail.

When Cécile had crept near, she peered through the growth of bramble, and saw a boy standing with his back towards her. His head was bent down; one arm, stretched somewhat behind him, rested on a rock. From the other hung a large, one-bladed penknife, open.

With utter stealthy slowness, noiseless as a cat, step by step, Cécile approached him. Once, as a twig snapped beneath her feet, Tom half turned his head, but did not see her. His whole attitude was one of listless pensiveness. The boy seemed deep in thought. All at once Cécile was close behind him. With a sudden jerk she had the knife tugged from his fingers, and almost before he could turn to face her, she had said, with rapid breath:

"Tom! the ring, the bracelet, the watch, and the locket!"

It was a perfectly ghastly and pallid face which the boy turned upon her; and a cruel face, too. His fist was raised to strike—a heavy, gnarled fist for one so young. But Cécile's fist, too, was raised—and in it the knife with its bright, sharp blade. The next moment Tom was on his knees, with chattering teeth and staring eyes.

"Tom! the ring, the bracelet, the watch, and the locket!"

He thought he saw before him a spirit—a spirit armed with all knowledge and all power.

He was a very tall boy, with a rather brutal face, and small scowling brow. As he knelt, his head reached almost to Cécile's bosom. But he crouched cowering before the little woman.

"You will give them—now?" she said, the knife still imminent over Tom in her hand.

Tom gulped a "Yes."

"You may get up, then."

She followed him out of the glade, back to the path, and still further up the gully. Tom walked on sullenly before, with bent head, and eyes sidling backwards every now and then. Cécile held the knife.

The boy, at a cleft which ran zig-zag on to the face of the rock of the gulley, turned sharply to the right. Cécile followed him.

He stopped when he had reached a spot where another cleft opened at right angles to the first, and faced her.

"Who art thoo?" he said.

"The two rings, the bracelet, the watch, and the locket," answered Cécile, gazing steadily into his eyes.

The boy flinched before this omniscience, his eyes drooped; he turned and went down the second cleft, Cécile behind him.

He stopped once more at a spot where there was a flat stone leaning half on the rock-side and half on the mould. He stooped to it, lifted it, and nodded his head sullenly in the direction of a small hole which the stone had covered.

"Pick them up," said Cécile.

"There they be," answered Tom. "Pick them up, if thoo wants them."

Cécile held out her gloved palm.

"It is cold," she said. "I cannot wait here all the day long. Put those things into my hand—the two rings, the watch, the——"

Tom stooped with sudden alacrity; and then, slowly, one by one, he put the things upon Cécile's palm.

"Now lead the way back," she said.

He went on before, swinging sullenly with his long legs, pulling twigs out of the rock-side in shame-faced braggadocio. The jewellery was in Cécile's pocket; the knife in her hand.

At the bottom of the steep ascent she called: "Stop!"

Tom stood before her, looking on the ground, munching a blade of grass.

Cécile dived into her pocket for her purse, took out five sovereigns, and held them out to him.

Tom, munching his grass, and looking on the ground, smiled, but made no other movement.

Cécile lifted his heavy red paw, put the money into his palm, and closed his fingers over it. Tom's hand fell back to his side, holding the gold.

"To-morrow," said Cécile, "or some time soon, I want you to come to Hillcrest Lodge—remember the name—and ask to see Cécile Delisle—Cécile—Delisle. You must try to come, see. Will you?"

Tom, looking on the ground, smiled.

"I will keep the knife, lest you stab me as I turn my back. Would you stab me, Tom? I hear you are very cruel to the cat, and you treated that poor lady's body shockingly, you know. But would you stab me, Tom?"

Tom, looking on the ground, smiled.

"Here, take the knife," said Cécile.

He would not take it; she lifted his other hand, and put the knife into it.

"Good-bye, Tom. Do not forget to come. I like you, you know. You can kiss my hand."

She held out her hand, but he would not kiss it. She took hold of the back of his head and ducked it, and made him kiss her hand. Then she ran, toiling, up the hill. At the first bend she looked back, and waved her hand to him.

Digitized by Google

Tom had taken off his broad-brimmed felt hat, and was furiously waving it round his head. Cécile laughed aloud, and three times kissed her hand to him, then turned the corner, and vanished from Tom's sight.

She reached her trap, and drove back over the shivering wolds to the little station, and from thence arrived at Seaborough a little after three.

A few minutes before four she drove up the lawn of Hillcrest Lodge beside Jack Heathcote in the trap. The day had already begun to darken.

* * * * *

It was to be war to the death. The afternoon sun, just setting, saw the four men together, one of them with deadly hate gnawing in his heart, the other with deadly jealousy and immeasurable contempt.

Down through the deeply-shadowed park, at the back of the Lodge, led a path among the mighty old trees, then over a bridge, which crossed a good-sized stream, then on again by a shooting-box of red stone in the forest, then through another dense growth of oaks, elms, and beeches. Here the road forked, and one of the forks, about a mile from the Lodge, led into a very large lawn or open space, shut in by a palisade of huge tree-trunks, and having at one end a broadish sheet of water.

At the extremity opposite to the water was a stone bench, and in the centre a sun-dial.

This was the spot determined upon for the duel, and here at about half-past three arrived Professor Queech, feeling as if he were going to execution; ten minutes later, Danton; and ten minutes after him, Pendragon. Before the stroke of four, Arthur, too, sauntered in, and threw away his cigar.

The question as to a doctor had been settled by a suggestion of Danton.

"He proposes," the Professor had said to Pendragon, "that only one of the pistols be loaded. There will therefore, in that case, be at least one life of the two certain to come safe out of this deplorable affair, sir."

"And how do you propose to arrange the details?" the hussar had asked.

"You, sir, will load one of the pistols, and place the two in a hat held behind your back; I will then take one, and give it to my principal, and you will give the other to yours."

"But suppose," said the Lieutenant, "that the one who has the loaded weapon only wounds, instead of killing the other—we shall still want a doctor?"

"No—it appears not. Dr. Danton says not. I tell you, sir, this is a dreadful business. He says that if the Captain obtains the loaded pistol, there is no chance of a practised shot like the Captain, expert in war, failing to hit a vital spot in so large a man as himself; while if he, Dr. Danton, obtains the loaded weapon, he assures me that there is not even the least chance of a failure of aim. He seems to have acquired a horrible and fiendish coolness and dexterity in the matter of pistols."

"Is that so?"

"It is a dreadful thing, Lieutenant Pendragon. He has fought many duels, it seems, and always with the same success. It is appalling, sir, to think of. At all events, here is no need for doctors, but for grave-diggers—unless some higher Power interposes ——"

Even the soldier sighed.

And so, as the sun went down, the four men met in the glade of the forest.

There was little talk. The disposal of the body was already a settled matter. There was a broadish sheet of water at one end of the glade.

"It is very cold," said Arthur to Pendragon, "pray don't keep me bothering about here."

"Are your nerves steady—your hand?" the Lieutenant said in a whiser.

"My dear boy, don't be absurd," drawled Arthur. "I am not a child. Isn't it confoundedly cold?"

The ground was hard and white, itself stiff-fixed in the rigour of death.

Pendragon took from the pocket of his overcoat a pair of Colt's pistols. One of them was already loaded.

A general movement ensued from the stone bench towards the middle of the opening.

There was a sinister, yellow gleam in the eyes of Danton—a rigidity of stone in his pasty face. He moved ponderously forward, with his imperial between his thumb and forefinger.

"I choose the pitch, you measure," said Pendragon to the Professor.

He looked about, and stood on a spot where the ground ran level.

Pendragon gave the other to Arthur.

"Here," he said.

The short legs of the Professor went stalking out. One, two, three—fifteen—paces.

Where Pendragon had stood, Arthur took his stand. Danton followed the Professor and stood where he stopped.

Midway, Pendragon and the Professor met for the ceremony of the choice of weapons. Pendragon took off his hat, and deposited the weapons in it. Then he put both hands behind his back, holding the hat in them. The Professor went behind him.

Pendragon waited.

The Professor stood on tiptoe and whispered from behind, close to the Lieutenant's ear:

"Oh, this is a shocking thing, sir! What shall I do?"

"Choose—quickly!" cried Pendragon.

Professor Queech gingerly took up one of the weapons, and holding it from him, bore it to Danton. Pendragon gave the other to Arthur. Then each second stood a little way from his principal, on opposite sides of the straight line between them.

Danton put one arm behind his back, and held out the pistol at full length with the other, pointing at Arthur's breast. Arthur, too, pointed at Danton.

"Deuced nuisance!" said Arthur to himself, "I feel shivery all over—such a confoundedly cold day!"

"Are you ready?" sang out Pendragon.

"Yes!"

"All right!"

"Then—one—two—three—fire!"

Arthur pulled his trigger. His aim was straight for the heart of Danton. But the pistol merely clicked.

Danton had not fired. He stood, with a bitter smile, covering his antagonist with the pistol, for full half a minute. Then he lowered it, and cried out:

"May I speak with Captain Musgrave for a moment in private?"

"Certainly not," shouted Arthur, "if you have anything to say, there is my second."

"No—I cannot speak to him. I must fire."

"Speak to him, Arthur—for God's sake, man!" said Pendragon, coming near, trembling in every limb.

"What can he have to say to me?" asked Arthur, with lifted eyebrows.

"Never mind—do!—I beg you!—like a dear chap, do now!"

Digitized by Google

"It's a deuced nuisance," said Arthur. Then he lifted his voice: "All right—meet me half-way."

Half-way he and Danton met.

"I agree to spare your life," said Danton, "on the condition that you leave Hillcrest Lodge to-night, and give me your word of honour never to see or hold any communication of any kind with the lady who is the cause of our quarrel during the rest of your life. Do you consent?"

"My good sir, you are quite certainly a d—— fool," said Arthur, his face the very expression of scorn. "I need not tell you that such a proposition would never have occurred to a gentleman—not even to a French gentleman."

"You decline then?"

"Yes."

"Then resume your place."

The two men returned to the appointed spots. Arthur stood with his arms by his side. Danton levelled his pistol, covering the heart of his rival.

* * *

Jack Heathcote lifted Cécile out of the trap. She threw him a nod and a smile, and ran into the hall, nearly bouncing into Miss Newton's arms.

"Oh, I beg pardon," said Miss Newton, "have you come from outside? I was looking for that tiresome Professor. He promised——"

"No, I have not seen him," said Cécile; "isn't he in the house?"

"He can't be found anywhere. Isn't it too tiresome?"

Cécile ran in, longing for Edith. In her eagerness, as she turned the angle of the corridor, she collided sharply with the Hon. Lily Grandcourt.

"Oh, pardon!" she cried. "I bump with everybody! Do you know where is Edith?"

"I am afraid it was my fault," said the Hon. Lily. "Where has Mr. Pendragon vanished to, do you know?"

"What, he, too?" said Cécile. "That is the second——"

She stopped short. A sudden thought seemed to take her.

"Where now is Captain Musgrave—can you tell?" she asked.

"No—I fancy he is playing truant, too."

"Is Dr. Danton in the house, then?"

"I rather fancy not," said Miss Newton; "I think I heard someone asking for him just now."

"Wait—I must go," cried Cécile.

She ran back out into the hall, down the steps, and out into the snow, which was some inches deep. She bent low down, going quickly over a wide area, examining the ground with her eyes, like a bloodhound sniffing everywhere for the scent of death.

Presently, near the borders of the forest, she cried:

"Yes, this is the way they have gone! Oh, I was silly not to have known it!"

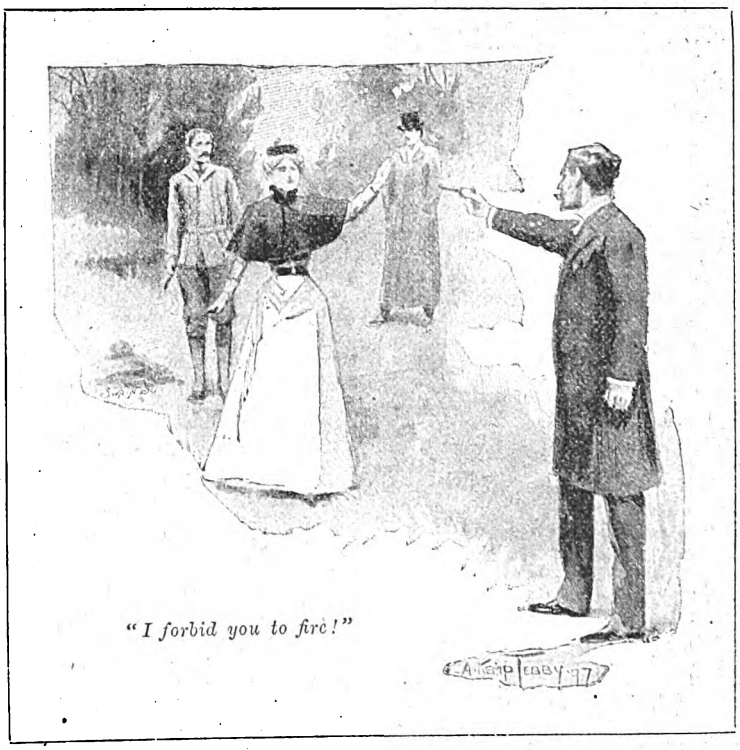
She started running with the lightness of a young roe down the pathway through the park, following the foot-prints in the snow.

* * * * *

Danton levelled his pistol, covering the heart of his rival.

The dusk had deepened, almost to gloom. But he saw his man well, and he was sure of that unerring hand.

He laid his finger to the trigger.



"I forbid you to fire!"

Clear through the still and frosty night rang out, sharp and shrill as a clarion, the sudden and piercing cry:

"I forbid you to fire!"

A figure, with lifted arm, stood between Danton and his prey.

The two seconds ran forward.

Danton's shoulders gave a shrug. His arm dropped.

"Duelling is a crime in this country," cried Cécile. "I refuse to move!"

"Oh, this is a beastly mess!" said Arthur to himself. "I can't stand this, I think."

Pendragon had Cécile by the arm.

"You really must, you know," he said. "This is very inconvenient. You must go, really——"

"No—don't go—stay here," whispered the Professor.

"All right—let her alone," called out Arthur. "Here—I agree to your conditions. I can't stand this dreadful mess with women."

He left his post and approached Danton.

"You agree?" said Danton.

"Yes."

"On your honour?"

"On my honour."

Arthur put his hands in his pockets, and sauntered away. But his heart was breaking.

(To be continued.)

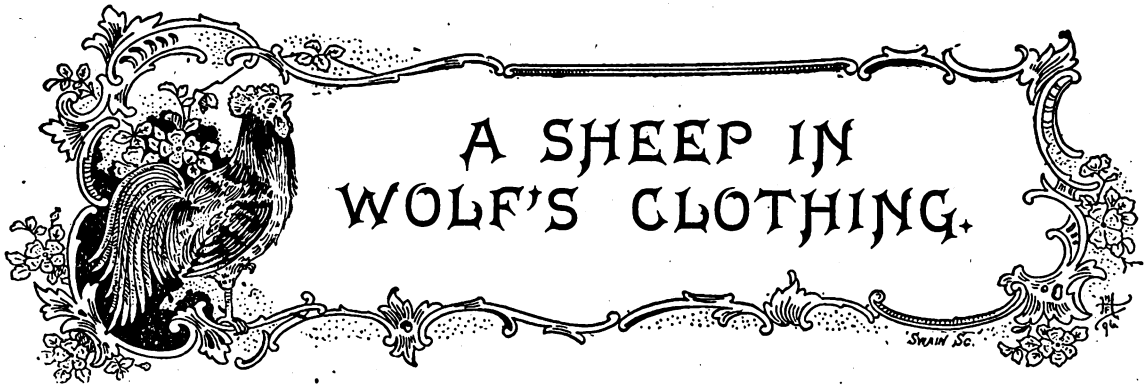
NOTICE.—In the next number of SHORT STORIES will commence a series of stirring historical tales, entitled "Deeds that Won the Empire." The stories will run through at least a dozen numbers, and among the subjects treated will be the Battle of St. Vincent, the Capture of Quebec, the Storming of Badajoz, etc.

Digitized by Google



A SHEEP IN WOLF'S CLOTHING.

The pull is uphill for almost three miles along here, and the horses plod along slowly. The dust is just as deep; but now, instead of blowing off to leeward, as it did a while ago, it hangs close round the stage in a thick, dense, reddish-yellow cloud, almost shutting off the view from the passengers inside, if they cared to look out.

But the beauties of Nature hold their interest only slightly just at present. The dust occupies their attention to a large extent. It fills their mouths, and eyes, and nostrils, and clings to their hair and ears in much profusion. It is disagreeable—very—and the man who has enough spirit left to try and keep up the conversation is voted an ass by his fellow-passengers. They were all very friendly only a short time ago; but they hate each other with a bitter hatred just now—all on account of the dust.

A mile or so back the sun shines brightly on the cañon road, making it look like a long, yellow ribbon; but just ahead the shadow of the mountain on the west, which seems to close the upper end of the pass, cuts the light off in an odd, abrupt way, and presently we shall be in comparative darkness, for the edge of the heavy timber is only a little distance before us.

Somehow the dust doesn't rise very high, or else the driver and the passenger on the box don't mind it, for we can hear them talking. Old Ben, through some unseen but easily imagined influence, has relaxed from his usual taciturnity, and is quite communicative to the beardless, boyish-looking young chap who had got on at Alpena and is sharing the box with him.

As the stage reaches the level and rolls into the shadows of the mountain and the tall pines, Ben points with the whip to the mouth of the narrow pass leading out of the cañon a quarter of a mile away, and remarks:

"See them two big rocks—road runs b'tween 'em? Uh-huh! Wal, right that—mebbe a couple rods 'r so fu'ther on—was whar I was held up one day in th' summer of '76."

"Yes?" said the passenger voice interrogatively. "Would you mind telling me about it?"

Ben chirped to his horses and began:

"Wal, 'twuz this a-way. That mornin' th' 'xpress-box was loaded plumb full o' hard stuff th't hed t' go through that day. Now, jes' 'z luck'd hev' it, one o' the gyards—we had them days—turned up missin' 'bout th' time we was readt t' start fr'm Eldorado in th' mornin'. Berry McNeill, th' other gyard goes arter 'im, an' fin's Mr. Man laid up with a gash in th' head fr'm a beer-bottle—be'n scrappin' night b'fore.

"Th' agent an' me was thinkin' pow'ful 'bout who we c'd git t' take Hauser's place ef he was sick, w'en hyar comes Mac, whistlin'.

"'Say, fellers,' says he. 'Hauser got plunked with a bottle las' night, an' is layin' on his downy couch with a headache. Reckon I c'n go it b' my lonesome. I got Hauser's sawed-off gun.'

"We both kicked a whole lot, but Mac, he'd made up his min', an' was boun' t' hev' his own way. B'sides, we didn't hev' no one right handy t' go 'long, so we hed t' give in, an' Mac, whistlin' one o' his everlastin' toons, piles up on th' box, an' we pulls out. They wa'n't no passengers.

"Wal, we kept our peepers skun right sharp, but ev'rythin' went lovely till jes' long 'bout hyar. Then Mac says: 'Ben, I b'lieve they's some cusses layin' for us up b' them rocks—I think I seen a feller's head, jes' now.' Say I: 'Mac, y're full o' hop. I seen it, too, an' 'twa'n't nothin' but a hawk, crossin' the road.'

"I stirred up the critters a bit, howsomever, but jes'z we turned th' rocks, somebody jumps out fr'm both sides an' nails th' leaders, an' they was so many guns starin' intuh my face th't it made me ashamed o' myself. Mac cut loose wi' th' sawed-off shot-gun, an' then begun wi' th' Winchister, gittin' two fellers an' skinnin' up some more—but they was too darn many of 'em, an' they c'd shoot, too, so Mac he never got no chance t' pump that gun dry. He oughtn't t' hev' shot, nohow, but he allus was a nervy cuss—more nerve'n sense. I use ter say. 'Mac——'"

Half-a-dozen dusky forms leap from the road-side—the big cowboy who got aboard early in the afternoon, and has been dozing and swearing in a sleepy way about the dust, is suddenly wide awake, and we, on the inside, get a good look at the muzzles of his two big revolvers. We hear Ben ejaculate: "Wal, this do beat all!" and then we are invited to get down into the road, where the pleasant-faced, boyish-looking young man who got on at Alpena proceeds to business, and politely, courteously, but firmly withal, relieves us of our spare change—and more, too.

* * * * *

That is my part of the story. Of course, there were quite a number of other people present, including the youthful highwayman and his capable assistants, and they also have a claim on the above narrative. I did not mean that I owned it; what I tried to say was that that is the only one of the events from which come this veracious tale that I took part in, and I think it has been shown that my part was entirely a passive one. Perhaps we had better call that portion of the story the gentlemanly road-agent's, because he got about everything else there was to get. The rest is Hallegan's.

Hallegan and I were travelling together, and it was his foresight—or, rather, an odd notion of his—that enabled us to resume our journey to Denver after the road-agent incident. This odd notion was in the form of a thin chamois incole, which he wore in his left boot, and which, in addition to a card giving directions for the disposition of his body in case he should suddenly be called hence while among strangers, contained a fifty-dollar bill. It was an ordinary fifty-dollar bill, but when Terence flashed it before my dazzled eyes in the hotel at Merrill that night I was quite sure that it was larger and more valuable. It took us to Leadville anyway, and that was all we could reasonably desire.

Digitized by Google

But for the rest of the story:

It was about two years after the road-agent affair, in which we lost almost everything but our good names and the clothing we wore, when one day I was thunderstruck to receive Hallegan's wedding-card. It was the first time I had heard from him for a year, and had anyone else told me Terence Hallegan was a marrying man I should have derided him; but when Terence himself, in his own peculiar chirography, directed to me an envelope containing such startling news, all set forth in the highest style of the engraver's art—well, it was too much, and I went down into the camp, where surcease of sorrow was obtainable in quantities to suit the purchaser, and where there was a full score of Terence's friends and acquaintances to toast his memory and condole with each other. And grief was our lot until the day of Jewett "struck it" in that hole he had been pegging away at over on the other side of the gulch, and excitement reigned supreme.

In the midst of the confusion, telegrams came and went, flying—brought and sent by special courier to and from the office at Sunrise, nine miles away; and one day came one for him who sits here burning the nocturnal oil. It was from Hallegan, who was now living in Chicago, and summoned me to hasten to that city, where I was needed to assist in closing in transactions involving the sale of some mining property in which Terence and I were interested.

Terence met me at the station. He looked remarkably well, even for a person whose health and spirits had always been of the very best, and I told him so, adding that in deponent's opinion he must have drawn a capital prize in the matrimonial lottery.

He smiled happily, and took my arm to walk outside the train enclosure, as he said:

"That I did—that I did, me boy; just wait till you see her, and you'll be sure of it."

He called a cab, gave the driver some brief instructions, and leapt in after me. We rode for several minutes in silence; then Hallegan turned to me in a rather embarrassed way, and said, in a strained tone:

"Billy, me boy—it's very near dinner-time at our house—and there's no time for—explanation. Only—if you think you've seen—my wife—if her face is familiar—please don't mention it, or act as though you noticed it. I'll explain after dinner."

I acquiesced wonderingly, and wondered yet more after I had met Mrs. Hallegan, for I was quite positive that I had never seen her before, and there was ample opportunity during the course of the excellent dinner we presently sat down to, to study her. She was slightly above the medium height, and of a perfect, though rather slight, figure. Her hair and eyes were dark, setting off excellently her clear olive complexion, and her features were all that an artist could desire. She was hardly what one would call a beautiful woman, however. "Handsome" would be the better word—or, perhaps, "striking." There was something about the firm set of her mouth when not speaking, and the rather masculine chin—in which, oddly enough, there was a charmingly feminine dimple—that caused this effect, I think. One would never have taken Mrs. Hallegan for the daughter of the little, white-haired, sweet-faced old lady who sat opposite me, and who she addressed as "mother."

No, I had never seen her up to half-an-hour ago, so I gave up studying her and fell to wondering what Hallegan was going to "explain."

Dinner over, the ladies rose to leave us, smiling over the broad hint Terence had just thrown out concerning a desire to smoke. As they reached the door, Mrs. Hallegan turned and bowed mockingly to her husband, whose hand was just reaching for the bell. "I hope, Sir Terence, that the cigars may prove dry company." Then, with a bright smile, she vanished.

I flopped into my chair breathlessly. Where had I seen that mocking brow? Then suddenly there came before me that little scene in the mountains two years since; the dust, the heat, the sleepy cowboy inside the coach, the dapper little chap who so politely took our money and watches. He bowed just that way when he finished his work and departed. "Her brother," I thought—"black sheep, blot on family escutcheon. How much they resemble——"

"Well, me boy?"

Hallegan was looking at me quizzically through the smoke, we having lighted our cigars meanwhile. I suppose I looked embarrassed. Of course, it was all rot; the idea of there being any connection, however remote, between the stately creature who had just left us and the little rascal who engineered that hold-up!

Hallegan spoke:

"Billy, me boy, I won't make a short story any longer than is necessary. You remember the little fellow who held us up two years ago?"

"Of course I do."

"Yes, very likely. Well, I fancy I'd better begin at the beginning.

"Three years ago, a young fellow named Wilson, who had been employed as cashier by the L. and A. Stage Express Company got into trouble over his accounts. The manager—Robinson—charged him with a shortage amounting to several thousand dollars. There was an investigation, and, on the strength of certain circumstantial evidence which need not be stated, as it is immaterial, backed by the testimony of Robinson, the manager, Tweedy, the superintendent, and Frank Robinson, son of the manager—who, by-the-way, had always been Wilson's bosom friend—the cashier was convicted on trial, and sentenced to a long term at Cañon City. Strange to say, he offered no testimony and made no defence, except his plea of 'not guilty.'

"Well, it killed him. Inside of a year the worry and disgrace, along with the hard work and close confinement—he had never been very strong—had wasted him to a shadow, and when, at last, he knew he couldn't live very long, he sent for his mother and sisters to come to him.

"His mother was too ill herself to travel, and one of the sisters—a cripple—was obliged to remain with her, but the elder sister went.

"She found him dying—dying in prison. It was the first she had known of his trouble, and, naturally, she was terribly shocked.

"He told her the true story of the affair, that young Robinson, between whom and himself had existed a sort of Damon and Pythias friendship, was the guilty one; and how, when some of the stockholders got wind of the shortage, the two Robinsons and Tweedy, who was a brother-in-law of old Robinson, had conspired to shield the guilty man by sacrificing an innocent one who would not defend himself. The confession made by the dying man was not altogether a voluntary one. His sister, who had known nothing except that he was innocent, caught a hint of the truth from him when he was raving in delirium—the rest she made him tell her.

Digitized by Google

"After young Wilson's death, his sister went quietly to work to see what could be done to prove her brother's innocence and to place the guilt where it belonged, but soon found that nothing could be proved. The Robinsons were too strong for her.

"About this time Mrs. Wilson and her youngest daughter were obliged to go to South Dakota on account of ill-health, leaving the elder daughter, who was studying medicine, here in Chicago. Not long after this the hold-ups on the different lines of the L. and A. began. For the first few times there was only one road-agent—a little chap, but a nervy one, who got talked about by the papers a good deal—but pretty soon there were others, until a band of about eight or nine had organised, under the little fellow's leadership, and they made life a burden to the L. and A people. It made no difference what precautions the company took, or how many guards it employed, the road-agents were too smart, and the boldest kind of hold-ups were successfully made—and, by Jove! it 'busted' the company's business.

"The L. and A. wasn't a heavy concern, of course, but had always made a good deal of money. The frequent hold-ups on its lines, though, proved a settler. It wasn't long before nobody would ship or travel over any of the L. and A. Company's lines unless actually obliged to, and the company was kept pretty busy settling the losses of its customers. Then came the crash, and somehow people began to suspect that the Robinsons had not run things as they should have been handled, and the stockholders investigated. Old Robinson died in disgrace shortly afterwards. The young man took all he could lay hands on and skipped, but was caught at Santa Fé. He's where he should be—at Cañon City. Tweedy got off on a technicality.

"About seven or eight months after we were held up, a stage full of fellows, including myself, was stopped and relieved one afternoon, about ten miles from Milliken, on the old Mule-shoe Trail. The young fellow was one of the robbers—I knew him in spite of his mask. There were only four of the road-agents on this occasion.

"They pulled out, leaving us orders not to touch our arms (which they had stacked on the ground) for twenty minutes, under the penalty of getting shot. But one of our party was a devil-may-care chap, and no sooner were the bandits gone than he walked right over to the pile of guns and picked his out, remarking that he 'didn't believe there were any road-agents around just then.' And there weren't.

"Well, the result of this fellow's foolhardiness was that we concluded it would be money in our pockets to get on the trail of those four road-agents, so we started after them, separating a little distance from each other. We followed them all the afternoon, but couldn't find a trace.

"You know how the old Mule-shoe Trail is? Well, the driver had gone on, agreeing to meet us on the other side of the Shoe—it is only three or four miles across.

"I was just about making up my mind to join the other fellows, and had stopped to think of the best way to cross the creek, when I heard a queer sound, like a woman sobbing. I looked cautiously around, and there, within two rods of me, was the young road-agent, crying as if his heart would break. There was nobody else there, it was plain to be seen, so I quietly sneaked up and requested him to throw up his hands.

"Did you ever hear a woman scream at the sight of a mouse? That's just the way this young fellow screamed when he saw the muzzle of my gun—and I, as soon as I saw the scared, tearful face turned to mine, knew as well as I know now that the famous bandit known as 'Foxey' was only a woman.

"She seemed to trust me, somehow, and pretty soon I had the whole story from her. Then I sat down and talked to her like a brother; and the result was that next day the road-agents missed their leader, and, inside of a fortnight, Miss Jean Wilson was back here in Chicago at her studies again.

"I need not say that this gentle bandit, who ruined the business of the L. and A. Company, took not one cent. of the proceeds, and never permitted any of the band to interfere with Uncle Sam's mail. The latter fact accounts, in a measure, for their success, for Uncle Sam is a bad man to interfere with. The former fact, I think, had to do, to some extent, with the strong hold which 'Foxey' had over his subordinates, although they must have had a good deal of faith in his demonstrated ability as an executive. The band was broken up not long after 'Foxey's' disappearance, and three of the men were caught; but they didn't know any more concerning their mysterious ex-chief than did the public at large."

"And—and Miss Wilson is——"

Hallegan's eyes twinkled: "Is waiting for us. Let us join her," he said.

R. L. Ketchum.

RESULT OF JUMBLE STORY.

No. 29.

The first prize of £5 goes to A. S. Holland, Worcester College, Oxford.

The following receive £1 each: Mrs. Leithead, 11, Lower Bridge Street, Chester; T. M. Hughes, 60, George Street, Altrincham, Cheshire; W. Pontin, Stubbington, near Forcham, Hants.

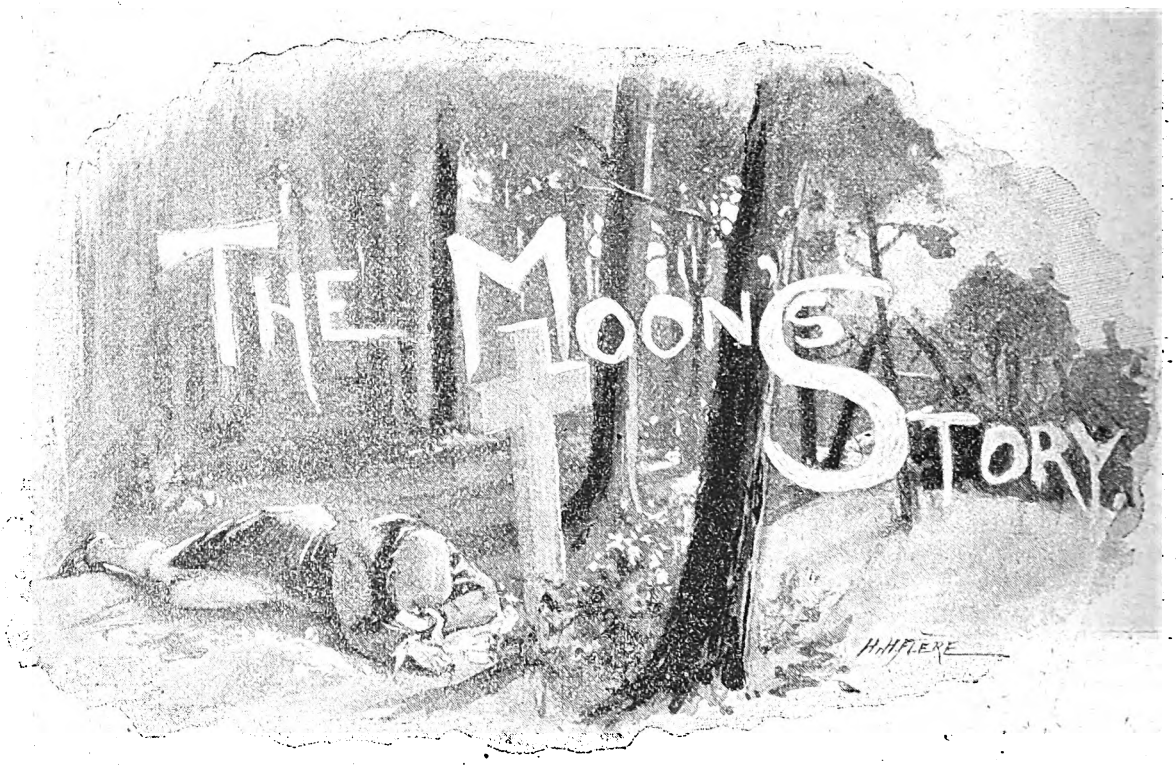
£2 has gone to Mrs. G. F. Healey, 3, Montrose Terrace, Ranelagh, co. Dublin.

THE KEY.

Title: "FAR ABOVE THE STAIRS."

76	9	112	101	15	5	114	30	61
7	1	111	83	25	120	125	29	106
70	12	50	126	18	43	103	41	31
86	2	104	68	60	17	36	46	54
23	107	89	108	71	57	121	92	98
33	84	62	132	51	42	44	53	95
6	3	59	117	38	20	58	49	96
19	10	77	81	100	56	85	45	94
11	52	24	130	87	40	127	90	91
97	28	16	116	14	69	55	63	27
37	13	115	39	64	35	119	79	93
82	102	109	26	80	22	131	65	4
99	113	72	32	105	74	124	88
34	123	73	48	118	75	66	128
8	129	122	78	21	110	67	47

Digitized by Google



"Never morning wore to evening but some heart did break."

YES, I am very, very old—so old that at times I almost lose count of my own years.

Many centuries I have thrown a pale light over your world, for I am marvellously fond of it—of its beautiful fields and forests, of its quiet hills and mountains, of its lakes, rivers, and valleys; I love them one and all, and they look, oh, so fair when wrapped in my pure embrace, that seems to sweep off all the glamour and heat of the merciless day. Is it not so, ye human spirits? Does not an infinite peace fall upon you when you stand in the night, and lift your tired faces to my softening rays?

Ah, if you did but know the secrets that I could unfold, the tales I could tell, of sad partings and bitter tears, of sweet vows, now, alas, forgotten and dead! But fear not; it is the dearest part of my lonely old life to see lovers wander trustfully out under my light, and whisper the old story that, though I have heard from times immemorial, never falls with less sweetness on my listening ear. Yes, the old man in the moon has ears, though you do not know it—large, sharp ears, that hear every foolish whisper that you guard so secretly. But he is a kindly old fellow, and very rarely betrays confidence until your eyes are closed in everlasting sleep and no word of his can harm the cold stillness of your hearts.

We all have favourites, I suppose; so I shall not be blamed if I plead guilty, and own that some forms linger longer in my memory than others.

It is a woman I am thinking of now, a beautiful girl such as we all used to know and love long ago, a tall, lissom creature, with the passion of the South in her eyes, and the beauty of heaven in her face. She wore soft, clinging gowns of white, that fell in straight folds to her feet, with high satin puffs on the shoulders. Her night-shaded hair lay in waves over her ears something as they wear it to-day but with a difference. She was nothing like the end-of-the-century girl, "the new woman," so to speak, who cares so little for moonlight, sentiment and love; her every movement was replete with that exquisite clinging womanliness that seemed then as much a part of the woman as the air she breathed. She would come on the porch of her homestead, and in the still of the night wander through the grounds; never alone.

As I have said she was supremely beautiful, with the beauty of those days; and so she had lovers by the score.

I have often wondered what subtle charm it was that brought all men to her feet, a magnetism that none could resist, but it was there, and, strange as it may seem, I have never known her face to flush with an answering thrill. She seemed to be wearing her life out dreaming and waiting for a love that should answer the craving of her soul—a love I feared she would not find in your world of unsatisfied desires. Her own heart was lying dormant, waiting for the touch of a magic hand, and at last it came, as it must to us all some day.

How well I remember the night! It was an early summer. I had risen slowly to my full height, and the garden lay beneath wrapped in a dead whiteness that seemed to make even the sleepy flowers lift their heads, thinking that dawn had crept upon them unawares.

She came at last, stepping out into the fuller light with her old regal carriage. By her side was the dark figure of a man, his head hidden in the shadow, but his face uplifted, and in her eyes I read the look I had been watching for so long—deep and heavy, but warmed with a glow that seemed to transfigure her features. It was the birth of love, and he had found a glorious cradle in her heart.

Digitized by Google

They moved slowly onward, and I saw him bend and whisper to her in very soft, low tones. She smiled, and reluctantly took the white jasmine that had been lying in her hair and held it towards him.

"Do you not like the odour?" she questioned wonderingly. "I think it is the sweetest of all flowers," she continued, and with a quick gesture she raised the blossom to his face.

There was a dead silence for a moment, then a heavy frown swept over his brow, and with a fierce gesture he tore the flower from her hand and, throwing it upon the ground, placed his foot heavily upon its delicate white petals. The crushed perfume was wafted to me, and seemed to dull my senses. Only dimly did I hear her faint cry of astonished wonder, and his quick apologies, for as I looked down at the dark face of the man, the scent of that jasmine was recalling a scene in a far-off country. I saw a lonely grave under tall pine trees, and, shaded by their branches, a man's form in mad anguish across the turf—in his clenched hands a wreath of white flowers. I can smell the faint, deathly perfume even now, and hear his sobs, rendered heavy by the stillness of the night. Then, as suddenly as the picture came it faded, and I was again looking at the garden, at the stern face of the man of this hour, and it was not strange; they were one and the same!

Ah, the pity of it. I would have cried aloud to warn her; but, as is my wont, according to Nature, remained silent, and she passed on in innocent happiness.

Well, the days crept on all too swiftly for her. Each evening seemed happier than the preceding one; every power that she possessed was strained to the utmost to win the lightest regard; and, strange to say, one as sensitive as she to impressions failed to notice that his heart did not speak through the words of love breathed so carelessly in her ear.

A little contents a woman when she is blinded by her own all-absorbing affection; and so Daphne was happy! And when, one evening, I saw him clasp her in his arms and ask her to be his wife, I knew that, come what might hereafter, that moment of incomparable ecstasy would outweigh all future sorrow. Almost in shame, I saw her wrap her white arms round his throat, and lift a face stamped with a great love that neither time nor change could efface.

Perhaps her heaven was then; who can tell? I only know that it did not last. There were a few happy weeks, and then the old restless look, that I had seen before, settled down on his face, and I knew that her frail hold upon him had snapped and her misery had begun.

Poor child! hardly a month had passed since their betrothal, when he murmured vague excuses, pleaded business, etc., and was off to his home, promising to return ere one moon had come and gone.

Ah, the frailty of man's vows!

She waited patiently, as the long days passed and grew into weeks and months, her faith in him never failing—the pure, strong faith of a dumb brute that is seldom rewarded.

He came not!

Each night I would watch her wander into the garden, always alone now; her face paler and very thin, in her eyes a strange, questioning look of fear—a fear she would not acknowledge even to herself.

The summer was well-nigh gone, when one evening, near the end of August, she came as usual to the garden. I was startled at the terrible change in her face; heavy shadows lay under her eyes, and the pallor of her skin was intensified by the black hair which had been caught up in a careless knot at the back of her head, held only by a slender gold dagger; hanging thus loosely round her brow, it seemed to make more pronounced the sadness lurking there.

She wandered down to the little lake which lies at the end of the garden, and stood, her hands clasped listlessly before her, gazing at the dark, still water. Hours may have passed, minutes or seconds—I took no heed of time—when there was a quick step on the grass, and a man's form emerged into the fuller light. The sound seemed to arouse the still figure; slowly Daphne raised her head and looked into his face. She did not move, but over her brow came a great wave of joy.

She held out her arms mutely; then with a gasping cry rushed forward and flung herself upon his breast. Her whole soul seemed to pass into that one embrace; she lay sobbing and whispering his name again and again, in painful ecstasy; her white hands caressing his throat and hair with touch tender as a mother's. But the man was silent, and the moments

Gazing at the dark, still water.

Digitized by Google

He stood leaning against the bench.

passed. Then I saw him lift her arms from about his neck and put her from him, gently, but with stern determination.

"What is it?" she whispered, her fingers still clinging to his, her eyes questioning his face: "Paul, tell me!"

"Tell you," he said roughly, and even in the dim light I could see the great whiteness of his brow, "aye, that is it. There is only one thing left to tell you now—that I am a cowardly scoundrel, and that I have come to ask you to give me back my promise, to set me free." He spoke quickly and brutally, as if he feared his own strength.

"To set you free," she repeated, in a low, moaning tone. "I do not understand." Her hands dropped, but her eyes still dwelt on his face.

He shifted awkwardly, but could not speak.

"What is it that you mean?" she reiterated.

"For Heaven's sake, Daphne, do not make me say it again," he burst forth impulsively. "Is not once enough?"

Then she seemed to awaken to his full meaning.

"It is enough," she said passionately; "but Paul, Paul, I cannot believe you; my ears have deceived me." She took his face between both her hands and forced him to meet her gaze. "Tell me again," she whispered feverishly, "with your eyes looking into mine. No, you need not be afraid, I am not angry, only unbelieving. Oh, my love, it is not true."

He was silent; her eyes burnt into his. "Speak," she repeated pleadingly, "is it true?"

He tore his face from her hands and turned away. "I cannot," he muttered despairingly; "you will never forgive me."

"Forgive you," she said, stepping towards him, her face aflame with sudden anger, "it is true, then—true that my lover of a few short months is weary of his pretty plaything so soon, is ready to cast it away because it pleases him no longer. Great Heavens! what have I done to endure so terrible a humiliation? What awful fate forces me to love a man so base?"

"You cannot say anything that will be too hard for me to bear," he said sullenly; "I have condemned myself enough."

"Enough! Could it ever be enough?" she cried in fierce passion. "What condemnation would be too hard for you—you, who came here, and, day by day and hour by hour, won my love with your false words, only to cast it aside when the novelty wore off, as if it were a worth'ess thing? Did you never think, in your careless pleasure, of the heart you were breaking, and the life you would wreck?"

He turned to her pleadingly. "I can only ask you to forgive me."

"Never mention that word to me again," she cried fiercely. "Forgive you! I do not wonder that you shrink before me; it seems one look from my eyes would be enough to lay you dead."

"If I could have died, I would have done so long ago," he said sadly. "Could you know what it was to have the being you loved best on earth cold and still in your arms, you would not speak of death."

"I could have looked with peace upon your dead face," she answered calmly, "rather than have known you as you are—to have had my idol shattered."

"Did you make an idol of me, Daphne? Ah, child, I know how far I am from that, and when I think of the pain I have caused you through my brutal selfishness, I feel that the grave indeed would be too good a place for me."

"Why did you do it?" she cried despairingly. "Why did you do it? I loved you so!"

"Aye that is it," he answered gloomily. "Love, that one passion, is the root of half the woe in the world; it drives us mad, it tears away our peace of mind, it shows us the fulness of happiness only to intensify the misery that is sure to come; it——"

She interrupted him with a quick, anguished gesture.

"Do not speak against it," she said slowly. "It has brought me misery, I own, but it has also taught me what life was. I cannot hear you malign the only pure sentiment left on earth."

Her voice sank in a sob; he looked at her intently for a moment, then, taking one of her hands in his, "Daphne," he said, "I have done you the greatest wrong man can do a woman, and there is no excuse for me; but I want you to listen to my story—to let me tell you why I hate the name of love."

"Some other time," she murmured faintly. "I am tired now."

He took her hand quietly, and led her to a rustic seat,

Digitized by Google

stubborn determination in his face; she knew those lines well, poor child, and did not make further protest; her hands only clasped each other convulsively, and she whispered: "Tell me quickly."

He stood leaning against the bench, gazing out into the darkness a few moments; when he spoke, his voice sounded harsh and unnatural.

"It is not a pretty story," he said, "nor is it one that is easy for me to tell, feeling as I do the ignoble part I have played towards you. It only shows me in darker colours, and will serve to thoroughly disenchant you—at least, I pray so. I have been a weak, pitiful coward all along, Daphne, and, as you said, should be ashamed to stand here before the greatness of your faith and purity."

He paused. "Go on," she said feverishly, "tell me everything."

"It is the old, old story of a man's mad love for a woman," he continued. "In my case she was not particularly good or beautiful; but I loved her. Heavens! talk of worship, of wild, slavish idolatry! I felt it then. She held my heart in her small fingers, but she treated it gently; she, too, loved me. Well, I will not make it long; for one short year we lived in paradise on earth. The world seemed too small to hold our happiness; we were drunk, mad, with the sweetness of our life. It could not last. I have often thought of those mournful words from Annabel Lee, how true they are! 'The angels, not half so happy in heaven, were envying her and me.'"

He sighed heavily, and Daphne with mute agony covered her face with her hands; but he did not heed her, he was lost in selfish pain of his own.

"Yes, they envied us," he went on, "envied poor human mortals even a taste of heavenly bliss; for Death came down one evening and laid his cold hand upon her brow and chilled her in my very arms.

"She was stricken with a terrible fever, and in twenty-four hours lay dead on my breast. Good Heavens! if I could have died, that moment would have killed me. But no, I lived on, to lay her still form in the grave, to call eternally upon her name, and hear only the mad echo of my own voice; to pray wildly for the mercy of death, and have it denied me. I was punished in that moment for all my sins, past and future." He paused a moment and let his eyes rest on the crushed, pitiful figure at his side.

"You once wondered why I bore such an aversion to flowers," he continued. "She worshipped them, and on her grave were great wreaths of white jasmine. Their odour even now drives me mad." He shivered and drew his hands across his eyes. The dark water rippling at their feet was the only sound to disturb the absolute silence, and his voice died away. He went nearer and took one of her hands in his.

"Daphne," he said gently, "my life is buried in that grave. For seven long years I wandered like one possessed from clime to clime, trying to find peace and rest, but in vain; then I met you, and as I looked at your beautiful face I felt that I might again know happiness, and that, in a new love, I could forget the past."

"Do not go on," she interrupted piteously; "I know the rest."

"You know the most of it," he said firmly, "but not all. I strove to be true to you, but when I held you in my arms, her face seemed ever to come between us; when I whispered words of love her voice seemed to be crying out in reproach. I could not rest or sleep, for at night her mournful eyes were gazing at me in the darkness like two lost souls; I was haunted, possessed; then I thought if I could go again to her grave and see the spot where all that remained of her loved body lay, this terrible phantom would leave me. You know how restless and dissatisfied I was then, how I pleaded groundless excuses and hurried away. But it was all of no use." His face paled, and he moved further away. "I can hear her voice now," he whispered distractedly, "calling, calling, always ringing in my ears. I can see her face. See!" he grasped Daphne's arm roughly, and drew her nearer to the lake, "see two great eyes, her eyes, looking at me, looking in reproach? Oh, Heavens, it will drive me mad!"

He covered his face with his hands in shivering terror.

He grasped Daphne's arm roughly.

Digitized by Google

The woman's voice broke the oppressive stillness.

"We are quite alone," she said calmly, "your senses are deceiving you, I see nothing. This scene has lasted long enough, we are both overwrought," she pressed her hands hard against her breast. "You must go now," she continued, still calmly; "but first, I give you your full freedom. God knows I would not hold you to your promise a moment after this."

He caught her hands. "Can you forgive me?" he whispered brokenly, "can you forgive me, Daphne, for spoiling your life?"

For a moment her eyes dwelt on his with the light of her great love shining through them.

"Yes," she answered gently, "I can forgive, and I will not utter one reproach. I think God has laid a heavy enough punishment upon you already for your infidelity. We will never meet again; take this and go." She drew from her trembling finger her diamond betrothal ring, and held it towards him in the dim light.

"I cannot take it," he muttered, shuddering.

She drew her head up haughtily. "I certainly will not keep it," she said, and she laid the glittering trinket in his hand.

"Then let it go where it belongs," he said roughly, and with a sudden passion flung the gem into the water, where it fell with a splash and vanished from sight, leaving only a tiny eddying circle to speak of its resting place. For a second Daphne gazed at the spot with wide anguished eyes; then a moaning cry of agony rang out on the evening air as she flung herself heavily upon her lover's breast, wrapping her bare arms passionately round his throat in eternal farewell.

Merciful Providence! that such misery should endure for the innocent! I listened painfully to her faint voice whispering his name over and over; I saw her trembling hands push back the dark hair from his brow and gaze long into his face, her lips quivering with anguish, and —I cursed mankind.

He, too, was touched, for he held her tenderly, and repeated again: "Forgive me."

And again she answered: "Yes, freely and fully."

He raised her bent head and pressed a last cold kiss on her brow. "Good-bye," he said brokenly. "Good-bye," she repeated after him mechanically; but she did not move from his embrace, and it seemed hours that she lay there in still silence. I began to have a terrible fear of I know not what, when she at last raised her head and tore her arms from round his neck.

"Go, now," she said, in a husky voice, "go quickly."

He lingered.

"Go," she commanded again, passionately this time, "and I will pray God to bring you peace and rest." She pressed her hands against her eyes heavily; and when she at last dropped them, the sound of his footsteps had died away, and she was alone.

Her hands went instinctively to her side, as a spasm of pain contracted her face, and her lips grew quite blue. She stood thus in silence for some moments, when a twig breaking somewhere aroused her. She suddenly stretched her arms out wildly to the unresponsive air. "Paul! Paul! Paul!" The very stars seemed to shudder, as with a gasping cry, her heart broke, and she fell heavily forward on the damp grass—her head hitting against one of the huge stones that fenced in the lake, her long hair dripping into the slumbering waters.

Crushed and broken like a delicate flower by the ruthless hand of man, she lay there; and in infinite pity I guarded her until the first messenger of dawn came and drove me away.

The next night I rose and looked down upon the garden. All was still as death; no dainty figure moved in and out among the trees, and a dire foreboding came over me; impatiently I shone over the great, still house; all was dark within. No sound of life came to allay my fears. At last I found a crevice in one of the lower casement windows, and crept in. The room was dark and heavy with the scent of flowers. At first I could see nothing, but soon my light fell upon a bier draped all in snowy white. Upon it lay a form composed for Death—a beautiful, motionless figure, covered with perfumed blossoms. It was Daphne.

Her tired hands were crossed upon her breast, her sad eyes closed for ever. Never more would they look in joy or sorrow on the world wherein she had learnt her lesson of misery; even the wreath of jasmine, twined by loving fingers in her hair, could not mar the peace of her eternal sleep; and in my infinite pity I let one small ray of the light she had loved fall across her lips like a kiss.

All was still, the ghostly silence of a death chamber, when suddenly the door was opened, and a man's form groped through the darkness of the room. I caught one glimpse of a face drawn with terrible remorse, before he flung himself down beside the quiet form and bent his head. I almost felt her form tremble beneath his touch, but the heavenly calm of her face changed not. She was at rest; but upon his darkened brow I seemed to see branded the shadow of two graves—one newly-made, and soon forgotten.

A man's heavy sobs broke the stillness. I hid my face behind a cloud and saw no more.

Leigh Ford.

Jumbled Picture Competition.

No. 1.

Cut out the figures portrayed in the sketches contained in this number and paste them up to form one picture. £2 2s. will go to the reader whose attempt is considered the cleverest, and a bottle of HOME NOTES BOUQUET to each of the five next. Date of closing: Monday, March 1st, 1897.

How to Make an Income of £5 a Minute.

The income of the Duke of Westminster is over five shillings a minute, day and night, all the year round.

This may be something of an eye-opener to many people, but there is really nothing very extraordinary in it.

We are prepared to pay £5 a minute to the four persons who collect the greatest number of coupons from Short Stories, P.W., and Home Notes, during 1897.

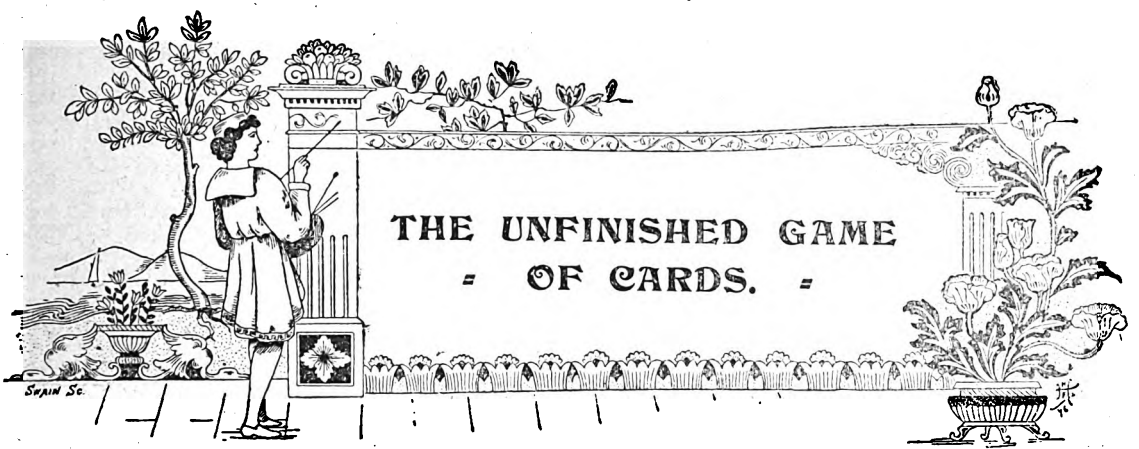
True, we should only keep up the rate for about twenty minutes, but think of your sensations during that blissful period.

The way to secure this tremendous income is simplicity itself. You collect the coupons published in Short Stories, P.W., and Home Notes, and in January, 1898, we will exchange these slips of paper for gold, provided that your collection is big enough.

Full particulars have already been published, and will appear again shortly.

Digitized by Google



The old château, dark against an after-sunset sky, and veiled by tall reeds, which, from my low point of view, seemed high as itself, loomed up before me. It was big and square, this château, with towers, and toppling chimneys, and many windows. About it stood a guard of ancient trees, some in full leaf, others half-dead, and others again, quite dead, but still on duty; in one was a ragged eagle's nest, with the old birds hanging over.

What silence! What loneliness! An old house, deserted and fallen to decay; a strip of marsh, intensely green in the pale yellow light; a wan and weary moon, gazing at the world through a purple mist. A water-bird started noisily from among the reeds and flew shrieking over my head out of sight; a moment later I heard its wings dip in the still water half a mile away.

I wedged the sharp prow of my skiff into a thick growth of reeds, and sprang ashore. The black mud oozed up around my ankles. I began to revile my curiosity.

The Angelus came faintly from the little village across the water; an unseen creature—a frog, possibly, or an insect of some kind—set up a mournful droning; then an owl chimed in with its melancholy note. Oh, the country sounds at twilight, how they sadden one!

After quitting the marsh I found myself in a wild tangle of vegetation. At my feet lay the trunks of fallen trees and pieces of broken marble in the tall grass—this was the pleasure-garden of the old château. Yes—can you believe it?—a pleasure garden, with trim walks and terraces, where tender-eyed beauties strolled in shady alleys and lovers made verses by the side of splashing fountains—the scene of fête, and frolic, and love-making under the eighteenth century's amorous moon.

On close inspection the old building looked even darker and more forbidding. I climbed the broken steps. A bat flapped its wings in my face angrily, as if resentful of my intrusion. I paused and listened. The Angelus had ceased—all was silent.

To enter by the great door was impossible—it was fast locked. Just over my head was a window with a stone balcony. To gain the balcony by means of tangled vines and break through the window seemed an easy matter, and in fact was soon done.

How shall I describe the room in which I found myself?

A great salon, cold and dark and damp as a vault; the faint light sifting through the broken jalousies serving only to emphasise.

I took a step forward and a cobweb caught me across the chin. Something scurried along the floor, my heart rose in my throat, though I knew the creature to be a rat. I stretched out my hands in the darkness and grasped mouldy rags. Pshaw! If one were a coward one would turn and run.

When my eyes became accustomed to the gloom, I saw that the room had been almost royal in splendour. Fragments of decayed damask hung from tarnished cornices; full-lipped, round-limbed goddesses, with faded wreaths in their dingy hair, and green mould upon their bare breasts, smiled down from frescoed walls, smiled upon the rats and spiders, and—and—one knows not what else!—as sweetly as upon the beauties and cavaliers of Louis's court one hundred years ago. The furniture was mostly of the time of the Grand Monarch. There were chairs and sofas, mirrors, and tables; but, alas! their gilding and glory had depart-d. Rats nested in the upholstery, spiders slung to the walls, a pall of mould, dust, and cobwebs lay over all. A harp stood in a corner, I touched its strings, and they gave out a sound like the groan of a soul in torment. Upon a table of rare workmanship lay cards and coins of silver, from the position of which I guessed that a quartet had been interrupted at whist; upon a second table stood glasses and a decanter of dark-red wine.

A slight noise attracted my strained ear. Forced by that instinct which forbids us to turn our backs to the unexplained, I wheeled about, and beheld a small feathered thing, a tiny owl, sitting on the window-sill, staring at me with inquisitive eyes of pale green fire.

We scrutinised each other for a moment in silence; then the wind began to shake the hangings, and the owl raised its wings and flew away. There was but one door in the room; this probably led to the entrance hall. I stepped forward boldly to open it, and started back again in sudden alarm; my heart stood still, there was a nervous, creeping sensation at the roots of my hair. The door swung open with a creaking of rusty hinges, and revealed to me the shape of something in human guise, standing out from the blackness beyond.

Holy Virgin! Ah, how I deplored my alienation from the saints. To call upon them now would be impertinent—also, quite useless!

The something approached, and proved to be a young girl—a young girl—and I had been afraid! She was elegantly dressed, tricked out in all the coquettish splendour of the court of Marie Antoinette, in rose-coloured brocade, white lace, fine as a spider's web, high-heeled slippers, jewels, paint and powder. For the rest she was beautiful—dark-eyed and red-lipped—but with a look so hopeless, so wistfully sad, that my heart went out to her in very pity.

Digitized by Google

"Madame," I murmured, bowing low.

She turned her burning eyes upon me, and paled beneath her rouge.

"Eugène!"

"Madame, pardon; I am Jean François Louis de Blanchard, officer in the Guard, at Paris. I am——"

"Enough, monsieur, 'tis I who must beg pardon. I mistook you for the blackest villain who ever drove bargain with the devil, forgetting that the chains which bind him are never loosed, even for one night."

"Heydey! And what is all this?"

My fair damsel stood back, and made way for an ancient dame, upon whose palsied head sat a velvet cap, with nodding plumes, and an ancient gentleman, in velvet and lace, with decorations upon his breast.

"Grandmamma, grandpapa, this is M. Jean François de Blanchard. Monsieur, Mme. la Comtesse and M. le Comte de Saint-Germain."

The old couple, thinking of that fine breeding which conceals emotion, were surprised, but received me with great courtesy.

"Ah, monsieur," said the Countess, "it is with much pleasure that I give you welcome. It has been many years since I have entertained guests in this house."

"Welcome to Château Saint-Germain," said the Count.

"And now, Valerie, ring for candles."

"You forget, grandmamma."

"Ah, true, true. I am old, monsieur, and the sight of a young and happy face has made me forget that things are not what they used to be. You must get the candles yourself, my child. They are in the inlaid cabinet under the oval mirror. On second thoughts, get only one, for M. le Diable alone knows where we shall get more when these are gone. Monsieur, may I ask if you are related to the Chevalier de Blanchard, a man of genius and a wit in the old days at Versailles?"

"Possibly. There are many of my name."

"Ouais! What a fool I am! The chevalier must, of necessity, have been dead these many years; and without doubt he was confessed and absolved. Alas, alas! I shall never see my old friend again—never again. But time passes—Valerie, the candle."

"Permit me," said I, producing my match-box—a silver bauble, the gift of la belle Heloise—and striking a light. The ladies turned pale.

"Monsieur!" cried the Count, in a voice that trembled. "Are you the devil in disguise, dogging our footsteps?"

"Heaven forbid!" and I made the sign of the cross.

"A thousand pardons. Do you play whist, monsieur?"

"Monsieur, I do."

"Bien. A dummy is unsatisfactory. Come, madame; come, Valerie. We are losing time. We were three points on the new game, I think, Valerie? Monsieur, will you kindly take the chair opposite madame?"

The Count took the cards and we began. Dieu, what cards! And what silver! The former were black with age, and the latter incrusted with green canker and old coinage, none of it of more recent date than 1780.

Truly, my situation was a strange one. Here sat I, Blanchard, of the Guard, playing whist with whom? With what? At least my entertainers were noble. The old couple seemed to take pleasure in the game; madame's small eyes glittered as she raked in her winnings; monsieur, when fortune favoured him, chuckled and showed a mouth full of fangs. Sometimes they disputed a point with warmth, but through it all she was still the grande dame, and he the gallant courtier. Once during the evening he took from his waistcoat pocket a gold snuff-box, with portrait of Lambelle; he gazed on the face with reverence, and then offered me snuff.

In the intervals of shuffling and dealing, they questioned me eagerly though guardedly about the doings of the world.

"Is there much gaiety at Versailles?"

"Alas, no, madame."

"At Paris?"

"Ah, yes, Paris is always gay."

"Oh, Paris, my beautiful city. The best years of my life were spent in Paris, monsieur."

When the conversation turned upon the military affairs of the day, I observed that the face of the Count betrayed a lively emotion—tears rose to his eyes. "I, too, have been a soldier," he muttered.

All this time Valerie said not a word, but sat, quietly enough, at my right hand, with her great, gloomy eyes fixed upon something which I could not see. Could it be that she still thought of Eugène?

The one candle flared and flickered, and lit up the faces of the players with an uncanny light, and cast monstrous shadows upon walls and ceiling; the wind moaned about the house and shook the ragged hangings. Behind my back I heard a rat gnawing at the harp-strings. I played badly—very badly. The politeness of madame was put to the test, and—to her honour, let me say—it stood the strain. But, tell me, could you play whist with a mind divided between the vague shadows that lurked under sofas and chairs and in dark corners and—a beautiful woman?

The Count was dealing and the Countess yawning behind her painted fan. I resolved to rouse the young girl from her reverie, and, leaning towards her, whispered:

"You are preoccupied, mademoiselle."

"Monsieur!"

"Trust me."

"Ah, my friend, you know not what you ask."

"Mademoiselle, you are thinking of that villain Eugène—is it not so?"

"Hush, in the name of Heaven. You cannot understand, monsieur. I loved him—oh, how dearly I loved him! I was reckless, I was mad. I would have given life and salvation for his sake, and—mon Dieu!"

"Monsieur, the deal is yours," said the Count.

The next deal was Valerie's; the next the Countess's. I seized the opportunity to resume the interrupted conversation.

"You do not love him now?"

"Love him? Ah, love is a tender flower; when trodden upon it dies, but in its place spring poisonous weeds which never die. Hatred and revenge—these are the weeds that overrun my heart, monsieur."

"Revenge?" I laid my hand upon my sword. "But tell me where this villain is to be found, and, by all the saints in the calendar, you shall be revenged!"

About the lady's lips there played a smile which disconcerted me; she touched my hand with her own, which was cold, cold as a grave-stone.

"Friend, put up thy sword. If the saints would only hear me I would pray through all eternity that thou and he might never meet; but, ma foi! the good saints have forgotten my very name. As to vengeance, we will leave that to the devil, monsieur."

Digitized by Google

"Valerie, monsieur, attendez! Are you aware, monsieur, that you have trumped my ace?"

And so the night wore away. We shuffled, dealt and played, lost and won; madame scolded me, and I made elaborate apologies to madame; between whiles I talked with Valerie behind her fan.

"Mademoiselle," I said, "I would die for you. Is there anything in the wide world that I can do to serve you?"

"Yes; give me the rose that you wear."

It was an insignificant flower pinned on my breast by a village girl, but she seized it eagerly, laid it against her cheek and pressed her lips to its drooping petals. I interpreted the action in my own way, and my heart leapt within.

Was it love that I felt for this strange creature with the painted face and powdered hair? Was it her beauty, or her unknown wrongs, or the mystery that surrounded her that attracted me so powerfully? Upon my soul, I neither knew nor cared! I feasted my eyes upon her face and form. She filled my heart and mind—all else was crowded out, even Heloise.

It was very late, the wind wailed like a banshee, the Count nodded in his chair, with mouth open and eyes turned backward—parbleu, he did not look handsome! The Countess sat and gloated over her winnings with an expression on her yellow old face that curdled my blood.

"Shall we not finish the game, madame?" I asked. But she did not reply.

Valerie rose from her chair with rustling of her silken gown and crossed to where the harp stood. I followed. She swept her hand across the strings and began a little chanson, something about love and idleness and a shepherdess in Arcadia—and stopped in the beginning.

"It was a favourite of mine when I was in the world," she said.

"You love the world, then?"

"I am sick with longing for it."

I led her to the window.

"Valerie, there it lies. Let us go and enjoy it together."

She did not answer, she did not even hear; she stood with her arms held out to the full moon, and her face bathed in its light.

"Come away," she said at length, almost fiercely; "I cannot bear it."

"Valerie, you have not answered me. Here is the balcony, there is my boat, the moon is overhead; let us go, my beloved."

"It is impossible."

"I am rich, I have a noble name, and, above all, I love you—I love you, Valerie! Come, let us leave this haunt of evil spirits. Ah, love, life is so short at best, let us be happy while we may."

"I implore you——"

"Valerie, why do you hesitate! Are you afraid?"

She made a gesture of disdain.

"Afraid? Is fear, then, the one thing that keeps us from our desires? Ah, you have not learnt life's lesson well. I tell you it is impossible, and that is enough."

"It is not enough. Love is strong, Valerie, and whatever the spell that binds you, I swear that I will break it."

She covered her face with her hands and sobbed; I stole my arm about her waist, and laid her head against my shoulder.

"At least, my sweet, nothing shall drive me from you," I whispered.

She broke away from me and stood with her arms folded upon her breast; she fastened her burning eyes upon mine; there was a look in them that was almost hope.

"Do you love me, then?"

"With my whole soul."

"How much would you resign for my sake?"

"Life—everything—my hopes of Heaven."

"What would you dare for me?"

"Death itself."

"Are you at peace with God, monsieur?"

"Alas, I fear not; it is many years since I confessed."

At this moment there was a knock at the door; no one seemed to hear it. The girl crossed the room—ah, with what grace!—and filled a glass with the dark red wine. A second knock; I observed that the hand of Valerie trembled as she gave me the brimming glass. A third knock; I raised the glass to my lips, and nodded across its brim to the woman I loved. I am a judge of wines; the bouquet of this was indescribably delicious.

"I drink to an eternity together," I cried.

Here the door swung open heavily, with a creaking of rusty hinges, and upon the threshold stood a young and fair-haired man.

He made a courtly bow. "Pardon," he said, in a low voice full of melody, "but the cock has already crowed for day. We must be travelling. Ah, I see, monsieur is about to give a toast. Do not let me interrupt, I beg. I assure you, monsieur, the wine is excellent."

The Count and Countess had risen and stood as though waiting. Their old faces wore expressions of profound despair, their arms hung lifeless at their sides. The money and cards lay in disorder upon the table. The candle burnt dimly, flaring up now and then with a spluttering noise. It could not last much longer.

With a cry, Valerie sprang forward and dashed the wine-glass from my lips. It fell to the floor with a crash.

"Do not touch it!" she cried. "For the love of God, leave this unholy place at once. Forget all that has happened, if you hope for salvation!"

The strange young man smiled mystically.

"Mademoiselle is unselfish," said he. "But come, we delay," and he held wide the door, while the Count, the Countess, and Valerie passed through.

"Farewell, monsieur," said the Countess, and waved her hand.

"Farewell," said the Count.

But Valerie never said a word. Not once did she look at me, but passed on with her head upon her breast, out into the darkness.

Then the young man turned to me with a smile of charming frankness.

"Monsieur, permit me to say that I am glad of this meeting. We are not strangers, but old comrades. Do you remember that night at Biarritz, when you won five hundred thousand francs from the Marquis? I was there and applauded. I was also present at the duel next day—unobserved, of course. And now a word in your ear, mon ami, you are épris with Mademoiselle Valerie; you wish to see her again; bien! I will help you. Be here at the château one year from to-night—last night, I should say. Madame la Comtesse will be glad to receive you. For your sake, I regret that she does not entertain more often. And now, au revoir! I do not say farewell, since we part to meet again." He bowed and closed the door.

There was a curious charm about this strange young man—the air of a poet, a diplomat, a great general. I liked him. I cautiously opened the door and peered out. Darkness and silence.

Digitized by Google

"Valerie!" I called. "Valerie!"

My voice reverberated along the deserted halls; rats scampered away, terrified. This was all I heard, except—ah, no, I imagined it—the sound of a muffled sob a great way off.

I took the candle and searched the house—room after room, corridor after corridor; all were furnished, but all had the air of having been long untenanted; everywhere rats fled before my invasion. At length I returned to the salon.

My candle had spun a winding sheet; it flared up for the last time and went out. I threw open an eastern window, and, lo! the pale dawn was coming up across the water, and the wind had died into a soft breeze that smelt of the morning! Oh, the blessed day! How welcome after such a night!

As I pulled my boat across the water, I looked back at the old château. There it stood among its guardian trees, veiled by a thin mist which ascended from the marsh like steam. The first rays of the rising sun had tinted the mist a pale rose colour, the marsh was visibly green, the song of a bird in a bush by the water's side enchanted my very soul. I felt almost light-hearted. But, oh, Valerie! a year is so long, so long!

Arrived at the little village I sought the curé, a pious man, well read in the history of the province. At my request, he told me the story of the château on the island. This is it:

"In the year 1785, the only living representatives of the powerful and wealthy family of Saint-Germain were the old Count, his wife, their granddaughter and heiress, Valerie, and Eugène, their nephew and next of blood. The Count held some high post at court, I believe. Valerie was dame de compagnie to the Queen; and I have no doubt that they were all quite as worldly as most people of their rank and day. Eugène was a villain, a roué, a man entirely without honour; and yet, they say, he was loved by his beautiful cousin. Ah, my son, I count the love of woman no compliment since she can give it to a man like this.

"Well, the Count—or, possibly, the Countess—for some reason unknown, lost favour at court, and it became necessary to quit Versailles. This island, the ancient seat of the family, was their place of refuge. It is said that these people, accustomed as they were to a life of gaiety and dissipation, found the château rather dull. Whist was their one amusement; the old people had a great passion for the game, and they often played all night till dawn, it is said.

"It appears that Eugène was heavily in debt. He appealed to his uncle. Help was refused; then, in desperation, he drove a bargain with the devil." Here the curé crossed himself. "This was the unholy compact: Great wealth in exchange for three souls. It was the part of Eugène to put out of the world three souls—three souls unrepentant and unshriven. This is what they say, my son. All I know is that one morning the servants found the Count, his wife, and Mdlle. Valerie sitting round the card-table in the grand salon, cold in death. The Count was in the act of trumping his opponent's ace; the Countess had fallen forward on her nose, her fingers still clutching the cards; and the eyes of mademoiselle—she had beautiful eyes, I am told—were turned towards the vacant chair. That this chair was vacant is a significant fact.

"The wine had been drugged with a subtle and instantaneous poison, and, it is said, has never been removed; the decanter still stands on a small table in the grand salon. Well, Eugène, guilty or not, inherited the old man's wealth, but never returned to the island indeed, though many years have passed and generations come and gone since that fatal day, those gloomy halls have never echoed the footfall of mortal man. The peasants shun the place, for there runs a tradition that to pass one night there—the night of the anniversary of the crime—is to lose your soul.

"And now comes the strangest part of the story. Upon this anniversary—the time of year is not clearly known—from dusk till dawn, the devil"—the pious father crossed himself again—"allows those three lost souls to revisit their mortal habitation and divert themselves with their favourite game, and, it is said, they always leave a game unfinished for fear lest the privilege be withdrawn.

"That is the story. I cannot vouch for it; I can only affirm that, once or twice, I have seen strange lights glimmering across the water. But your scientists have many ways of accounting for such phenomena. The fate of those three was sad, indeed. If they had lived a few years longer, they would have met another as sad, perhaps, but more noble, for the Saint-Germain were loyal. Ah, well for me, I do not fear the dead, and the bones of these have been dust a hundred years in the great vaults under the château. May Our Lady plead for them!"

The curé ceased speaking, and I told him my story. He listened with great interest.

"My son," he cried, seizing my arm, "you will not return to the island? Do you know who it was who tempted you?"

"I know."

"Then, for the love of Our Lady, and all the saints, be warned! Valerie, whom you say you love, is—at this moment—burning in Hades!"

"Love is stronger than the fear of Hades."

"My son, my son, may Heaven protect you, for you stand in danger of losing your soul!"

"Father, it is lost already!" And I staggered out of the house into the street like a man in a dream.

N. A. Cox.

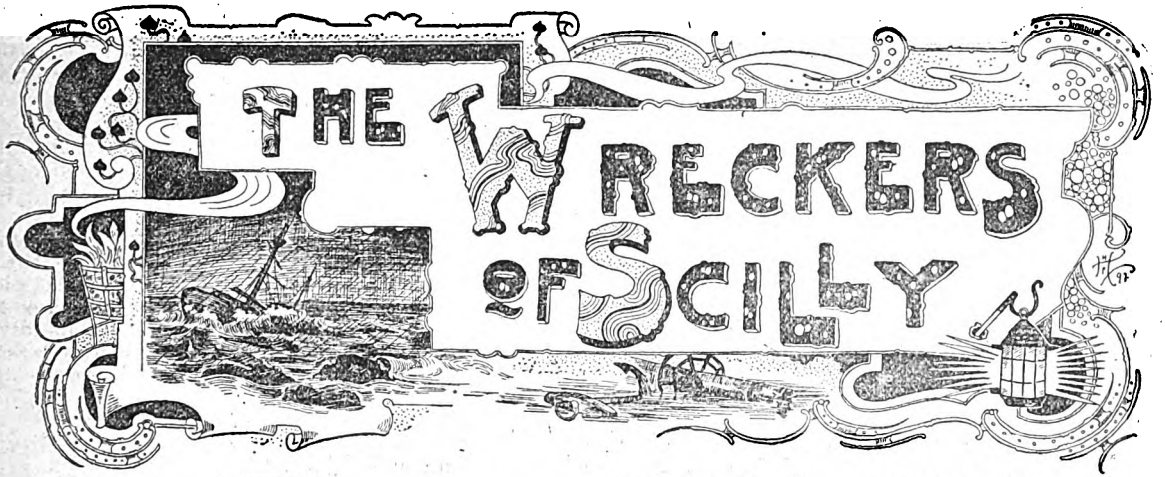
Be Sure Your Handwriting Will Find You Out.

OF recent years Graphology has developed to a remarkable pitch. Exhaustive study in the subject has resulted in its being classed as one of the arts. The true character of a person may be discerned in a few strokes of the pen, where attempts to discover it have failed in every other direction. You may think yourself a really nice sort of person, and your friends and acquaintances may think so, too, but you ought not to rest satisfied until you have had the opinion of the most expert graphologist of the present time. This will cost you the nominal expenditure of six penny stamps and a stamped and addressed envelope, all of which must be enclosed in an envelope with a specimen of your handwriting upon an unruled sheet of paper with your usual signature and full name and address, and forwarded to these offices. The truths which will be revealed to you need not necessarily be flattering—it depends upon your real character. Those who have faith will be delighted; and those who are sceptical will be surprised.

GRAPHOLOGIST,

PEARSON'S WEEKLY Buildings, Henrietta St., London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



SUMMARY.

The scene is laid at St. Agnes, one of the Scilly Islands. The inhabitants live by the booty obtained from vessels wilfully led to destruction by false beacons. The only two exceptions are Nigel Prideaux and Damaris Nance, his sweetheart. Manuel Nance, Damaris' father, is Nigel's greatest enemy. The King Hal, a warship laden with Spanish plunder, is lured to destruction, and wrecked off Troy Town. All hands are either drowned in the sea or killed by the inhabitants, except Sir Francis Seymour, who is rescued by Nigel. Damaris takes food to the survivor, who falls in love with her. Nigel secures Sir Francis' escape. Manuel Nance decides to give his daughter in marriage to one of the sons of Governor Layton, and for this purpose sends one of his men to convey the offer. The big dowry which is to accompany the girl creates dissention among the Governor's six sons, and they decide to swim across to the island on which she lives, the first arrival to become her husband. Damaris, however, strenuously objects to the marriage.

CHAPTER IX.

The Wedding Day.

It was an unforgettable day that dawned for St. Agnes on the 26th of June, 1539.

A bank of cloud, dark, with ragged edges, lay in the south-west when the sun rose to shine on the placid sea, and the grey, thatched cottages set in the deep-coloured grass of the island. But it was so distant, and the breeze had such a gentle, murmurous note, that even the islanders most versed in weather lore took no heed of it. The blue Atlantic lapped the stones of St. Warna's Bay with a cooing sound that was of itself a lullaby.

But the shattered hull of the King Hal still stood against the rocks of Troy Town as a witness to the fickleness of the beautiful sea; and the fresh splinters and bits of iron, fragments of clothes, half a boat, and much else which littered the strand gave further testimony in the same direction.

Once again Damaris woke to hear the pleasant sound of the chink of gold. The sun beamed in upon her and made a crimson pool where its rays settled on the Turkey mat which was set over the hay upon the floor. But the sound of the gold filled the girl with a chilly terror. She knew well that it was her marriage portion that was being reckoned; and she feared that heaven might not befriend her after all.

No sooner did she begin to bestir herself than her father entered her room. There was that in his face that saddened Damaris yet more than her own presentiment.

"We shall part, my daughter, shall we not, with some sorrow?" he said.

"I know not wherefore we should part at all, dear father," replied the girl, and, but half-robed as she was (for she had not called to her nurse), she put her arms about Master Nance.

"Oh, cheer thee, cheer thee! A day will make much difference to my little Damaris, I warrant. By St. Nicholas, thou'lt like thy lot of matron full as well as thy dull days here!"

"I will not wed him, father—I will not wed him—though he marry me with chains," she sobbed.

"As touching that, my obstinate maid, time shall show. But, mark thee, I'll not endure thy moodiness. An thou art not Mistress Layton the younger ere nightfall I'll cast thee forth from thy nest here. By the thunder which trumpets the good things coming for us of St. Agnes, I rejoice I have but one daughter to plague me with her ingratitude and humours. I warrant, my wench, if thou dost not display thy sweeter parts—and thou hast them—thy husband is not one to beg thee to be gracious. There be they who flog their wives

Put her arms about the smooth neck of her favourite Nell.

Digitized by Google

into dutifulness, and, marry, it answers well with dispositions like thine. So no more of this; thou art to be wedded this afternoon, and thy friend, Father Harris from Tresco, has the word to be here to tie the knot."

While he spoke the face of Manuel Nance reflected the working of his mind. For the moment he had forgotten his determination to wash out the memory of some of his past crimes by a more lawful future. His veins had swelled, and it was all he could do to keep from striking Damaris in his unmanageable passion.

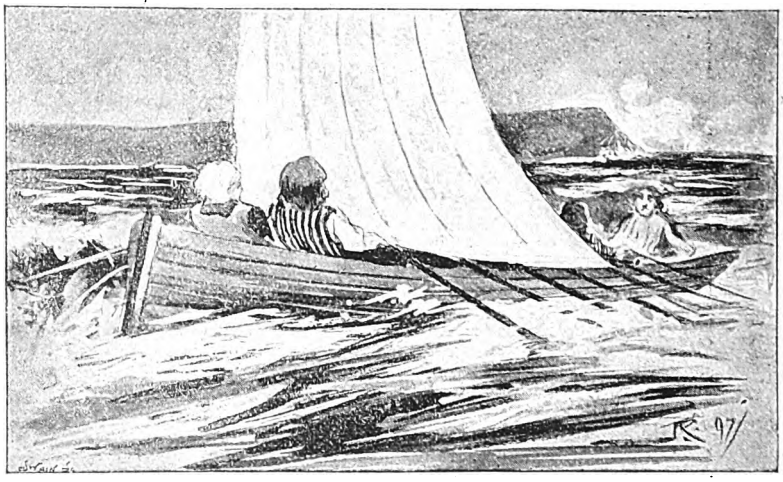
He returned to his room, and the girl, very sad at heart, finished dressing herself as best she could. She would go forth into the open—that was the most effective balm for distress. Under the blue dome of heaven and with the cool air fanning her, she ever regained her spirits in a measure.

Her steps took her towards her kine, and, to the amazement of the patient beast, she put her arms about the smooth neck of her favourite Nell and cried upon its coat.

"Come weal, come woe, dear ones, you and I must part!" she sobbed.

Then she left them and wandered on in the bright morning sunshine, with the happy twitter of birds about her and the glitter of the sunlit dew on the grass.

And so at length she reached the little inlet wherein Nigel's boat, The Nell, rocked lightly at anchor but a fathom from the cliffs.



Did not therefore desist from pulling through the bay.

"Here will I bide till he comes!" she said to herself.

Nor had she long to wait. For the night had been a restless and weary one for Nigel, and he yearned for the events of the day to begin even as Damaris feared them.

When he saw that she had been weeping, he took her in his arms with a passionate pressure, and kissed her cheeks where they were stained with the passage of her tears.

"Thou wouldst not have me give thee up?" he asked anxiously.

"If thou didst my heart would break—for I have but thee," she whispered.

"Good, my Damaris. Then I am content. Hearken. In an hour or two all the men folk start hence for Hugh Town, to bring over Master Layton with a flourish. I am to be with them; but that will I not be. Come hither, my Damaris, and peep into my fairy cave."

With that he led her to a well-dissembled hole between some granite boulders, and showed her his store of provisions, with a spare sail, cushions for his mistress, an extra rudder and pair of oars, knives, a pistol and much else.

"By the aid of these, my precious, and God's help, we will leave St. Agnes behind us and adventure upon the broader mercy of the world."

"But how, Nigel, shall it come about?"

"Listen. To avoid going with the rest, I will straightway put out as if I were after the mackerel. For the time I will be by Annet, where I can see them make their start. They will say hard things of me, but for that, my sweet, of course we care not. But when they are well across—then with both my arms and all my life I'll row hitherwards. Wilt thou be here to join me?"

"If I be not dead, look for me. Even my curse will for once be kind."

"'Tis well. Thus met, we will not soon be parted, my life's blood. And dress thyself, dearest, for a journey instead of a bridal—though it will be both in one."

There was already an echo of uproar in the village when Damaris regained her father's house. It was not often there was even a funeral in St. Agnes—save such as the men of the King Hal had: a wedding was, of course, rarer still. The women and girls were, therefore, hard at work, some mixing paste for the cakes of the wedding feast, and some gathering flowers to bespread the shingle where young Layton was to tread on landing, and at the door of his bride's dwelling.

The men, too, were in high spirits. It had been noised about that Master Nance himself would soon follow his daughter out of the island. He was not loved; and he would not be much lamented. Moreover, would not his pastures and house, as well as the wealth that was in it, accrue naturally to them? This was an established custom in St. Agnes. The emigrant might take away as much as he could carry in a boat—the rest was for those who stayed behind.

There was further the exciting thought: Who should be their chief when Nance had gone? Some held that Pender should take the dignity, but others were of opinion that the office should be filled by a regular election, which might raise another than Pender to the sovereignty.

Master Nance summoned them all together, as he was wont, and gave them his instructions. They were, without exception, to accompany him—in the big sailing-boat, which was only used on great occasions, such as the boarding of a ship on a distant rock, or to fight a Spaniard or a Frenchman whom they could take at a disadvantage. In this way the Governor of St. Mary's would have due honour paid to him, and Master Nance himself would be fitly homaged.

So busy were they, and full of chatter, that they did not much heed the lowering nature of the sky. This had changed greatly since the dawn. The clouds had browed thick from the south-west, and there was a lurid tinge to them which told of the storm of which they were heralds. The closeness of the air also argued of a possible outbreak of some severity.

Master Nance himself was concerned with the care of a certain important little oaken case, in which were the five thousand pieces of gold, without which he feared he might not bring back the bridegroom.

At length all things were ready, and the men trooped down to the shingle by Perkilla Bay. The boat was ready, but it was marked that those who had taken charge of her had delayed to unbind the sails. They stood looking about them—at the sea and the sky, as if uncertain what to do.

Digitized by Google

"Devil take them!" exclaimed Nance, when he noticed this, "what is the hindrance?"

"'Tis the day, Master Nance, I'm of opinion," answered one of the men; "we be like to have a capful, by the look of it."

Then for the first time that morning Nance, too, gazed about him as a mariner should.

He frowned when he saw the shape of the south-west clouds and the colour of the sea south of the Gugh.

"Holy fiend!" he exclaimed, but he said no more.

"Oh, it may not be so bad," continued the man who had drawn his attention to it. "And for me, who have no wenches to get husbands for, it matters not."

But Nance heeded not this stroke of satire. He was still intent on the heavens. At length he turned away, with a forced laugh and a heave of the shoulders.

"I trow," he said, "if we be fated to make well through it, no puff of wind shall arrest us. All aboard her, men, and ho! ho! off with her. We'll have her mainsail up in a pistol shot, and there'll be breeze enough to land us with Master Layton ere a third of an hour has gone."

"And for getting back, Master Nance, in the teeth of that?" observed Fortescue, pointing to the cloud.

"Oh, what the demon avails it to think so far ahead! That's my merry lads, slip her out quick as a flash of lightning. Who knows what shall come to pass? For me, I've shipped the tiller of my life, and mean to sit in the stern of the boat till judgment day."

The other St. Agnes men stared at their lord, but did not therefore desist from pulling through the bay to get into the wake of the wind. Nance's red face and unusually bright eyes were certainly somewhat odd, and he moved his fingers nervously, like a man who had not full control over them. But it was not until they had turned the easternmost point of the bay, and a sudden howl of wind caught them at the head of Gugh channel, that they had serious doubts about their master's sanity. The squall took them unprepared and all but drove them over. For several moments there was confusion—and in the thick of it, with the men bustling each other on to the windward gunwale, what should Master Nance do but roar out lustily their St. Warna's chorus:

"Huzza for the rocks it splits upon,
And hey for the corpse with its gewgaws on!"

He shouted it several times, embracing his box of crown pieces the while, and with his gaze concentrated upon the bellied sail.

The others, with looks at each other and low mutterings, drew away from him, so that he was left alone in the stern of the boat. As the ship plunged in the heavy swell the waves broke over him. But this did not seem to affect his delirium. He sang on, though drenched to the skin.

Some of the men were now for turning back while they had a point of wind in their favour.

"It bodes us ill," said one of these, "to go into a squall like yon" (pointing to the waves of the Sound beyond the Gugh) "with a witless man, and he with the tiller in his hands."

"Master Nance," cried another, "be you careful, we request of you."

But though they tried to argue him into giving up the helm, he would have none of them. With a flash of momentary intelligence, he bade them retake their places, and cleverly drove the boat over the tops of the waves.

"I'm master shipman here, by the Heaven that made us, and I'll brook no meddling. Are we all aboard?"

"Every man and boy of St. Agnes, Nigel Prideaux, his idiot boy, and little Obadiah excepted," answered one.

"Ah! a murrain on that Prideaux youth. Why haled you him not along of us? I have my fears of him. Zounds, and he may be with her at this moment! 'Bout ship, I say, and back to St. Agnes. I'll not endure e'en such a chance as that."

Vain was it for Pender to shout that he had seen Nigel cross the Sound towards Annet with his tackle on board.

"I'll not credit it—ye're all against me, you rats. I'm cheated by earth and heaven and Damaris and Master Layton. What cares he for me, forsooth? 'Tis the crowns he marries, not the flesh and blood of my sweet child. Marry, how I've misused her—but not"—this with a shriek that made even these well-nerved men start to their feet—"as I might have done. I'll turn me and repent."

Several of the others flew towards him to prevent the disaster that was impending. There was a riot of cursing. And then the boat, having been strongly placed broadside against the storm, was tossed over like a feather, and men and sails were all interningled in the waves. Master Nance's mocking yell of laughter as the sea broke over the boat once more was the last sound that the gulls overhead might have recorded of these doomed men of St. Agnes.

They did not all go to the bottom at once. Certain of them could swim, and swim bravely. But these were either so hampered by the others, or by the ropes and sails of the boat, or so oppressed by the fury of the waves, that they soon succumbed. They failed even to reach the reef of St. Bartholomew, which stands midway in the channel between St. Agnes and St. Mary's.

The gulls screamed above them, and one by one they gave in and died.

All this happened out of sight of St. Agnes, for the women folk had their labour to attend to, nor did the islanders of St. Mary's chance to notice what had befallen

"I'll turn me and repent."

Digitized by Google

the ship, though some had marked its starting, and anon questioned each other as to its fate with anxiety.

Towards noon the Tresco monastery boat safely ran into Hugh Town, yet not without grave peril, and after much laborious beating against the wind. Father Harris was on board her, but he learnt that the St. Agnes men had not appeared. To St. Mary's it seemed natural that the storm should have made Master Nance return home in haste. The waves were of a fearful size, and their bellowing off Porth Hellick and Peninis could be heard two miles away.

Not until the evening did St. Agnes have any intimation of the calamity that had come upon them. With much sighing and sorrow the women had been forced to agree that the marriage would have to be deferred. Dame Cochran said so—not without glee that seemed quite ribald. She understood the sea better than the rest, and unless the wedding party meant to marry death himself, she said they would not dream of trying to return to St. Agnes in the teeth of the gale.

But towards the time of sunset, when the storm was at its worst, young Nigel landed on the island, soaked, and with the strength almost beat out of him. It had taken him ten hours to toil through a couple of miles of sea, even with the shelter of the St. Agnes coast from the wind. A little more and he would have given it up, and accepted his fate.

"Ill news!" he blurted out to the first comer who met him, and then he reeled and swooned into the woman's arms.

"Look here," cried Dame Cochran to poor, agitated little Damaris, "here's a lively armful."

So saying, she dropped Nigel upon the floor of Master Nance's house with a laugh, and went her way.

Silently, but with agony at the heart, Damaris bent over her lover. He was so wet and pallid that she doubted not he was drowned. Had she not again and again gone to the cave where they were to meet, and each time in vain? At length she had no longer hope that they could voyage in such Young Nigel landed on the island.

Sped homewards as fast as he could go.

a storm as prevailed. That was grievous enough. But (the later thought that it was because her lover was lost had already—when the nurse appeared—begun to stab her like a poisoned knife.

So she fell upon Nigel, and wept on his breast, and called him all the tender names and more by which he had called her, and caressed him, and bathed his cold face with her hot tears.

Until, lo! when her sorrow was at its intensest, he opened his eyes, and his lips smiled at her. Then in a moment she became as pale as he had been, and she leapt to her feet in astonishment that was half terror. But Nigel reassured her.

"Thou art the best of apothecaries, dear one."

Whereupon her tears wetted him again, though this time they were tears of joy, and when she had said many foolish, fond things, she tended him like the most careful of nurses until he was able to get up and tell her of the calamity that her father and the others had encountered.

This also overwhelmed the poor girl. But, with her head nestled on Nigel's breast—it was very damp; but what mattered that, seeing how copious were her tears?—she at length took comfort of a sort. It was worse for the others than for her. She still had Nigel, but they, poor souls! had lost fathers and husbands and sons and brothers all at a stroke.

By this time all St. Agnes knew what had happened. Little Obadiah, while playing in the surf of Perkilla Bay, where the strand shelved most gradually, was amazed and enchanted almost out of his infant wits to perceive a thing that proved to be a dead body come coquettishly towards him. At one instant it was nearly within his reach; but even while he was stretching his little bared arms towards it, the jealous sea fetched it away again. So the game lasted for a while. But anon, with a mighty heave, the Atlantic dashed it well on to the stones, and when the wave receded there it stayed.

"A pin for a man and a pin for a boy, yelled the little urchin as he capered round the body. It was sadly beaten and scarred by the sharp granite rocks, and the clothes were three parts stripped from it.
And two pins more for the saint at the helm."

"Huzza for the rocks it splits upon,
And hey for the corpse with its geegaws on!"

Whether it was due to infantile greed, or mere curiosity, or the association of the words of the hymn of St. Warna, something impelled the little lad to examine more closely the poor drowned man who had been tossed up specially, as it seemed, for his entertainment.

Holding his breath, and with the wind in his long hair, he trod on tiptoe towards the derelict find, not without anxiety (for never before had he been allowed to finger prey of this kind), touched the arm, where it was bent across the body. Even as he did so he disturbed the equilibrium of the corpse, so that it rolled over towards him with the face fully uncovered.

The lad uttered a horrible, piercing scream and sped homewards as fast as he could go. Nor did he stop his wails until he was at his mother's knee.

It was his own father that the Atlantic had bruised and thrown to him.

(To be concluded.)

Digitized by Google

THEOBALD'S GREAT VALENTINE PARCELS.

Special Sale, 14 Days Only, Enormous Value.

Each parcel contains a real Franciscan gold ring set with real Paris brilliants, resembling exactly a ten-guinea ring, a strong and pretty real leather purse a miniature opera glass, with good lens, lady's fashionable brooch, new pattern this season, gentleman's scarf pin, a handsome leatherette writing-case, an artistic fancy mat, a charming doll with clothes to take on or off, a 6d. fancy trinket or ash tray in colours, a cyclist alarm, an artificial moustachio, an automatic watch key (wind any watch), a beautiful scent satchet, and six coloured story books. The entire lot carriage free for 2/6. If two parcels are ordered, a 1/- pair of scissors or cigarette case, whichever preferred, given free. In commemoration of Her Majesty's 60 Years' Reign, we are giving away a large number of expensive prizes to purchasers of these parcels. In every parcel is a prize coupon which entitles the holder to a chance of one of these gifts, which consist of 500 REAL SILVER WATCHES, 500 real gold and diamond rings, 500 real gold pencil cases, 500 silver ditto, 500 Gentlemen's twill silk umbrellas, 500 Ladies' ditto, 500 Ladies' travelling bags, 500 sets of table cutlery, each set consisting of six each table and dessert knives, table and dessert forks, dessert and tea-spoons, 500 pictures in oil of the Royal Family. Some people think these prizes are never given away because they don't happen to get one, but it is a positive fact; and those people who don't care to run the risk of being the lucky one out of every ten, if they send for ten parcels we will guarantee to give them whichever prize they choose. This is an offer never made before, and makes an expensive prize a positive certainty. Send along at once and accept our extraordinary offer, such as no firm has ever had the enterprise to make before.

100 SEWING MACHINES GIVEN AWAY TO READERS OF THIS PAPER.

PRACTICALLY speaking, we are actually doing this. We are offering a best Lockstitch Sewing Machine as advertised by a leading London house at £4 4s. for 21s. each, to the first 100 readers of this paper who choose to send to us. It is done as a huge speculation. If we should send you one of these machines and nothing else it would be a great loss to us, but we expect, having placed such an immense bargain in your hands, you will not only recommend us to all your friends, but always deal with us for other goods we sell, when you require them. Our scheme is this: We offer to send you a best quality, high-class, thoroughly reliable Lockstitch Sewing Machine, full-size, fitted with latest improvements throughout, heavy fly-wheel, popular boat-shape shuttle, patent winder, packed free of charge, and each one tested and guaranteed. We take all risk of machine reaching you safely; and if it gets damaged in transit, we send you a new one at our own expense. The machines are made so that they can be used either by foot or hand. Of course, it is utterly absurd to think that in the ordinary way you could get a good Lockstitch Machine for £1 1s. It could not possibly be done; but just as a butcher or a baker opening a new shop gives goods away at less than cost, so we, as a big advertisement for our other goods, offer to supply 100 of these high-grade guaranteed machines to the readers of this paper for £1 1s. each. Our offer stops as soon as 100 are sold, as we are positively only offering 100 to the readers of certain popular papers. Any moneys received after 100 are supplied to this paper's readers will be returned at once in full. Those anxious, therefore, to secure the greatest bargain possible should send at once. No machine will be sent unless the coupon below is cut out and sent to us with the order. Extra needles, 1s. dozen; 3 extra spools for 6d.; 1 dozen reels cotton, 1s.; oilcan and oil, 6d. Remember, Lockstitch Machines as advertised at £4 4s. we are offering at 21/-. Send your friends to see them at work. Full particulars of these machines and specimens of work can be had for 1d. stamp.

SHORT STORIES COUPON.	To be cut out and sent with order. Not more than one machine will be sold to the same person.

J. THEOBALD & CO., 19, FARRINGDON RD., LONDON, E.C.

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to the

PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 Pieces for £1 1s.

100 Pieces for £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery. The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful. Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS COCOA.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

WITH FULL NATURAL FLAVOUR.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An Egyptian Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87, Alexandra Road, Norwich.—Gentlemen,—I have had some boxes of your Tablets for my wife, and she has derived great benefit from them. Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Bretton West, near Wakefield.—"Miss L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.—Mr. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.—Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

127, Out Gang Lane, Old Radford, Notts.—Miss E. P. PARSONS says: "I was 16st. before taking Tablets, and am now 15st.—going on nicely."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

OTTO-FREEZ

BEAUTIFUL TOILET SOAP.

Everyone should use it. It is so nice for the skin. VALUABLE COUPONS with every Tablet. Two Tablets sent post free 1/-.

THE OTTO-FREEZ CO., 66, High St., Camden Town, LONDON. N.W.

TOO STOUT

If you require a reliable remedy for the relief of superfluous fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills. No starvation required; you may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5lb. to 7lb. weekly. They are a harmless vegetable preparation; successful in the most stubborn cases, and improve health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain safe, tasteless, and highly recommended. Prices, 2s. 9d 4s. 6d., and 11s., post free, plain wrapper. PROFESSOR F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

THE WIRT FOUNTAIN PEN.

MARK TWAIN says: "The 'WIRT' is an absolutely perfect reservoir pen compared with which all other pens are frank failures."

PRICES: 10/6; with Gold Mounts, 13/6 and 16/6. Special Pens for Presentation, encased in Sterling Silver, 27/6 and 29/6. All pens fitted with 14-carat Gold Nibs, Iridium Pointed, which should last a life-time. Broad, medium, or fine nibs to suit any hand. Catalogue sent post free on application.

THE WIRT FOUNTAIN PEN CO. LTD., 1, GRESHAM BUILDINGS, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Answers to Correspondents.

J. E. T. thinks that it would be a good plan to publish a book of reproductions of photographs of the different statues to be found in London, together with a brief account of their history.——Such a volume would be interesting to a few people. A portfolio of drinking-fountains or of railway-stations would be just as much appreciated by the man in the street.

E. W. C. B.—(1 and 2). An accident must happen to the train in which the person is travelling. (3.) The coupon must either be signed or an annual subscription to P.W. paid, and the newsagent's receipt forwarded to us.

HOUSEKEEPER.—The best thing to use in cleaning satin furniture is fresh breadcrumbs. Rub them over the satin until they grow discoloured, and then dust off the remaining crumbs with a soft cloth.

J. M.—Your schemes for the destruction of snakes in India are very elaborate, but I am afraid that they are not worth patenting.

I. P. has been very much struck with the number of ladies who are to be found at nearly every football match of importance. He is anxious to know whether there is any likelihood of women developing a craze for this pastime similar to that developed by the male sex. "We don't hear anything of the Ladies' Football Club nowadays," he says, "but the interest centred in the men players will, I am mortally afraid, become as morbid and unladylike as cycling."——Although there does actually appear to be an increase of lady spectators at football matches, both big and small, there need be no reason to deplore this fact. It is, after all, a healthy interest, and the play is to a certain extent rendered better by the knowledge on the part of the players that the eyes of their sweethearts and their wives are watching their movements with a critical interest.

W. W. (Gibraltar).—The different navies of the world were represented at the Chicago Exhibition by models only. There is no waterway for a vessel of 1,000 tons between Chicago and the coast.

P. B. asks if it is possible for rubies to lose their colour.——It is quite possible, although a somewhat infrequent occurrence. Should a gem of this kind be exposed to the light continuously for, say, a couple of years, it will become perceptibly lighter in tint.

GRACE.—Thanks for your letter. The trunks of trees which are covered with moss or lichen are more liable to lightning strokes than those which are not.

C. L. N. is an amateur photographer, and wants to know how he can print out weak spots in his negatives.——Concentrate the sun's rays on the dense part of the negative with the aid of a large reading-glass. Do not allow the focus to become too small, and move it slowly to and from the negative in order not to form a round spot.

J. M. W.—Perhaps the chief manufacturers of piano organs are Messrs. Chiappa and Sons Limited, 6, Little Bath Street, E.C.

MISS LANG is making preparations for a dance, and has just received the last reply to her invitations. The fact that only twenty gentlemen accepted, while thirty-seven ladies agreed to come, out of an equal number of invitations despatched, leads Miss Lang to wonder if the dancing man is becoming an extinct animal——Your experience does not seem to be at all uncommon. Cases of the same sort are becoming more frequent every year. Men are beginning to realise that, after all, dancing is but a waste of time, and they are certainly becoming more moderate in this direction. They fail to see the humour of rushing home, hustling into dress clothes, tearing off to a hall, hunting up partners, getting hot, feeding on ices, tarts, and other unsubstantial, indigestible food, talking ball-room babble, going out into the cold air at midnight, and getting up the next morning stuffy and totally unfit for work. When a man goes to a dance, it is not in human nature for him to take things calmly and moderately; consequently, he is beginning to prefer not to go at all.

MECHANIC.—There is no such company or syndicate as you mention, so far as I know, either in London or any other part of the United Kingdom.

W. W. D. R.—More than ninety per cent. of railway passengers in England travel third class. They contribute about eighty-three per cent. of the receipts.

A. S. T.—To cure broken chilblains apply a little vaseline every night till healed, and then use the following embrocation. Those unbroken should be anointed with a little of the following embrocation every night till the chilblains disappear: The embrocation is made by breaking a fresh hen's egg into a bottle, and adding to it (very gradually) a quarter of a pint of turpentine, when thoroughly mixed add half a pint of vinegar very slowly. This mixture, which will be found to keep well, should be shaken before use.

E. C. W.—The puzzle you send is only an adaptation of a very old one. Many thanks, however, for giving me the opportunity of seeing it.

F. R. M.—The next century commences on January 1st, 1901.

MR. JAMES LINGARD has sent me particulars regarding a patent balance valve saucepan cover. The object of this novelty is to prevent water from boiling over, and it does so on the same principle which guards against the possibility of a locomotive boiler exploding—by allowing the steam to escape. The address of the manufacturer is 235, Earl's Street, Longsight, Manchester.

MEAT extracts are common enough. A vegetable extract is a novelty, but it is a novelty with some sterling merit. It is made entirely from vegetable substances which, after being ground and mixed, are reduced by machinery to an extract. The stuff is very palatable and nourishing. The jars and bottles cost from 7½d. upwards, and may be obtained from Fromm's Extract Company, 61½, Fore Street, London, E.C.

THE Pneumatic Compensation cycle is the result of five years' experimenting in applying the pneumatic principle to the frame of the cycle instead of to the wheel. This point has been gained at last, giving far greater resiliency than the pneumatic tyre and without the usual danger of puncturing, side slipping, etc., which has attended the progress of the pneumatic tyre, and this is obtained without destroying the rigidity or stability of the frame, getting rid of the whole of the vibration generated in the machine itself, as well as at the point of contact. Another new feature is that the machine can be taken to pieces into three sections and packed in a portmanteau in a few minutes, without the aid of tools, and taken as personal luggage, thus doing away with the great risk of injury in transit and at the same time saving the annoyance of special booking and the heavy charges of railway companies. This may not be the accepted machine but it is undoubtedly the forerunner of the proper application of pneumatics to cycles. The offices of the company are at 52, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

OUR EYES! OUR EARS!

THEIR DISEASES

CURED WITHOUT OPERATION

NEW TREATMENT.—For Cataract and all Diseases of the Eye; Deafness in all its forms; Noises in the Head and Ears; Discharges from the Ears; Deafness from Influenza and Catarrh cured. Nine cases out of ten cured without personal interview. The special remedies forwarded to any part. Hundreds of letters in testimony. Bleeding, Blistering, and all other obsolete and violent treatment avoided. No "Ear-Drums," "Ear-Cornets," or painful instruments employed. Write for Testimonials and Printed Form of Questions to answer; forwarded free.—Mr. T. ISON, Eye and Ear Dispensary, Leeds. [Estab. 1871.]

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BLACKHEADS

or "Maggots," Pimples, Blotches, etc., immediately and permanently removed by my Skin Cleansing Lotion, "CUTISOLINE." Never fails. Hundreds of testimonials. Post free with directions, 1/6, 3/- and 5/-. AUSTIN LENNOX, Skin Specialist, 1, Shoe Lane, Fleet Street, LONDON.

TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, Mrs. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

HAIR DESTROYED.

On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 26, Belvedere Rd., Lambeth, London.

AVOID BAGGY KNEES

The ONLY Stretcher whereby the tension is obtained by means of a Screwed Rod.

Separate Stretchers are recommended for each pair of Trousers in use.

OF ALL HOSIERS, TAILORS, and OUTFITTERS EVERYWHERE, or sent on receipt of P.O. (Bronze, polished, 5/-; Army quality, nickel, 9/6), to S.S. Dept., 6, PHILIP LANE, LONDON, E.C.

BLUSHING PERMANENTLY CURED

On receipt of stamped envelope, a lady will send to all those afflicted, free particulars of a simple, harmless, and inexpensive self-treatment, which has permanently cured her daughter and hundreds of others of both sexes. Address, in confidence, Mrs. F. R. AUSTIN, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London.

CAN YOU WRITE?

Of course you can! Why not then emboss your Notepaper, etc., with a pretty Monogram? using the

Patent Pocket Monopresse

Every Initial and Monogram kept in stock. Monograms of one or two letters, 9d. each, post free. Apply—

CHAS. ROMPLER, 7, New Basinghall St., London, E.C. Agents wanted.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full, perfect, natural Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. Highly approved and recommended by the Medical Profession. For testimonials, press opinions, and free particulars, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

JOHN JACKSON,

Skittle and Skittle Ball Turner,

113, PENTONVILLE ROAD,

LONDON, N.

Hornbeam Skittles; Sycamore Skittles; Four Corners; American Pins; Cheese Ball, Warranted; Round Ball, Warranted; Lawn Bowls.

FRAMES LAID AND REPAIRED.

Price List on Application.

"DRUNKENNESS"

CURED. A Lady having cured her husband secretly of intemperate habits, will gladly send particulars of the remedy on receipt of stamped envelope.—Mrs. S. S. BARRINGTON, 4, Featherstone Bldgs., LONDON, W.C.

NOSE

A RADICAL PERMANENT CURE Medically approved, for Red Noses, 3/9, post free, under cover. Pamphlet, "Red Noses, Cause and Prevention," 1/-; Machines for Ugly Noses, particulars for stamp.—LEES RAY, Specialist, Wavertree, Liverpool.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5, Sept. 1, £5, Oct. 1, £5, Nov. 2, £6. Dec. 1, £6. Jan. 2 1897, £6, Feb. 1, £6.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

A SUM of from 10s. to 20s. per week offered for spare time to either sex, everywhere; work can be done evenings.—Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 92A, Aldersgate Street, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope.—Address, Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 179, Westminster Bridge Road, London.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

THE "ENGLISH ORGANETTE."

WITH EXPRESSION STOP

EASY PAYMENTS, 4/- Monthly.

Plays Hymns, Popular Airs, Quadrilles, Waltzes, Polkas, Reels, Hornpipes. Any tune can be played with artistic effect by anyone. No musical knowledge required. A mere child can play it.

Most Marvellous Musical Instrument in the World.

Price 30/-. Terms: 4/- deposit & 4/- monthly.

Organette delivered when first 4/- is paid. Write for list of music and full particulars. (Mentio n this paper.)

J. M. DRAPER, Organette Works, BLACKBURN.

"JUNO" CYCLES

ARE THE VERY BEST.

JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb.

JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO. LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

New JUNO CYCLE RIDING SCHOOL, 1,700ft., now open.

Palatable Substitute for Cod Liver Oil.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 10d.; 1lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; including tin and postage.

MRS. CONYERS,

KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

THE "COMMEMORATION SOUVENIR"

1837. REDUCTION SALE. 1897.

Now that Queen Victoria has reigned longer than any other British Monarch, every loyal subject will agree that a most suitable epoch has arrived for manifesting our loyalty. This event we have distinguished by a "Commemoration Souvenir" Reduction Sale of our Queen's Royal Household Carpets and Hearthrugs, etc., at about ONE-HALF their original prices.

The "QUEEN'S ROYAL" Carpets have doubled their sales during the past year. They are impervious to dust, and the dirt cannot penetrate them.

Sole Proprietors, Messrs. F. HODGSON & SON, City of Leeds.

We do not send out shams and veneer in Carpets and Rugs, but Goods of a character and at such a low price as to command the indisputably high Appreciation, Admiration, and Recommendation of our Clientele from all parts of the World.

The "Queen's Royal" Household Carpets and Hearthrugs are extolled by all the Nations of the Earth.

Sale price Gigantic Sale of the "Queen's Royal" Household

2/- HEARTHRUGS (Reg.)

in Reversible Rich Turkey Patterns, measuring 6ft. long and 3ft. wide. These Hearthrugs have gained a world-wide reputation for Magnificence, Cheapness and Utility, having no equal. Registered New Designs, and considered Works of Art. Thousands of repeat orders and testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction.

Special Offer.—Three for 5/9; Six for 11/3; Twelve for 22/-.

H.I.H. Eugenie de Christoforo
Princess Palœologœ Nicephorœ-Commenœ
Princess de Croy
Dow.-Mar. of Londonderry
Dow.-Mar. of Downshire
Duchess of Wellington
Duchess of Richmond
Marchioness of Breadalbane
Marchioness of Hastings
Marchioness of Drogheda

COLOSSAL SALE OF RICH VELVET PILE REAL

Brussels Hearthrugs.

Sale Price 5/6

In Rich Oriental and Indian Art Designs, measuring 6ft. by 3ft., which for price, real value, weight, and richness of manufacture will be found unapproachable.

Special Offer.—Three Rugs, 16/-; Six for 31/-.

Melville Castle, Glasswade, Midlothian, June 1st.

The Right Honourable the Viscountess Melville writes: "I am very pleased with the 'Royal' Velvet Hearthrugs to hand, and would like four more Hearthrugs. Her ladyship would also like two Velvet Carpets at 30s., one ditto 60s. 6d., to match them. Cheque, £8 14s., inclosed."

The Elms, West End, West Ham, January 4th.

Sir William Onslow, Bart., writes: "I was much pleased with the 'Queen's Royal' Carpet and Rugs which I had from you a short time ago. Please send me another, 12ft. by 18ft., £2 2s., with three Hearthrugs to match. Cheque inclosed."

Castle Hill, Ealing, London, June 4th.

"Lady Madeline Erskine received the 'Queen's Royal' Reversible Carpet from Mr. F. Hodgson, the dark terra-cotta colour which she likes very much. Please send another at earliest, same size, dark art shades. Cheque inclosed."

District Lodge, Curragh Camp, February 6th.

"Lady Anne Kerr wishes Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son to send her another 'Queen's Royal' Carpet as before, size 12ft. by 13½ft., 25s. 6d. Cheque inclosed."

H.R.H. Prince Louis of Battenberg
H.R.H. Prince K. Bigit, Siam
Marquis of Breadalbane
Marquise de Biddle Cope
Lord Farnham
Lord Henry Fitzgerald
Lord Lee
Sir Henry de Bathe
Sir Henry Bellingham
Sir E. H. Blair, Bart.

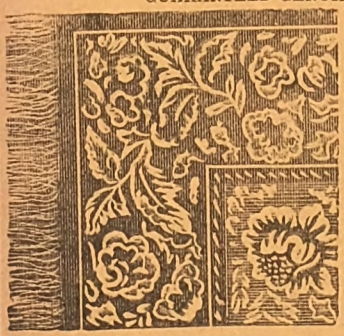
OUR NEW VENTURE.—Yes, Two different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright.)

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division), HODGSON v. WEBB BROTHERS.—On the 18th day of July, 1890, his lordship, Mr. Justice Chitty, granted an interim injunction, restraining Messrs. Webb Brothers, of Hackney Wick, from infringing Mr. Fredk. Hodgson's Trade Mark, "Eclipse," No. 93,774 (Leeds).

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ECLIPSE" CARPETS (Regd.)

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.



This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. We will forward direct from the looms to any address on receipt of amount, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, in our New (Reg.) Waterlily and Persian designs, the largest ever sold at the price, suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool.

Sale Price 3/6 Each.

Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. An "Eclipse" Rug sent with Carpet 1/- extra.

SPECIAL OFFER.

Two Carpets and Two Rugs 8/-, or Four Carpets and Four Rugs 15/6.

P.S.—When this Design (registered) is wanted in Carpets or Hearthrugs, as above, kindly quote No. 268,493.

We Rely upon Spontaneous Repeat Orders from our Clients for the Maintenance of our Trade. Established nearly a Quarter of a Century. All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON. 27/2/97.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send any goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

PRODIGIOUS SALE OF THE "PRUDENTIAL"

REVERSIBLE CARPETS

(Registered).

Reversible, woven throughout with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in 12 sizes only. These carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine on one side the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian, and on the reverse the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

REDUCED SALE PRICE.

Size.		Each.		Size.		Each.
6ft. by 9ft.	... ...	4/9	REDUCED SALE PRICE.	9ft. by 15ft.	... ...	12/6
7½ft. by 9ft.	... ...	5/11		12ft. by 12ft.	... ...	12/9
9ft. by 9ft.	... ...	7/6		12ft. by 13½ft.	... ...	14/6
9ft. by 10½ft.	... ...	8/6		12ft. by 15ft.	... ...	15/9
9ft. by 12ft.	... ...	9/6		12ft. by 18ft.	... ...	19/6
10½ft. by 12ft.	... ...	11/6		12ft. by 21ft.	... ...	22/6

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Regd.), to match above Carpets, sent for 1/6 extra, size 2yd. long and 1yd. wide. Special Offer, Three Hearthrugs for 4/3, or Six for 8/-, or Twelve for 15/6 sterling value.

P.S.—When this Design is wanted in Hearthrug or Carpet, as shown above, kindly quote Registered No. 268,496.

F. HODGSON & SON,

Manufacturers, Importers and Merchants,

WOODSLEY RD., LEEDS.

Telegraphic Address: "ECLIPSE, LEEDS," National Telephone No. 948.

N.B.—Foreign Orders executed and packed free, and shipped at lowest rates.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 427. FOR WEEK ENDING MARCH 6TH, 1897. [ONE PENNY.

"No flaw in its claim to be ABSOLUTELY PURE."
MEDICAL ANNUAL.

FRY'S
Pure Concentrated
COCOA

Awarded Highest Honours. | "Strongest and Best." HEALTH.

Over 200 Gold Medals and Diplomas awarded to the Firm.

VERY IMPORTANT TO SINGERS.

A VOICE TONIC

STRENGTHENS THE VOCAL POWERS AND CLEARS AND IMPROVES THE VOICE.

PROMPTLY CURES COUCHS AND HUSKINESS IN THE THROAT.

Liqueur Syrup of Kreat Halviva.

This Valuable Preparation is commended and used by the LEADING PROFESSORS of SINGING and ELOCUTION.

M. EDOUARD DE RESZKE, says:
" . . . . have pleasure to say that it is a Good Tonic."

H. SIMS REEVES, Esq., says:
"It is an excellent and unsurpassed lubricant to the throat, and has the marvellous effect of at once dispelling huskiness and dryness of the throat."

On Sale of all Chemists and Drug Stores at 2s. a Bottle, or direct from

THE HALVIVA COMPANY LIMITED,
4, TEMPLE CHAMBERS, LONDON, E.C.

10/6 HALF-GUINEA 10/6
COSTUMES
Allen Foster & Co
THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES
10/6
THE ALLEN FOSTER HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES
Are utterly unrivalled all the world over.

PATTERNS FREE.

DESIGN NO. 100.

THE ALLEN FOSTER HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Are acknowledged by thousands of delighted purchasers to be the very best Half-Guinea Costumes ever offered to the public. Made in the Allen Foster SPECIALITE SERGE, renowned for its durability and wear. COLOURS—Black, Navy, Electric, Myrtle, Brown, Bronze-Green, Ruby, Fawn, Drab, Cinnamon, etc. WRITE FOR PATTERNS. This attractive model, Design No. 100, consists of a tight-fitting bodice, prettily trimmed. The saddle and sleeves are lined. The skirt is cut full and fashionably. PRICE COMPLETE, 10 6. SKIRT ONLY, 5 6. REGULAR STOCK SIZES are 34in., 36in., and 38in. round bust (under arms). Skirts being 38in., 40in., and 42in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra. When ordering please mention Short Stories. Each Costume securely packed and sent carriage paid, 9d. extra. Skirt only, 6d. extra.

Bankers: London and County, Aldersgate Street, E.C.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., The London Manufacturers,
17, ROSCOE STREET, GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

ADVERTISERS should write for particulars of Special Positions.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

TOO STOUT

If you require a reliable remedy for the relief of superfluous fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills. No starvation required; you may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5lb. to 7lb. weekly. They are a harmless vegetable preparation; successful in the most stubborn cases, and improve health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, tasteless, and highly recommended. Prices, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., post free, plain wrapper. PROFESSOR F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

March 6, 1897.

No. 11.

S.S. S.S.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 11.

Mar. 6, 1897.

NEWSAGENTS

S.S. S.S.

REGD.

Dr. Mackenzie's

ARSENICAL TOILET

SOAP.

Prepared with special ingredients as a beautifier of the skin and complexion, and guaranteed to contain a small but absolutely harmless quantity of arsenic. Produces a lovely skin and complexion, and cures spots, pimples, redness, and freckles. The finest and purest soap made. Absolutely harmless. But beware of the many worthless imitations. Have Dr. Mackenzie's or none. Deliciously and expensively perfumed, at all Stores and Chemists', 1s. per tablet. 3 in box, 2/6, or post free from S. Harvey, London Bridge, S.E. This soap can also be had without arsenic.

HAIR DESTROYED.

An American lady who has entirely destroyed Superfluous Hair on herself will, on receipt of stamped addressed envelope, send free particulars of the Remedy to all those afflicted. Address, Mrs. C. H. McCOY, 2, Lambeth Square, London, S.E.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ¼lb., 10d.; ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; 2lb., 4s. 4d.; including tin and postage.

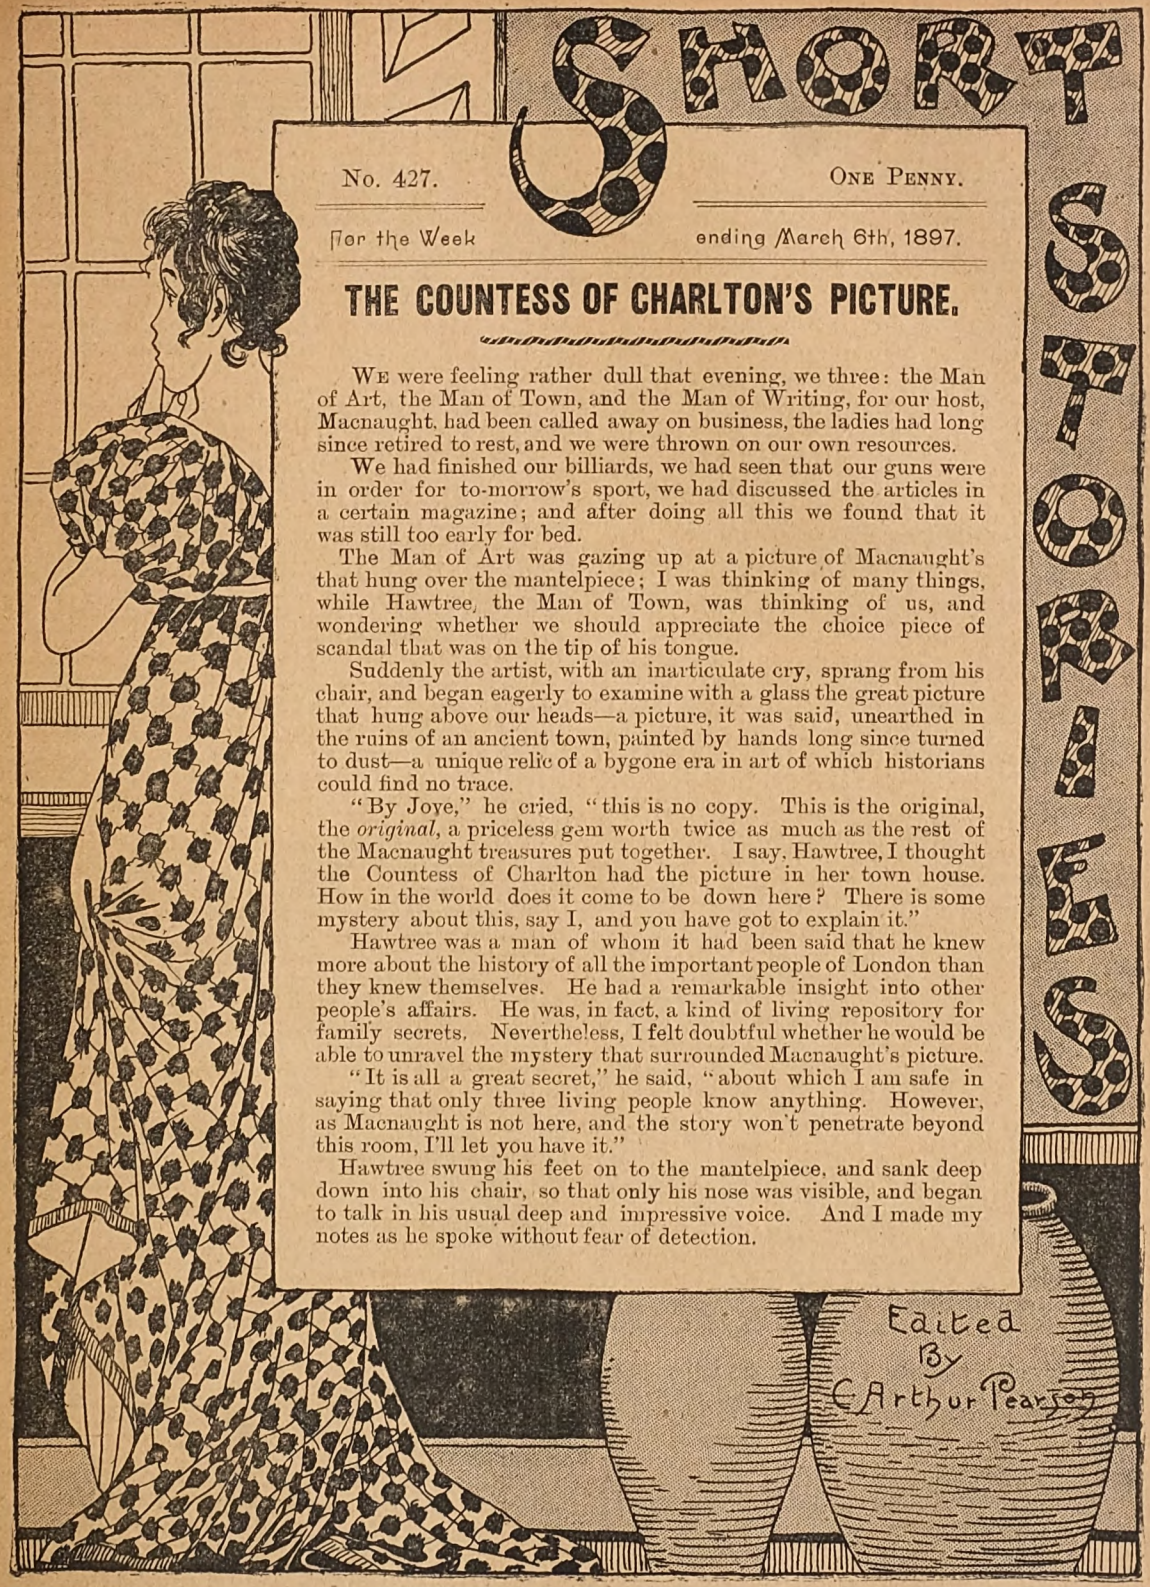
MRS. CONYERS,

KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

Fully Guaranteed. Lists and Testimonials Post Free. Over 1,000 New and Secondhand Cycles on Sale or Exchange. Easy Terms to suit all. Tuition Free in School to Purchasers. Trade supplied. — BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO., 42, High Street, Camden Town, London.

CYCLE AUCTION SALES.—Every Tuesday & Thursday, 7 p.m.; Saturday, 3.30. Largest Cycle Sale Rooms in London. Over 2,000 Cycles. Open 9 till 9. Inspection from the Trade and Public invited. Auction Catalogues Free. Tattersalls of the Cycle Trade.—79, Queen's Road, Bayswater (next door to Metropolitan Railway Station).



THE COUNTESS OF CHARLTON'S PICTURE.

We were feeling rather dull that evening, we three: the Man of Art, the Man of Town, and the Man of Writing, for our host, Macnaught, had been called away on business, the ladies had long since retired to rest, and we were thrown on our own resources.

We had finished our billiards, we had seen that our guns were in order for to-morrow's sport, we had discussed the articles in a certain magazine; and after doing all this we found that it was still too early for bed.

The Man of Art was gazing up at a picture of Macnaught's that hung over the mantelpiece; I was thinking of many things, while Hawtree, the Man of Town, was thinking of us, and wondering whether we should appreciate the choice piece of scandal that was on the tip of his tongue.

Suddenly the artist, with an inarticulate cry, sprang from his chair, and began eagerly to examine with a glass the great picture that hung above our heads—a picture, it was said, unearthed in the ruins of an ancient town, painted by hands long since turned to dust—a unique relic of a bygone era in art of which historians could find no trace.

"By Joye," he cried, "this is no copy. This is the original, the original, a priceless gem worth twice as much as the rest of the Macnaught treasures put together. I say, Hawtree, I thought the Countess of Charlton had the picture in her town house. How in the world does it come to be down here? There is some mystery about this, say I, and you have got to explain it."

Hawtree was a man of whom it had been said that he knew more about the history of all the important people of London than they knew themselves. He had a remarkable insight into other people's affairs. He was, in fact, a kind of living repository for family secrets. Nevertheless, I felt doubtful whether he would be able to unravel the mystery that surrounded Macnaught's picture.

"It is all a great secret," he said, "about which I am safe in saying that only three living people know anything. However, as Macnaught is not here, and the story won't penetrate beyond this room, I'll let you have it."

Hawtree swung his feet on to the mantelpiece, and sank deep down into his chair, so that only his nose was visible, and began to talk in his usual deep and impressive voice. And I made my notes as he spoke without fear of detection.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"You must know, then, that this picture," said he, waving his hand to the mantelpiece, "is a priceless work of art that is as unique as it is valuable. It is impossible to say whose hand laid those marvellous colours. It is impossible, too, to say at what date the picture was painted, or for whose pleasure it was designed. Its whole history is wrapped in mystery. All that is known for certain is that it was discovered some three or four hundred years ago beneath the ruins of an ancient town, and that when it was brought to light it nearly caused a world-wide war on the question of its ownership. An English general, however, succeeded in gaining possession of it by a skilful strategy, and immediately packed it off to his family at home, with whom it has remained until it fell into the hands of our friend Macnaught."

Having finished this magnificent, if somewhat vague peroration, Hawtree looked round suddenly, barely giving me time to drop my note-book to the floor, and to disguise with a quick cough the quiet chuckle on which I had ventured.

When he had satisfied himself that I was giving him my whole attention, and that the artist was doing the same, he again buried himself in the recesses of his chair, while I stealthily reached out for my note-book and continued taking down his words as he gave utterance to them.

"It was an original notion of our friend Macnaught to make a collection, as he called it, of the unique works of art of the world. Money is a quick worker and it was not long before Macnaught found himself in possession of many treasures of which there were no duplicates in existence. Thus, that picture to the left was painted by a French artist, whose name, unfortunately, has escaped me. A genuine work of art, is it not? No sooner was it hung at the Salon, than Paris was at the man's feet, dealers were clamouring for his work, and he was generally considered the coming artist of the century. A day later he committed suicide, leaving his immortal masterpiece behind him. Macnaught immediately bought it. Again, that picture on the opposite wall is the sole remaining work in existence of an early Italian artist. The colour is worthy of Titian.

"Well, this rather curious collection that Macnaught was making was already well known, when he heard, for the first time, the full history of this picture that now adorns his wall. Immediately, the desire to own it took full possession of him. He actually made a space for it on the wall, and thought of nothing else through the day, and dreamt of it through the night. If everything else failed I fully believe that he would have murdered the owner and carried it away by force.

"The picture had remained in the family of the old general who had taken it after it had been unearthed from the ruined city. As a sacred relic it had been handed down from father to son until the fifth generation, when it was owned by its lawful mistress, the Countess of Charlton.

"At this time, when the fever was strongly on him, business made it impossible for Macnaught to journey down from this place of his in Scotland to London, to personally inspect the picture. So well, however, had its charms been described to him, my humble voice being among those that urged him to procure it at any cost, that Macnaught determined to boldly write to the Countess of Charlton, and make her a direct offer for the picture. This he accordingly did, and for six days afterwards his soul was in torment.

"On the seventh day a letter was handed to him, heavily crested, and bearing the London post-mark. It was short, and very much to the point. The Countess of Charlton, it ran, while thanking Mr. Macnaught for his offer of her picture, regretted that she was unable to accept it.

"Macnaught was furious. He raved up and down his studio, tore his hair, threatened the life of the Countess, and swore unceasingly great Scotch oaths in the broadest dialect for the remainder of the day.

"When he grew a little calmer, he sat down, and dashed off another letter to the Countess, explaining his reasons, and offering her a prodigious sum for the picture.

"The letter that came by return made him all the more determined to have his way. It was something like this:

"Dear Mr. Macnaught,—I must again thank you for your kind offer for my picture, which, I may say in confidence, I should be only too pleased to accept, were it not for the fact that it is absolutely out of my power to do so. It is, as you say, a unique work of art, and would no doubt be a grace to your collection. It has been in our family for hundreds of years as a sacred relic. When it is passed on from one generation to another a clause is invariably inserted in the will to the effect that it must, on no account, go out of the family. If this is done, the whole of the property and wealth that goes with the picture is to be forfeited. You see, therefore, that much as I would personally like to accept the money which your liberality offers, it is quite impossible for me to think of doing so.

"Yours very sincerely,

"Cecilian Charlton.

"'Cecilian Charlton be hanged,' roared Macnaught when he read this letter, 'will or no will, I ken verra weel I'll have that picture.'

"So he took a pound of tobacco, and shut himself up in his room and sat thinking of ways and means for the remainder of the day.

"Now Macnaught was a canny Scotsman, and the more he considered the letter, the more one or two points impressed themselves on his mind. In the first place, from a financial point of view, it was evident the Countess of Charlton might be termed very hard up; in the second place, she did not care a jot whether she had the picture that hung in her drawing-room, or whether any one else had it; and in the third place she was not an exceptionally scrupulous woman. And as Macnaught thought of these things several ideas occurred to him.

"It seemed to him that if, on some pretence or other, he made a copy of this picture, it would not be a very hard matter to transpose the two, and put his copy in place of the original. Then all that he had to do was to run off with his precious burden, and he would find himself in possession of one of the priceless treasures of the world, and no one would be the wiser.

"Now Macnaught was a Scotsman, and a religious man to boot, although the passion of his art caused him perhaps to do some things that he had better left undone. So when this thought of stealing the picture came to him, he sprang to his feet, and shouted:

"'Na, na, I will not sell my soul for a woman; but I will have her picture whether she cares or not.'

"So he sat down again, and thought it all over once more, and the idea of transposing the pictures stayed in his mind. And before he was half through the tobacco he had found the way."

Here Hawtree came to a pause, for he had been talking for a long while and feared that we might be dozing. So he sat up in his chair, and mixed himself a long drink, which he drank off at a gulp, so as to save future interruptions. While he was doing this I looked through my notes to see whether the story was promising. How was Macnaught to gain the picture that he coveted? He could make a copy, and transpose the two, and steal the genuine picture, but this he would not do. And the Countess of Charlton was not to be bribed, although she was not a scrupulous woman. I could see no way, so I implored Hawtree to continue.

Digitized by Google

"That afternoon Macnaught rode over to the town, and, going to the hotel, took an official piece of note-paper, and wrote his third letter to the Countess. In this he posed, I am ashamed to say, as an American millionaire, incidentally mentioning that he had made his money out of buttons. He had recently bought a mansion in New York, he said, and was anxious to obtain a few startling English pictures wherewith to ornament his walls. He had heard that the Countess of Charlton possessed a picture, the like of which there was none in existence. That was the very thing he wanted and he guessed that it would "knock" his friends. He would be pleased to pay, therefore, any price that the Countess would ask for it, and he added that she need not be careful as to a thousand or two. He then went on to say that if the Countess would sell the picture, he would send a good artist down to make a copy for her to keep in remembrance.

"'Personally,' said he, 'I should not know the copy from the original, and as I am shortly to return to America, no doubt you will kindly see that it is well packed. I very much regret that I am not able to come from Scotland to see you personally about the matter.'

"This extraordinary letter took Macnaught a long while to compose, and when it was finished he took it out to post it with his own hands, and then returned to the hotel to wait for the reply.

"When it came, people thought that the worthy artist had taken leave of his senses, for he did nothing but pat his chest, and chuckle mightily to himself.

"For the third letter of the Countess of Charlton said that she would be pleased to accept the American's offer, although the figure that she mentioned would have caused a start even to a millionaire. And would he please send an artist to make a copy as soon as possible?"

Here Hawtree paused to say that if we were getting tired of his story he would finish it to-morrow. But the artist remarked that he might as well finish it off now he had begun it, and since I was interested to see how Macnaught gained his picture in the end, I told him to go on.

"Macnaught," went on Hawtree, as fresh as though he had but begun to tell his story, "returned to his house, said good-bye to his friends, and taking a train to London, went to a barber's shop and had himself shaved, in case the Countess might by any chance recognise his face, and then presented himself at her door, saying that he had come from the American millionaire to paint her picture."

"Then, Macnaught," said the artist, "and the American millionaire, and the man who went to paint the picture, were all one and the same man?"

"Precisely," said Hawtree, "they were all characters in the plot that he had devised. Well, the Countess received Macnaught very graciously, and herself helped him take the picture from the wall, and place it where he might have the best light. Then he set to work, and, acting on a whim of the Countess, he made the very back of the canvasses the same, so that as the picture grew he had difficulty in telling the one from the other.

"Every morning the Countess came in and admired his work, and she seemed especially pleased when she saw how alike the two pictures were. At the end of a month Macnaught had finished his painting, and when he had allowed his picture to dry, he examined it closely, and thought that an ignorant person might very well think that the one was as good as the other.

"Then he sat down, and mopped his brow, and thought very hard of many things, for now the time for action had come. Then he sprang up hastily, lest his courage should forsake him. He took up the original painting that had been found in the ruins of the ancient city, and tore it away from its frame, and put his own painting in place of it. But he did not steal it, but merely placed it on his easel.

"'For,' said he, 'why should I sell my soul to this woman?'

"Then he sought out the Countess, and made his adieux to her, remarking that he had had a letter from his American patron asking him to request that the painting should be sent off immediately he had finished the copy.

"Then he left the house, and returned hastily to Scotland. Soon after he had arrived, the painting came to the hotel. With trembling fingers he unwrapped the parcel, and then he gave a great shout of joy. For there before him, lying snugly in its case, was the genuine picture that had belonged to the Countess of Charlton, the priceless gem of art, the thing that he coveted more than all the world.

"For the Countess, you understand, had fallen into the trap that he had laid for her, and thinking, no doubt, that to the millionaire button-maker one picture was as good as another, she had deliberately sent him, what, in her own mind, she thought to be a copy of the original picture.

"And this is the history of the painting that you see before you. Macnaught, however, did not send the Countess the large cheque that he had promised. He wrote her a letter in which he said he feared that she had very much misunderstood his former letters, for it was the original picture that he wanted, and not the copy that she had sent. He therefore was not prepared to pay her the large sum she had asked, but forwarded her the same amount that he had paid the artist, and trusted that she would find this satisfactory.

"He slipped in a cheque for five hundred pounds, and that is all that he has ever paid for one of the priceless treasures of the world. It is said that the unscrupulous Countess of Charlton fell into a fit, through chagrin and disappointment, when she read this letter. Yet she could do nothing."

"But how was it," asked the artist, "that the Countess did not bluff the matter out, and say that she had sent the wrong picture by mistake, and wished to sell him the genuine one?"

"You forget," replied Hawtree, "that it was completely out of her power to sell the picture at all. Is there anything else you can't understand?"

I looked through my notes to see if everything was quite clear. Macnaught, I gathered, had posed as an ignorant American, had gone himself to paint a copy of the picture, had transposed the two, trusting that the Countess would send away what she considered to be the copy. And in this he was not disappointed, for the Countess had fallen into his trap. So he had gained the picture, without stealing, or without hurting his Scotch conscience.

"Would you like me to go over the story again?" said Hawtree, "it is a little complicated."

"Don't trouble," replied the artist, "for now that you have finished I think I'll be going to bed."

Marcus Tintal.

Digitized by Google

On the night of February 13th, 1797, an English fleet of fifteen ships of the line in close order, and in readiness for instant battle, was under easy sail off Cape St. Vincent. It was a moonless night, black with haze, and the great ships moved in silence like gigantic spectres over the sea.

Every now and again there came floating from the south-east the dull sound of a far-off gun. It was the grand fleet of Spain, consisting of twenty-seven ships of line, under Admiral Don Josef de Cordova; one great ship calling to another through the night, little dreaming that the sound of their guns was so keenly noted by the eager but silent fleet of their enemies to leeward.

The morning of the 14th—a day famous in the naval history of the Empire—broke dim and hazy, grey sea, grey fog, grey dawn, making all things strangely obscure. At half-past six, however, the keen-sighted British outlooks caught a glimpse of the huge, straggling line of Spaniards, stretching apparently through miles of sea haze.

"They are thumpers!" as the signal lieutenant of the Barfleur reported with emphasis to his captain; "they loom like Beachy Head in a fog."

The Spanish fleet was, indeed, the mightiest ever sent from Spanish ports since "that great fleet invincible" of 1588 carried into the English waters—but not out of them——

The richest spoils of Mexico, the stoutest hearts of Spain.

The Admiral's flag was borne by the Santissima Trinidad, a floating mountain, the largest ship at that time on the sea, and carrying on her four decks 130 guns. Next came six three-deckers, carrying 112 guns each; two ships of the line of eighty guns each, and seventeen carrying seventy-four guns, with no fewer than twelve thirty-four-gun frigates, to act as flying cordon of skirmishers.

Spain had joined France against Britain on September 12th, 1796, and Don Cordova, at the head of this immense fleet, had sailed from Cadiz to execute a daring and splendid strategy. He was to pick up the Toulon fleet, brush away the English squadron blockading Brest, add the great French fleet, lying imprisoned there, to his forces, and enter the British Channel with over a hundred sail of the line under his flag, and sweep in triumph to the mouth of the Thames.

If the plan succeeded, Portugal would fall, a descent was to be made on Ireland, and the British flag, it was reckoned, would be swept from the seas.

Sir John Jervis was lying in the track of the Spaniards to defeat this ingenious plan. Five ships of the line had been withdrawn from the squadron blockading Brest to strengthen him; still he had only fifteen ships against the twenty-seven huge Spaniards in front of him; whilst, if the French Toulon Fleet behind him broke out, he ran the risk of being crushed, so to speak, betwixt the upper and the nether millstone.

Never, perhaps, was the naval supremacy of England challenged so boldly, and with such a prospect of success, as at this moment.

The Northern powers had coalesced under Russia, and only a few weeks later the British guns were thundering over the roofs of Copenhagen, while the united flags of France and Spain were preparing to sweep through the narrow seas.

The "splendid isolation" of to-day is no novelty. In 1796, as it threatened to be in 1896, Great Britain stood singly against a world in arms, and it is scarcely too much to say that her fate hung on the fortunes of the fleet that, in the grey dawn of St. Valentine's Day a hundred years ago, was searching the skyline for the topmasts of Don Cordova's huge three-deckers.

Fifteen to twenty-seven is enormous odds, but, on the testimony of Nelson himself, a better fleet never carried the fortunes of a great country than that under Sir John Jervis. The mere names of the ships, or of their commanders, awaken more sonorous echoes than the famous catalogue of the ships in the "Iliad." Among them Trowbridge, in the Culloden, led the van; the line was formed of such ships as the Victory, the flag-ship, the Barfleur, the Blenheim, the Captain, with Nelson as Commodore, the Excellent, under Collingwood, the Colossus, under Murray, and the Orion, under Sir James Saumarez.

Finer sailors and more daring leaders never bore down upon an enemy's fleet. The picture offered by the two fleets in the cold haze of that fateful morning, as a matter of fact, reflected the difference in their fighting and sea-going qualities.

The Spanish fleet, a line of monsters, straggled formless and shapeless over miles of sea space, distracted with signals, fluttering with many coloured flags. The British fleet, grim and silent, bore down upon the enemy in two compact and firm drawn columns, ship following ship so closely and so exactly that bowsprit and stern almost touched, while an air-line drawn from the foremast of the leading ship to the mizen-mast of the last ship in each column would have touched almost every mast betwixt. Stately, measured, threatening, in perfect fighting order, the compact line of the British bore down on the Spaniards.

Nothing is more striking in the Battle of St. Vincent than the swift and resolute fashion in which Sir John Jervis leapt, so to speak, at his enemy's throat, with the silent but deadly leap of a bull-dog. As the fog lifted about nine o'clock, with the suddenness and dramatic effect of the lifting of a curtain in a great theatre, it revealed to the British Admiral a great opportunity. The weather division of the Spanish fleet, twenty-one gigantic ships, resembled nothing so much as a confused and swaying forest of masts; the leeward division—six ships in a cluster, almost as confused—was parted by an interval of nearly three miles from the main body of the fleet; and into that fatal gap, as with the swift and deadly thrust of a rapier, Jervis drove his fleet in one unswerving line, the two columns melting into one, ship following hard on ship.

Digitized by Google

The Spaniards strove furiously to close their line, the twenty-one huge ships bearing down from the windward, the smaller squadron clawing desperately up from the leeward. But the British fleet—a long line of gliding pyramids of sails, leaning over to the pressure of the wind, with "the meteor flag" flying from the peak of each vessel, and the curving lines of guns awaiting grim and silent beneath—was too swift.

As it swept through the gap the Spanish vice-admiral, in the Principe de Asturias, a great three-decker of 112 guns, tried the daring feat of breaking through the British line to join the severed squadron. He struck the English fleet almost exactly at the flag-ship, the Victory. The Victory was thrown into stays to meet her, the Spaniard swung round in response, and, exactly as her quarter was exposed to the broadside of the Victory, the thunder of a tremendous broadside rolled from that ship.

The unfortunate Spaniard was smitten as with a tempest of iron, and the next moment, with sails torn, topmasts hanging to leeward, ropes hanging loose in every direction, and her decks splashed red with the blood of her slaughtered crew, she broke off to windward.

The iron line of the British was unpierceable!

The leading three-decker of the Spanish lee division in like manner bore up, as though to break through the British line to join her admiral; but the grim succession of three-deckers following swift on each other like the links of a moving iron chain was too disquieting a prospect to be faced. It was not in Spanish seamanship, or, for the matter of that, in Spanish flesh and blood, to beat up in the teeth of such threatening lines of iron lips.

The Spanish ships swung suddenly back to leeward, and the fleet of Don Cordova was cloven in twain, as though by the stroke of some gigantic sword blade.

As soon as Sir John Jervis saw the steady line of his fleet drawn fair across the gap in the Spanish line, he flung his leading ships up to windward on the mass of the Spanish fleet, by this time beating up to windward. The Culloden led, thrust itself betwixt the hindermost Spanish three-deckers, and broke into flame and thunder on either side.

Six minutes after her came the Blenheim, then, in quick succession, the Prince George, the Orion, the Colossus. It was a crash of swaying masts and bellying sails, while below rose the shouting of the crews, and like the thrusts of fiery swords the flames shot out from the sides of the great three-deckers against each other, and over all rolled the thunder and the smoke of a Titanic sea-fight.

Nothing more murderous than close fighting betwixt the huge wooden ships of those days can well be imagined. The Victory, the largest British ship present in the action, was only 186ft. long and 52ft. broad; yet in that little area a thousand men fought, a hundred great guns thundered!

A Spanish ship like the San Josef was 194ft. in length and 54ft. in breadth; but in that area 112 guns were mounted, while the three decks were thronged with some 1,300 men. When floating batteries like these swept each other with the flame of swiftly repeated broadsides at a distance of a few score yards, the destruction may be better imagined than described.

The Spanish had an advantage in the number of guns and men, but the British established an instant mastery by their silent discipline, their perfect seamanship, and the speed with which their guns were worked. They fired at least three broadsides to every two the Spaniards discharged, and their fire had a deadly precision compared with which that of the Spaniards was mere distracted spluttering.

Meanwhile the dramatic crisis of the battle came swiftly on. The Spanish admiral was resolute to join the severed fragments of his fleet; the Culloden, the Blenheim, the Prince George, and the Orion were thundering amongst his rearmost ships, and as the British line swept up, each ship tacked as it crossed the gap in the Spanish line, bore up to windward, and added the thunder of its guns to the storm of battle raging amongst the hindmost Spaniards.

Position of British and Spanish fleets at 9 a.m. on February 14th, 1797.

But, naturally, the section of the British line that had not yet passed the gap shortened with every minute, and the leading Spanish ships at last saw the sea to their leeward clear of the enemy, and the track open to their own lee squadron. Instantly they swung round to leeward, the great four-decker, the flag-ship, with a company of sister giants, the San Josef and the Salvador del Mundo, of 112 guns each, the San Nicolas, and three other great ships of 80 guns.

It was a bold and clever stroke. This great squadron, with the breeze behind it, had but to sweep past the rear of the British line, join the lee squadron, and bear up, and the Spanish fleet in one unbroken mass would confront the enemy.

The rear of the British line was held by Collingwood in the Excellent, next to him came the Diadem; the third ship was the Captain, under Nelson. We may imagine how Nelson's solitary eye was fixed on the great Spanish three-deckers that formed the Spanish van as they suddenly swung round and came sweeping down to cross his stern. Not Napoleon himself had a vision more swift and keen for the changing physiognomy of a great battle than Nelson, and he met the Spanish admiral with a counter stroke as brilliant and daring as can be found in the whole history of naval warfare.

Digitized by Google

The party swept through on to the main deck.

The British fleet saw the Captain suddenly swing out of line to leeward—in the direction from the Spanish line, that is—but with swift curve the Captain doubled back, shot between the two English ships that formed the rear of the line, and bore up straight in the path of the Spanish flag-ship, with its four decks, and the huge battleships on either side of it.

The Captain, it should be remembered, was the smallest seventy-four in the British fleet, and as the great Spanish ships closed round her and broke into flame, it seemed as if each one of them was big enough to hoist the Captain on board like a jolly boat.

Nelson's sudden movement was a breach of orders. It left a gap in the British line. To dash unsupported into the Spanish van seemed mere madness, and the spectacle, as the Captain opened fire on the huge Santissima Trinidad, was simply amazing. Nelson was in action at once with the flag-ship of 130 guns, two ships of 112 guns, one of 80 guns, and two of 74 guns.

To the spectators who watched the sight, the sides of the Captain seemed to throb with quick-following pulses of flame as its crew poured their shot into the huge hulks on every side of them. The Spaniards formed a mass so tangled that they could scarcely fire at the little Captain without injuring each other. Yet the little English ship seemed to shrivel beneath even the imperfect fire that did reach her.

Her foremast was shot away, her wheel-post shattered, her rigging torn, some of her guns dismantled, and the ship was practically incapable of further service either in the line or in chase. But Nelson had accomplished his purpose. He had stopped the rush of the Spanish van.

At this moment the Excellent, under Collingwood, swept into the storm of battle that raged round the Captain, and poured three tremendous broadsides into the Spanish three-decker, the Salvador del Mundo, that practically disabled her.

"We were not further from her," the domestic but hard-fighting Collingwood wrote to his wife, "than the length of our garden."

Then, with a fine feat of seamanship, the Excellent passed between the Captain and the San Nicolas, scourging that unfortunate ship with flame at a distance of ten yards, and then passed on to bestow its favours on the Santissima Trinidad. "Such a ship," Collingwood afterwards confided to his wife, "as I never saw before!"

Collingwood tormented that monster with his fire so vehemently that she actually struck, though possession of her was not taken before the other Spanish ships, coming up, rescued her, and she survived to carry the Spanish flag in the great fight of Trafalgar.

Meanwhile the crippled Captain, though actually disabled, had performed one of the most dramatic and brilliant feats in the history of naval warfare. Nelson put his helm to starboard, and ran, or rather drifted, on the quarter gallery of the San Nicolas, and at once boarded that leviathan.

Digitized by Google

Nelson himself crept through the quarter gallery window in the stern of the Spaniard, and found himself in the officers' cabin. The officers tried to show fight, but there was no denying the boarders who followed Nelson, and with shout and oath, with flash of pistol and ring of steel, the party swept through on to the main deck. But the San Nicolas had been boarded also at other points.

"The first man who jumped into the enemy's mizzen-chains," says Nelson, "was the first lieutenant of the ship, afterwards Captain Berry."

The English sailors dropped from their spritsail yard on to the Spaniard's deck, and by the time Nelson reached the poop of the San Nicolas, he found his lieutenant in the act of hauling down the Spanish flag. Nelson proceeded to collect the swords of the Spanish officers when a fire was opened upon them from the stern gallery of the admiral's ship, the San Josef, of 112 guns, whose sides were grinding against those of the San Nicolas. What could Nelson do? To keep his prize he must assault a still bigger ship. Of course he never hesitated! He flung his boarders up the side of the huge San Josef, but he himself, who was by no means robust, had to be assisted to climb the main chains of that vessel, his lieutenant this time dutifully assisting his commodore up instead of indecorously going ahead of him.

"At this moment," as Nelson records the incident, "a Spanish officer looked over the quarter-deck rail and said they surrendered. It was not long before I was on the quarter-deck, where the Spanish captain, with a bow, presented me his sword, and said the admiral was dying of his wounds. I asked him, on his honour, if the ship was surrendered. He declared she was, on which I gave him my hand, and desired him to call on his officers and ship's company and tell them of it, which he did, and on the quarter-deck of a Spanish first-rate—extravagant as the story may seem—did I take the swords of vanquished Spaniards, which, as I received, I gave to William Fearney, one of my bargemen, who put them, with the greatest sang-froid, under his arm, a circle of 'old Agamemnons,' with smoke-blackened faces, looking on in grim approval."

This is the story of how a British fleet of fifteen vessels defeated a Spanish fleet of twenty-seven, and captured four of their finest ships. It is the story, too, of how a single English ship, the smallest 74 in the fleet—but made unconquerable by the presence of Nelson—stayed the advance of a whole squadron of Spanish three-deckers, and took two ships, each bigger than itself, by boarding.

Nelson disobeyed orders by leaving the English line and flinging himself on the van of the Spaniards, but he saved the battle.

Calder, Jervis's captain, complained to the admiral that Nelson had "disobeyed orders."

"He certainly did," answered Jervis; "and if ever you commit such a breach of orders I will forgive you also."

Digitized by Google

KNOLLYS' STORY.

Those who know my friend Knollys only casually are apt to set him down as a cynic, because, at times, his speech is slightly mordant and he is given to ridiculing bravery and charity as madness; but I know danger holds no dread for him, and have accidently happened on some of his many good deeds. To me he has always seemed a man of unusally lenient judgment, putting the best construction possible on the evil actions of his fellows; though his own life is beautifully clean, he takes people as he finds them, not feeling called upon to attempt to revolutionise the world.

If I am unreasonably proud of my friendship with Knollys, it is pardonable, for he is an experienced man of the world, who must be nearing fifty, whereas I am not yet thirty. Ever since he saved my life in India, at the imminent risk of his own, he holds, he feels, a certain amount of responsibility on my account, and I am only too willing to view the world under his tutelage.

But I am glad that my mother did not hear him relate the story that spoiled my dinner, which was assuredly a good one, since he ordered it. She maintains that Knollys is extremely unsympathetic; and, prejudiced as she is, she would not have observed that, under his cold exterior, there lurked a warm pity for his friend.

It had been arranged, during his short stay with us, that in two months I should join him in London; and the prospect of another delightful run across the Continent with him made me somewhat forgetful of the fact that it was his last night in this city.

He had rashly promised my cousin to visit his rose-gardens, and on that afternoon redeemed his word. When we met at the club I noticed that Knollys appeared tired. He stood at the window, apart from the other men, looking across at the plaza, and did not at first notice me.

"I suppose it was irksome," I began, "for Tom can talk of nothing but his wife and his roses. You see they are renewing their honeymoon. Their affairs looked very black for a time, but suddenly righted themselves, and their friends are suffering the consequences."

Knollys ceased to watch the wavering shadows of the trees, and turned inquiringly.

"It was a misunderstanding," I continued, as we walked out to dinner; "Tom forgot that appearances are often misleading, and she was unable to furnish a satisfactory explanation of her conduct."

"I conjectured something of the kind from what he told me coming back to the city, and it reminded me strongly of a little episode in the life of a friend of mine. And she, too, in some indefinable way—some turn of the head or the trick of the voice—recalled my friend's wife. The story might interest you."

"I am sure it would," I returned eagerly, for Knollys is always well worth hearing.

"It happened some years ago, but I think I remember the points quite well," he commenced, smiling faintly; "I am not so certain, however, that I shall be able to do the story justice, for I am not a clever raconteur, and you will probably surmise the end long ere I have reached it. My friend—we might call him Smith—my friend Smith was able to be of some service to a man whom he met in a foreign land. The man met with a fatal accident, a few days later, and, together with the valet, Smith volunteered to nurse him. The stranger, feeling he had a claim on Smith because of the first favour, burdened him with the pleasant task of bearing the news of his death to his wife.

"Upon Smith's return to England, he carried out his mission, and having gone once, went again. She was a very young woman, and very beautiful, and Smith was irresistibly attracted. Her husband had been a scoundrel, and, after a decent lapse of time, she married Smith. For the first four years of their marriage they were so intensely happy that it is possible they proved rather tiresome to their friends. About that time Smith began to miss money and other articles of value, and was finally able to trace the thefts to the butler. The man vainly denied the charge, and, although none of the missing valuables were found in his possession, he was discharged without a character. This mild measure was adopted because of the intercessions of my friend's wife.

"For some weeks Smith entertained no doubt that he had fastened the burglaries on the proper party, but on returning home one evening he found his wife in the library. She had opened his desk by means of a false key, and in her hands held a roll of notes. Guilt was depicted in every feature: she cowered before him—she was abject in her cowardice."

"She needed the money to save a brother," I broke in authoritatively.

"No; she had no brother nor any near relative who might need help," Knollys said, as he set down his glass. "The man, anxious to find some excuse for her, suggested this; but it was no relative. It was for herself; yet she had wanted for nothing that money could buy or love devise. He might not have conceived her sin to be so flagrant had she not permitted the servant to suffer in her stead. So far as it was possible, Smith made restitution to the man; but by her silence she had convicted herself of the most heinous of all transgressions in her husband's eyes. There was one way only in which he could explain the matter to himself. He had never believed in kleptomania until then, but it was the one thing upon which his mind centred. And she confessed she had often felt impelled to take valuables for which she could have no possible need.

"He was a proud man, and he was tortured by his discovery. He had regarded his wife, his child, and himself as being made of finer clay than the rest of mankind. His disillusion was complete. The day after she was unmasked she came into a splendid inheritance, but Smith rigorously refused to permit the expenditure of any of it in the household.

He dared not leave her for an instant, thinking the desire might come back to her. He sacrificed his pride by telling the true state of affairs to her maid, a trusted servant, and together they kept vigilant guard over her. It was the most insidious cruelty he could contrive—one that must have wounded her sorely. She was never permitted to lose sight of her sins. He was inflexible in his course, keeping her always under his relentless eyes. My friend Smith thought himself, in those days, quite capable of accusing and judging his prisoner, and seeing that the sentence was properly carried out. When she seemed to forget for an instant her past error, Smith ever so gently turned the thumb-screws. Ah, he really devised modes of exquisite torture that she should properly expiate her crime!

Digitized by Google

"No, she did not rebel; she drearily accepted the penalty of her guilt. At first she lived in deadly fear lest he should send her away from him; but when she found it was part of his plan to be with her constantly, she seemed content. She could not, rather would not, grow accustomed to the thought that she had forfeited Smith's love. During the first few days she hovered round him, hoping to lure some expression of pardon from him, some word of love. Never forgetting that she bore his name, he treated her with a cold civility that was more frightful to her than would have been an exhibition of brute force. He was disciplining himself all the while in repressing his feelings, for, as you have perhaps suspected, he loved her as passionately as ever.

"She devoted herself to the child, who had become a source of constant agony to Smith. If he took a fruit or sweetmeat that had been forbidden him, it became to Smith's fevered imagination evidence that he had inherited his mother's weakness; in other days it would have seemed the child's lovable fault or play.

"The child slept in his mother's apartments, and Smith was about to retire one night when his wife came in hurriedly, bidding him send immediately for their physician, for the little one was choking. Smith went back with her, and, after seeing the child, left the room—she thought to send for the family physician. She used the simple remedies that had formerly proved effectual, but without avail. She looked at Smith when he came back, but he did not speak.

"At length he told her that he had not summoned a physician, believing it better that the child should die."

"What?" I cried, aghast, my loud tone in marked contrast to his low, unhurried words.

"You are not eating," remarked Knollys, as he reflectively regarded the bead that had formed round the edge of his glass. "You are astonished at my friend's action, but he himself did not question the wisdom of its course; perhaps it did not occur to him that he could err. Better, he thought, to cause himself one sharp pang than untold misery to the bitter end. In fact, he believed he was doing a very good deed—to consign your child to death is not such a simple matter as it might appear. When the mother learnt what he had done, she was wildly indignant for an instant, then quietly placed the child in his crib and stoically watched his sufferings. And what had seemed quite right and courageous in himself struck Smith as monstrous in the mother. You are neglecting your fillet. You will find it——"

"But the mother?" I reminded.

"The mother?" echoed Knollys wearily. "You progress too rapidly. Smith was able to dismiss from his mind the idea that he had been instrumental in bringing about the little fellow's death, for it would have been impossible for the physician to reach the house before the child expired. The mother, however, did not reason with so much finesse, and, after the death of her child, faded visibly. In this instance, physicians were called in, but what they might have been able to do for the child they could not do for the mother. It is true she could not have found life very joyous, but her doctors agreed they had never seen anyone so determined to escape from the world. There was no illness—only a growing languidness, a gradual putting by of the smallest tasks, and a want of will to recover. If ever a woman died of a broken heart, it was my friend's wife."

"Did she give no explanation of her conduct?" I demanded, leaning on the table heavily.

Knollys was looking at something beyond me, and did not hear me until I had reiterated my question.

"So you do not believe she was a kleptomaniac? The explanation did not come from her, but from another quarter," he finally proceeded. "She was delirious for nearly a week before her death. In her lucid moments, she would ask the date, then strive to recollect something that elusively evaded her. She was continually murmuring about some money that was to be sent to someone—whom, they could not determine. Smith had been with her all day, and, towards evening, feeling he must be alone for a while to give vent to his misery, went to the library. The morning's post was awaiting him. The topmost letter was addressed to her in a man's unfamiliar hand. He tore it open, filled with an insane jealousy.

"Ah, of course, you perceive from whom it was. You are in the same position as the novel reader, who, knowing both sides of the story, is aware of the end long before the hero and heroine have lived it out. Unfortunately, Smith knew only his portion of the tale. The missive purported to come from her first husband, whom Smith had helped to bury, but whom she believed to be still alive, and cautioned her to forward his monthly allowance at once, or he would be under the painful necessity of declaring himself to Smith without delay. It was a pity he had not done so long before, as Smith would have recognised the valet. Does it not seem altogether impossible that she should have been so credulous?

"So, you see, the mystery, which Smith had believed to be no mystery, was cleared without her speaking, but a little too late, for, while Smith was reading the letter, she passed away, leaving him in a maze of maddening reflections. He has had a long while to appreciate the bitter pathos of the incident, and sometimes ponders on the problem of whether she would have confessed had he not suggested to her the excuse of kleptomania. Knowing the simplicity of her morals, he comprehends the struggle there must have been while the butler was suffering for her. I think Smith would have pardoned her for taking the money to buy the man, so that he should not make himself known; even her own silence, had he been conscious it was done that she might not be separated from him. Her love for Smith was the one passion of her life, and she paid for it dearly."

"Poor woman," I murmured tritely.

Knollys raised his head, his lips parted in a shadowy smile. "Note how we differ. I should say, 'Poor man.' She is in a place of peace."

"I am glad I am not acquainted with your friend Smith," I observed, trying to shake off the gloom of Knollys' story. "He must be a very sombre companion. Do you see much of him?"

"The world knows nothing of his story; he does not wear his heart on his sleeve. It is only to me that he confesses how dull he finds life. Yes, I see a great deal of my friend Smith—a great deal too much. Let us drink to his early demise. Believe me, it is what would please him best."

ALICE S. WOLF.

Digitized by Google

SUMMARY.

Prologue.—The Hon. Ernest Wentworth lies dying at his estate, Chisholme Park. His wife, a light, pleasure-loving creature, falls under the mesmeric influence of Armand Lemaitre, who, by force of will power, compels her to rob her husband. While in the act of extracting a bundle of notes from a bureau she is interrupted by the appearance of her husband, who enters the room in his bed-clothes, silently points at her with his fore-finger, and then falls down dead. She shortly after leaves for Paris to join Lemaitre.

Nineteen years elapse. Edith Wentworth, who was adopted when a baby by Lady Hilton, is living at Hillcrest Lodge. Among the guests for Christmas are Cécile Delisle, a school-friend of Edith's, Professor Queech, Jack Heathcote, and Captain Arthur Musgrave. At York, on the journey down from King's Cross, Cécile observes that the carriage next to theirs contains a man and a woman. At their destination, a few miles further on, she notices a strange man there alone.

Lemaitre, alias Dr. Danton, arrives at the house as a guest, and exercises an influence over Edith that arouses the jealousy of Arthur, who strikes Danton, and agrees to fight a duel.

A murder is committed at Thorgill Beck. The body of a woman is discovered by one of Farmer Wilson's sons. Cécile deduces from the description of the body that it has been robbed. She visits the spot, and obtains the jewellery from the boy who first discovered the body.

In the duel between Danton and Musgrave only one of the pistols is loaded. Danton is lucky enough to draw the loaded one, but gives Musgrave an opportunity of leaving Hillcrest Lodge, never to return or to speak to Edith. This proposal is refused, with scorn. As the Doctor is about to fire, Cécile comes between the principals. In order to obviate further trouble Arthur agrees to Danton's conditions.

CHAPTER V.

The Face in the Locket.

Arthur sauntered away from the duelling-ground, his hands in his pockets, with a smile of scorn, but a heart that was nigh to breaking. The pledge of honour which he had just given had turned the fair aspect of the world into blackness for him.

Danton and the Professor wandered away by another path. Cécile, very pale and silent, walked towards the Lodge on the arm of Pendragon.

She had not seen Edith since her return from Thorgill Beck. She entered the Lodge, shivering, and hungry, and tired. She went hunting for Edith, and found her upstairs in her room getting dressed for dinner. Cécile lifted her arms to Edith's neck and held up her white face to be kissed.

"But, Cécile, dearest, where have you been? and how pale you look, dear!"

Cécile was dragging her down, kissing her passionately, but did not speak.

"You must not take those lonely rides by yourself," said Edith, pressing Cécile's cheeks tight between her hands, "and look! I am going to wear this sky blue at dinner. He said, you know, that he likes bright hues—oh, don't look so gloomy, my own darlingest love!"

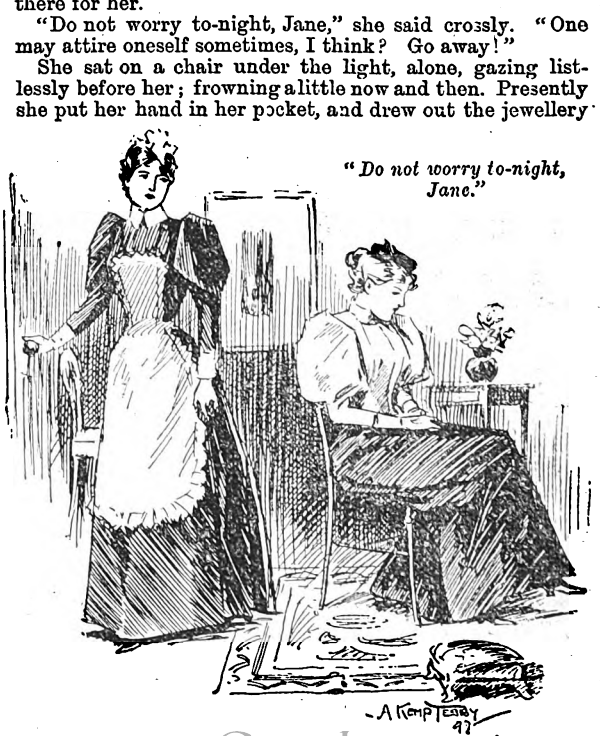
A pang was at Cécile's heart, a whole world of apprehension. Her eyes dropped before Edith's. What were those "conditions" she had heard Arthur accept from Dr. Danton? She could not guess, but she feared.

"I am going to dress," she said, "let me go. I am not feeling like one's own darling to-night."

She screwed herself from Edith's arms, and went away towards her own apartments. There was a maid waiting there for her.

"Do not worry to-night, Jane," she said crossly. "One may attire oneself sometimes, I think? Go away!"

She sat on a chair under the light, alone, gazing listlessly before her; frowning a little now and then. Presently she put her hand in her pocket, and drew out the jewellery



"Do not worry to-night, Jane."

Digitized by Google

she had obtained from Tom Wilson that day. She had not examined the things before, for some other people had got into the compartment of the train with her.

One by one she took them out: the rings—a wedding ring, and one set with diamonds and amethysts; then the watch, all bent and broken, of gold; then the chain bracelet, with battered rings; each of them, one by one, she examined minutely, holding them near to her eyes.

She had left the locket to the last. It was of gold, and slightly battered. As soon as she had it in her hand she started.

"But——" she said, and stopped.

She looked closely at the outside.

"But—but this was worn beneath the dress!"

She had the habit of speaking aloud to herself, in a low, whimpering murmur, when she was searching and probing into any hidden thing.

"Beneath the dress. One sees that by the way the gold has worn smooth on this side. She wore it so for years; she did not wish the locket, then, to be seen? But why not? Ah, because it contains a likeness! And that likeness is not the likeness of her husband. She did not want the husband to see the locket, because she did not want him to see the likeness. The likeness is a likeness of an old love—of a former husband, perhaps. Yes—yes—that is how it is. We shall see. We are near to light—to light!"

But she would not open the locket. Somehow she was afraid. For five minutes she sat with it in her palm, eyeing the outside.

"But this is nonsense!" she said suddenly; and the next moment the locket was open in her hands, and she was pouring over a small oval daguerreotype set in one of the leaves.

She went utterly white.

"My God!"

Her head dropped in her hands on the table.

"Oh, my God!" burst in a groan from her dry lips.

The face which she had seen she knew. It was the face of a man. A face exactly similar hung among the family portraits of the Hiltons in the corridor without.

"She was Edith's mother!" sobbed Cécile—"this—this is the portrait of her father!"

Ten minutes passed, and her head rested still in her hands on the table. Then she rose, calm and pallid, her lips pressed together.

"Well, love," she said, "you shall be avenged! I will find the murderer of your mother!"

When she had dressed hurriedly, and gone down to dinner, the report had already spread that Captain Arthur Musgrave had departed from the Lodge.

He had left a note for Lady Hilton saying that a sudden duty called him away.

"These, then," said Cécile to herself, "were the 'conditions'!"

CHAPTER VI.

In the Conservatory.

The house-party at Hillcrest broke up soon after the middle of January. Nearly the last of the guests to leave was Dr. Danton. Cécile for a whole week had been waiting expectant.

"Why does the man not go?" she said.

She had an invitation to a country-house, near the garrison town of Ilminster, to stay with the St. John-Heygates, and was anxious to be gone. Ilminster was the town at which Arthur's cavalry regiment was now stationed. Cécile wished to be near him.

"You should go, you know," said Edith.

Cécile pouted.

"Do not worry," she said. "I will go when there is need. Now is no hurry."

"But what are you waiting for, darling? I shall want you in London with us soon, you know."

Among the rich foliage of the place they met.

Cécile kept her own counsel, and waited—waited for Danton to go.

Lady Hilton was shortly to leave for Cannes for a few weeks' stay, prior to the opening of the London season. Edith had consented to be parted from Cécile for a little, and was going to Seaton Abbey, the Duke of Grandford's seat. Seaton Abbey is in the same county as Giltwood Towers, the St. John-Heygates' place, and only twenty miles away; so that the two girls could meet as often as they desired.

Cécile waited for Dr. Danton to go.

Tom Wilson had not put in an appearance. Cécile did not forget him, and after waiting a week, wrote this short letter to Thorgill Beck:

"Tom, you've got to come — understand. — Cécile Delisle."

But Tom did not come.

As Cécile was waiting for Danton to go, so was he waiting for her to set out. She kept religiously close to Edith's side, day by day, from morning to night; and Danton was eating his heart out with anxiety to speak to Edith.

"That man believes to outwit me," said Cécile, "but he reckons wrong this time."

"How outwit you, dear?" asked Edith.

"You are not so blind! Here I wait. The Captain Arthur is a lucky man—he has one woman to love him, and another to serve his interests."

"Cécile! you do say things! And I am afraid the Captain is rather undeserving of all this feminine devotion, isn't he?"

"But you love him, Edith?—you love him?"

Edith squeezed her tight in her arms, fearful even to whisper her secret.

"And why undeserving, pray?" asked Cécile.

"The Captain has a most unloverlike lack of ceremony, dear. His departure was abrupt, to say the least of it."

"He had to go," said Cécile.

"Nonsense! why?"

"He had to go. One must trust one's own sweet love. Mind not why. I happen to know that he had to go. I do not choose—at present—to tell everything I know."

"You are too fond of mysteries, Cécile, darling. At least he might have said good-bye."

"I believe he could not. I believe there was a strong reason which prevented him. One must have faith in someone who loves one."

But that night, Cécile notwithstanding, Danton found his chance; only for a minute, as they moved from dinner. Lady Hilton had called back Cécile to mention something to her. And Danton, stooping low over Edith, said:

Digitized by Google

"Once more, before I go, I wish very much to speak with you alone."

His head was close to hers. His brows were frowning.

Edith half-glanced up at him.

"I shall be smoking in the conservatory at nine. Grant me this!"

"I—really——"

"Grant me this, Edith!"

The girl's will melted. Once again that dreamy yielding state, into which close proximity with Danton always brought her, overcame her.

"What is it you're after?"

She whispered the "yes" so low that he had to bend lower and ask:

"Did you say 'yes'?"

"Yes," she repeated.

Two minutes later she was wondering at herself for consenting.

But at nine, with absolute cunning, she ran from Cécile up the stairs and descended by another way to the conservatory. Among the rich foliage of the place they met.

Danton took her hand, and they sat within the very bower where Arthur's stinging chastisement had fallen upon the Frenchman's face.

"We have not long to speak," said Edith—"what is it——?"

"You must say something definite to me before I go," answered Danton. "I want to go to-morrow. It is dreadfully hard to tear myself from you. I cannot tell you all you are to me. You are my very soul's soul. Say something kind before I go."

"I have told you—I do not know what to say—I cannot coerce my heart——"

"You don't mean to say that you still cherish a secret fondness for that soldier boy?"

"I did not say that!" cried Edith with a touch of spirit. "You should not speak to me in that way. Even if it be so, do you suppose I am devoid of modesty?"

"Calm yourself: it is too cruel—it is too wildly absurd—for you to be angry with me. But the soldier boy you must forget. It is incredible that you should choose that drawling, brainless creature in preference to me, who am your soul, your life. And besides he is not worthy of you. He has given you up. He has told me so."

"Told you so?" Her widening eyes turned slowly round upon him.

"Yes. He has told me that he will never even speak to you again as long as he lives."

"He—said—that—to—you?"

"Yes. I give you my word. Do not think of him. He is a mere brainless coward."

Edith's heart was throbbing in her bosom with a thousand agonies of shame, rage, despair.

"Oh, let me go," she cried, "you shame—you torture me—what have you to say to me?"

"A word of comfort—one word—don't go—you will marry me?"

"I? You? No!"

"Say yes!"

"No!"

"You shall say yes!"

"Let me go—oh do!"

"Then say yes!"

"No—not to-night."

He was frowning, frowning into the back of her head, as he had frowned upon her mother's head.

"Yes—is it yes?"

"Not to-night—to-morrow—I feel stifling!"

"I am yours, you know, Edith! You are mine—my soul—my body—flesh and bone. Edith! say yes."

Her head fell slightly backward and sideward to his shoulder; up went her heaving breast, giving forth, with the sigh of one who dies, the long-drawn "yes."

For a moment she lost consciousness, but her eyelids which had drooped in hypnotic sleep, opened at the sound of the dearest voice in all the world.

Cécile stood at the entrance of the bower.

"You are here, then?" she said. "Come, come, darling! Lady Hilton wants you. You will have the goodness to excuse Miss Wentworth," she added, to Danton.

For half a minute the eyes of the girl and the man met in a long, searching gaze, in a long, deadly challenge.

CHAPTER VII.

The Bag of Apples.

Hillcrest Lodge was empty, and Jack Heathcote was at the very bottom of the well of despair. His bird had flown.

"What a fool I was to fancy she would ever care for me," he said to himself twenty times a day. "Why, the cleverest man going wouldn't be half good enough for her."

His white left eyebrow rose up, and the right sank down from a forehead wrinkled with despondent care. He walked about idle all the day, with his hands bulging out his trousers pockets.

"P'raps I ought to have spoken out more plain," he said, "but what's the good? A man can't go putting such questions to Queen Victoria. I suppose one of those don't-care soldier fellows will get her."

His place was not far from Hillcrest, and sometimes in the morning he rode over on a high-trotting bay to watch from the lawn the house in which Cécile had slept, and eaten, and talked. How good it was of her that day to take him to Seaborough! Fool he was! He ought to have spoken out then!

One morning he sat on his horse watching the front windows, when a tall boy with weary steps slouched near him. He had on a wide-brimmed felt hat, and carried a heavy bag of apples.

Digitized by Google

As he came opposite to where Jack Heathcote sat on his horse, he stood and looked round toward the house for some minutes; then with a "Gosh, A doan't ca: e!" started again his weary walk away from the house.

Heathcote, noticing something odd and travel-worn in his appearance, called out:

"What is it you're after?"

"Cécile Delisle," said the boy.

"I'm after something very similar myself," said Jack to himself, "but it's no go." Then he added louder: "Come here. What's your name?"

The boy swung sullenly up to the horse.

"A'm Tom Wilson," he said.

"What's it you want?"

"A've brought Cécile Delisle a bag o' apples."

"It's no go, Tom," said Jack, "bird's flown."

"There doan't seem to be noaboddy aboot," said Tom.

"No—they're gone, all gone. But stop! aren't you the boy I heard her speak about? Didn't she write you a letter?"

"A'm the one."

"Then you're the luckiest dog in the world, that's all I can say. But why didn't you come before?"

"A was e'en thinking o'er it."

"Something like myself, boy. But it's all up: Miss Delisle's away enjoying herself with other people."

"Where aboots?"

"A place called Giltwood Towers, near Ilminster, in Shropshire."

"A'right! A'll foind her," said Tom.

"You! why, the young monkey——"

But Tom had already recommenced his dogged slow slouch, burdened with his bag of apples; and did not turn his head.

Three days later as Cécile was walking down an avenue of limes at Giltwood Towers, in the afternoon gloaming, she uttered a sudden cry of glee. Before her stood Tom Wilson with his bag of apples, with his hanging head, begrimed with mud and dust from top to toe.

"Tom! Tom! I knew you would come," cried Cécile.

Tom could not get a sound from his throat. Part of the way only he had travelled by railway; that day he had walked thirty miles.

He held out the bag.

Cécile peeped inside, and uttered another cry.

"Oh! Why, I love apples! And I shall eat everyone of these, and not even my dearest friend shall have half of one! I knew very well that you were good—but, oh, how tired you look, Tom! Come with me this moment!"

She took hold of the boy with one hand and of the apples with the other, and led the way to the back of the mansion toward the kitchen.

Here a table was soon spread, and Tom sat before cold meat and bread and beer.

"And you have come just at the right time, Tom," said Cécile, sitting near, "just when I have something for you to do."

Tom's eyes gleamed with pleasure.

"And you love me now, Tom?"

Tom smiled.

"And you would not stab me with a knife, I think?"

"Not Oi," said Tom from behind a full mouth.

"Then when you are done, come round to the front and ask for me. I am going away to write a letter which I wish you to deliver for me this night, see? You are tired, and shall have a horse. After an hour, come."

She got up, took Tom's shaggy head in her two hands, and dipped a kiss upon it; then ran away a little, and then back.

"But tell me, you wonderful boy, how did you find out where I was?"

"A saw a gentleman on a horse, i' t' early mornin' lookin' at t' house; he toald me."

"The house? What house?"

"T' house where thoo lived."

Cécile began to ripple with laughter.

"What sort of gentleman, then? A little man?"

"Aye."

"With white hair, Tom?"

"Aye."

He passed up and down the ranks.

Cécile's hands went clapping with gaiety; she left a long trail of laughter behind her as she ran away.

An hour later Tom mounted on an old grey cob of the house-stables, and set out for Ilminster, with a letter from Cécile to Captain Musgrave.

But half way on the road he found himself utterly lost, and had to travel a long distance before he was directed by a chance peasant to the right path again. When he reached the barracks it was long past midnight, and he was unable to gain admittance through the closed gates.

He and his horse slept at a small tavern in the town.

CHAPTER VIII.

The Broken Pledge.

The barracks lay at the western extremity of Ilminster. At the end of the main street of this well-to-do but rather sleepy town, you ascended a rising roadway for about a quarter of a mile, and then came upon a common, where stood the barracks.

The regimental orders for that morning ran: "The troop will parade at ten a.m. for dismounted sword exercise;" and at ten a.m. the parade-ground, or vast quadrangle inside the barrack-buildings, was bright with glinting spurs, and bosoms as red and round as robin-redbreast in his brightest liveries.

Captain Musgrave was acting adjutant, and at this early hour had to be out of bed to see that the drill-sergeant gave the recruits their necessary instruction in the art of bending the spinal column from convex to concave, until the nine months had elapsed which are deemed essential to the making of a warrior.

"Troop—attention!" went the spruce sergeant-major, as the captain came across the barrack-square, his figure clasped in the close-fitting, braided coat.

He passed up and down the ranks, giving an occasional hint to some raw novice, pointing at the lack of lustre in a pouch, or the imperfect whiteness of a belt.

He was about to visit another part of the grounds, when the sergeant-major said:

"There was a lad wanting to speak to you this morning, sir. I told him to wait yonder at the door of the orderly-room."

Arthur turned on his heels in that direction, and was presently envisaging Tom Wilson.

"Is it you who want to see Captain Musgrave?" he asked. "Give me the letter, if it is for him."

Tom examined him suspiciously, and then held out the letter.

It began:

To-morrow night I wish to see you particularly, and as you may want plenty of notice I send you the letter by messenger to-night, so that you may not fail.

Digitized by Google

"Why did you fail to bring this last night?" asked Arthur.

"Missed my way," said Tom.

"You are a stranger here, I imagine?"

"Aye."

The letter proceeded:

First of all, I want to tell you that the bearer of this is a great friend of mine, a dear, rude, affectionate little savage, whom I want much to humanise. And I am going to ask you, as a great favour to me, if you will have him for your soldier-servant, and treat him very kindly for me. I have the fancy that he is a runaway from home for my sake, and naturally I wish him to be in the best hands. If you will do this, I promise you that he is very shrewd and strong-minded, and some day may show himself more than worthy of his meat. But you must lead and not drive him, otherwise you will find that you have got the wrong man this time.

"What frightful nonsense," sighed Arthur, "it happens, however, that I do want a servant. Here—would you care to be a soldier and my servant, you?"

"Not Oi," said Tom.

"You would not?"

"Not Oi."

"That settles it, then. But the lady here says that she wants you to be."

"Well, if she wants, I will."

"It is quite a question of the heart, I see. Will you do, then, everything that she wants?"

"Aye," said Tom.

"Very well. We shall see."

The letter continued:

You know, perhaps, the Dragon Inn? It is a little outside Ilminster at the east end. As I have to be in Ilminster during the afternoon, I will wait at the inn for you at nine. Pray do not fail, as the matter is very important. I have it on good authority that the wines and spirits there are excellent. At nine, then.

"What the deuce do I care about the wines and spirits at the Dragon Inn?" muttered Arthur. "Little French girls that behave like mad women in a play should be abolished. Can the child be in love with me?"

That very morning, at Seaton Abbey, thirty miles away, Edith, too, was reading a letter from Cécile. It said:

One is dying for a sight of one's own sweet face, and hungering for one's own sweet lips. I will not wait. To-morrow I will be in Ilminster, and if you come then, I shall have you all, all, to myself. We will spend the night together at a dear little old-fashioned inn called the Dragon, a short way beyond Ilminster, on the east. Just outside the gates there is a very long lane, long and narrow, between hedges, where you will await me at ten, exactly, in the night. Do not enter the inn, but wait there for me, so that we enter together. Do just as one's own love tells to one, and one will not go far wrong. The wines and spirits at the inn are said to be excellent. At ten, then.

"Sweet, mysterious Cécile!" said Edith, rapturously kissing the letter. "The wines and spirits!—what can she mean?"

Arthur drank his glassful, and rose on unsteady legs.

Cécile had engaged a parlour on the first floor of the Dragon, a rather lonely country inn in the middle of fields and woodland, very sombre-looking, and deserted at night.

In this room by ten minutes past nine she sat alone with Arthur Musgrave. There was a small square table in the centre, covered with brown oilcloth, some old carved oak chairs, some old tapestry hanging on the wainscotting.

"And do you like Tom?" asked Cécile, wriggling herself to a position of comfort in the armchair.

"Oh, I dare say he will learn to govern me without overmuch friction in time," drawled the Captain. "He is at present, as you say, rather a cannibal. But one must expect to be the prey of one's servants, I suppose."

He suppressed a yawn, languidly wondering why he found himself in this vile den.

A waiter entered with a tray bearing two bottles, a large bowl, glasses, and biscuits.

"You are permitted to smoke, Captain Arthur," said Cécile, "and I will myself, you see, take a cigarette. The spirits are for you, the wine for me."

"You are wonderfully good," said the Captain, adding to himself, "and an uncommonly fast little witch, too."

But he composed himself comfortably in his chair, and began smoking a cheroot, Indian fashion, with the large end in his mouth. Cécile, with half-closed eyes and thrown-back head, was puffing clouds of cigarette-smoke into the air. Then in a moment:

"Let me do the devoirs," she cried, jumping up. "Do you like much to drink?"

"I? Drink? No—I'm afraid I am rather exemplary in that way. I hardly ever 'take anything,' as we say—that is, when I can help it."

"So much the better," said Cécile to herself, "you will topple over sooner." Then she added aloud:

"You like the woman better than the wine, is it not?"

She was a little excited to-night, and whenever she was excited her English became very Frenchified in its turns of expression.

"Whatever will she say next?" wondered the Captain with languidly lifted eyebrows.

"But at least," said Cécile, "you like the punch? I have made, see, a bowl to be ready for you. I, myself, shall I confess——"

Digitized by Google

"Well?"

"I like the wine—yes!"

"Naughty," said the Captain.

"Oh no—not so naughty. One is not a nun. I do not say I like to be stupefied, but to be just nicely—what do you say?—'elevated.'"

"Quite so: I am in no danger of misunderstanding you at all."

"And, look here, shall we have—what you call it?—a game? For every glass of the wine I drink, you drink one of the punch? You are not a monk, I think?"

"Not at all a monk," said Arthur. "I entirely agree to anything you want me to do."

"Well, then——"

She poured out a glass of wine, and ladled out a spoonful of punch, which she handed to Arthur.

"It is to be hoped that you will not drink many glasses of wine," said Arthur, coughing after his drink, "this brew is dreadfully hot and strong!"

"Yes! I shall drink," she nodded laughing. "A soldier should not be beaten by a lady, is it not?"

Arthur hated to be called "a soldier."

"But now—I must talk to you more seriously," went on Cécile. "You know, perhaps, that Dr. Danton is engaged to my friend, Miss Wentworth?"

Arthur went white.

"Another glass," said Cécile replenishing his, and drinking more wine.

"No, I did not know," said Arthur. "I prefer—really—if you won't mind—not to speak on that subject."

"But, yes, I mind," answered Cécile. "I wish you to know. He gained his point by a misrepresentation, you see."

"What misrepresentation?"

"He said you had promised never to speak to Miss Wentworth again."

"The cur mentioned that?" cried Arthur, half springing from his chair.

"Yes. The subject is painful. I will drink again, if you do not mind."

For the third time she ladled punch into Arthur's glass. Each time as he drank he coughed. A distinct bright flush mounted to his forehead and cheek.

"If you please," he said, "I shall be glad if you will drop the subject. I do not care what Miss Wentworth chooses to think of me. As to what the man, Danton, said, it is true. I can never, as long as I live, hold any sort of communication with Miss Wentworth. It is your fault, too."

"My fault, is it?"

"You know. You came and interfered in our fight. I was so disgusted with the frightful scene, that I took the only chance to clear out of it."

"But if I had not come you would have been shot, most certain," said Cécile.

"Shot, yes; but that would have been the height of blessedness compared with the life I now live."

"You care so much for Edith, then?"

"Care for her?" he cried wildly, "why, I die for her—I perish for her. Oh, God!"

Then immediately, in the depths of his fuddled brain, he had the dim consciousness that he was showing emotion—before a lady—he who despised a man for showing emotion under any circumstances.

What was the matter with him? Was the punch drugged? It was, at all events, devilishly strong.

"I will drink again," said Cécile. "The subject is a painful one."

She ladled out some more punch, nearly a glassful, and Arther, hardly noticing the quantity, drank it—the whole of it.

"Still there is no need to despair," said Cécile, her own forehead flushed with the yeast of the wine. I can tell you for certain, that you do not love Edith more——"

"Arthur!" she murmured.

"Say it!" he cried, staring in tipsy hunger upon her face.

"More—more than she loves you."

"That is so, then?" he cried, "that is so, for very certain?"

"Yes it is so," said Cécile, glancing at the face of an old grandfather's clock in a corner.

"Then, by Heaven——"

"I cannot drink more wine," she said rising, "only one more glass"—she poured out wine and punch into the two glasses—"and then you must go. I have said what I wished to say."

It was three minutes to ten by the big clock in the corner.

Arthur drank his glassful, and rose on unsteady legs. His eyes were glary with intoxication; the room swam round him. A wild madness and exhilaration reeled in his brain.

"Good-bye! Go now!" said Cécile. "Down the stairs this way, then out by the garden gate, then straight on along the narrow lane—straight on, you know!"

She held a candle while he stumbled down the stairs, and heard him go out by the gravel-path, and heard the gate bang behind him. Then she threw herself on a couch, laughing gleefully and guiltily.

The lane was dark, and narrow, and lonely. A hundred yards from the inn stood a solitary dim lamp on its post.

Beneath this, as Arthur stumbled forward, with one arm going out waving in his joyous intoxication, he saw a figure stand. He had to pass close to her, and the lamplight shone on their two faces.

They stared at each other for half a minute.

The next moment he had her in his arms, his lips glued passionately to hers.

"Edith! Edith! You are mine!"

His cry rang through the quiet night.

"Arthur!" she murmured. "Darling! Arthur!"

(To be continued.)

Asterisk Letter Competition.

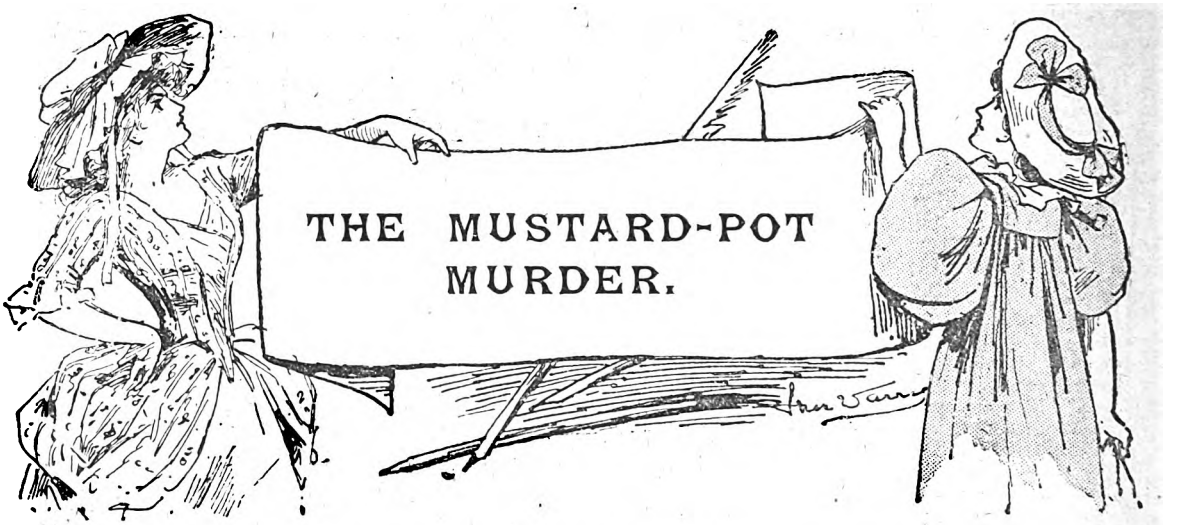
NO. 2.

On page 317 will be found a sentence in which the central letters of each word have been dropped, and asterisks substituted.

Two guineas will be given to the reader who sends in on the back of a post-card the paragraph which most closely resembles the original.

All attempts must reach this office by Monday, March 8th.

Digitized by Google



THE MUSTARD-POT MURDER.

"It had to be," said the old man who lived next door. "It was Fate."

He waved his hand at the solid-faced prisoner an officer was leading down the street. They had just discovered the crime which a few weeks ago all Paris was talking about as "the murder of the Rue Saint-Maur."

The old man had been expecting it. He was an unpleasant old man, and had feared he would die before it happened. He was gratified, therefore, that he had not missed it.

Eight years ago Louis Désire Besnard and his wife came into the Rue Saint-Maur. They were bride and bridegroom. Then she was fifty-eight. He was forty-one. They rented a small shop at No. 49 and sold wine and groceries to the neighbourhood. Their affairs prospered. They had a sleeping apartment on the first floor upstairs.

About a year ago the woman, who up to that time had been an affectionate wife, began to show curiously violent temper towards her husband. She was sixty-four then and he was forty-seven. One evening cries of "Help! Murder!" and terrifying shrieks came from the Besnard apartment. The neighbours hurried in and found Madame Besnard beating her husband.

Each time she struck him she screamed for help. In a few days there were more cries from the Besnard ménage. It became a regular thing. At first the neighbours came. "Surely he must be murdering her," they said. Presently they learnt better and came no more.

When the shrieks startled passers-by the inhabitants of the street would say: "Madame Besnard is 'combing her beloved.'"

Madame Besnard had developed an insane jealousy. Each time a woman customer entered the shop there was a scene. She who had been a loving wife became a fury. What was at her hand in these moments of rage she hurled at him.

Besnard was powerful and in the prime of life. The neighbours wondered that he endured so much.

"How is it, Besnard?" said one.

"If I struck her," he answered, "I should kill her. My hand is too heavy."

When the old man, whom the street called "Papa" Collignon heard this he chuckled, for he knew what was passing in the shopkeeper's mind, and he thought that perhaps he would live long enough after all. But the winter had been a hard one on "Papa" Collignon; he was very feeble.

As spring came on, the screams from the Besnard ménage and the assaults of the wife came to be taken as a matter of course in the Rue Saint-Maur. On one of the first very hot days of early summer—it was a Tuesday—word was passed through the street that Madame Besnard was in an unusually bad temper even for her. All day she sought chances (and found them) to pick quarrels with customers and neighbours, and above all with Besnard.

In the morning she kicked him on the calf of his leg and cut it open so that he had to go to a chemist to get it plastered up, and a second time to have the wound re-dressed. But Madame Besnard was not satisfied.

"I shall kill him yet," she confided to a friend. "I only hurt him this morning. I have got to kill him."

At 6.30 o'clock that evening the concierge, M. Boirot, was in his room with his wife and child. His room was next the back shop where the Besnards dined at this hour. At 6.30 precisely, through the wall they heard the agonised woman's shrieks and the cries of "Save me! Murder!"

"Listen," said the concierge. "Madame Besnard is beating her husband again."

But the screams, though a commonplace occurrence, terrified the child and threw her into a fit of sobbing. Madame Boirot and her husband had to quiet her. It was half-an-hour before the little girl was still again.

Before long Boirot saw Besnard pass the concierge's window and go upstairs to bed.

"But madame?" said the concierge's wife, "where is the wife?"

"She must have gone up while we were tending the baby," said Boirot.

Early on Wednesday the wine-merchant opened his shop as on other days. But his wife was not there. By 10 o'clock the word had gone through the street that Madame Besnard was not at the shop.

When "Papa" Collignon heard it he tottered in and bought a whole litre of wine, and chatted with Besnard and hoped madame was not indisposed.

Digitized by Google

The wine-merchant thanked him much. Madame was upstairs.

But the concierge told what he had heard at 6.30 o'clock on the evening before to several of the lodgers of the house, and they, too, went to Besnard.

"She had just gone for a walk," said he. "Not far, only in the neighbourhood. I expect her back any moment."

All day the dwellers in the house watched for the return of Madame Besnard, but she did not come. In the afternoon the concierge called to a policeman in plain clothes who was passing. He told him his suspicions.

The officer went down into the shop. "What has become of your wife?" he asked bluntly.

"She is upstairs," was the answer.

"I want to see her," said the officer, and he went out and up the stairs to the Besnard apartment. The concierge let him in. Madame Besnard was not there.

He went back to the shop.

"Ah, yes," said the wine-merchant, "she must have stepped out." He grew pale as he said this, as if he were going to faint.

Thursday morning Madame Besnard had not come back, but the shop was open as usual. The concierge decided to wait no longer. At eleven o'clock he went to the Police Commissariat of the precinct and told the magistrate his story. The magistrate, M. Bottelier-Lasquin, went with him to No. 49, Rue Saint-Maur.

Besnard was at his cash desk, getting change for a customer.

"Where is your wife?" the officer asked sharply.

"She is out walking," was the answer.

M. Bottelier-Lasquin looked the wine-merchant in the eyes. "Come," he said, "that will not do. Where is she?"

Besnard had been pale and confused before. Now he became very calm. He shrugged his shoulders. "Very well," he said, "she is in there." He pointed to the back shop.

In a corner the officer found Madame Besnard. The body was standing up, wedged against the wall by boxes and sacks. A plank and some old clothes hid it. The blood had run from a wound in the head, and covered the face. The skull was fractured.

The magistrate ordered the body to the Morgue and took Besnard to the station. It was then that "Papa" Collignon had waved his hand at him.

The murderer confessed freely.

At 6.30 o'clock on Tuesday evening they were finishing dinner in the back shop. There was a quarrel, and Madame Besnard, snatching a salad-bowl from the table, hurled it into his face. It stunned him for the moment. His anger flashed up. He was exasperated beyond endurance. He seized a heavy crockery mustard-pot and threw it with all his might. Her head took the blow. She dropped, moaned a few minutes, and died.

He left the body where it fell and went up the stairs to his room. At two o'clock in the morning he stole down again and dragged it into the corner, stood it up, and hid it behind the packing-case as the officer found it.

What was he going to do with it? He did not know. He hadn't thought about it much. "It was pleasant to have the shop quiet."

Was he sorry? He supposed so, but he did not know certainly.

"It was pleasant to be quiet." ARTHUR MOTT.

RESULT OF COMPETITIONS.

RESULT OF ASTERISK COMPETITION.

NO. I.

THE first reader to forward a correct solution in this competition was Mr. C. B. Collin, Booking Office, Manchester Exchange Station, L. and N.W.R.

Below is published the original sentence:

A deep silence ensued, and Retta, fancying she knew her charge fully, and believing what she said, quickly dismissed her indignation at the girl's wild words. In the interval Lalage grew restless, and a quick observer might have discerned an expression upon her lovely face, in fact, a something about her whole mien, inspiring a shudder of incalculable fear.

RESULT OF PICTURE COMPETITION.

NO. 2.

Below appear the names and addresses of the prize winners in this competition:

W. Hodgson, 2, Eton Street, Plumstead, £5.

The following receive £1 each:

T. Stanley, 30, Garturk Street, Govanhill, Glasgow.
J. D. Monsen, 56, Bryantwood Road, Highbury, N.
F. H. Burkett, 19, Glenthorn Road, Hammersmith.
W. Power, "Ellery," New Brighton, Cheshire.
R. H. Seater, 28, Woodside Road, Woodside, Surrey.

The winning attempt is here given.

1.

Picture rejected,
Artist dejected,
Thinking so sadly,
Of cheque he wants badly.

2.

Artist sits moping,
Nothing to hope in,
Picture displaced,
From the easel it graced?

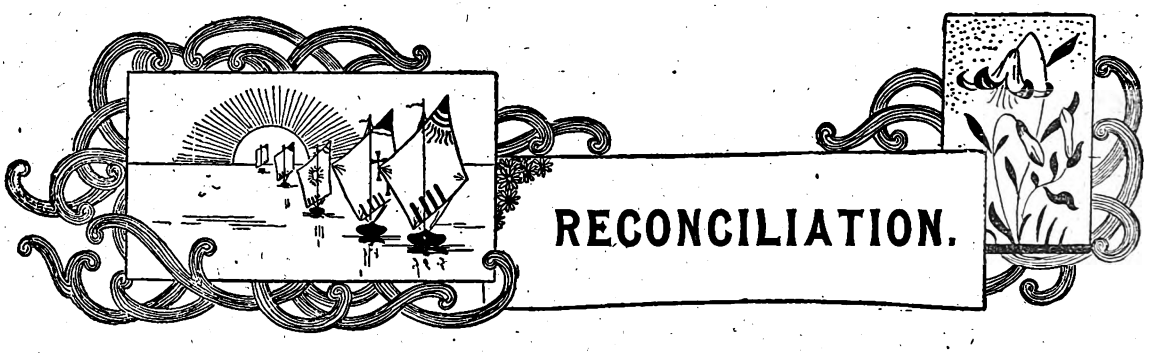
3.

Bright, new idea,
Comes very clear,
Artist quick rushes,
To palette and brushes.

4.

A touch here and there,
A scene rises fair,
Showing—'tis true,
Features quite new.
Artist I see, as pleased as can be.

Digitized by Google



RECONCILIATION.

Paul Reville and Jean Vernier, two well-known and favourite actors, hated each other cordially.

By a sort of fatality, as soon as either of these irreconcilable enemies undertook or created a rôle, he was sure to see the name of his adversary in bold type side by side with his own on the poster of the same theatre.

Both were always warmly received and applauded. Reville was irresistible in a rôle requiring personal beauty and noble bearing. Vernier seemed the very incarnation of meanness and treachery, the ideal scoundrel, hardened and impenitent. Regularly every evening towards twelve o'clock he was unmasked and crushed under the hee's of the righteous and fascinating Reville.

In their mutual desire to annihilate one another they occasionally reached sublimity.

At the Odéon they have been seen—Reville under the scarlet livery of Ruy-Blas, Vernier under the Spanish cloak of Don Salluste, pouring forth their romantic tirades with such splendid sonority and expression as to create breathless enthusiasm in the crowded audience.

Again at the Ambigu, they were together in La Tour de Nesle in Le Bossu and Patrie. Always associated, always receiving together the ovations of an enthusiastic public, always great artists of the old school, so much loved by our fathers, and always leaving on any rôle they assumed the mark of their masterly conception. They never exchanged a word, save before the footlights and during the long, laborious rehearsals. Then, entirely ignoring their own individuality, and projecting themselves each into his respective rôle, each eyeing and measuring the other with the air of a Spanish grandee, and each stimulating the other to his best, they would rise to the full height of their powers, astonishing and delighting their admiring fellow actors.

"My dear old friend!".

Neither had ever taken the hand of the other, and both had openly professed the same antagonism in real life that they had exhibited on the stage.

At the Actors' Club, if Vernier was alluded to in the presence of Reville, the latter simply hurled out the one word cabotin (strolling player), shrugging his shoulders contemptuously.

With Vernier, the epithet pitre was sufficient. He pronounced this word with an enjoyment quite indescribable, and after the manner of the pupils of the Conservatory, opened his mouth in the form of the circumflex accent, and rolled out the r with a tremendous vibration.

Reville was a widower. Vernier was unmarried. The wife of Reville had died young—of consumption—leaving a little girl, beautiful with the beauty of a Greuze.

When Vernier, who was a good deal of a bear, caught sight of his rival in the street, leading his little girl by the hand, he was half conscious of a softened feeling towards his hated enemy, and he would growl out in his deep voice:

"What a lucky fellow he is!" and his envious eyes would follow the happy father on his way to a confectioner's, to buy a crisp little cake for Cécile.

The Porte St. Martin had announced the reproduction of The Mysteries of Paris for a certain date, the principal rôles of "The Schoolmaster" and "Prince Rudolph" to be filled by Vernier and Reville.

The disgust of Vernier knew no bounds. He to have this vile rôle. He to serve as a mere foil to his rival, who, in his rich robe-de-chambre, with gold girdle and tassels, would have ample opportunity of displaying his manly beauty and "air noble" in full view of all the pretty women, while he, Vernier, in rags and an old fur cap, would be pelted with cabbages and execrations from the upper gallery, the wretch from the "quartier Muffetard" being held in utter detestation by the class frequenting that part of the house.

Digitized by Google

As the rehearsals proceeded, Vernier's indignation became more and more pronounced. Suddenly, there came a rumour of Reville's illness. He had contracted a violent cold, attacking the lungs, which were seriously affected, and the poor fellow was flat on his back in the City Hospital.

His place was filled by an understudy, and as all were somewhat eagerly awaiting the expression of Vernier's satisfaction in the new arrangement, he astonished everyone by showing himself more dissatisfied than before.

Early in the evening the audience became conscious of something quite unusual—bizarre Vernier was not himself; he forgot his lines, passed his cues, stumbled, hesitated.

It was soon manifest to all that he missed his old associate; that he was, in short, lost without Reville, who, by his disdain and overbearing manner, his airs of a grand seigneur had irritated him, aroused his temper, and spurred his ambition. Reville had indeed kindled the now sleeping fire of genius in the soul of this veteran of the melodrama.

As all were wondering and talking over this singular contretemps—were asking "What does this mean?"—it was learnt that poor Reville was rapidly becoming worse, his symptoms giving no hope of his recovery, and astonishment reached its climax as soon as it was known that Vernier was on his way to the hospital to see his rival.

When he rang the bell at the door it was with a shaking hand. He was conducted to the chamber, where Reville, with eyes half closed, lay in that partial sleep, in which the faintest sound, no louder than the fluttering of a butterfly's wings, is distinctly perceived.

Hearing a gentle step in the room, he half raised his head from the pillow, and, seeing Vernier, said with a smile:

"Ah, it is you. I knew you would come. I was expecting you."

Vernier, the fierce, treacherous, impenitent rascal of the melodrama, fell, rather than seated himself, in the chair at the head of the bed, saying in his deep bass voice: "My dear old friend!" half sobbing out the words.

"Come," said Reville, "embrace me."

Beautiful "Accolade!" Thirty years of mutual hatred lost in this supreme embrace! They remained closely clasped, each in the other's arms, looking into each other's friendly eyes, full of kindness and dimmed with tears.

Reville, raising himself on his elbow, said:

"You do not know how glad I am to see you. I cannot tell you the pleasure it gives me, for, after my child, have you not been all my life? Do you remember Ruy-Blas? 'I have the livery of a lackey, and you the soul of one?' And to think that all that is finished! To think, my old friend, how many times I have played at burying you on the stage, and that now you are to bury me in good earnest!"

And as Vernier made a slight gesture of denial, Reville continued:

"Oh, yes; I know it is only a question of time. It is a great comfort to see you here at my side and grieving for me, and I shall die content."

Here he was interrupted by a paroxysm of coughing; but, after resting a few moments, he added:

"No; content is not the word. I am leaving my child, my darling Cécile. It breaks my heart to feel that I shall never again feel her little arms about my neck, never again kiss her soft curls, and when I am gone what will she do? What will become of her? God help my darling! She has no one." And overcome by emotion, he gasped for breath as Vernier said gently and tenderly:

"I shall be here."

"You! Will you?"

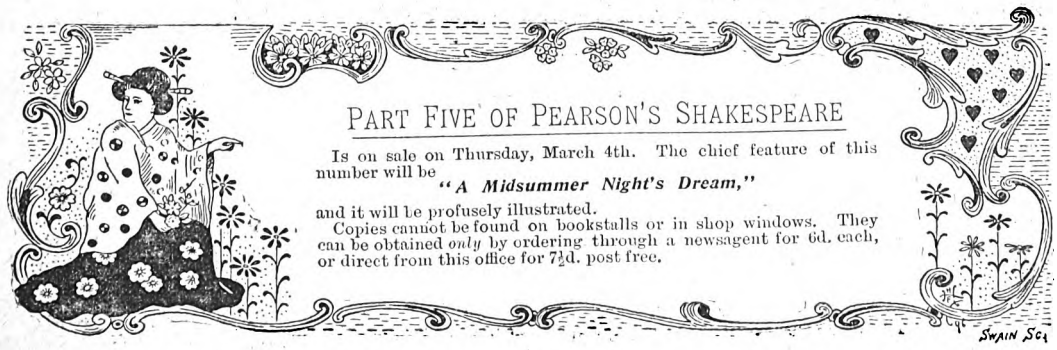
"Dear old friend, I am alone in the world; I have no no one to love. Give your child to me, I will be a father to her. Rest satisfied. She shall want for nothing. On my honour. By the memory of all our triumphs in the old days. I promise you to make her happy. I have means—much more than I need for nourishing the little creature. She shall never forget you. Your name and memory shall be dear and sacred to her. I cannot say all I feel—all I mean. Will you trust me? That is right. Your hand, old friend!"

Reville's face was radiant through his tears, and he said:

"This is the most perfect of melodramas."

The next day Reville was dead.

AUGUSTE FAURE.



Digitized by Google

The Sunday Reader.

A NEW PAPER FOR THE HOME.

Sixteen pages of interesting reading matter, profusely illustrated by the best Artists of the day, for ONE PENNY.

On MARCH 4th the FIRST NUMBER

WILL BE PUBLISHED OF

THE SUNDAY READER,

WHICH WILL BE A POPULAR RELIGIOUS JOURNAL, FULL OF INTERESTING STORIES, ARTICLES, AND ANECDOTES, AND WILL BE IN A VERY SPECIAL WAY A PAPER FOR THE HOME.

NOBODY need hesitate to place this new journal in the hands of his or her family. Even those who never attend a place of worship will find their homes made brighter and happier by the influence of The Sunday Reader, and the children will specially welcome this bright journal, because of the scores of opportunities it will afford them to secure handsome prizes in healthy and elevating competitions and examinations.

There are plenty of journals which provide pure reading for week-days, but there is a great need for a high-class, pure, and healthy paper for Sunday reading, which shall at the same time be bright, cheerful, amusing, and instructive. The average religious paper is too dull for children and young people, but

THE SUNDAY READER

WILL BE ABSOLUTELY THE BRIGHTEST PAPER FOR SUNDAY READING EVER PUBLISHED.

The Sunday Reader will consist each week of sixteen large-sized pages, and will contain scores of the best Articles, Anecdotes, and Paragraphs possible; besides two splendid Short Stories, and a stirring Serial Story by one of the best religious story writers of the day, whose services have been secured for this journal. Every issue will contain about a score of beautifully executed illustrations drawn by leading black and white artists.

Now go at once to your Newsagent and order a copy of No. 1.

You can then judge for yourself if it is not the best penny paper for Sunday reading ever published. Every purchaser of No. 1 will have presented to him, free of charge,

A Superb Coloured Picture, fit for Framing.

This is one of the best and most artistic plates ever given away with any journal. A minister who has seen it says: "A truly handsome picture, and fit to adorn any wall."

Now let me tell you some of the attractions and advantages offered in The Sunday Reader:

A MAGNIFICENT COLOURED PLATE, fit for framing, presented free to every purchaser of No. 1.

A SPLENDID FIFTY-GUINEA AMERICAN ORGAN offered to Bible students in a very easy examination. This Organ is one of the finest instruments of its size ever made, and would form a superb adornment to your drawing-room. Full particulars of how to secure this will be found in the First Number of The Sunday Reader.

A FREE RAILWAY INSURANCE FOR £250 to all purchasers of The Sunday Reader.

£50 for Sunday School Superintendents and Teachers.

A CLERGY BENEFIT FUND OF £100. You can add this substantial sum to your minister's salary if you like. Get a copy of The Sunday Reader and see how to do it.

THREE THOUSAND GRAND BOOKS to be distributed amongst readers.

A GUINEA for a Motto; and many other attractions and advantages.

Digitized by Google

BLIND - - - JUSTICE.

A LAWYER'S REMINISCENCE.

"An innocent man need never be afraid to face a jury," so spoke a young lawyer but lately admitted.

"Well," said I, "from a layman's point of law, I think that if I thought the chances against me, no matter how innocent I were, I would decline the honour."

I had just dropped in for a friendly chat and smoke with my friend, Richard Boynton, an old lawyer well-known for an extensive clientèle. Turning to him, I said, as I lighted a cigar:

"What say you, Dick?"

"In theory, I agree with our young friend; in practice, with you."

Boynton added: "I'll give you a case in point if you like. It is about ten years ago when I was aroused about two o'clock in the morning by a messenger, the bearer of a hastily-scribbled note from a gentleman, an old client of mine. He was a childless widower, much interested in Egyptology, and consequently spent much of his time in Egypt. Being rich he could afford this expensive hobby. He was of a very quiet and retiring disposition, disliking all kinds of publicity or notoriety, and, like many studious men, was ofttimes very absent-minded.

"The note I received ran:

"'Dear Boynton,—They have brought me down here on some absurd charge or other. Come and arrange for my release immediately.—R. Rowley.'

"I hastened to the relief of my client. Now, I must tell you, he was very fastidious in his dress, and particularly natty and trim in his appearance. He wore a brown beard, cut in Vandyke fashion. Judge, then, of my astonishment when I was shown a man dressed in a particularly flashy style, of the kind affected by the sporting fraternity; a clean-shaved face, save for an inch or two of side whiskers. The man appeared to me to be a vulgar sporting man who had been out on a spree. Seeing me, he advanced rather unsteadily, and stammeringly said:

"'Ah, Boynton, get me out of this quick.'

"'There is some mistake,' I said to the policeman.

"'How?' asked he.

"'Why, this is not Mr. Rowley; this is not the gentleman I came to see.'

"'That's so? Well this is the man who gave me the note I sent up to you.'

"At this moment I looked up at the man before me and said:

"'You sent for me?'

"'Why, of course; who else should I send for?'

"'What made you use Mr. Rowley's name?'

"The man looked at me in amazement, and stutteringly replied:

"'R—R—Row—Rowley's n—n—name?'

"'Yes. Mr. Rowley's name,' I said impatiently.

"He clutched me by the sleeve, and gasped out:

"'Why, man—what do you mean? Do these clothes so alter me? Speak, Boynton!'

"I looked at him very keenly, and gradually there dawned on me that, after all, this was only my old friend Rowley.

"'Heavens! It is you, Rowley? What are you doing here? Come, man, compose yourself, and let's get at the bottom of this.'

"I sat down on the bench by his side, but, notwithstanding my cross-questioning, all I could get from him was nothing more than he had arrived the previous evening, had engaged a room at the Grand Hotel, had had some Welsh rarebit and a bottle of Bass, and had gone straight to bed. About midnight he had been aroused by a violent knocking at the door, and on opening it, had been gruffly told that he was under arrest, and that he was to dress pretty quickly.

"Hurried by the officers, he had hastily dressed himself, protesting uselessly that the clothes he was hustled in were not his, and was hurried off to the station. On his arrival there he had sent for me. No amount of cross-questioning could get him to vary or enlarge his story, nor could he give me the slightest reason for his arrest. As to his beard, that had easily been explained in answer to a question of mine. Owing to a slight skin eruption, contracted in Egypt, he had had it shaved off some time ago.

"The next step was to get him bailed out. This, I found, was not so easy a task. My non-recognition at first of my friend was against him. The magistrate next morning protested that this prisoner was a confidence man wanted for various offences, and that he was a certain Wilcox, alias Boucher, alias Palver, alias Moroney, and scoffingly declared he would not let him out under £500 bail. I did not stay to argue the matter out, but in less than an hour was back with a couple of friends of well-known wealth and standing. Bail was accepted. I carried my friend off in a cab to my house. Next morning my client was in a state of fever. I easily got a certificate from my physician exaggerating the illness.

"He remained in my house and in bed for nearly a week. During that time I found out enough to solve the mystery to my moral satisfaction, but not enough to convince a jury or even any outsider. The solution of the mystery was this: The man with the many aliases had come by the same train as my friend Rowley, had put up at the same hotel, and had been assigned a room on the same narrow corridor. By some chance my friend after supper had been given the key of Mr. Wilcox's room and had gone straight to bed. Mr. Wilcox's keen mind, ever bent on covering up his tracks, on finding that he had been given the wrong key, said nothing, examined my friend's bag, and then the idea evidently came to him that it would be a good thing if he could pass out of the hotel as Mr. Rowley.

Digitized by Google

"The probability was that he (Rowley) was in his room. To open the door was an easy trick for the thief. Then he must have taken my friend's attire, leaving his in its place. This affected, he paid his bill as Mr. Rowley, saying he was going to catch the night express north, and so he vanished.

"The question remained for me to prove that my friend was the real Rowley. I confess I saw immense difficulties in doing so promptly, and certainly not without great notoriety, mortifying to my friend, even if I succeeded.

"His resemblance in Wilcox's attire was so strikingly like the photos sent on to the police, and so unlike his own photos that the correspondence, papers, cards, and odds and ends which Wilcox had, either in his haste or intentionally, left in the coat and vest pockets, and which the police at the station had seized when they had searched him, that I shudderingly felt the chances were all in favour of a speedy conviction."

"What did you do?" asked the young lawyer.

"What did I do?" you ask. "I smuggled him off on a boat to America and forfeited the bail. He was, as I said, a rich man. It was the simplest way out of the difficulty and the surest.

"Still, my client, though perfectly innocent, is now a fugitive from justice." J. P. Mascott.

THE POISONED ARROW.

THE commanding officer was seated in the adjutant's office, in troubled parley with the officer of the day.

It was high noon, midsummer, and Arizona; and though the adobe was as cool as only an adobe can be in fiery weather, the Major was mopping his brow in entire discomfort.

"That's it, that's it!" he ejaculated. "Think of sending a man off on the very eve of his wedding; the very day before he is to be married. It's a beastly unpleasant thing to have to do, but I'm too old for a trip like that; Gowan's on the sick list, Henderson's away, Thompson's wife may die any minute, Trowbridge won't be back until early to-morrow morning, and you're half dead (precious hospital we have!) and officer of the day, besides. Then, moreover, Howland's about the only one who can handle those things right, and not make a mess of it. He's got to go, that's all."

He rang the bell for his orderly, and sent that unduly erect individual to find Lieutenant Howland, give him the commanding officer's compliments, and say he would like to see him in the adjutant's office immediately.

Presently Howland entered. He was the most promising officer in the regiment, and was tall and strong and homely. He had a square jaw and a straight mouth, and the jaw looked squarer and the mouth straighter just now. He foresaw something unpleasant when he caught sight of the Major.

"E-e-eh!" commenced the commanding officer, and dog-eared an official-looking document and straightened it out again. "Eh, Howland!"

"Well, sir?"

"Why—eh, I've got to ask you a deuced unpleasant thing, Howland."

"I will try to answer it, Major."

"Not a question, not a question. It's something I've got to ask you to do, and, by Jove, I'd rather be shot!"

"Anything I can do for you, I shall be most happy to do."

"See here. Everybody is sick or away, and I'm so old and fat, and Briggs is just out of a fever bed and hardly able to stand, you know, and someone has got to go up to the agency and quiet a fuss among the Apachés about the beef issue. Whoever goes has got to go now and get there in a hurry. I suppose I might attempt it, I suppose I might; but I'd make a mess of the business. I can't manage those bucks. I lose my temper too fast—and then I'm so fat!" said the Major sadly. "Briggs insists upon going, but, you see, he shouldn't. I won't allow him to. Don't you see how it is? There's only you available."

"Certainly, sir."

"I've got to ask you to do it to prevent a lot of trouble. I know you are to be married to-morrow, and it's the most disagreeable thing I ever had to do, to send you away to-day. But you see how it is," he reiterated.

"Of course, I see, sir, and I'll go—not exactly with pleasure—but still, I'll go. I can get back by noon to-morrow—and that'll give me time to shave and dress," he added with a grim smile.

They discussed the matter at some length, and Howland went to get on his scouting clothes for the long, hot ride through dust as dry as flour, and to say good-bye to Captain Trowbridge's youngest daughter.

Like the princess of fairy lore, she was as good as she was beautiful, and had light hair and brown eyes, and dimples, and clinging, feminine ways. Howland was badly in love; had been for several years, but many things had happened to prevent his marriage. At first he had had a mother and sister to support on a second-lieutenant's pay; then the sister had married, and his mother had died, so his fortune was all his own; but at that time Doris Trowbridge was engaged to marry another man.

When she found that she cared more for Howland than for her fiancé, she broke the engagement, and was meek and tearful and ashamed of herself for a month, until she and Howland arranged things satisfactorily between them. They were to have been married six months before, but Howland was ordered off as scout; and three months after that she had been at the point of death; so now, though the season was unpropitious, they had determined to take time by the forelock, make the most of the chance visit of a clergyman, and be married in the middle of July.

At this juncture Howland was being sent away, and he grew desperate.

Digitized by Google

Nevertheless, he said good-bye to little Miss Trowbridge with exemplary calmness, and was more careful than she not to show depression.

"You'll come back, surely, won't you?" she begged.

"Of course I will, goosey. Don't I go to the agency on an average of twice a month nearly all the time?"

"I know. But somehow this seems different."

Howland agreed with her, but he laughed at her for all that.

"It's like the legend of Sir Olaf, isn't it? He went away the night before he was to be married, and an erl maiden made him die."

"There's nothing so fascinating as an erl maiden at the agency, more's the pity," he told her.

Then he went and rode off under the scorching sun in a cloud of dust, two soldiers behind him.

The girl watched him until she could see him no longer, and then went back into the tent to sit with a white face and closed lips and dry eyes, looking at the sands of the parade-ground.

* * * * *

Howland held a long council with the chiefs, and very nearly succeeded in settling the difficulties before nightfall. They talked, sitting under a shelter of willow sticks and branches. There was a half-cured ox-hide on the ground, upon which they squatted.

Two of the Indians played monte with a pack of grotesque raw-hide cards, and one whittled a stick for an arrow-shaft. They liked Howland, and they trusted him. This was known, so missions of the sort usually fell to him. He talked now, and waxed very eloquent, and the chiefs grunted as the interpreter translated. They were almost won to him, but they postponed their decision until they should have time to talk matters over, so they bade him return after dark. Howland went away, after having given the daughter of one of the bucks a bright handkerchief, and having said a few words to her out of his scanty vocabulary. The girl looked at him intently, with her little, bird-like eyes twinkling, and said nothing in reply, but smoothed the bandanna on her knees. When he was gone she rose and stood in front of her tepee to watch him out of sight, as the fair-haired white woman had done a few hours before.

After a time she put the handkerchief on her head and went in the direction he had taken.

When she found him it was dusk, and the coyotes had begun to whine and bark all about them, and one faint star glimmered in the purpling sky. Her eyes were wonderfully bright, and her wild gracefulness would have been alluring to another man.

She went up behind him and touched him on the shoulder. He faced about, and asked what she wanted. But for the bright handkerchief on her head he would not have remembered her. When he saw that, he smiled, and the girl, encouraged, began a protestation of desperate, savage love, in the most even of voices and broken of English, interspersed with Apaché and Mexican.

Howland answered her kindly, and, to her calm-toned pleadings, smiled in her tense face and turned away.

"Poco tiempo, you come," she said, gliding after him and grasping his hand. She followed him for a few yards. "You come?" she insisted.

"Yes, poco tiempo, I come to see your father."

She flung his hand from her and hurried off into the shadow with a low snarl.

Late at night, as Howland left the council of the braves, a hundred yards from the camp, a woman strode up to him, and, without any preface, dropped at his feet and caught his hands and repeated the story of her savage passion in the same monotone.

But Howland had completed his embassy successfully, and was in haste to return to the camp during the night and comparative coolness, so he pushed her away with a disgusted "Vamoose!" and hurried on.

* * * * *

Years ago there were still poisoned arrows used occasionally—weapons deadlier than the more popular rifle or carbine, for their scratch was fatal. The head was dipped in a poison curiously made. A bit of liver, quite putrid, was held before a rattlesnake until he had injected his venom into it time and time again. After a few more days this virulent substance was put upon the points of the arrows, to carry agony and dissolution to whatever they touched.

It was one of these arrows that Howland jerked from his arm, a few moments later, as he went into the hut where his two soldiers were waiting.

He held it in front of the candle and examined it intently, while the blood dripped over his dusty boot. One of the men asked him how it happened, while he cut open the sleeve. "A mistake, very likely. It was not one of the bucks; we parted good friends." The woman he did not mention. He looked at the arrow again.

"It's poisoned, I fancy. Rather hard luck," he said. He passed one hand across his face wearily, and repeated: "Hard luck!" Then he gave the men a detailed account of what he had done and accomplished, that they might tell the Major in case he himself should be past speaking. The agency doctor was off on a two days' hunting trip, so the soldiers bathed and dressed the wound, and made Howland drink the contents of a large flask of whisky. But he ordered his horse and went back to the post, nevertheless, across the long, gleaming plain of sand, under the purple arch with its stars of glimmering gold; three weird, dark figures following the road through the night.

And just as the grey of dawn came over the far off black mountains, just as the dawn breeze sprang up and blew on his swollen and burning face, just as the first call for reveille shrilled through the valley, two dust-whitened riders, supporting him in his saddle, drew up at the hospital.

At two o'clock a stretcher carried the body of Lieutenant Howland from the hospital to his quarters and the flag was put at half-mast.

Gwendolen Overton.

A STORY WITHOUT WORDS.

On page 313 several sketches are given in their proper order. £2 is offered to the reader who sends us the most appropriate wording to go under each sketch, the whole to form a story descriptive of the illustrations, and a bottle of Home Notes Bouquet will be given to each of the senders of the next best five attempts.

It is not necessary for competitors to have any literary ability. If you have a good idea, surely there should be no difficulty in putting it down in words. The whole of the story is limited to one hundred words, which may be distributed under the sketches according to the judgment of the competitor.

All that you have to do is to write in the order of the sketches the wording that you think most appropriate, enclose your attempt in an envelope (which should be marked "Picture Story"), and forward it to this office before Monday, March 8th.

Digitized by Google

Pearson's Picture Puzzles.

No. 1. ONE HUNDRED POUNDS IN PRIZES.

IN the current number of PEARSON'S WEEKLY you will find ten pictures. They represent the names of ten well-known Actors and Actresses on the Dramatic and Music-Hall Stage. This is a competition that requires no explanation. If you will look at the accompanying picture you will see the reply is Beerbohm Tree. Who are the other people?

Write down their names in the spaces provided, and then keep the list till three other sets appear. When you have filled in the lists for four weeks send the four sheets to us in one envelope, addressed

"Pictures," Pearson's, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

But remember the sheets must come to us four in one envelope. Don't be discouraged if you cannot find forty names, fill in thirty-five, thirty, or even less. Others may be no more clever than yourself.

1st PRIZE.	£50 in Gold.
2nd PRIZE.	A £10 Bank of England Note.
3rd, 4th, and 5th PRIZES.	£5 Bank of England Notes.
6th to 20th PRIZES. . .	Fifteen Sovereigns.
21st to 40th PRIZES. .	Twenty Half-Sovereigns.

No. 1.—Beerbohm Tree.

DO YOU WANT A WATCH?

On February 18th we wound up a watch and placed it in a safe. It was wound up somewhere between the hours of four and six in the afternoon. It is supposed to run down in about thirty-six hours. If you want this watch, which is a superior article, manufactured by Mr. HENRY E. PECK, of 71, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and sold by him at five guineas, all you have to do is to mark the time at which you think it will stop on the clock face herewith, and on the line left for that purpose. You may make any number of attempts for this prize, but each one must be on a separate clock-face.

Magnificent English Lever Watch, ¾-plate movement, jewelled in eight holes, chronometer balance, plain or engine-turned cases, crystal glass, five years' warranty with each watch.

The prize will be given to that competitor who draws the hands pointing most nearly to the hour and minute at which it is found the watch in our safe has stopped.

There is no entrance fee required, but no competition will be accepted unless traced on the diagram herewith.

In the unlikely event of two competitors being correct, the watch will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt first reaches this office.

Competition closes Monday, March 8th. Address attempts:

"WATCH" Short Stories, PEARSON'S BUILDINGS, HENRIETTA STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Hour..... Minute.....

Name.....

Address.....

.....

All Competitions must be sent through the Post.

Digitized by Google

A STORY WITHOUT WORDS.—No. 5.

SEE PAGE 311.

1

2

3

4

5

6

7

8

9

Digitized by Google

SUMMARY.

The scene is laid at St. Agnes, one of the Scilly Islands. The inhabitants live by the booty obtained from vessels wilfully led to destruction by false beacons. The only two exceptions are Nigel Prideaux and Damaris Nance, his sweetheart. Manuel Nance, Damaris' father, is Nigel's greatest enemy. The King Hal, a warship laden with Spanish plunder, is lured to destruction, and wrecked off Troy Town. All hands are either drowned in the sea or killed by the inhabitants, except Sir Francis Seymour, who is rescued by Nigel. Damaris takes food to the survivor, who falls in love with her. Nigel secures Sir Francis' escape. Manuel Nance decides to give his daughter in marriage to one of the sons of Governor Layton, and for this purpose sends one of his men to convey the offer. The big dowry which is to accompany the girl creates dissention among the Governor's six sons, and they decide to swim across to the island on which she lives, the first arrival to become her husband. While Nance and his men are rowing over to Hugh Town to fetch Master Layton, the boat capsises and all are drowned.

CHAPTER X.

The New Chief of St. Agnes.

There was deep sorrow in St. Agnes for many days after this catastrophe. It could not have been otherwise. The drowned men had not been exemplary Christians; but they were fathers of families, and their wives and children felt all natural affection for them.

At one swoop, the population of the island was reduced from forty-five to twenty-eight. But three males were left in the land: Nigel, his faithful idiot, Ban, and the child, Obadiah.

Under these circumstances, it fell to Nigel to assume a sort of temporary lordship in St. Agnes. Of governmental duties, of course, he had none. But youthful ambition was stirred within him; and he took upon himself to see that the women and girls lacked no food that could be got by the aid of his hands from the ocean.

This seemed the more imperative as no boat came to them from St. Mary's until the third day after the accident. The sea, though calm in other parts, ran with a furious speed in the channel between these two islands. It was, said the women-folk, who were ever prone to detect in extraordinary events the agency of some malignant force, the work of the spirits of the dead men of the King Hal. But little of this ill-fated ship now remained in the position where it originally struck. The new storm had wrought fresh havoc upon it, and again the strand of St. Warna's Bay was overcast with jetsam. For the time, however, the survivors of St. Agnes took no interest in the things. They let them lie (bales and boxes, and even the bodies of a bullock and a man) as if they were no longer concerned with aught but their own bereavement.

In such a state did Master Layton and his son Eric find the island when at length they came into it.

The Governor was aghast to hear what had happened. True, the bodies of two or three men had gone ashore under the Fort Hill of St. Mary's, and given warning of some calamity. But that all the able-bodied males of the island save one should be cut off in the twinkling of an eye was almost past belief.

Yet his worship's distress was, sooth to say, quite as much on account of the gold that had sunk as for the sake of the men or their widowed wives.

He was quick to interrogate Nigel about the other property of Master Nance. Here, however, he did not profit greatly. For, in the meantime, our hero had talked with the women of Agnes, and had persuaded them to view their loss as in some sort a judgment for the cruel deeds their husbands had wrought in their lifetimes. By this one brief, sharp blow the Almighty had chastised the men, and so shielded them from the worse fate that would in eternity have been theirs had they continued to work such evil.

It was not sound theology, nor even impeccable reason. But it did not displease the poor souls. And in keeping with the idea, each wife had surrendered such precious things as her house contained, and especially the treasures of the King Hal, into the hands of Nigel. With this rich produce and the far richer spoil of the dwelling of Nance, it was proposed to ask the intercession of the noble Lord Abbot of Tavistock. Heaven would not, it was thought, be deaf to their pleading on behalf of the souls of the dead men, if the prayers were so generously supported. Only the plunder of the King Hal did Nigel keep apart from the rest, for he remembered Sir Francis Seymour's words thereanent.

Master Christopher Layton thus found himself baffled. He could not aver directly that there was treasure in St. Agnes, though his suspicions were more than strong. And in the evening he returned to St. Mary's in no very sweet frame of mind.

Nor was young Master Eric quite contented with the day's events. For the first time he found himself face to face with the damsel to whom he was to have been wedded.

The blue eyes and graceful form of Damaris awoke in him a passion he hitherto had not dreamt of. She did not greet him as a bridegroom. Indeed, she forbade him even to speak to her—for was she not in weeds for her father? But while she was within reach of him he let his eyes wander over her with such a flame of eagerness in them that Nurse Cochran could hardly keep her hands off him.

Yet in the end, when it transpired that she was now a portionless bride, what must his father do but scorn the notion that he should still regard this beauty as his wife in future.

It was in vain that he protested, vowed he would not live without her, and so forth, after the manner of hot, impulsive youths. Master Layton made a jest of him.

Digitized by Google

"Silly calf—'twas not her beauty thou wast about to wed, but her money bags. Since these be gone, thou mightest as well eat the pot the bread's baked under as mate her emptiness. Beauty, quotha! a fine thing in sooth. Look at the carcass of a cow thrice weeks in the salt sea, and then prate of the merits of skin charms!"

"I'll do it, though thou talk thy tongue out," was the youth's angry rejoinder.

"Marry, and so thou shalt, an it please thee, and be lord of St. Agnes to boot—a fine lordship, with nigh a score of lone womenfolk to aid thee—'twill suit thy talents, my son! But yet, remember the damsel is in distress. It were ill manners even in thee to vex her with thy enquiry this month or more—so come away and drink a jug of canary on it."

Though well-nigh speechless with rage, the youth could do no less than acknowledge the propriety of what his father said on the subject of his wooing. And so with a sulky muttering he returned to the boat, and St. Agnes was again left in peace.

These few days had wrought a strange alteration in Dame Cochran's estimate of Nigel.

At first she was for scoffing at him in his assumed position as head of the island. But his concern for the widowed women, and his untiring efforts to hearten the spirits of them all, won her admiration.

He was quick to interrogate Nigel.

Only in the matter of the island's reformation was she at discord with him. She was not, she said, so eager to hand over the souls of her ancestry to the arch fiend in the nether world. She mocked at the thought that there was so much amiss in the island traditions and the habits that had come down to them. If they cut the throats of strangers who set foot on their land, they were acting but in self-defence. What right had these or any to invade a land without a "Pray thee, may we?" For the rest, what difference was there in the long run between a slit throat and a drowned man? As for the money and valuables on derelicts, they were as much the property of the finder as the egg a fowl lays is the property of the hen's owner. Nor was it so very heinous a sin to light a fire on a headland, which might serve as much to warn as to misguide a ship.

But this same good soul was not a whit averse to conciliating Heaven with some of the treasures of the island. There was no harm, she admitted, in thus making sure of the dead men's well-being in Purgatory. The harvest of the Atlantic was rich enough to license even such extravagance. And she hoped wisdom would yet come upon Master Prideaux, to enable him to see that he did no wrong in accepting the gifts proffered by the waves. Was it not a fair duello? At one time the sea thought well to snatch away eighteen lives at a stroke. Surely the least they could do was to receive what trifles at other times it offered them in compensation!

But to all this of course Nigel shook his head.

Damaris herself was the first to enlighten the old woman about her love for the acting lord of St. Agnes; and this news, too, did not come with such a shock.

"I'd rather see thee Mistress Prideaux than Mistress Pert Layton, wench," she said. "And when all's said there's little choice left if thou art to wed one of thine own people—a thing that is ever much to be advised. Further, there be three other marriageable maidens in the island, and I would not that either of those gawbies took the one proper man we have, and left thee wanting."

"Dear nurse," said Damaris in reply to this, "thou'rt fonder of me than I fancied, and the hearing of thee has made me happier than I have been this many an hour."

"'Tis a rule, wench, worth thy minding, that a rough tongue's more oft than not the voucher of an honest heart. Troth, I'm not perfect."

"And yet thou'rt not so far from it."

"Hearken to her. She says I'm perfect, or nigh it. Marry, then I must e'en do what the others do, and ascribe it to that fine wooer of thine who works changes in us all."

This with a little jesting laugh, though in no ill spirit.

But Damaris chose to regard it as a confession of fact.

"Therein, sweet nurse, I am at one with thee. My Nigel is matchless."

"And so art thou to think him so," was the rejoinder, with another laugh and a shake of the head.

Thus the days ran by, and the women began to turn their minds less and less upon their trouble. The middle of July was past, and again unkindly weather blew over the black rocks of the isles. The nights, too, grew longer, though not much, and some of the dames talked freely to each other of the terror of the coming winter, with no mankind to stand 'twixt them and the storms, and the fear of starvation that was worse than the worst of storms.

A St. Warna's Day came and went. For the first time in many years the Saint was bereft of her ritual. None went down to the Bay—nor was a single sacrificial pin cast into the muddy water of the well. Young Obadiah had been of less lively mood since his adventure on the evening of that twenty-sixth of June. It was but rarely he sang at all now; and never the hymn of which he had formerly been so fond.

Nigel had resolved again and again to take boat across to St. Mary's and there journey with others to the mainland, past St. Martin's and the Eastern Isles. But Damaris and his own doubts kept him at home. How could he so dissemble his purpose in visiting the Abbot of Tavistock as to quiet such qualms or suspicions as might arise in Master Layton? Besides, it is not easy to carry a large sum of money without the chink of it betraying itself.

Digitized by Google

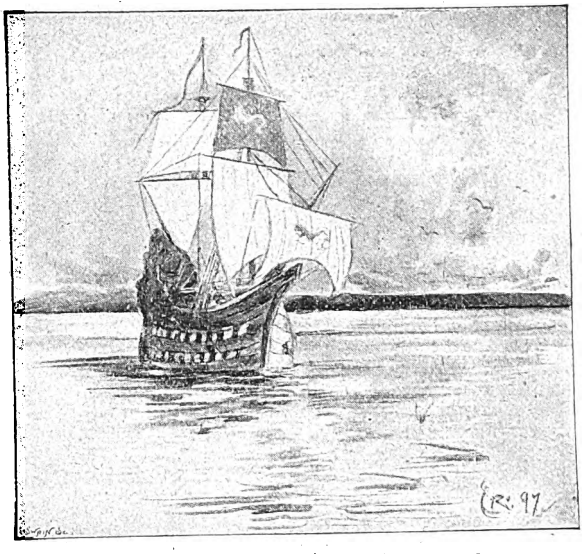
For these and other reasons, Nigel deferred his



Her head was pointed straight for the little haven.

expedition. And of all the hindrances that worked on him, none was more potent than the thought that in his absence young Layton might sail to St. Agnes, and carry off Damaris by main force.

On these grounds he had said to his sweetheart: "I will not leave Agnes without thee, or until we be duly wed, and there be some here to lift a hand in thy aid if any come to molest thee."

To which Damaris had replied that since it was so, she cared not whether they were wed or no. All she desired was the continual presence of her Nigel. What could it signify to her happiness whether they were or were not linked fast by Church ceremony, with Book and ring? She could not be more joyful of soul than she was—and this notwithstanding the occasional sadness that possessed her as she thought of her father and his end.

In truth they were bright days for both of them. There was none to say to them, "Thou shalt not do this," or, "Do this in despite of thy wishes." And many an hour, free for the time from broader anxiety, did Nigel pass with pretty Damaris on the velvety downs which spring inland from the granite cliffs.

CHAPTER X.

And so They Lived Happy ever After.

One bright, calm morning, with only a sigh of wind from the east, there stole into the channel between St. Mary's and St. Martin's a stately vessel full four score feet from stem to stern.

A month had gone by since the wreck of the King Hal on St. Agnes, and no such vessel as this had since appeared in the waters of Scilly.

There was excitement in Hugh Town when it was seen that her head was pointed straight for the little haven. At that distance it could not be seen whether she was of English make, or whether she was one of the pirate craft of Spain or France.

By-and-bye, however, the pennons fluttering from her tall masts told that she was a royal ship. The fair arms of old England floated in the clear air, and beneath them was a dragon with a forked tail, which Master Layton knew for the heraldic bearing of his late guest, Sir Francis Seymour.

Slowly the good ship walked through the pool towards the haven. Even the tide did not this day seem to aid her much. But at length, after a cannon shot which awoke echoes from many a rock far and near, and sent the gulls shrieking into the air, she dropped her anchor within two hundred yards of the shore. Master Layton, in his little boat, was already alongside her, and tendered a very hearty welcome to the guest whom he had so lately speeded from his island.

"I bear a Royal Commission, my good friend," said the knight, "and will say somewhat for your own ear when, with your leave, I have broken my fast."

Of the nature of this commision we need add little. It was concerned with the redistribution of certain of the lands of the islands when the dissolution of the monasteries (then brewing) might be expected. Sir Francis himself had a large grant of the monastic territory in the Isles. The Abbot of Tavistock, like the rest, was to be well shorn of his wealth.

In the course of light talk, after dinner, Master Layton spoke of the depopulation of St. Agnes, and the terrible manner of it.

Sir Francis was interested. But his interest became such when he heard young Nigel Prideaux was left sole man in the island, that the Governor of St. Mary's wondered not a little.

"Then your Excellency knows the youth?" he suggested.

"I know none I esteem more—of his kind," answered the knight.

He would not further be drawn on the subject, though it was observed, after inquiring about the girl named Damaris, that he puffed his lips and looked elated, like one with a brave idea in his head. He learnt too that it was this same damsel who was to have been the prize of the eccentric contest he had by chance initiated—whereupon he had

They came upon Damaris.

Digitized by Google

frowned, and trifled restlessly with his moustache, which he wore short, and turned after the Italian mode.

There was much in his visit which perplexed and even troubled Master Layton; but he knew not what to do or say in mitigation of his anxiety. The King's Sign Manual was not to be questioned.

On the morrow, upon a placid sea veined with lines as if snails had trodden over it, and left their mark, Sir Francis was escorted across to St. Agnes. He was accompanied by Master Layton, the Governor's two eldest sons, and others. With the party was Father Harris from Tresco, who was in Hugh Town at the time, and craved a passage that he might take the church's consolations with him to the widowed women and orphans.

"Who knows, sir priest," said the knight somewhat cavalierly. "Thou mayest have more duties than thou wottest of, and some of a various kind."

But to this Father Harris said nothing, for he had word of the reason of Sir Francis' coming into the Isles, and was careful not to anger him.

No sooner were they landed in Perkilla Bay than young Eric Layton craved permission to run on ahead to give warning of their visit. But Sir Francis said "Nay" to him—there was that in his face which told Master Eric that the knight was no favourer of his suit with Damaris. Yet it did not dishearten him; for what can it matter, he asked himself, to a nobleman whom the wench marries?

An, hr, wn of a s*n ty a*l ce un Ds hf,s*d wh h*r wn wk in a g*y h*w, wh rs bn h*r a*d t*e s*n, t*e L*n yh h*d to c*e h*s md ay. T*e lt of r*n on t*e g*s fr fe me h*m tk t*e k*s c*r mt en be h*s rl.

"Sweetest of sweet Penelopes!" exclaimed the knight, as he bent and kissed her hand—she going rose-red to her ear tips the while—"may eternal fire have me if I do not aid thee towards thy Ulysses."

All which was Hebrew to the bystanders, and indeed to Damaris herself—though she knew by her heart that it meant no ill to her.

Then the womenfolk of the island gathered and surrounded the party. They mourned their losses afresh, and shed tears; nor would they take comfort from Father Harris, whose words had a scholarly cast they cared not for. Only when mention was made of Nigel did their countenances clear at all. With one voice they belauded "Master Prideaux" as their true friend.

"By St. Jago of Compostella," exclaimed Sir Francis, with a light laugh, "your cavalier, fair Damaris, will have to play the Turk. 'Tis much to be hoped thou art complacent and not of a jealous humour."

This time the girl smiled, for she caught his meaning. There was compliment to Nigel in his words. She could forgive his allusions for the sake of that.

Afterwards they all went toward St. Warna's Bay, and the site of the wreck of the King Hal was regarded with lowering brows by Sir Francis. The distress of that fatal night was renewed in him as he beheld the cruel rocks and the splinters and other wreckage on the stones.

"Where is this Master Nigel?" he asked imperiously. "I have an account to settle with this accursed island."

They said he was still out at sea in his boat after the fish; and with him was little Obadiah Hicks.

"A pretty land in sooth," scoffed the knight gaily. "With a score and more of dames and virgins in the keeping of an idiot!"

And so they strolled on, and their steps led them to the grassy curve which ended in an inlet on the north side of Troy Town headland.

Sir Francis lifted his head briskly, and then glanced at Damaris, whom he had kept by his side.

"Methinks," he said softly, "thou and I, child, have been here before. And, by my faith, it was a well tasting capon, and the sweeter for being carried near that tender heart of thine!"

"'Twas this very spot," rejoined Damaris. "Yon rock like a sheep's head faced thee, did it not, from the cave?"

And so they strolled on.

"Marry it did, and finely I wearied of thy hard sheep's head ere that stout lad of thine took me in hand. May my right arm rot from my body if I forget it."

But at this moment there was a sound of much talking behind them, and, turning, they saw the women of St. Agnes and Nigel himself, and after them they were dragging a hand-cart, which seemed more burdensome than its load would have argued it.

The knight stepped back, and offered both his hands to our hero.

"Good Nigel, I rejoice to see thee," he said most courteously, so that Damaris was like to kiss him for his kindness. "But what have these dames brought me?"

"The fragments of thy lost ship, Sir Francis—in all, some thirty thousand gold pieces, and other curios."

The knight said not a word at first, but looked from Nigel to the boxes, and then at Master Layton.

After which he abruptly slapped Nigel on the shoulder. "Thou art a marvel of a boy," he exclaimed; "indeed," he added, with a merry, wicked smile, "thou'rt a pair of wonders, and beshrew me if I'll rob the world of its chance of a progeny of such. As for you, sir" (to Master Eric), "you may sing your 'dimittis in pace,' for you've lost her. Stay, I like not the blackness of your countenance. You be men of hard and reckless lives in these islands, and I've not faith in all of you. I pray you withdraw a pace or two, save only Master Prideaux, whom I hereby name Lord of St. Agnes by Royal Grant under my hand, and also save the Demoiselle Damaris Nance."

The knight had to repeat his request before it was fully complied with. Then the Laytons and the womenfolk of St. Agnes gave way.

"Now then, young people," said Sir Francis, "you have seen one token of my goodwill toward you. I'd fain give you a second. There's yon priest of Tresco here to hand, and I will rejoice to play the part of bride-father. Come, say the word, and we'll have you tied up for life this very hour."

Digitized by Google

Perhaps Nigel would have accepted this proposal without demur had it been made to him alone. The opportunity was at least a good one, and he was so light at heart to perceive that he had a friend who was more puissant than the Governor of St. Mary's.

But the blushes on Damaris' downcast face held him reluctant.

"It were ill done to hurry her," he said gently.

"Methinks I know maiden nature better than thou, good Nigel," was the knight's smiling rejoinder. "It may be 'no' at the mouth with them, but I vow to thee it's 'yes' at the heart on such times as these. And it's the man who reads their hearts first and their tongues' words only by the light of them—it's that man who does best for them—and, by my soul, best for himself too. Dost take me?"

This discourse seemed to encourage Nigel — he advanced and took the girl's hand.

"Sweetheart," he whispered, "wilt be my bride this very hour? I'll view thy silence as consent."

Sir Francis heard and laughed loud. "Thou'lt make a good lord, Master Prideaux, for thou hast strategy in thy composition, as well as truth and honour, and such goodness as I would were more common elsewhere in the world. She'll stay as dumb as a post, mark if she do not."

And so she did. Whereupon Nigel put her hand upon his arm and they both stood before the knight. The girl had raised her face towards her bridegroom when Sir Francis called for Father Harris—and there was such a light, contented smile upon it that he could hardly refrain from clasping her in his arms in public.

Thus, on the green turf, under the blue sky, with the babble of the sea on the shingle in their ears, and with all the people of St. Agnes and the three Layton men about them, Nigel and Damaris were married. And at a word from Father Harris, after the ceremony, all went on their knees, with their faces toward the Bay of St. Warna, and the priest besought the Almighty to bless the island of St. Agnes and all its inhabitants, and to put right instincts into their hearts. To which prayer the knight in particular uttered a resounding "Amen," with unrestrained shaking of the head as he looked sternly towards the rocks on which the King Hal had been lured. But his face lost its severity when he marked the boxes of gold, and he gave the bride and her groom great congratulations on their alliance.

The St. Agnes women, too, pressed forward, and Dame Cochran in the van of them, to offer their blessing also to Nigel and Damaris. The event pleased them mightily upon the whole. And Dame Cochran in particular could not refrain from looking impudently at young Layton, with a toss of her old head. But Master Eric had ere this begun to laugh as if he cared not at heart for his own discomfiture. He was a youth of volatile and pliable nature, and he jeered at himself for his recent earnestness as if it had been a folly.

They burnt it to the ground.

"There's one thing more," said Sir Francis, when he had begun to move towards the Bay to leave the island. "In due time I will send thee, my Nigel, a company of stout-limbed youths, like thyself, to reinstate the island. They will have a word to look to thee for their headship; for their wives they need also, I trow, look not out of St. Agnes. By my troth, widows are not to be sneered at. They are like autumn plums, than which I know naught more to my taste. But such maids as thou, fair Damaris, are — as methinks I have said before—incomparable."

Then, with many expressions of his lasting goodwill, Sir Francis left St. Agnes in the keeping of its new lord. Master Layton and the others also parted with Nigel as with a person of some great distinction.

* * * * *

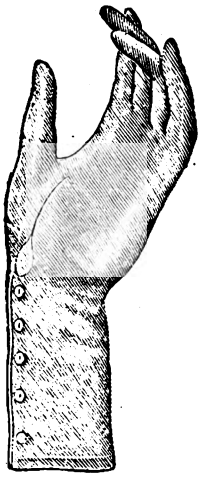
That evening the wedding feast in St. Agnes was celebrated. And afterwards, ere bedtime, with a silvery moon in a quiet sky, they all repaired to the Bay of St. Warna, and, kindling a bonfire round the post which had of old served them as the centre of their heathen dances, they burnt it to the ground. The well of St. Warna they choked with the big stones they rolled into it, and at this task no one was so industrious as little Obadiah Hicks.

A new and a happier era had begun for the isle of St. Agnes.

The End.

Digitized by Google

THE LONDON GLOVE COMPANY'S GLOVES . .



At Warehouse Prices!

Single Pairs Sold!!

Ladies', Gentlemen's, and Children's Gloves

Of Every Description.

Supplementary Departments:
HOSIERY, HANDKERCHIEFS, FANS.

WAREHOUSE PRICES! NO INTERMEDIATE PROFITS!!

Send Post-Card for a Detailed Price List (Illustrated) free by post.

THE LONDON GLOVE COMPANY,

46, Cheapside, E.C., and 83, New Bond Street, W.

MOUSTACHES

HEAVY and HANDSOME Speedily Produced.

BALD PATCHES Covered by using

Giving himself (h)airs ESAULINE The Hair Apparent

Testimonials daily.

POST FREE Secretly packed, 1s.6d.,3s.,5s.

"I USED IT."

Same preparation also sold as a specially prepared HAIR LOTION for LADIES' HAIR at 1/-, 2/6 and 4/6 per bottle Postage 3d. extra,

From .. KNOWLES & CO. 30, Newgate Street, LONDON, E.C.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING. £20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue 259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 188, Euston Road, London. (Over 30 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5, Sept. 1, £5, Oct. 1, £5, Nov. 2, £6. Dec. 1, £6. Jan 2 1897. £8. Feb. 1, £6.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS COCOA.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

WITH FULL NATURAL FLAVOUR.

A SUM of from 10s. to 20s. per week offered for spare time to either sex, everywhere; work can be done evenings.—Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 92A, Aldersgate Street, London.

OTTO-FREEZ

BEAUTIFUL TOILET SOAP.

Everyone should use it. It is so nice for the skin. VALUABLE COUPONS with every Tablet. Two Tablets sent post free 1/-.

THE OTTO-FREEZ CO., 66, High St., Camden Town, LONDON, N.W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A.D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87, Alexandra Road, Norwich. — Gentlemen,—I have had some boxes of your Tablets for my wife, and she has derived great benefit from them. Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Bretton West, near Wakefield.—"Miss L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.—Mr. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.—Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 13st."

127, Out Gang Lane, Old Radford, Notts.—Miss E. P. PARSONS says: "I was 16st. before taking Tablets, and am now 15st.—going on nicely."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

THE WIRT FOUNTAIN PEN.

MARK TWAIN says: "The 'WIRT' is an absolutely perfect reservoir pen compared with which all other pens are frank failures."

PRICES: 10/6; with Gold Mounts, 13/6 and 16/6. Special Pens for Presentation, encased in Sterling Silver, 27/6 and 29/6. All pens fitted with 14-carat Gold Nibs, Iridium Pointed, which should last a life-time. Broad, medium, or fine nibs to suit any hand. Catalogue sent post free on application.

THE WIRT FOUNTAIN PEN CO. LTD., 1, GRESHAM BUILDINGS, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Answers to Correspondents.

P. L. S. wants to know why champagne can be manufactured only in certain parts of France.———The champagne district in France has a peculiar conformation of soil—loam and stones mixed. There is no similar soil suitable for vine culture in any other country, or in any other part of France, and, as a consequence, this small area in the north-west of the French Republic has retained its celebrity for centuries.

A. A. G.—32,000 varieties of goods are manufactured from wool.

J. S. T.—Opinions differ as to which is the most sensitive part of the body. It is usually supposed to be the tip of the tongue, but those engaged in polishing billiard balls, or any other substances requiring a very high degree of smoothness, invariably use the cheek bone for detecting signs of roughness.

U. I. C. E.—You are suffering from an overpowering dose of self-consciousness. It is a malady that frequently attacks young men of your age. You imagine that everybody is drinking in every word you say, and noting your every movement, while really they are not taking the least notice of you. There is no remedy for such a trouble. The only thing is to wait until you outgrow it.

Ben.—The "Adventures of Mr. Alfred Juggins" will be published in book form.

F. R. stammers. He wants to know of a cure.———Tap or beat time with the finger at every syllable pronounced, either in reading—which should always be aloud—or speaking. By so doing the most inveterate stammerer will be surprised at the immediate result, and with long and constant practice no impediment will be found to fluent speaking. Also, if you will carefully note, when reading aloud, that there are certain letters which, more particularly as initials, make speaking difficult, you will find that the sound of other letters can either be substituted or pronounced so as to remove the difficulty. Thus Y and U are especially obnoxious. Say Eeankee for Yankee, Eeouth for Youth, etc. By care and patience you will find this of great assistance.

C. D. D.—You may make an excellent lubricating and burning oil and embrocation compound from the following recipe: One ounce of camphorated oil, three ounces of sperm oil, and four ounces of vaseline oil. Mix the whole together, and colour with a little alkanet.

Cavendo Tutus.—Impossible to say which is the best sea-side town for investing in boarding-houses. Rising places are best, and these are not at all difficult to find.

L. T. is going bald, and wants to know of a simple remedy.———Try glycerine, whisky, and quinine. They should be mixed. Don't give yourself the whisky, your wife the quinine, and your baby the glycerine. This will probably result in the loss of heir. Rub the mixture into the scalp every morning.

Mrs. J. L. T. is in a quandary. She recently advertised for a cook, and amongst the replies was one from a person with excellent recommendations and in every way satisfactory. Arrangements were made for her to take up her position in the house, and she arrived the other day with her trunk and a bicycle. Mrs. J. L. T. remonstrated with her new menial, who in return insisted in either stopping or receiving a month's salary in lieu of notice. My correspondent wants to know if she can legally prevent the cook from bringing her dirty bicycle right through the front door, and keeping it in the kitchen.———I'm sorry, but no questions of a legal or medical nature will be answered in these columns. You had better consult some respectable lawyer in the matter. If he thinks you are wrong, the quietest, quickest, and, perhaps, in the end, the most economical course to pursue, would be to pay the woman the balance of her wages and pack her off. This peculiar case opens up the possibility of a new occupation for women. In the event of its legality being proved, there is nothing to prevent a servant from bringing an elephant or a pantechnicon van full of goods into the house of her employer, on the ground that they are part of her belongings.

M. F. D.—There is a railway between Cronstadt and Oranienbaum which is laid upon the ice.

G. C. S.—A cigarette smoker sends into the air about 4,000,000,000 particles of dust at every puff.

Dreamer.—You never see Pearson's Shakespeare about because it is not exposed for sale in shops or on bookstalls.

H. T. L. M. (Doncaster).—The brain of the ant is larger in proportion to its body than that of any other animal.

Lucy.—It is not for me to say whether Home Notes Bouquet is better than the one you mention. You'd better sample both, and judge for yourself.

A Constant Reader.—I know of no instance in which the winner of the Derby has been known at any London office before the second horse has passed the winning post.

J. F.—The mail steamers of the City of Dublin Steam Packet Co. have sailed regularly for a great number of years, with the exception of the day mail on Good Fridays.

S. L. K.—The proper distance between the eyes is the width of one eye.

A. M.—When you write on one subject, do not enclose stamps for handwriting delineation in the same envelope. Keep them entirely separate, and mark your communication on the outside "Graphologist."

E. S.—When cabinet photographs first came out about twenty years ago, 95,000 copies of the Queen's likeness were sold in one year, but now 500 is a good sale.

Although it is considered a breach of etiquette to look behind one while walking, while riding a bicycle it is considered distinctly clever, if you are still on the bicycle after you have looked round. There are very few occasions, though, on which it is absolutely necessary to look round. As a rule, it is merely to satiate idle curiosity. However, this fact does not deter novelty-hatchers from bringing forth instruments for enabling one to take a back view. Among the best of these, consistent with the very modest price of a shilling, is the "Mirror Wristlet" issued by Garston and Co., of Queen Square, Aldersgate Street, E.C. There is little doubt that the article will become popular with ladies. They will find it invaluable for looking at the country behind them, to see if their hair is tidy or their hat on straight.

It is only to be expected that with the advent of the motor car the bicycle horse will become unpopular with the rising generation. Mr. Charles Clamp has recognised this in good time, and has invented a toy in which the locomotive engine takes the place of the wooden horse. The boy sits on a seat in the tender, and pedals the back wheels, while the steering gear is connected by rods with the front wheels. This gentleman is the inventor also of a water roundabout, in which ships take the place of the orthodox horse, and float round in real water. The engine works and shipbuilding yard are to be found at 67, Kitto Road, New Cross, S.E.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

FINEST CYCLES.
Lists of ROYAL AJAX and SILVER QUEEN CYCLES for Ladies and Gentlemen free. IMMENSE STOCK. New & Secondhand. Wonderful bargains. Carriage Paid. Easy Payments from 10s. monthly. Large discount for cash. We include all accessories free of charge. Old machines exchanged. 1 year's guarantee.—THE BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO., 45, Everton Rd., Livrp'l.

OUR EYES! OUR EARS!

THEIR DISEASES

CURED WITHOUT OPERATION

NEW TREATMENT.—For Cataract and all Diseases of the Eye; Deafness in all its forms; Noises in the Head and Ears; Discharges from the Ears; Deafness from Influenza and Catarrh cured Nine cases out of ten cured without personal interview. The special remedies forwarded to any part. Hundreds of letters in testimony. Bleeding, Blistering, and all other obsolete and violent treatment avoided. No "Ear-Drums," "Ear-Cornets," or painful instruments employed. Write for Testimonials and Printed Form of Questions to answer; forwarded free.—Mr. T. ISON, Eye and Ear Dispensary, Leeds. [Estab. 1871.]

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full, perfect, natural Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. Highly approved and recommended by the Medical Profession. For testimonials, press opinions, and free particulars, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

BLUSHING PERMANENTLY CURED
On receipt of stamped envelope, a lady will send to all those afflicted, free particulars of a simple, harmless, and inexpensive self-treatment, which has permanently cured her daughter and hundreds of others of both sexes. Address, in confidence, Mrs. F. R. AUSTIN, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London.

HAIR DESTROYED permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

ORGANETTES 4/- MONTHLY
Plays Hymns, Popular Airs, Quadrilles, Waltzes, Hornpipes, &c. A mere child can play it. Cash or easy payments. List of tunes and full particulars free.
DRAPER, ORGANETTE WORKS, BLACKBURN.

JOHN JACKSON,

Skittle and Skittle Ball Turner,

113, PENTONVILLE ROAD,

LONDON, N.

Hornbeam Skittles; Sycamore Skittles; Four Corners; American Pins; Cheese Ball, Warranted; Round Ball, Warranted; Lawn Bowls.

FRAMES LAID AND REPAIRED.

Price List on Application.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.
Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE

HAIR DESTROYED. On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 26, Belvedere Rd., Lambeth, London.

DEAFNESS CURED.
On receipt of stamped envelope, a lady who cured herself of Deafness and Noises in the Head, after fifteen years of suffering, will send to all afflicted free particulars of the Remedy, which is simple, safe, sure and inexpensive. Address—Mrs. C. E. AUSTIN, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

HAIR DESTROYED. A lady will, on receipt of stamped envelope, send free particulars of a new French Remedy, which permanently removes all Superfluous Hairs, destroying the roots without injuring the skin. Simple and inexpensive. Address, Madame "F. B.," c/o Fontaine et Cie., 1, Piccadilly Circus, London.

TOO STOUT.

A lady who in a few months reduced her weight from 16st. to 10st. 3lb. by a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment, will willingly send free particulars of same to all who are sufferers, on receipt of stamped envelope. Address, Mrs. G. M. ELLIS, 26, Belvedere Road, Lambeth, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.
A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope.—Address, Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 179, Westminster Bridge Road, London.

BLACKHEADS or "Maggots," Pimples, Blotches, etc., immediately and permanently removed by my Skin Cleansing Lotion, "CUTISOLINE." Never fails. Hundreds of testimonials. Post free with directions, 1/6, 3/- and 5/-. AUSTIN LENNOX, Skin Specialist, 1, Shoe Lane, Fleet Street, LONDON.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

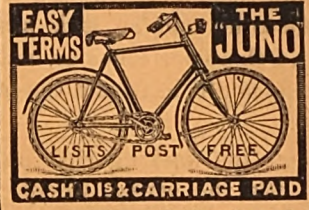
THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

"JUNO" CYCLES

ARE THE VERY BEST.

TWELVE EQUAL MONTHLY PAYMENTS.



JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb.

JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO. LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.
N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.
New JUNO CYCLE RIDING SCHOOL, 1,700ft., now open.

BLUSHING.

Particulars of a self-treatment for a permanent cure, as prescribed by eminent physicians of the U.S.A., forwarded free to all sufferers on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. B. F. FIELD, 15, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London, W.

"DRUNKENNESS"

CURED. A Lady having cured her husband secretly of intemperate habits, will gladly send particulars of the remedy on receipt of stamped envelope.—Mrs. S. S. BARRINGTON, 4, Featherstone Bldgs., LONDON, W.C.

TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, Mrs. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

THE GREAT COUGH REMEDY, BRONCHONIA.

A Marvellous Remedy for Coughs, whether arising from Consumption, Bronchitis, or Asthma. Its efficacy is testified to by Eminent Physicians. Of all Chemists, 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per bottle. Post free, 2s. 9d., 4s. 9d., and 11s. 6d.—J. HOWARD & Co., 20 and 21, Queenhithe, LONDON, E.C. One Trial will prove its Efficacy.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

CORPULENCY CURED By a simple inexpensive self-treatment, effecting a rapid and permanent reduction without change in diet. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. G. A. BOYD, 14, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London.

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be Worth the Guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery.

The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied, but amazed at the Quantity and Quality given. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful Present can be given. Every item is useful.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to

THE PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY, STAFFS.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

They Hammer on the Hard Road.

"It isn't the hunting that hurts the horses; it's the hammer, hammer, hammer on the hard high road."

The noble sportsman who said this is sometimes a little careless about his "h's," and in quoting him I have taken the liberty of putting them where they belong. He won't mind that, I'm sure. As to his opinion, it is sound as a cocoa-nut. And there are other animals besides horses of which he might have said the same thing. For example:

"It isn't the working that hurts the men and women; it's the worry, worry, worry on life's hard high road."

But what is one to do? How can we stop worrying? On this point a certain writer says: "Don't worry, don't fret, don't let your mind dwell on trifles; observe the true proportions of things." Bright man! Let us tender him a vote of thanks. Should you ever consult him about a grain of sand in your eye he will say: "Oh, don't pay any attention to it." Excellent advice—for people with glass eyes. But how would he handle cases like these?

"Only recently," writes a woman who evidently knows what she is talking about, "have I recovered from an illness in which (taking body and mind together) I suffered more than I shall be able to set forth in words. It began in March, 1893. Without knowing why, I felt strangely. I was tired and exhausted, and had wholly lost my appetite. I ate a little, of course, but it appeared to do me no good. After eating I had a deal of pain at the chest, through to my back. There was a horrible gnawing sensation at the pit of my stomach, and for over three months I took no solid food. My flesh left me until I became so thin my acquaintances hardly recognised me; and I was so weak I could scarcely drag one foot after the other.

"But perhaps the worst feature of my condition was the state of my mind and nerves. My ambition was not only gone, but I grew so low-spirited and nervous that I didn't dare stay in the house alone. At night this feeling would be more intense and depressing. Sometimes I fancied I should not live till morning. Every subject presented its dismal and doleful side to me. I had medical advice and treatment, but no benefit came of it. Nearly a year passed in this way, when in February (1894) my mother persuaded me to try Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup, saying it had done her so much good under similar circumstances. I got a bottle from the Provident Co-operative Stores, Whitehall Branch. After taking it only a few days I felt greatly relieved; and by continuing to use it my appetite soon returned, my food agreed with me, and I grew strong and able to resume my work. (Signed) (Mrs.) Agnes Maria Hyde, 25, Devon Street, Darwen, Lancs., February 27th, 1895."

"In the early part of 1889," writes another, "I began to feel ill and out of sorts. I felt heavy, tired and weary in body and mind. I had a sour taste in the mouth, no appetite, and much pain and distress after eating. Rest gave me no relief, and I seldom got a full night's sleep. As time went on I became very weak—never being free from pain of some kind or another. The doctor's medicine did not reach the real seat of my complaint. For two years I suffered in this way. In March, 1891, I read a book about Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. I shall never forget the hope with which it inspired me. I got a bottle from Boot's Drug Stores, Bridge Street, and was wonderfully relieved by it. I could eat and digest food, and the pains decreased, and in a short time left me altogether. I have since had my usual good health. I now keep Mother Seigel's Syrup in the house as a family friend. (Signed) (Mrs.) Susannah Horne, 4, Beach Cottages, Mansfield Road, Rotherham, March 12th, 1895."

Most women fall ill from worry. It is hammer, hammer, hammer on the hard high road with them; an endless monotony of petty cares and vexations—all hitting the same spot on their brains and nerves. The disease that is bound to follow is the disease that came so near crushing the heart and life out of the two ladies whose letters you have read—indigestion or dyspepsia. That Mother Seigel's Syrup will cure the disease is a reason for profound thankfulness. But as for the causes of worry!—alas, I can suggest no remedy save courage, and hope in the good time coming.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 428. FOR WEEK ENDING MARCH 13TH, 1897. [ONE PENNY.

"Cadbury's represents the standard of highest purity at present attainable."
—THE LANCET.

"The Typical Cocoa of English Manufacture—Absolutely Pure."
—THE ANALYST.

CADBURY'S COCOA

Absolutely Pure, therefore Best.

In DRINKING COCOA, care should be taken to have the pure article only, as many so-called "pure" cocoas contain added matter, which is not only unnecessary, but often positively harmful. CADBURY'S is a perfectly safe and reliable Cocoa, containing the full nourishing properties of the cocoa bean, without any foreign admixture whatsoever. As a sustaining, strength-giving beverage, and a nourishing food, CADBURY'S COCOA fulfils every requirement.

"HEALTH" says: "CADBURY'S COCOA has in a remarkable degree those natural elements of sustenance that give the system endurance and hardihood, with a steady action that makes it a most acceptable and reliable beverage."

Digitized by Google

10/6 JOHN NOBLE

HALF-GUINEA

COSTUMES,

WORN BY LADIES OF EVERY DEGREE.

PERFECT in Fit, Style, and Quality.

TWO GOLD MEDALS.

Ladies should write for latest Sketch-book of Fashions for Ladies and Children, sent FREE.

SPECIAL CALENDARS FREE.

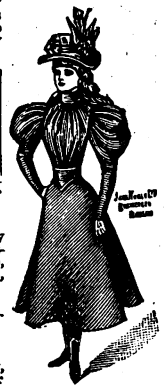
MODEL 647.

All purchasers during the next few weeks will receive an Ornate Souvenir designed by Raphael Tuck.

NEW DRESS GOODS

A Box of 1,000 Patterns, including 250 Varieties of SERGES, sent free on approval.

TWO NEW DESIGNS.



A very smart, well-cut, full-fronted Bodice, shaped to the back. The sleeves are of the very latest shape. The skirt is full and wide, and made in a recent tailor design. Price complete 10/6. Safely packed and carriage paid for 9d. extra. Skirt only, as sketched, 5/6. Carriage 6d. extra.

10/6

MODEL 648.—Pretty up-to-date Maid's Costume, well-cut Bodice, Fashionable Sleeves, Tailor-made Skirt.

Size 35 38 42 in.
Price 6/11 7/11 8/11 ea.
Size 46 50 in.
Price 9/11 11/- ea.
Carriage 6d. extra.

COLOURS.—All Costumes supplied in Black, Navy, Bronze, Brown, Ruby, Petunia, Cinnamon, Fawn, Grey, or Myrtle.

Sizes in Stock fit figures 34, 36, 38 in. round bust (under arms), skirts being 38, 40, 42 in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure for 1/6 extra.

Please mention "SHORT STORIES" when ordering.

Bankers: "London and Midland" Bank.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

16 POSTAGE STAMP PHOTOGRAPHS

For ONE SHILLING.

Send Cabinet Photograph and Postal Order to

LEE'S ART STUDIOS:

PORTRUSH; GIANT'S CAUSEWAY IRELAND.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

WHY SUFFER FROM CORNS, BUNIONS, OR ENLARGED TOE JOINTS, when a packet of Thompson's Celebrated French Corn Plasters will cure you? It is thin as silk, and can be worn with tightest boot. Post free for 14 stamps from M. F. THOMPSON, Homœpathic Chemist, 17, Gordon St., Glasgow. Thompson's Guide to Health post free.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

March 13, 1897.

No. 12.

S.S. S.S.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 12.

Mar. 13, 1897.

NEWSAGENTS

S.S. S.S.

REGD.

ONE BOX

OF

Dr. Mackenzie's Harmless

ARSENICAL COMPLEXION WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire; clear, fresh, free from blotch, blemish, coarseness, redness, freckles, or pimples. Post free for 4/6.—S. HARVEY, 5, Denman Street, London Bridge, S.E. Half Boxes, 2/9. Use DR. MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL TOILET SOAP. Deliciously and expensively perfumed, at all Chemists' and Stores, 1/- per tablet, 3 in box, post free 2/6. Absolutely harmless. Can also be had without arsenic by asking for Dr. Mackenzie's Complexion Soap.

AVOID BAGGY KNEES

The ONLY Stretcher whereby the tension is obtained by means of a Screwed Rod.

Separate Stretchers are recommended for each pair of Trousers in use.

OF ALL HOSIERS, TAILORS, and OUTFITTERS EVERYWHERE, or sent on receipt of P.O. (Bronze, polished, 5/-; Army quality, nickel, 9/6), to S.S. Dept., 6, PHILIP LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Fully Guaranteed. Lists and Testimonials Post Free. Over 1,000 New and Secondhand Cycles on Sale or Exchange. Easy Terms to suit all. Tuition Free in School to Purchasers. Trade supplied. — BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO., 42, High Street, Camden Town, London.

CYCLE AUCTION SALES.—Every Tuesday & Thursday, 7 p.m.; Saturday, 3.30. Largest Cycle Sale Rooms in London. Over 2,000 Cycles. Open 9 till 9. Inspection from the Trade and Public invited. Auction Catalogues Free. Tattersalls of the Cycle Trade.—79, Queen's Road, Bayswater (next door to Metropolitan Railway Station).

THE DEAF HEAR

The New Patent

SOUND DISCS

Completely overcome DEAFNESS and HEAD NOISES, no matter of how long standing. Are the same to the ears as glasses are to the eyes. Invisible. Comfortable. Worn months without removal. Explanatory Pamphlet Free.

The L. R. WALES CO., 62 & 63, New Bond St., London, W.

SHORT STORIES

No. 428.] For the Week ending March 13th, 1897. [ONE PENNY.

That Wedding Cake.

"LETTERS, sir!"

"Thank you, Thomas. Put them down and take yourself off!"

I had just finished my breakfast, and the tiny silver chocolatière, with the bachelor service of transparent china, still stood on the damask-draped round table. It was a bright little room, with its white and gold paper and high-heaped grate, in the grey light of this chill December morning, when the air was thick with noiselessly falling snow-flakes. And this contrast between the bitter atmosphere without and the tropical warmth of my own special nook gave me an additional consciousness of satisfaction, as I leant back in my chair and proceeded to examine my correspondence.

"Lee Worcester wants to know if I can go there to tea this evening. Of course I can; Lee's wife is a perfect little rosebud, and one, besides, who does not believe in cashiering all her husband's bachelor friends. And then I rather like that brown-eyed sister-in-law of his. Yes, I'll go, certainly. Hallo—here's a letter from my brother in Glenfield!"

I unfolded the document eagerly, scarcely able, at first, to credit the tidings it revealed.

"Well, here is a pretty state of things! Going to be married, claims my congratulations, says that Mary (who the dickens is 'Mary'?) is in great tribulation about the wedding cake; affair to come off on Wednesday and no cake to be had for love or money! Will I be the best fellow in the world, and send one down from D'Artier's?"

I glanced at the date of the letter; it had been delayed several days' posts, and there was not a minute to be lost. I rose and put on my hat and overcoat, giving more heedful gaze at the various directions about icing, weight, and decorations, which accompanied Tom's closely-written epistle, before I sallied boldly forth into the street on my novel errand.

It was just about one o'clock, the snow had ceased falling, and the sun shone brilliantly. D'Artier's was full, of course; there were at least a dozen ladies that I knew sitting at the tiny marble tables. I tried to assume an air of easy impudence, as if I had only come in for a pound of chocolate almonds; but it was of no use, I could not disguise the latent sheepishness of my aspect as I sauntered up to the counter.

"How can I serve you, sir?" demanded the trim damsel who presided over the saccharine treasures.

All rights reserved.]

I muttered something under my moustache, feeling a hot blush suffuse my whole countenance. Why wouldn't those inquisitive womankind attend to their ice-cream?

"Cake, sir? Certainly. For a party, sir? Pound cake, lemon, almond——"

"No, no," I bawled; "I want a wedding cake!"

"Oh, I beg your pardon, sir," tittered the atrocious shopwoman. Was it reality, or did I only fancy that the titter was echoed among the bonnets and furs beyond? However that might have been, the mere apprehension was sufficient to throw me into a cold perspiration.

The next moment, however, the counter was heaped with various temples of glistening white sugar, some wreathed with make-believe roses, some surmounted with Cupids, others pure white masses of icing. I surveyed them in a state of hopeless bewilderment.

"Perhaps, sir, it would be better if the lady could come with you to select," hazarded my enemy behind the counter.

I could endure this badgering no longer, but pounced upon a gigantic pyramid of sugar lilies, from which peeped up a tiny alabaster Cupid.

"I will take this; what is the price?"

"£3, sir."

I laid down the money, and never experienced so delicious a sensation of relief as at the moment when I gave the address to which I wanted it sent.

I went out of the shop with the eye of every woman upon me. At no time of my life has my vanity received so appalling a blow. My very knees trembled. On reaching the door I sprang into a hansom and drove to the club.

* * * * *

"How d'ye do, Golde? When is it to come off?"

"When is what to come off?" queried I, considerably puzzled at my friend Atherton's address.

"Your wedding, to be sure. Ah, you're a sly dog to keep us all in the dark so long."

"You can't have been much more in the dark than I am at this moment, Atherton. What on earth do you mean?"

But Atherton only wagged his head knowingly, and rushed off in pursuit of a 'bus, saying something of which I only caught the disconnected fragments "my wife," and "D'Artier's."

"Hang that wedding cake," was my internal ejaculation.

As I pursued my speculative way a tiny gloved hand was held out from a passing carriage.

Digitized by Google

"Ah, Mrs. Eveleigh, excuse me for not noticing you."

"We all know that love is blind," said the lady, smiling. "Now I know why you haven't been to see me for such an age. Ah, you needn't look so unconscious. My niece was at D'Artier's this morning, and saw how particular you were in the selection of a certain article."

Before I could explain this piece of circumstantial evidence, there was a movement in the "block" of carriages which had caused the temporary detention of my fair friend, and her equipage rolled away, with a wave of the pretty hand and the archest of smiles.

I stood looking after her. with an odd sort of impression that I should wake up presently to find myself married to somebody, whether or no; indeed, I was not altogether certain whether Mrs. Golde was not waiting for me at home.

How brilliantly the firelight and gas-light illumined that cosy little room at Lee Worcester's, with its pink-tinted walls and the crimson carpet sprinkled with small white buds. The piano was open, strewn with sheets of music, just as it had been left, its pearl keys glimmering softly in the subdued radiance of the one jet of light that glowed through a frosted glass shade above. The tea-table was all set—I had often dreamt of a home of my own that should be something like Worcester's in its snug evening comfort, and somehow that tea-table always formed part of the phantasm. There was something so bright and cheerful in the snowy damask and the sparkling glass and glittering china.

The golden slices of cake and tiny white muffins, breaking into crisp flakes that melted in one's mouth, and amber jellies, quivering like gigantic jewels through their crystal prison walls, produced a wonderfully agreeable effect on my epicurean sight. And I could imagine no prettier vision to crown it all than Mary Worcester in her crimson merino dress, edged round the throat with delicate lace, presiding at the silver tea urn. Except, perhaps—but that's neither here nor there!

I was a little disappointed, on entering, not to see Lee's sister-in-law, a trim little beauty, with brown, rippling hair and velvety eyes, somewhat between hazel and black, but I did not like to ask any questions, and consequently remained in ignorance until Mary casually remarked:

"Netty is very low-spirited this evening, perhaps she will come down stairs by-and-bye."

How I longed to ask what the matter was. Perhaps she had received bad news; perhaps she was not well. I would have given my two ears to know, but I didn't dare to enquire.

"So you're going to be married, eh, Tracy, my boy?" said Lee, as we sat in front of the bright fire. "Well, you can't do better. A bachelor at best is a mere fraction of society."

I started up, annoyed beyond all endurance.

"For mercy's sake, dear Lee, do tell me where you picked up that ridiculous report!"

"Ridiculous report! That's pretty cool, upon my honour," exclaimed Worcester.

"Now, Mr. Golde," said Mary laughing, "don't deny the soft impeachment. I am sure you would enjoy a quiet home of your own much better than chambers. There is no charm against a sad heart like domestic bliss!"

There was a radiant softness in her own tender eyes as she spoke that penetrated me with the sudden conviction that I had been very foolish to remain single all these years.

"Do confess," she added gaily.

"But I have nothing on earth to confess!"

"Nonsense," said Mary, holding up a pretty warning finger. "What were you buying at D'Artier's this very morning?"

I turned scarlet, here was that everlasting wedding cake again!

Fortunately my inquisition was terminated for a moment by the entrance of Lee's sister-in-law, looking lovelier than I had ever seen her before, a little pale perhaps, however, and her silky eye lashes heavy with what I could almost have fancied recent tears, were it not that she seemed in extravagantly gay spirits. The soft flushes of colour came and went like pink shadows across her cheeks, and her coral lips were dimpled with the brightest of smiles, yet all the time I could not divest myself of the odd impression that she was ready to melt into an April shower of tears at any moment!

She lightly tendered me her congratulations upon the approaching "happy event," holding out a small, snowy hand loaded with sparkling rings as she did so.

"You speak in riddles, Miss Nettie."

"Don't pretend that you have not the key to them," she said, a little tremulously.

"I cannot comprehend what you mean," I answered.

She said no more, but sat quietly down, shading her eyes with her hand, as though the fire dazzled them. Mrs. Worcester, however, still pursued the obnoxious topic.

"Then how do you explain the wedding cake at D'Artier's?"

"Is that the only testimony upon which I am tried and convicted of a wilful intention of matrimony?"

"That is all; we are ready to hear your defence."

"Well, that unlucky mass of white sugar and dyspepsia was for my brother's wedding ceremonies, a hundred miles away. I assure you it had not the least connection with my matrimonial fortunes."

Nettie looked up with a rare brilliance under her long lashes, and an almost involuntary smile wreathing her lips; I took heart and went bravely on, cheered by a sudden inspiration.

"But I will purchase a bride cake twice as large for my own wedding, if Nettie will consent to be my bride."

There—I had done it! In less than five minutes I was an accepted lover, looking boldly into the wondrous liquid depths of those brown, beautiful eyes. A new sensation—but agreeable, very.

"And now, Tracy," said Mary mischievously, "I will tell you a secret; the reason Nettie cried half the afternoon and became so low-spirited this evening was that——"

"Mary!" remonstrated Nettie, with cheeks ablaze.

"That she heard you were buying a wedding cake," pursued Mary, putting away the white fingers with which Nettie vainly strove to fetter her tell-tale lips.

"I'll order another one to-morrow," said I meditatively. "Ah, I shouldn't have repined so much at Tom's commission had I known what a sweet little wife it would win me."

"Don't, Tracy," said Nettie, hiding her face on my shoulder.

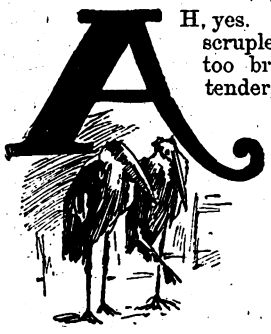
And when Tom wrote to know why on earth I didn't come to his hymeneal ceremonies, I wrote back that I was obliged to stay to attend to a wedding of my own.

And such a wedding cake as graced the centre of our banqueting board! It's no use trying to describe its frosted splendours, but if any of my readers seriously contemplate getting married, I'll send them the recipe.

A. Graves.

Digitized by Google

THE DUEL.



AH, yes. I really do feel some sort of scruple about this matter. He is too brave a lad, too young, too tender, for the shambles of such an old butcher as myself.

But, pshaw! Why should I, eh? It is his own folly. To insult me—me, Gaston de Samnarez—and at Bignon's, too, before all my friends and acquaintances. And such an insult! Sangdieu! but my blood boils at the thought. I—spat upon, drenched with wine-lees, called coward and liar by this sprig, this but erstwhile school-boy! Nom de Dieu! but I will cut his comb, this cockerel.

And yet he could not have done aught else. He had no alternative. He says I insulted his sister. And so the cartel has gone out, and this morning I meet this young Don Quixote.

Ah! here we are on the ground. We are first, I see, my seconds and I. "Ah! good-day, doctor. Hope sincerely we won't trouble you much." What a charming spot where a man may meet his enemy, and where the two may discuss their little differences as gentlemen should. Here for a man's last bed, if so it should happen, is a piece of turf, softer than sleep. Ma foi! I grow poetic. I should be composing a sonnet instead of preparing to write an epitaph. But, really, what a heavenly morning! No balking, dazzling sun, but a cool, grey haze—sufficient light, with no nasty shadows from that background of trees.

"Charming, gentlemen, charming! My dear Raoul—ah! here comes my man! Bonjour, messieurs! He's a bit nervous, Raoul, but I'll wager he's full of mettle." It is a pity—such a pretty boy, with a girl's peachy bloom on his young cheeks. But there is a murderous glare in his usually soft eyes as he looks at me, for am I not—malediction! Well, a little blood-letting may cure your chivalrous fever, my young sir; and so we will bleed you—we will bleed you!

At last, all preliminaries settled, we stand, boy and man, face to face, divided by two cruel ribbons of steel.

"Engagez, gentlemen!"

How gracefully, yet firmly, he stands. A very pretty style he has, too. I wonder who was his maître d'escrime? Whoever he may be, he teaches well, and his pupil does him credit. This is no raw, clumsy novice. Parbleu! What a wrist it is—supple, yet firm. Quick, too, on his legs—like a cat. Wastes too much energy in moving about; but that is a fault with all the youngsters. Ah, that was a sweet thrust in quatre, and how is that for a smart counter, eh? Prettily parried! Egad, a fine double, feint, and quick lunge! Well recovered; but do not try any more tricks with me, mon enfant, it will not pay.

Sacré! how his eyes burn as he watches me; and yet through their fire I can see the soft reproachful glance of his sister. Poor girl! What lovely and innocent orbs she had. I am sorry, but——"

Mon Dieu! Phew! that was a narrow shave. Moral: leave thoughts of limpid eyes and remorse till after the fight. Too hot, too hot, my young friend. Faith, you will not get such another chance to send me drumming this pretty bit of sward, with hands and feet, if I can help it. Mon Dieu! how the clubs would ring, if I, by some careless play, went down before this raw schoolboy. How he himself—— But not yet—not yet.

How our blades clash and rasp, and grate and rattle, as they wend their sinuous ways for life or death. Faith, it is a sinister music—the music of the sword. Hot work this and a deuced more trouble than I expected.

He's as nimble as a wild cat.

"Touche!"

Our swords are struck down, and the doctor steps to me. Disgrace! I could not recover in time, and this lad, this novice, has ripped my left shoulder with his awkward counter.

"No need for you, doctor. No harm done, gentlemen." Only a warning to me not to play the fool with this forward young devotee of the foil and plastron. "I hope you are not satisfied with this trifling scratch, monsieur?"

A little blood, you say, will not plaster your sister's honour? Eh bien, you want all—all I have. Good, good! Now you shall never go home to boast of that paltry prick. Quick, before my shoulder stiffens.

"Ready, gentlemen? Then engagez!"

Hard work this, eh? What with lunging and recovering, shifting, breaking, and taking ground, my older legs are getting tired. But my stronger play is beginning to tell, and his wrist is weakening every moment.

Still he plays on pluckily. He is a true knight, indeed. I can have him when I please. Heart or lungs? Neither. His sister implores me out of his eyes. No fear, sweetheart: he shall live. I will just take the sting out of him. He is too young, too handsome; he will be a devil among the women in time, that boy—a second Gaston de Samnarez, perhaps.

Peste! he has scratched my hand now! It is nothing—nothing—it has but pricked the skin. Fight on—fight on, I say, you young hound! Nom de Dieu! if you must, you must, so there, and there, and there!

Spang goes the guard of my rapier, clicking sheer against his breast-bone, and his blood spouts out in a warm clammy jet on my shirt-front and face.

And there he lies—poor boy, poor boy—on the bloody sward, with his eyes, even in his death-throes, full of a mingling of the sister's soft, sad reproach, and his own unsatisfied yearning for revenge. His face will haunt me to my death—and, perhaps, even then—who knows?

A heart-rending shriek, a rustle among the bushes, and a white figure flies out and throws herself on the bloody corpse. Just Heaven! It is his sister! Let me be gone!

HASSAN.

Digitized by Google

An American Adventuress

The London season was well advanced; in fact, it was the week before Ascot, yet Harry Wainwright had only been in town a few hours when he strolled into his club for dinner. He took his letters from the hall porter with the air of a man to whom all correspondence is a bore, and rapidly glanced through them, till he came to one the contents of which caused him the utmost astonishment. It ran as follows:

My Dear Harry,—It may surprise you to learn from me that I intend shortly to be again married. As this will make a considerable alteration in my mode of living, I wish to see you as soon as possible. My breakfast hour is half-past ten, as usual.—Your affectionate father,

Charles Wainwright.

Such was Sir Wainwright's brief announcement of his engagement to his only son. The only son's answer was equally brief:

My Dear Father,—I have only come up to town this afternoon, when I found your letter waiting for me. I will call upon you to-morrow morning at half-past ten.—Your affectionate son,

Harry Wainwright.

From these two letters it will appear that the relations between father and son were not of a confidential nature. It would be impossible to imagine two more different characters.

Lady Wainwright had died when Harry was hardly more than a child, and since her death Sir Charles had led an ordinary lazy bachelor's life. Both the house and the shooting on his country estate at Winterford had been let, and Sir Charles spent most of his time at his bijou residence at Mayfair. A few country-house parties were quite sufficient to satisfy his taste for field sports, which had never been very ardent. At the present time he had the reputation of being the best dressed, the most gentlemanly, and the most selfish man in London clubland.

To such a man a son must be an incubus in any case; but when the son is a keen sportsman, and possesses an utter disregard for all the conventionalities of life, the incubus becomes too great to bear. Fortunately for Harry Wainwright he had an income of five hundred a year under his mother's marriage settlement, and his father gave him another two hundred and fifty on the tacit understanding that he did not annoy him. So far the arrangement had proved satisfactory to both parties.

"Well, Wainwright, come to town at last? You don't seem very pleased with it, either."

The speaker was Lord Pelham, eldest son of the Duke of Harness. He was one of Harry Wainwright's greatest friends. They had been at Oxford together, and since then had ridden the same horses, shot the same coverts, and carried on harmless flirtations with the same woman—important factors in concentrating modern friendship.

"Yes, it was a nuisance to have to leave the salmon this weather, but I had to come up to town on business. Seen or heard anything of the governor, Pelham?"

"Do you mean Sir Charles?"

"Yes."

"Not much; except that they say he has been paying a lot of attention to a new beauty."

"Well, he has got engaged to somebody. Read that. The worst of it is that I came up to town to tell him that I am engaged, so I expect there will be a muddle."

"H'm! But tell me about yourself, old man. In the first place, I congratulate you; and in the next, let us order dinner."

Harry Wainwright's story was soon told. He had been staying in a country house in the north for the salmon-fishing, and had fallen in love with, proposed to, and been accepted by the daughter of his host, a girl named Maud Blossom. Pelham knew her intimately, having often stayed in the house, and again warmly congratulated his friend.

"Now tell me something about my future step-mother."

"Well, to speak the truth, I don't know very much about her; she is an American widow, with lots of cash, named Mrs. Stanley. As I have already said, she is sufficiently handsome to have become a fashionable beauty. Of course, she must be clever, or society would not have taken her on credit, so to speak, for nobody seems to know anything of her antecedents. But you will soon be able to judge for yourself. By-the-bye, are not the Blossoms coming up to town?"

"Yes; they are coming up at the end of the week for Ascot, and have got rooms at the Langham."

Even "the pink wine of France" failed to dispel the gloom which the news of his father's engagement had cast on Harry Wainwright's mind. He knew that vanity and selfishness were the two chief traits of Sir Charles' character. It was a hard confession for a son to have to make to himself, but it was the truth, and Harry Wainwright, now that he was engaged to be married, knew that he should have to look the truth sternly in the face.

Digitized by Google

He left the club soon after dinner, and went back to his hotel. What a difference twenty-four hours can make in a man's life! On the previous night Wainwright had retired to rest with the prospect of enjoying every happiness that love can bring. To-night he had already begun to realise that the path of that love would not be strewn with roses.

He was at his father's house in Mayfair punctually at half-past ten on the following morning, with a spirit which, though depressed, was resolute. If the father should sneer at the son's engagement, it was more than probable that the son would forget his filial duty and sneer at the father's.

There was no cordiality in Sir Charles' greeting. He received his son with the same polished politeness with which he would have received an utter stranger, and during breakfast neither made the slightest allusion to the subjects which filled each other's thoughts. Yet, although they talked on the ordinary topics of the day, a careful listener would have noticed that they resembled two boxers, each of whom was waiting for an opening.

Breakfast being finished, Sir Charles lit a cigarette, pushed his case towards his son, and, sinking into an armchair, said, in an indolent tone of voice:

"You gathered from my note, Harry, I suppose, that I intend to marry again? Of course, my marriage will alter considerably my present mode of living. I shall make Winterford my chief residence, where, my boy, you will always be welcome. Indeed, both Mrs. Stanley—that is my future wife—and myself would be glad if you lived there altogether."

Sir Charles had an idea of making his son his estate agent, with instruction to superintend the stables and the shooting.

"I am sorry, sir, but I am afraid the arrangement would be impossible. I really came up to town yesterday to tell you that I had become engaged to be married myself."

Sir Charles was silent with surprise for some seconds. Only those who knew him intimately could have recognised how angry the news had made him.

"H'm!" he answered pettishly. "Then I am afraid that the plans I had made for your happiness are destroyed. As a married man, I could not afford to give you the liberal allowance which I have been giving, while the prospect of a married stepson and his wife in the house would hardly be pleasing to my wife."

"Nor to mine either, sir, for that matter."

"And may I ask who is this lady you intend to make your wife?"

"Miss Blossom. I believe you were at school with her father."

The indirect illusion to the baronet's age added fuel to the fire of his irritation, but he only said:

"Ah, John Blossom. A very dense boy. I remember him at Eton."

"And may I ask who my future stepmother may be?"

"Certainly; Mrs. Stanley. I dare say you may have heard of her."

"I must plead ignorance to the name."

Sir Charles stood aghast. The name of Mrs. Stanley as a fashionable beauty had been on everybody's lips during the present season, yet his own son had not even heard of it.

"Mrs. Stanley's attractions are well known in society circles," he said stiffly, with a strong emphasis on the word society. "I am generally considered a fortunate man for having won her affections."

"Indeed. Then I congratulate you. Who was the late lamented Mr. Stanley?"

The veins on Sir Charles' forehead were swollen with passion, but he replied calmly:

"I cannot see that it matters in the least to you or to anybody else who he was. I asked you here this morning to tell you of my engagement and to accept your congratulations. You have thought fit to show your annoyance at my engagement, both by your words and your manner. There is only one thing now that I have to ask you and that is to keep your annoyance to yourself. It is the worst possible form to let family quarrels become public property. In regard to the private allowance which I have hitherto given you, that will have to cease entirely. You have an independent income of your own, and if you choose to marry with that income, it is your affair, not mine. I only know that I would not risk matrimony on the same terms."

"Is not that a question for Miss Blossom to decide?"

Sir Charles shrugged his shoulders.

"Perhaps so. At all events, it is not for me to decide. Now, in order to prevent any vulgar gossip, I wish you to call upon Mrs. Stanley. I, on my part, will call upon Miss Blossom. It is a matter of mere formal politeness; that is all."

"Certainly, sir; there is no need to tell the outside world, if we disagree."

"When will you call?" Sir Charles asked abruptly.

"The sooner the better. This afternoon, if you like."

"Very well. If you will call here about three o'clock, we will go together. Is Miss Blossom in town?"

"No, sir; but she is coming up on Monday for Ascot."

"Very good. Then I shall see you at three."

Such was the meeting between father and son: no affection, no sentiment, no anger had been expressed. Both were glad the interview had been got over without a scene. The son had lost a third of his income: the father had lost a good estate agent. Both knew that the gulf that separated them had been widened.

* * * * *

Mrs. Stanley certainly was the beauty of the London season. She had shot forth like a rocket over the firmament of society, but from what star she had emanated, and what was the propelling power of the emanation, were secrets which society had not succeeded in unravelling.

Society did know that she had made her début under the wing of Lady Highclass; that she had a charming house in Grosvenor Place; that she went everywhere, and that everybody worth knowing went to her "At Homes." That was sufficient for society; it was not sufficient for Lady Highclass.

At the time of the interview between Sir Charles Wainwright and his son, another interview was taking place between Lady Highclass and Mrs. Stanley, in the latter's boudoir. There was one point of resemblance in the two interviews; both were equally unpleasant.

"You remember our compact perfectly well. You were to give me five thousand pounds, if you got married."

"Exactly, Lady Highclass; but, then, I am not married."

"As good as married, anyway. I am pressed for money, and am leaving town directly after Ascot. It can make no difference to you whether you pay me now or in a month's time, and it makes every difference to me."

Digitized by Google

"But it does make a very considerable difference to me. I have my expenses, as well as you have. You have already been paid more than sufficient for your services."

"Take care, Clare Stanley. I am not a woman to be insulted with impunity. If I have hitherto exercised my social influence on your behalf, I can also exercise it against you."

"And let society know that your influence is to be bought by the highest bidder. The British aristocracy will be proud of you."

"Perhaps. One thing is certain: that society will believe me and won't believe you."

"Might not society wonder how you, with your income manage to live at such an expensive rate? No, Lady Highclass, the part of the bully does not suit you. You know perfectly well who would be the sufferer if we were to quarrel."

"I don't want to quarrel," her ladyship retorted. "But I want money, and must have it."

"But suppose that I have not got it to give you!"

Lady Highclass looked astounded.

"It is the truth. I have not five thousand pounds in the bank at the present time. I will give you a cheque for a thousand, and you must wait for the rest till it is due."

Lady Highclass protested! Then she changed her tone to one of entreaty. But in vain. Mrs. Stanley was inflexible. So, as there was nothing more to be got, her ladyship took the cheque for a thousand pounds and left.

Mrs. Stanley was inflexible.

Mrs. Stanley leant back in her chair, and a smile of contempt came over her beautiful face.

"Yes, my lady," she muttered to herself, "if I had given you five thousand pounds you would have blackmailed me for more before my marriage. Bah! How I wish the whole farce were over."

Possessing a physical beauty which was as near perfection as possible, and a fascination of manner which was well-nigh irresistible, it was not surprising that, once launched into society, she should have sailed forth in front of all rivals.

The chief surprise about her career was that she should have accepted a baronet like Sir Charles Wainwright. He was considered two or three rungs too low in the ladder for a girl who had a royal prince dancing attendance on her.

Some few of the old loungers about Clubland said that Mrs. Stanley was too clever not to know her own business best, and then Wainwright might not be quite such a lucky dog as people thought. Their opinion would have been strengthened if they could have seen her as she muttered: "Bah! How I wish the whole farce were over."

Harry Wainwright called for his father at the appointed time to go with him to Grosvenor Place. He was curious to see this beautiful woman who was about to become his stepmother. He had already made up his mind that she was only marrying his father for his position, and determined to watch her narrowly.

Nothing could have been more gracious than Mrs. Stanley's manner of receiving him. She affected to take a great interest in his engagement, and asked him several questions about his fiancée. Sir Charles listened with astonishment. As he said to her afterwards: he had never known a woman draw Harry out so much before.

"My dear Charles, as we are so closely connected, is it not better that we should be firm friends?"

"Of course, Clare! I only said to Harry this morning that there was nothing more odious than a family quarrel. Still, it will not be necessary for us to see a great deal of him and his wife."

"I wonder what she is like, and whether we shall get on together?"

"This Miss Blossom? I suppose she is the ordinary country girl, of the milkmaid type. But she is not an interesting subject; let us talk about ourselves."

Although she did not say so, Harry Wainwright was a subject of great interest to Mrs. Stanley. She was resolved to make him fall in love with her, and, in spite of his engagement, had not the slightest doubt that she would succeed. In truth, so far from cementing family friendship, it seemed extremely probable that she would be the cause of a very pretty family quarrel.

* * * * *

Mr. Blossom was a model of a country squire. Nobody in their sane senses could have taken him for anything else. Even when he was sitting in his stall at the theatre he exhaled a scent of the country, which made his neighbours picture him shooting partridges amongst his own turnips. He disliked town life, and if it had not been for his wife and daughter would never have come to London. As it was, he generally spent his days at Lord's or the Oval, unless there was a race meeting within easy distance. But during his present visit he found that he had other duties to perform. He had been obliged to dine with Sir Charles Wainwright, and he had come away with a very poor opinion of his host. He had been taken to a formal dinner-party at Mrs. Stanley's, and had expressed the candid opinion afterwards that there was no fool like an old fool, which was not flattering to the baronet.

Digitized by Google

"I tell you what, Janet," he said to his wife one evening. "Harry Wainwright is as good a fellow as ever crossed a horse; but how the deuce he came to have such a father is a mystery to me." To which his wife sensibly replied that Maud was going to marry Harry and not his father.

To Maud Blossom, however, this visit was one of continuous pleasure. She was proud of having Harry Wainwright for an escort. Mrs. Stanley had been more than polite to her, and would insist on calling to take her driving in the park, on bringing her home to lunch, and on rendering those thousand and one little civilities which pave the way to friendship between women. Maud was far too innocent to detect the treason which lay hidden in the heart of her new acquaintance.

But it was Ascot week, and the Cup day had arrived, the day which society has chosen as the meridian of the London season. Sir Charles had dressed himself with more than ordinary care for the great festival, and the result was a triumph of the tailor's art; but he was far from pleased at the arrangement which had been made for the day.

"Clare knows how I hate anything like a family party!" he said to himself, as he slung his field-glass over his shoulder; "yet she insists on asking the Blossoms to join us. Then she is perpetually telling me to do the agreeable to Maud, while she talks to Harry. Confound it all! I wish I were married! I'll take good care that we have none of this nonsense at Winterford."

To take her driving in the park.

The truth was that Mrs. Stanley, having determined to make Harry Wainwright fall in love with her, had already commenced a flirtation with him under the guise of friendship. Both to him and to Maud she represented herself as an amicus curiæ, anxious to prevent any family quarrel; and so she got rid of the somewhat tiresome attentions of Sir Charles, won Harry's confidence, and checked any distrust on Maud's part. She knew beforehand that her married life could not possibly be a happy one, and that it was her policy to have her stepson on her side in the future disagreements between herself and her husband, which were certain to take place.

Why describe Royal Ascot, with its royal procession, its royal enclosure, its crowd of the best-dressed worshippers at the shrine of fashion? Has it not been written in the chronicles of English institutions? Do we not all know it, from the duchess in the latest production of Worth's, to the welsher's clerk, with his hawk eye on the look-out for fools? Let us therefore confine our attention to our story. Many were the field-glasses pointed in the direction of Mrs. Stanley: many critical eyes looked at the beauty of the season. One man evidently took a special interest in her. Although he was backing horses for large amounts in Tattersall's ring, yet when his attention was not taken up with racing, he was always looking at Mrs. Stanley with a puzzled expression on his face. That he was a well-known man in betting circles was apparent from the deference shown to him by the bookmakers, not a few of whom wondered at his present absent-minded manner. At last this leviathan among backers beckoned to a quietly-dressed man, and talked earnestly to him for some two minutes. The quietly-dressed man listened, occasionally nodded his head, but never spoke a word until his companion had finished, when he merely said: "All right."

"Then I shall see you to-morrow at seven?" enquired the backer.

"Yes," replied the quietly-dressed gentleman; and they parted as mysteriously as they had met.

Meanwhile, Sir Charles Wainwright, as he had predicted, was spending a very unhappy day. Both Mr. and Mrs. Blossom took an unaffected interest in horseflesh, and made constant excursions to the paddock, leaving the rest of the party to amuse themselves.

Now, as a crowd of friends and acquaintances were always hovering round Mrs. Stanley, and as that lady also took care to keep Harry Wainwright at her side, Sir Charles was obliged to attend to Maud, and to suffer the pangs of jealousy at the same time. Maud Blossom belonged to the class of unsophisticated country girls for whom Sir Charles had no admiration; so when he had laid two "ponies" to one on the favourite for the Cup, and seen it beaten by a short head, what little good temper he did possess had taken wings and flown away from him.

Digitized by Google

"Don't be absurd."

"Harry," he said petulantly to his son, "I am afraid I must ask you to take care of Maud for a few minutes, as I have to go into the ring."

It must be remembered that Sir Charles' love for Clare Stanley partook more of the nature of pride than of affection. If she had not been the centre of admiration he would never have given her a moment's thought. But as some men are ambitious to ride the most showy horse in the Row, so others are ambitious to be engaged to the most beautiful woman of the season. Such was the case with Sir Charles; so it was extremely galling to him that Clare should give him the cold shoulder at such a place as Ascot. He thought that society would notice it, and so it did.

"I say, Mrs. Stanley doesn't seem to be very spoony on her elderly beau, does she? Who is the young fellow with her?"

"Oh! that's young Wainwright, her future step-son."

The first speaker whistled in surprise.

"He's all right. He is one of those sporting chaps who would like to spend their lives shooting big game in the Rockies. Besides, he is engaged to be married himself."

"Is he? Then I pity the girl."

This, and much more, said society.

But Harry Wainwright had no suspicion of the remarks which were being made about him. Mrs. Stanley had told him that she wished to lessen the breach between him and his father! She had been very kind to Maud, to whom she had told the same tale. So if she did not deceive the scandal-loving world, she deceived this innocent pair. Partially, though not altogether, she deceived her Sir Charles when they returned home.

"I don't know what I have done, Clare, but you would hardly speak a word to me to-day."

"And I thought I was doing exactly as you wished. If you want to spoon in public like John Thomas and Mary Jane——"

"Don't be absurd. You know what I mean. You would not let me come near you, and, worse still, made me look after that milkmaid."

"Now, Charles, you have lost your money and are cross. At least, you have me all to yourself now."

She kissed him as she spoke, and soon coaxed him into a good temper.

"Wait till we are united, love, then we can see as little of our Phyllis and Strephon as we choose. Now, Charles, say you are not angry with me before you go."

"Men were deceivers ever." So sang the Bard of Avon three hundred years ago. Tempora mutantur: times change, and so do human beings.

* * * * *

Mr. Carte, of Chicago, the leviathan amongst backers on the turf, sat in his private room in a private hotel in Albemarle Street at seven o'clock on the evening following the Cup day, waiting for the quietly-dressed gentleman. It was the first year that Mr. Carte had patronised the English turf, and certain bookmakers hoped it would be his last. He had come over with plenty of dollars and a system, the system had succeeded and the dollars had increased! Socially he had confined himself entirely to racing circles, and had not even evinced any ambition to enter the precincts of clubland. This was the reason why he had not seen Mrs. Stanley before the previous day, but now that he had seen her she occupied a considerable share of his thoughts.

"Well, Dick," said Mr. Carte, as the quietly-dressed gentleman entered the room, whom we will introduce as Richard Lee, "it has been a glorious week; another regular knock-down blow for the ring, my lad. Pleasure first and business afterwards. Come to dinner—I am as hungry as a cowboy."

Dinner is a lengthy affair amongst racing men who are obliged to be abstemious during the day, and it was after eleven before the two friends returned to Albemarle Street. An hour was spent in going through the betting-book. Then, throwing himself into an arm-chair with an air of relief, Carte said:

"And now, Dick, how about this Mrs. Stanley?"

"She is Nell Robinson, widow of Jack Robinson, who was shot down Texas way some two years ago."

"I more than suspected that yesterday; but how the thunder has she managed to come over here and raise Cain in society?"

"Well, she is the 'cutest woman I ever ran across. Her beauty speaks for itself."

"I know all that. But who was Stanley? And where did she get the shekels from? I don't know much about society, but I do know this, that American widows don't catch on unless they are considerably gilded."

"Then if you want to find out that, you will have to trace her career since Jack Robinson's death. Personally I don't suppose that Stanley ever existed, except in the lady's imagination. All I know is that she came over to England at the beginning of the year, and was run by a certain Lady Highclass, who seems to be a bit of a boss. But what is the good of finding out? You don't want to spoil the woman's game, do you?"

"Certainly not; unless there was something to be gained by it."

"What can you gain? You don't want money."

"I don't know, but useful information is always worth something or other. Let me see, you went down into the Argentine for a few years or so, after the Robinson affair, so couldn't know anything about her."

Dick Lee nodded.

"Who is this Sir Charles Wainwright, whom she is going to marry? He is not one of the regular racing fraternity."

"Man about town," the other answered laconically.

"Got any shekels?"

"Yes, and a country seat called Winterford."

"Fancy Nell Robinson as a baronet's wife and the mistress of an old English country house! By Jove,

Digitized by Google

I've hit it! Sir Charles shall go on the turf, and I'll manage his horses."

Carte was so pleased at the idea, that he did not

She tore open the note.

notice the look on Dick Lee's face. If he had, his joy would not have been as boisterous as it was. He talked exultingly for some minutes as he fancied himself as owner of racehorses. He might have fancied himself a member of the Jockey Club, if Lee had not suddenly interrupted him.

"You seem to ignore the consent of Sir Charles."

"Bother Sir Charles! He would consent, to prevent the exposure of his wife. Or I might approach the wife first, and she would coax him into consenting, to save herself."

"Both contingencies are extremely improbable."

"What do you mean?"

"Simply that you have nothing to expose. Listen to the case. You happen to know that Lady Wainwright is the widow of an American gambler, and you disclose the fact to her husband, who is probably aware of it already, demanding as a price of your secrecy that he should enter into a racing partnership with you. He would either laugh at you, or have you horse-whipped. So much for the first contingency! The second is worse. The lady would defy you to do your worst, and ring the bell for you to be shown out of the house."

"Then I would let society know what sort of woman it has made its idol."

"Society would not believe you, in the first place, and you would gain nothing by it, in the second. You might have some influence if you chose to make a complaint to the Jockey Club, but you are powerless to make a complaint against a reigning beauty."

"But how did she get her money? The woman must have some secret."

"Probably she has," replied Dick Lee curtly. "But then you don't happen to know it."

"I must say you don't seem very keen on the matter."

"Because I don't see anything to be got out of it. Sorry to destroy that charming castle you were building in the air, but there is not the slightest chance of its ever having an earthly foundation. Take my advice, and think no more about it. I must be off to bed now; meet you at breakfast. Good-night!"

But Dick Lee did not go to bed. He sat up smoking and thinking till the first streaks of dawn lit up his room. In the stillness of the night many plans suggested themselves to his mind, only to be tossed aside as worthless as soon as they were formed. On one point only was he satisfied, namely, that he had put Carte off the scent of Mrs. Stanley's history. He alone of all men in London knew that history, but he was doubtful how to make use of his knowledge, or, indeed, whether to make use of it at all.

"If I were sure she would be happy, her secret should die with me," he said to himself more than once. Strange thought for the hero of over fifty duels. If it had been expressed aloud, nobody who knew the man would have believed in its sincerity. Could this be the same Dick Lee who had beaten the Red Indian in cunning; who was the deadest shot in the Southern States; who had never been known to spare either man or woman? But he had never shown to any living creature the one deep wound in his heart. Until that day he had thought himself that it was cured, but now it was bleeding as copiously as ever. The love which he had deemed dead was again full of life; but how different was the nature of that life! What had been passion was now compassion; jealousy had become generosity; the burning ardour of the man was changed into the tenderness of a child.

* * * * *

Mr. and Mrs. Blossom, having enjoyed their annual visit to London in their own peculiar fashion, left town, and also left their daughter behind them. Maud was now the guest of Mrs. Stanley, much to the disgust of Sir Charles, who, with the selfishness of all lovers, whether they be twenty-one or eighty-one, wanted to monopolise the society of his fiancée. Mrs. Stanley, however, thinking that she should have as much of Sir Charles' society after marriage as she wanted, had elevated Harry Wain- to the position of her "tame cat."

It was a proof of the woman's cleverness that she had done this without exciting the jealousy of Maud. London life, with its dissipations—its Hurlingham, its Sandown, its dances in Mayfair, and its "At Homes," in Belgravia—were such novelties to the country girl, that her mind was in a constant state of bewilderment, and she never paused to consider that her lover's attentions were becoming daily less ardent. Even if she had had any doubts about Harry Wainwright, Mrs. Stanley would have instantly dispelled them during those curl-paper confidences which women love to indulge in.

"My dear Maud, Harry's devotion is really too tiresome. He sat out two waltzes with me to-night, while you were dancing with Lord Pelham, and his conversation consisted of Maud, Maud, Maud, nothing but Maud."

Then the girl's eyes would brighten. She had thought at the time that Harry might have been more attentive to her, now she blamed herself for thinking him wanting in devotion. Certainly Mrs. Stanley ought to have been satisfied at the success of her deception.

Digitized by Google

We are told that Circe was the daughter of the sun, and that by means of the heat which she inherited from her sire, she was enabled to make the sons of men burn with a consuming passion. There can be no doubt that the ancient Greeks were right, except that they omitted to state that Circe was not the only daughter of the sun. For certain it is that Clare Stanley had managed to make more than one man fall in love with her. And yet she was not happy.

She knew that she was on the verge of a precipice and that at any moment she might be hurled into the chasm of shame beneath. But this she had known when she had started on her adventurous career, and this was the reason why she wished to hasten her marriage with Sir Charles, and to make Harry Wainwright her lover, so that he might protect her in her future troubles. Her social success had been greater than she had ever anticipated. But she had sacrificed her love at the altar of her ambition, and had found out in the quiet moments of her solitude that the artificial veneer had not stifled the woman's heart with which Nature had endowed her.

She was sitting one July afternoon in her boudoir thinking of her old life, and feeling some little remorse that she had ever forsaken it. It was not the life in Texas that she was dreaming of, but of the two years which succeeded it—two years spent with the husband whom she loved, amongst the most luxurious scenery of South America—two years of unbroken bliss.

Where was that husband now? Was he alive or dead?

Two people . . . are sitting side by side.

She was alone. Maud had gone with some new friends to a matinée, and Sir Charles was in the city on business. Suddenly Harry Wainwright was announced.

She received him with her usual fascinating manner—a manner which was charming him on to his destruction as it had charmed many before.

The man sat down beside her on the sofa, and yielded himself up to her influence. Occasionally his conscience had smitten him about Maud, and then he would drown conscience in wine.

Now the voice of conscience was dumb: he drank in every word which came from her lips; he gazed upon her beauty and was intoxicated by it.

"Clare, my friendship, my love is yours," he said as he bent over her. "My darling——"

A knock at the door arrested his words, and a servant entered with a note. Mrs. Stanley looked at the handwriting, and turned as pale as death.

"There is a man waiting for an answer, madam."

She tore open the note, and quickly read the contents. Then she went to her writing desk.

"I will be with you at the time you mention," was all she wrote, and, addressing the envelope, handed it to the servant.

"Clare, darling, what has made you worried?"

She rose angrily.

"What right have you to call me darling? You, who are engaged to another woman. No, Harry," she added, more softly, "forgive me, for it has been my fault. Leave me now; forget me and all that you have said to me. It is not too late. Go to Maud. She loves you and believes in you. Your place is by her side. This infatuation for me will be past in a day, and your love for Maud will be stronger. Go now. I wish to be alone."

He went out without a word. The dream was over. The veil was lifted from his eyes.

What was the note which had caused this sudden change in Clare Stanley? Merely:

"Meet me in the Broad Walk at Kensington at six.—Dick."

It was already five o'clock. There was no time to be lost. She hastily changed her elaborate tea-gown for a plain serge dress, and was soon being whirled down to Kensington. She had had no minutes even for thought. Her brain was too dizzy to enable her to judge how to act.

She trembled as she walked up the Broad Walk, glancing nervously about her. At last a quietly-dressed gentleman stepped out from behind one of the huge trees.

"Nell!"

"Dick!"

Dick Lee held out his hand and she took it, though her eyes were downcast. They walked along a few yards in silence.

"Nell," the man began, and there was a note of the saddest compassion in his voice, "I am not here to reproach you, nor to molest you in any way. I only want you to answer me one question. Are you happy?"

Digitized by Google

"I am the most miserable creature on earth," she replied, sobbing.

They strolled away from the madding crowd, though few would have recognised them as the society beauty and callous gambler.

"Can you ever forgive me?" she murmured.

"I can and do forgive you. I forgive you so much that if you ask me to leave you now, your secret shall never pass my lips. If you wish me to remain, Nell, it is not too late now to return to the old days of happiness."

"How can I thank you for your generosity? How can I atone to you for the past? I was and am your wife. I will be your slave."

And thus she sacrificed her ambition at the altar of her love and duty.

In the course of the evening Sir Charles Wainwright received the following note, together with presents which he had made Mrs. Stanley:

DEAR SIR CHARLES,—Circumstances have occurred which render it imperative on my part to break off our engagement. I am sorry for any pain that this letter may cause you, but you would have suffered more if I had married you. Do not try to see me, as henceforth I am dead to society. Wishing you happiness in the future, I am, yours sincerely,

CLARE STANLEY.

* * * * *

The scene is Goodwood. Sir Charles is there, looking five years older than he did at Ascot. Harry Wainwright is there, telling his friends that he means to be married before the commencement of the hunting season. Mr. Carte is there, though without his late companion. Society is there, inventing tales wide of the truth about the disappearance of its late idol.

* * * * *

The scene is the deck of an Atlantic liner. Two people, whom the passengers have agreed to be a newly-married couple, are sitting side by side. Love is visible in the face of both; but in the face of the man it arises from the sense of protection, in the face of the woman from heartfelt gratitude.

G. F. U.

A LITTLE FISHER MAIDEN.

"Six pairs."

"Long ones, ten buttons, and Suèdes."

"You can choose for yourself."

"Done."

"Oh! You will back out."

"I?" indignantly. "No, indeed! I have been longing for it for days."

"All right, then, I take the bet."

"Halloa!" chimed in a third voice from the other end of the room, "what are you two up to now?"

The girl laughed.

"I thought you were too deep in politics to be listening," she said, "but if you want to know, Stanley has just bet me six to one——"

"That she won't walk down the Rue Grande at noonday in the fisher-girl costume she admires so much," interrupted Stanley.

Percy Rivers threw his paper on the ground, rose, and crossed the room.

"What nonsense is this?" he asked sternly, facing his younger brother and sister.

Ethel shrugged her shoulders.

"You are always a spoil sport, Percy," she said plaintively. "It is as dull as ditch-water with you stepping in to stop every bit of fun. Where's the harm in this? I dare say, for all your long face and priggish manner, that you had plenty of larks in your time."

Percy's brows grew sterner.

"Am I to understand, Ethel," he said, "that you propose masquerading here, in a foreign town?"

Ethel nodded.

"Call it what you like," she said doggedly, "I am going to dress up as a fisher-girl; the costume is most becoming. Stan can withdraw his bet; I shall do it just the same."

"I forbid you, Ethel."

A defiant look answered him.

"We'll see," she said saucily. "I'm off to consult madame," and with a glance at Stanley, she left the room.

"How could you be so senseless, Stanley?" said his brother angrily, as the door closed. "Now she will carry out this ridiculous farce."

"Don't fly into a passion, Percy," returned the young fellow calmly. "I had no idea she was really in earnest."

Then his senior paced the floor.

"After all, it is nothing very dreadful."

"When does this mad performance take place?" asked Percy, stopping short.

Stanley shrugged his shoulders.

"Oh, Ethel will settle that."

"Look here," said Percy grimly, "I wash my hands of you both, but I depend on you, Stanley, to keep her out of any scrape this tomfoolery leads to."

Digitized by Google

"All right, old fellow, but you can be easy. Ethel won't come to grief."

Miss Rivers, in the meanwhile, was closeted in madame's sanctum behind the shop.

The Lenoirs were jewellers, but mother and daughter would have found their incomes precarious enough without the money accruing from the first and second floors, now occupied by the Rivers.

It was policy, therefore, to be obliging; so, though Mme. Lenoir was shocked at the proposed escapade, and inwardly apostrophised the English as a "mad lot," she expressed great interest.

"I think I can find mademoiselle the dress she requires," she said, all smiles and smirks.

"You dear woman!" exclaimed Ethel delighted. "How? Where? Of course, it must be new."

Madame nodded.

"Leonie," addressing her daughter, "Josephine would lend hers, eh?"

"What?" cried Leonie shrilly. "Her wedding dress?—never!"

Madame looked at Ethel.

"Mademoiselle would be very careful of it, would she not?" she said.

"Oh, yes," replied the young girl eagerly. "I only want it for an hour. But will it fit me?"

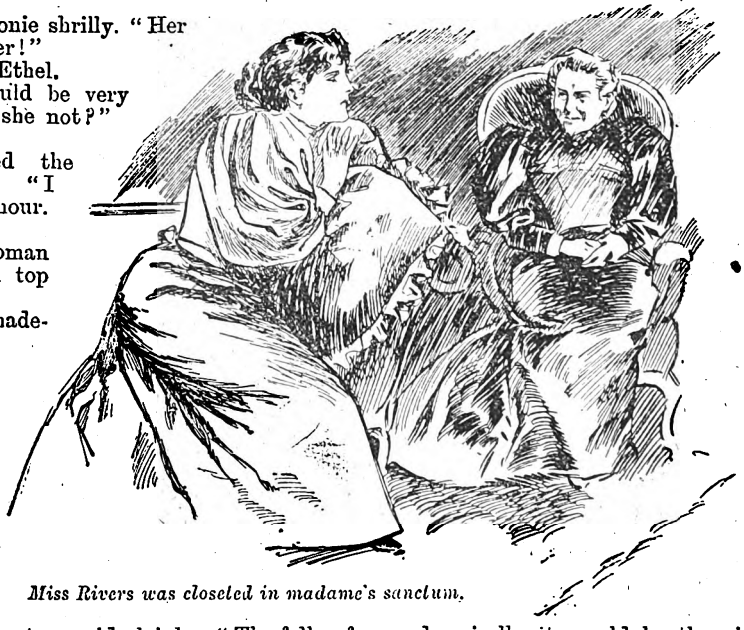
The French woman surveyed Ethel from top to toe critically.

"Yes," she said, "mademoiselle is the same height."

Then, with a wink at Leonie:

"How much will mademoiselle pay for the loan?"

"The cost is the least part," replied the girl quickly. "I leave that to you, dear madame."



Miss Rivers was closeted in madame's sanctum.

Madame's arched eyebrows and hand gesture said plainly: "The folly of those people!" and she instantly resolved to take advantage of the said folly to do a stroke of business on her own account, independently of the "commission" she intended to charge Josephine when the bargain was concluded.

"I will send about the costume at once," she said aloud, "and, Josephine, if she consents, shall bring it to show mademoiselle this evening. It is all complete except——"

"Except what?" interrupted Ethel eagerly, as madame paused, while Leonie looked wonderingly at her mother.

"The long earrings," replied the French woman suavely. "Mademoiselle knows they are an essential part of the dress, and Josephine would not care to lend them——"

"But——" began Leonie.

A frown from madame cut her short.

"Mademoiselle must buy a pair of real gold ones," suggested the shrewd tradeswoman, with a triumphant glance at her daughter; and leading the unresisting Ethel into the shop, she showed her several pairs of handsome earrings.

"You ninny," said madame to Leonie, with a reproving shake of the head, when Ethel, having selected, ran off with her treasures. "You ninny, will you ever learn to open your mouth for the ripe fruit to tumble in it?"

The Boulognaise fisher-girl proved ready to oblige the English lady, and Ethel was summoned downstairs that evening.

"This is Josephine, Mees Etel," said madame by way of introduction, pointing to a young girl in stiff-brimmed white cap and scarlet petticoat.

"It is very good of you to lend me your dress," said Ethel with a smile.

Josephine began untying a brown-paper parcel.

"See, mademoiselle," she said proudly, placing each article over a chair; "see, everything fresh and new."

"They are your wedding things," said Ethel, fingering the bodice.

The fisher girl reddened.

"We are to be married next week," she said simply.

"And what will Antoine say to your lending your finery?" broke in Leonie's high treble voice.

Josephine's face clouded.

"Hold your tongue," cried madame to her daughter; "Antoine is not such a fool; he will think a handful of francs payment enough."

Josephine looked from one to the other, hesitatingly; but Ethel, unheeding the dispute, slipped on the petticoat.

"Did I not tell mademoiselle it would be the right size," exclaimed Mme. Lenoir triumphantly, "eh, Josephine?"

But Josephine kept her eyes on the ground.

"Their figures are exactly alike," continued madame, nodding her head in approval at both supple, graceful forms.

Ethel gathered up the rest of the apparel in her arms.

"Stop a moment, mam'selle," said Josephine, touching her. "Antoine is strange; he may be vexed, as Mademoiselle Leonie suggested just now."

"You won't lend them?" Ethel's voice was plaintive.

Madame came to her rescue.

"You can't disappoint Mees Etel, after it has been arranged," she said to Josephine. "Antoine need not know unless you are so silly as to tell him, and the money will come in useful."

A smile crept round the corners of Josephine's lips.

"Take the things, mam'selle," she cried; and Ethel, promising to return them the following evening, slipped away.

About eleven o'clock next morning a tap at Stanley's door made him open it. He stared for a moment, then uttered a long-drawn whistle.

Digitized by Google

"Well, do I look nice?" demanded his sister gleefully.

"Capital!" and he laughed heartily.

"How did you manage it so soon? But, Ethel," and his tone was serious, "mind your p's and q's, don't look about you."

She nodded.

"I shall go straight down the Rue Grande to the quay, pop in upon the Stuarts, and back again; while I am gone, Stan, you can buy the gloves. Au revoir!" And kissing her hand, she descended the stairs.

Percy, coming up, almost knocked against her. He started at the gay apparition. Then he recognised Ethel.

"Good Heavens!" he groaned, but before he could say more the bird had flown into madame's parlour.

Percy hesitated a moment, and walked into Stanley's room.

"What's up?" asked the young man.

"I have just met Ethel in that fisher-girl toggery," answered Percy irately. "You will please follow her and see that she does not get into mischief, do you hear?"

Percy could not settle himself to work.

But Percy, returning to his study, could not settle himself to work. Ethel had neither father nor mother; little control as he possessed over her, he was still the responsible party.

The thought of possible insult to his madcap sister so disturbed him that he resolved to go after her himself. An unexpected call, however, detained him from putting his resolution into immediate action.

In the parlour Ethel had been duly admired and flattered.

"But mademoiselle's hands will betray her," said Mme. Lenior. "They are far too white and delicate. Leonie, fetch a basket. There," as the desired article arrived, "mademoiselle can tuck them under her shawl round the basket. So—that's better."

Thus equipped, Ethel stepped off.

"She is as like Josephine as two peas from behind," said madame, watching the girl.

"If only Antoine does not catch sight of her!" murmured Leonie, with a frown.

Ethel threaded her way through the throng of people usual at that hour of the day in the Rue Grande, and though she looked neither to the right nor to the left she was aware of the many curious glances and smiles directed at her. Her heart beat loudly, partly with excitement, partly fear of recognition or being accosted. She gained the Stuarts' house without molestation.

Husband and wife were just sitting down to the noon breakfast, when a grinning maid ushered in Ethel.

"Ethel," screamed Mrs. Stuart. "What mad freak is this?"

The Captain, who had not penetrated the disguise as quickly as his wife, now looked grave.

"My dear young lady," he said, "how could you do anything so risky?"

Ethel explained the joke, but her friends shook their heads. How could Percy have allowed it?

She sat subdued and dispirited for a few moments, and rose to depart.

"Yes, get back as quickly as you can, you silly child," said Mrs. Stuart.

The return journey had lost its zest; the flavour had gone from the fun. Ethel, as she went swiftly along the quay, was more alive than ever to the comments of the passers-by, and the glances of other fisher-girls.

The bright colour in her cheeks had given place to pallor, a longing to be safe again at home seized her. How far off the Rue Grande was.

Absorbed in herself, she had not noticed a lithe, dark-browed young fisherman following her at a distance, a sinister, jealous gleam in his black eyes.

But as by degrees he came closer, an instinctive feeling warned her of his approach. He tried to see her face, but Ethel looked straight before her.

Turning a corner, she came face to face with Percy. A sigh of relief escaped her; she grasped at his proffered arm. Before she could take it, a strong hand pushed her aside, a glint of steel flashed in the sunlight, a savage oath, and a knife was buried in Percy's shoulder.

Ethel screamed. At the sound the hot-blooded Gascon staggered back, pale and trembling. He stared at her.

"Antoine, you fool," shouted the bystanders who collected at the fray, "you have killed the Englishman! The girl is his sister!"

They carried the injured man to the nearest surgeon.

Fortunately for Ethel's stricken conscience the wound was not dangerous. During Percy's tedious convalescence she was a devoted nurse, but she never thinks of that day without a shudder at the possible consequences of that woeful wager.

H. W.

RESULT OF "PICTURE STORY" COMPETITION.—No. 4.

The £5 prize has gone to Sam Bellchambers, 145, Gloucester Road, Regent's Park, N.W.

£1 has been sent to each of the following:

James Matthews, "The Elms," Newbury, Berks.
W. A. Lewis, Harrogate Cottage, Yorkshire.
Mrs. H. Fox, 6, Barnard Road, Claughton, Birkenhead.
Allen Grace, 37, Kennington Park Road, Newington, S.E.
Ernest Coulson, 4, St. Andrew's Street (North), Bury St. Edmunds, Suffolk.

THE WINNING ATTEMPT.

A MODERN ELOPEMENT.

1.

The fair Angelina walked out with her tike,
And her crusty, tyrannical father;
Alphonso, her lover, drew near on his bike,
At a pace that was furious, rather.

2.

The pair, though forbidden, had vowed to be matched,
So Alphonso flew after the daughter;
A saddle in front of his bike he'd attached,
And on nearing her, skilfully caught her.

3.

"Stop thief!" cried the dad—"what the dickens is up?"
Not a moment the two lovers tarried,
But leaving behind them the dad and the pup,
They were off like a shot, to be married!

Digitized by Google

The Shadow-Hand

By Louis Tracy.

SUMMARY.

Prologue.—The Hon. Ernest Wentworth lies dying at his estate, Chisholme Park. His wife, a light, pleasure-loving creature, falls under the mesmeric influence of Armand Lemaitre, who, by force of will power, compels her to rob her husband. While in the act of extracting a bundle of notes from a bureau she is interrupted by the appearance of her husband, who enters the room in his bed-clothes, silently points at her with his fore-finger, and then falls down dead. She shortly afterwards leaves for Paris to join Lemaitre.

Nineteen years elapse. Edith Wentworth, who was adopted when a baby by Lord Hilton, is living at Hillcrest Lodge. Among the guests for Christmas are Cécile Delisle, a school-friend of Edith's, Professor Queech, Jack Heathcote, and Captain Arthur Musgrave. At York, on the journey down from King's Cross, Cécile observes that the carriage next to theirs contains a man and a woman. At their destination, a few miles further on, she notices a strange man there alone.

Lemaitre, alias Dr. Danton, arrives at the house as a guest, and exercises an influence over Edith that arouses the jealousy of Arthur, who strikes Danton, and agrees to fight a duel.

A murder is committed at Thorgill Beck. The body of a woman is discovered by one of Farmer Wilson's sons. Cécile deduces from the description of the body that it has been robbed. She visits the spot, and obtains the jewellery from the boy who first discovered the body.

In the duel between Danton and Musgrave only one of the pistols is loaded. Danton is lucky enough to draw the loaded one, but gives Musgrave an opportunity of leaving Hillcrest Lodge, never to return or to speak to Edith. This proposal is refused, with scorn. As the Doctor is about to fire, Cécile comes between the principals. In order to obviate further trouble Arthur agrees to Danton's conditions, and immediately leaves Hillcrest Lodge. Cécile makes appointments with both Edith and Arthur to meet her, the one in a country lane and the other at an inn. She induces Arthur to drink a good deal, and then sends him away in such a direction that he must of necessity pass Edith, whom he speaks to in defiance of his pledge.

CHAPTER IX.

Drayton Races.

What should he do?

He lay in bed in the morning after the meeting in the lane, and looked round the room.

There was his sword; there were his pistols. How should he die? Live he could not.

"What a drunken fool!" he said aloud, his fine, nervous lips curving in unspeakable scorn of himself. Many times he said it:

"What a drunken ass!"

He, a man of noble blood, an officer in Her Majesty's Army, had broken his word, solemnly plighted—and plighted, people would say, to save his life. If it were known he would be hissed from the army, he would be hounded from the society of every decent man. His first instinct, on opening his eyes, was to rip up his bowels with his sword.

"A poor drunken clown!" he said, pitying himself, almost crying for scorn and self-shame. To be ruined like that, utterly and for ever, by punch!—how bestially ludicrous! By a little mad French girl! How wildly grotesque!

What should he do? What could he do? That question a thousand times over, he asked himself.

Suddenly he was resolved. He jumped from the bed, and rang. Tom Wilson, already a creature of buttons and livery, showed his sullen face.

"Look to that busby," said Arthur, "and my boots, and spurs. Have you made the lather as I told you for shaving?"

"Aye," said Tom.

"At the end of every answer you give use the word 'sir,' will you?"

"I doan't know."

"Don't know what?"

"I doan't know as I shall."

"We will look into that together, Tom. I am sure Miss Delisle would wish you to be respectful."

"A'll ask her aboot thot, if 'oo doan't mind waitin'."

"But you won't have time to consult her about every trifle of your duty, you know. Meantime, leave me as soon as you can."

When the Captain was dressed, he sat in the outer room and wrote the following letter, his face perfectly calm, his hand steady:

Sir,—Owing to circumstances almost beyond my control, I have broken my word in the matter of which you know. And I cannot even now promise that the relation set up by this breach of faith will, as far as I am concerned, cease for the future, things having gone to such a point between me and the lady in question. Meanwhile, of course, my existence is entirely at your disposal, and I await your instructions. I may tell you that I have resolved not to take my own life, but in all other respects,—I am yours to command, Arthur Musgrave.

He directed the letter to "Dr. Danton, Hillcrest Lodge, Seaborough—To be forwarded," and sent Tom Wilson to post it.

Tom Wilson . . . showed his sullen face.

Digitized by Google

They sat in little groups . . . playing nap.

But the perfect calm which all through the day concealed the agony that boiled and rankled in his heart, broke up towards night. At eight his rooms were full of a company of drinking officers, and Arthur was then in a high fever of uproarious gaiety.

They sat in little groups round tables about the rooms playing nap. Brandy and champagne was the order of the day.

At Arthur's table the stakes went up from shillings to pounds. The rooms were full of smoke and hubbub, and the night grew old towards morning.

"What's the matter with Musgrave to-night?" said Pete Pearson, a sallow, thin fellow, with a high nose, and retreating chin, and goggle eyes, "he's suddenly broken loose, looks like."

Pendragon glanced at Arthur, and saw him holding high a champagne glass, laughing loud with throat thrown back.

"I shall ride that mare to victory, by God, or shoot her!" he cried, his voice rising high above the tumult of the room.

"I think it'll be a case of shooting, then," said Pete Pearson. "My money's going on Filigree."

"Oh, I don't know," said Jack Lascelles, a mere boy, with incipient moustache, and hair combed up high at the temples, "I rather like Musgrave's mare. She can go, you know, if she's coaxed. And she knows him. I've put a pony on her."

"It may be good punning, my boy, but bad business," answered Evelyn Hardy, whose thin-haired head gave out a continual odour of the patent hair-restorers, with which he waged an agonised war against the coming baldness. "Neither Filigree nor the mare is good enough for my hard-earned subsistence. What about the little Frenchman, then?"

"What, Bon-gré?" sneered Jack Lascelles. "It's wonderful what things people who have had no long experience of the turf will pitch upon as likely to win a decent race. I've seen Bon-gré, if you want to know; I've run my hand over his haunches. He isn't a horse—he's an insect."

"He's an insect with wings, then," said Evelyn Hardy, and he's going to make money for whoever chooses to patronise him. I think a fellow should know what he's talking about."

"But who the deuce is it owns Bon-gré? A French fellow, isn't it?" asked Pete Pearson.

"Yes, a financial sort of medico character. I was at the stables last Friday," said Lascelles. "His name is Danton."

Pendragon started.

At this point Arthur's voice was heard again. He had risen, flushed, to his feet.

"I shall put every penny I am worth on her, I tell you," he cried, his face stern, with frowning brows, and eyes alight.

"Bravo!" cried someone, "and so shall I."

"I already stand involved to the extent of £30,000 on her. To-morrow, at this time, the amount shall be double! If any one thinks——"

Pendragon went and laid his hand on his shoulder.

"Festina lente, my dear boy," he said. "It is time to go to bed."

Arthur sat down and emptied another glass.

CHAPTER X.

Hawke and Lemaitre.

About this very time two men were closeted together in a private room in a London hotel. One of them was a squat man, very bulky about the back and shoulders, with massive arms. His face was bronzed; but his chin-beard was gone, though it was the man whom Cécile had seen mysteriously standing in the railway compartment on the day of the murder. His mean, shabby clothes had now given place to a frock-coat, a gaudy tie with a diamond pin, fashionably-cut trousers, gold chain, and diamond ring.

Opposite him, on the other side of a small table, lounged the great bulk of Dr. Lemaitre.

"How much is it you want?" asked Lemaitre.

"A paltry two hundred."

"Ah! That will make three hundred in three weeks, Hawke."

"But that's nothing to a man such as you, mate."

"Not, eh? Suppose I tell you that at this moment I haven't got fifty pounds in the world?"

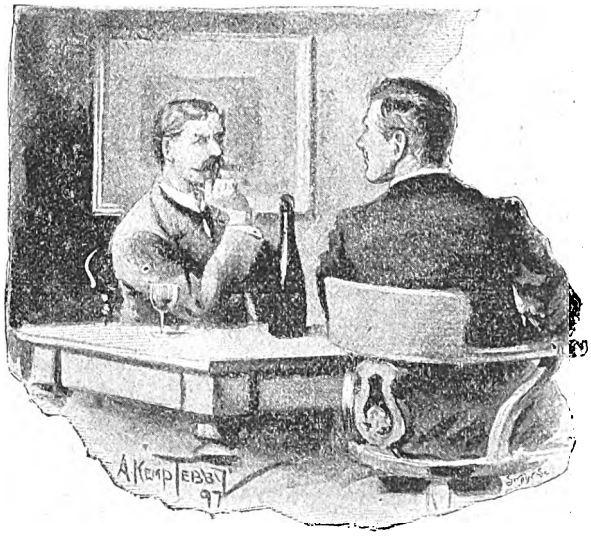
"Must find it, mate. I ain't what you'd call an unreasonable man, you know. Some people 'ud work a secret like this I have got of yours for all it was worth. All I want now is a paltry two hundred just to go on with."

"Well—have some more brandy—I cannot give it you, Mr. Hawke. Suppose I promise you five hundred in three weeks' time instead?"

The Doctor stroked his imperial and looked sideways at the brutal face of Hawke.

"Three weeks? Why, man alive, you don't expect me to wait all that time! If you was hanging for three weeks you'd be pretty dead at the end of it, I suppose."

Lemaitre got suddenly angry. He leant forward and stared at the man.



"How much is it you want?"

Digitized by Google

"Come, learn your place, sir! Remember what you were, and what I have made you. You never had two hundred pence in your life till a lucky chance appeared to put me a little in your power. You must wait!"

"Appeared to put you a little in my power?" laughed Hawke. "Oh, that's good! Why, I can make you swing, mate, by just walking down the stairs and saying two words to the nearest policeman."

"You would lose your income. And you would have no proof of your tale."

"No proof? Well, that's only your little joke, I suppose. Why, wasn't I under the carriage seat all the time, and see you do the whole job?"

"But there would be only your word for it, and the police already know the value of your word, I should imagine. But how the devil came you to be under that seat that day? Have some more?"

Lemaitre had assumed his careless, friendly tone.

"Well, to tell the truth," said Hawke, "I wanted to get to Seaboro' to see a pal, and as I didn't have a copper to pay the fare, I had to go the distance under the seat. You can't get under a third-class seat, you know; but you can under a first."

"It was a lucky trip for you, I think?"

"It was, I own to that. And for you, too. For, if I wasn't there to tell you to get out on the wrong side of the train at the small half-way station, you would have gone on, sure enough, to Seaboro'. You were so flurried like. And that would have been dangerous."

"Why?"

"'Cause a lot of people got out at Seaboro', and some of them, sure enough, must ha' seen you with the lady beforehand: if you hadn't got out at the small station, some of them would have seen you at Seaboro' without her: and when they heard of the body——"

"Quite so. I understand. You know your trade, Mr. Hawke."

"Oh, as for that, no one can say as I haven't got my wits about me. The p'lice themselves 'ud tell you that. Do you know I think they are after me for this affair?"

"Is that so?" asked Lemaitre eagerly.

"I fancy so. There's a chap called Wheeler, who's got the case in hand, and I know he thinks it was I as did it. It was he who got me the seven years' hard I told you about. And I know he's been making enquiries about me lately."

"They musn't get you!" cried Lemaitre, leaning forward. "Und rstand that, Hawke! You may have been seen getting out of the compartment at Seaboro', and that alone would certainly convict you, unless you told the whole story—and so lost your income."

"And made you swing," put in Hawke.

"Look here—what do you say?—I think you had better leave the country," said Lemaitre. "Disguise yourself, and get away to Paris."

"It's all very well for you to talk, mate," cried Hawke, "but how am I to go kicking up my heels at Paris without money? You say you've got none."

"Not now; I shall have plenty in three weeks' time."

"I see. Well, I guess I'll stick pretty close to you during those three weeks. But I'm keeping low all the time. I shan't be nabbed. See, I've shaved my beard. I know all about Wheeler's little dodges, and can go one better every time, you bet. I suppose it's those Drayton races you're thinking of, where you're going to make your pile, ain't it?"

Lemaitre nodded.

"S'pose you lose?"

A look of intense fierceness passed for a moment over Lemaitre's face.

"I must not lose," he said.

"Your horse is Bon-gré, ain't it?"

"Yes."

"And everything depends on his winning, don't it?"

"Yes."

"And mind you don't get nabbed."

"How much do you expect to win?"

"About £20,000."

This was a lie. He counted on winning not less than £50,000.

"And how can you tell that Bon-gré's so sure to win?" asked Hawke.

"He must. No one knows his powers but me and Simpson. We have kept it dark. But he is made of lightning. He must win. He shall win!"

He spoke—more to himself than to Hawke—with an intensity of earnestness.

"Well, I don't know," answered Hawke, "he may lose, you know. Simpson's your jockey, ain't he?"

"Yes."

"Bon-gré has won a race before, I think you said, ain't he?"

"Yes. The Grande Nationale, in Paris. But under a different name. No one knows he's the same."

"And what are the chief horses you've got against you?"

"They are nothing at all. I tell you Bon-gré is made of lightning, man! He bounds like a wave of the sea. He is not a horse, he is a spirit—an idea. He is bottled flight. He is swiftness made visible in the flesh."

"Ah, that's all very fine, I dare say; but what horses 've you got against you?"

"There is Filigree, the Duke of Grandford's horse. A very good horse, but a mere clod-hopper compared to Bon-gré. He will come in second, I am told."

"That all?"

"There are about eight others. The best of them is Lancet, Captain Musgrave's mare. She'll slip in third."

"He the man you fought the juel with?"

Lemaitre started violently.

"Mr. Hawke! Mr. Hawke!" he said, lowering under his eyes, "you know too much of my affairs! It is dangerous, Mr. Hawke."

"I ain't afraid," said Hawke.

"I can take you off like that," said Lemaitre, with a snap-away of his thumb and finger.

"Now, mate, don't talk like that. I'm all right," said Mr. Hawke coldly. "You didn't think I knew that little bit, did you? Why I had you under my eye every day while you were at that—what's the name of the place? I saw the whole juel from behind the trees. And wasn't I just frightened you might get hit, too! I watched over you like a mother."

Lemaitre's head and cruel eyes rested upon Hawke with inward musing. But he did not speak.

"I suppose it was all about a woman," said Hawke.

Digitized by Google

Lemaitre nodded, musing upon Hawke.

"And you won her?"

"Yes."

"Going to marry her?"

"Yes."

"Suppose you lose the race."

"Hold your tongue."

"Well, but how about this money business, mate? Business is business, ain't it?"

"I will give you £25 till the day of the races."

"And how much on that day?"

"£500."

"Say £1,000 for luck."

Lemaitre looked at him, and said;

"All right."

"Well, you've always acted straight to me, I must say," pondered Mr. Hawke. "Give us the money. Where am I to meet you on the race-day?"

"Near the start."

"What o'clock?"

"Say three."

Lemaitre handed him some notes.

"And mind you don't get nabbed," he called, as Hawke reached the door.

CHAPTER XI.

Won by a Nose.

Drayton is a town about fifteen miles north-west of Ilminster. Drayton Common lies south of the town, and is said to be one of the finest racecourses in the world.

On the great race-day it presented quite the appearance of Epsom on a Derby event. The presence of the Prince of Wales on the grand-stand—he was staying in the neighbourhood at Lord Westburgh's—made the day momentous in the county. The common was crammed, as well as the roads, for many miles round. The air was full of excitement and speculation.

This excitement was enormously intensified by the confidence which seemed to reign in the three opposing parties into which the betting had divided sportsmen. Each party seemed somehow so sure of its horse. Bon-gré was the favourite, but the adherents of Filigree and Lancet smiled disdainfully at the notion of Bon-gré turning up a winner.

Jack Lascelles, his flushed face lighting up the whole course, appeared early, full of confidence, and striking his fist into his palm, said:

"I tell you, sir, Bon-gré is not a horse. He's a grasshopper. I've seen him, I tell you; and if a fellow does not know a horse when he sees him, who does?"

At about eleven there was a change in the betting. A rumour got abroad that the Prince of Wales had laid heavily on Filigree.

In an incredibly short time Filigree had replaced Bon-gré as favourite, and with a big swing back, almost like a panic, the bookies dropped from records of two to one to twenty-five to one against Bon-gré.

Lemaitre, alone with Simpson, his jockey, in a room at the stables, rubbed his hands gleefully at the news.

"There is no doubt of our winning, is there?" he said, looking hard at Simpson.

"Not a bit," said Simpson, flicking with his whip his swinging toes, "unless Lancet creeps in before me by a nose."

Simpson was a mere wisp of a man, in the shape of a bow.

"What do you mean?" said Lemaitre quickly.

"Well, you know, Lancet is a bigger hanimal than Bon: a more powerful hanimal. I don't for a minute think myself that she's the ghost of a chance, 'cause Musgrave's such a heavy lout. But Lancet's got the wind, you know, no one can take that from Lancet—give the devil 'is due. And you know what wind will do."

Lemaitre stroked his imperial, with nervous, trembling finger.

"You must win—I hope you will win, Simpson," he said, "I shall make you roll in gold, if you do."

"Oh, I ain't afraid of Filigree, for that matter," said Mr. Simpson. "But here's off to the course."

About this time there was another panic. There went abroad a rumour that Lancet had been hip strung for two hours during the night, and had only escaped death by a miracle. She was reported to be in a state of great nervous exhaustion that morning. The excitement rose to fever-pitch. Hardly anybody had the least notion whether the report was true or false. The bookies began to refuse to lay odds against Filigree, who was now prime favourite.

But a cheer went up from the course when Musgrave appeared in red and white on Lancet among the group at the starting post, though some few knowing ones, gifted with accurate eye, said:

"That man's too heavy for that horse, take my word for it."

Musgrave to the last minute was smoking a cigar. His face was perfectly calm.

"But who on earth taught him to ride a racehorse?" said one busy bookie to another.

"Well, you know those cavalry officers who have served out Afghan way. They learn to climb up crags on horses as if they were goats. You can't unseat them from a horse. Whether he's got the science to ride a race is another matter. Personally, I'm thinking he'll make a mess of it."

At this moment the starter's flag went down, and away spurted the variegated throng like a scattered rainbow.

Almost from the first the three favourites put the general mob of horses behind their heels. A silence like the silence of night fell upon the uproar of the mighty crowd. Spy-glasses were the order of the day. The dense masses of humanity that thronged, tier above tier, on the stands, seemed suddenly to break out into a wide eruption of tiny moons which moved round with the moving horses.

A minute from the start Filigree was leading by a neck, Bon-gré was second, and Lancet was throwing herself about a good length behind Bon-gré.

"Good biz," whispered Jack Lascelles, nearly mad with excitement, unconscious of the fact that his great toe was supporting his whole weight; "Fil's in the van, as I said; if you fellows had only had the sense to listen to reason——"

"Looks as if you were right, in truth," said Peterson. "What the deuce has become of Musgrave? He isn't anywhere."

"Poor old Mus!" mused Evelyn Hardy, looking through his glass. "He keeps up pretty well though. Golly! he's got his heels in that horse's ribs, too! What think of it, Pen?"

"I haven't bet a sou on anybody," said Pendragon coolly; "but I can tell you which horse will win."

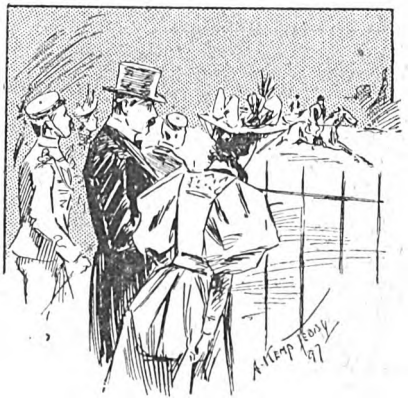
"Which?"

"Lancet. Musgrave's lips are set tight."

"He can set his lips as tight as he likes——"

"But I saw him turn deadly pale just at the start. Arthur Musgrave does not turn pale like that for nothing, I assure you. He evidently means to win."

"By Heaven!"



The air was full of excitement.

Digitized by Google

cried Jack Lascelles. "Bon-gré has shoved her nose before Filigree! Not bad for the Frenchie. He'll beat a retreat presently, though, you'll see."

"I don't know," mused Peterson. "That Simpson is simply a monkey on his animal. He has no weight. He is merely a human bubble on an equine whirlpool."

"Musgrave is keeping up jolly well, though!" cried Lascelles. "I fancy he's gained a little on Filigree. But, I say! just look at that French horse—why, he's all neck!"

By the time the three leaders had reached the furthest point of the course, Filigree was behind, with Musgrave's Lancet second, and Bon-gré leading by a length.

"It's the Prince has given poor Fil this cursed luck!" said Jack Lascelles with dogmatic certainty. "A prince is sure to lose."

"Bosh! A prince should be lucky," said Peterson.

"Not a bit! It's as much princely to throw money away as it is human to err. I say! Look! Look! Did any of you see Musgrave bend right down and talk into his horse's ear?"

Pendragon was white with excitement. He nodded.

"Yes, I saw him," he said. "I told you he meant to win. When you have blood in the rider as well as in the horse."

The two front horses had now put the others well behind them. Filigree was nowhere.

The dash home, past the stands, was down a gentle hill. Bon-gré and Lancet, with staring eyes, and horribly heaving flanks, felt that the battle was between them, and flew as if from pursuing fire. The spattering hoofs sped nearer. Bon-gré held a steady neck in front.

"I don't believe Mus has used his whip a single time during the whole run," observed Evelyn Hardy under his breath. "What's the use of a whip, then?"

"And look at Simpson! why, his arm is going like a flail all the blessed time. Why the deuce doesn't Musgrave?"

"I say, you fellows, can any of you see Musgrave's face?" cried Jack Lascelles, "it's like a piece of white iron."

"But why the deuce doesn't he use his whip?"

"He isn't a trained jockey, he isn't accustomed to the whip."

"Hasn't he used it once even?"

"Not once," said Pendragon.

"Then that must be intentional."

"I should think so."

"Do you think he is gaining on Bon-gré, Lascelles? I fancy so."

"Losing, you mean."

"No, gaining, I fancy—yes, surely. I'll swear to it."

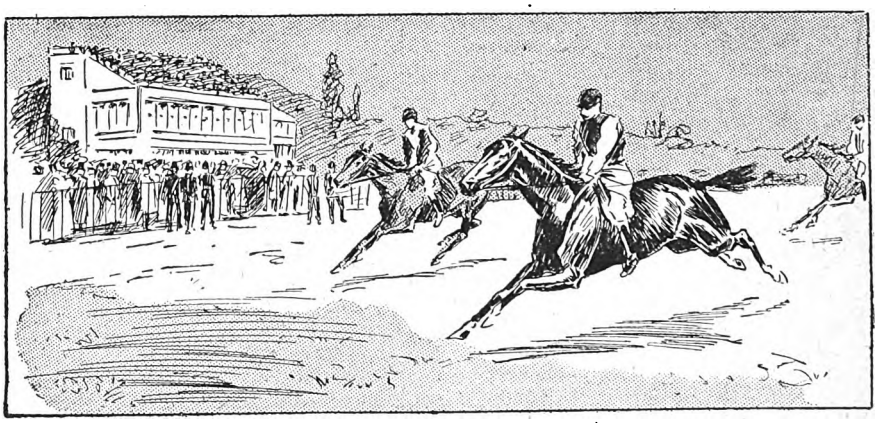
"No—can't you see?"

"No—no—and yet——"

"Bon-gré intends to keep his neck in front. That is clear. Nothing can alter it now."

"Jerusalem! Look! Look! Musgrave has struck!"

Down—for the first time—for the last—in one biting and whistling cut had descended Musgrave's whip upon the tingling, throbbing haunch of Lancet.



The two horses were just then dashing and straining past the stands.

In that one intense chastisement, the iron wrist had done its work. The next moment, almost with a bound of frenzy, Lancet had her nose in front of Bon-gré's.

From ten thousand throats there burst to the skies one ringing yell of cheering. Pendragon, with bawling mouth, was leaning wildly forward, and waving his hat like a maniac. On all the stands sprang up the thronging multitudes in their gala many-coloured costumes, the Prince among them, shouting, waving handkerchiefs, like a sea whipped into foam and madness.

The two horses were just then dashing and straining past the stands. A moment after, Lancet ran past the post, with Bon-gré's red and snorting nostrils at her shoulder.

Musgrave had won the race.

(To be continued.)

A Paper for Sunday Afternoons.

The second number of The Sunday Reader is now before the public. Judging by the reception with which the first number met, there can be no doubt that this will be one of the literary successes of the century. It is, in fact, the paper for the home. It is suited for all classes and creeds. The articles will please you, the stories will please your wife, and the Bible competitions will not only elevate and instruct your children, but will amuse them for hours together.

You can gain some idea of the good things contained in the second number of The Sunday Reader from the following selection of articles. The Sunday Reader also contains two splendid short stories, besides a thrilling serial:

A God who Rides upon a Peacock: The most curious idol of famine-stricken India.
Crucifixions of To-day: The horrible cruelties of the King of Benin.
Travelling Churches.
An Ape in a Pulpit.
Angels with Garters and Bracelets.
A Centenarian Wedding.
Worshipping a Pack of Cards.
The Largest Cemetery in the World.

Price ONE PENNY. THE SUNDAY READER Published Every Thursday.

PEARSON'S SHAKESPEARE

PART VI.

NOW ON SALE.

PRICE 6d.

JUMBLED PICTURE COMPETITION.

NO. 2.

Cut out the figures portrayed in the sketches contained in this number, and paste them up to form one picture. £2 2s. will go to the reader whose attempt is considered cleverest, and a bottle of HOME NOTES BOUQUET to each of the five next. Date of closing: Monday, March 15th, 1897.

Digitized by Google

Pearson's Picture Puzzles.

ONE HUNDRED POUNDS IN PRIZES.

IN the current number of PEARSON'S WEEKLY you will find ten pictures They represent the names of ten well-known Actors and Actresses on the Dramatic and Music-Hall Stage. This is a competition that requires no explanation. If you will look at the accompanying picture you will see the reply is Beerbohm Tree. Who are the other people?

Write down their names in the spaces provided, and then keep the list till two other sets appear. When you have filled in the lists for four weeks send the four sheets to us in one envelope, addressed

"Pictures," Pearson's, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

But remember the sheets must come to us four in one envelope. Don't be discouraged if you cannot find forty names, fill in thirty-five, thirty, or even less. Others may be no more clever than yourself.

Beerbohm Tree.

1st PRIZE.	£50 in Gold.
2nd PRIZE.	A £10 Bank of England Note.
3rd, 4th, and 5th PRIZES.	£5 Bank of England Notes.
6th to 20th PRIZES. . .	Fifteen Sovereigns.
21st to 40th PRIZES. .	Twenty Half-Sovereigns.

DO YOU WANT A WATCH?

On February 25th we wound up a watch and placed it in a safe. It was wound up somewhere between the hours of four and six in the afternoon. It is supposed to run down in about thirty-six hours. If you want this watch, which is a superior article manufactured by Mr. HENRY E. PECK, of 71, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and sold by him at, five guineas, all you have to do is to mark the time at which you think it will stop on the clock face herewith, and on the line left for that purpose. You may make any number of attempts for this prize, but each one must be on a separate clock-face.

It is an English Lever Watch, ¾-plate movement, jewelled in eight holes, chronometer balance, plain or engine-turned cases, crystal glass, and five years' warranty is given with each watch.

The prize will be given to the competitor who draws the hands pointing most nearly to the hour and minute at which it is found the watch in our safe has stopped. To prevent mistakes, put the time also on the space provided.

There is no entrance fee required, but no competition will be accepted unless traced on the diagram herewith.

In the unlikely event of two competitors being correct, the watch will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt first reaches this office.

Competition closes Monday, March 15th. Address attempts:

Hour..... Minute.....

Name.....

Address.....

.....

"WATCH" Short Stories, PEARSON'S BUILDINGS, HENRIETTA STREET, LONDON, W.C.

All Competitions must be sent through the Post.

Digitized by Google

THE NIGHT BEFORE THE WEDDING.

It was in the year 1839, that this young man, rich, gifted and handsome, came to New Orleans to spend a winter with Charles Marot Bauderet, whose acquaintance he had formed in Paris. The two men were of the same age, and their tastes were similar. Verot had been captivated by Bauderet's wit, learning, and subtle personal charm. In turn, Bauderet's imagination was touched into singular activity and his sympathies borne over by Verot's magnetic charm.

It is rare, indeed, two young men, poets both, find such an overmastering mutual interest flowing between them. Their friendship became at once a passion.

When Bauderet left Paris after a year's sojourn there, he exacted a promise from his new friend that he should come to New Orleans and spend some months with him. Thus it came about that early in the autumn of 1839, Verot arrived, after a pleasant voyage, and took up his abode in the Bauderet mansion in Bourbon Street.

When Verot arrived, Bauderet met him at the wharf with every outward show of irrepressible delight; but the young Parisian at once felt that some great change had taken place in his friend. At first he was inclined to fear that Bauderet was not sincere in his expressions of joy over his arrival; but soon enough the mystery was adequately explained. Bauderet was in love. His whole nature was absorbed in the new passion.

Mademoiselle Des Champs was the daughter of a retired painter, whose home was but a few steps from Bauderet's gate. Recently the poet had met her. To meet her was to love her, and now he could find room for no other thoughts. Isobel Des Champs was the subject of his most eloquent conversation, his strangely melodious poetry, his curiously brilliant sketches in water-colours.

Bauderet was anxious to have Verot see Isobel Des Champs; and, of course, the young visitor, especially after Bauderet's eloquent descriptions, felt quite willing to meet the beautiful girl. Nor was he in the least disappointed when he saw her; indeed, her loveliness so far surpassed expectation, so dwarfed all former vision of maidenly attractiveness, that Verot was struck to the heart by her first glance.

If Isobel captivated Verot, it was not a loss of love at first sight, for the handsome Parisian did not fail to impress her imagination in turn. From the moment of their first meeting they were ardent lovers, as everybody could plainly see, save only Bauderet. So lost in the infatuation of absolute devotion was he that he could see nothing but Isobel's dazzling beauty, could hear nothing but the rich, low music of her Creole voice.

Soon enough Verot was in the seventh heaven of a successful courtship—not courtship, but love-telling and love-listening while poor Bauderet went on in blissful enjoyment of his imaginary lordship of Isobel's heart.

The time was approaching for Verot to depart for France, when, one morning, he informed Bauderet that he and Isobel were to be married, and would set sail within a fortnight to make Paris their home.

At first Bauderet was stupefied by the announcement. He gazed almost vacantly into his friend's eyes, while his face grew deadly white. Not a feature moved, however, nor did the quiet smile go from his thin, firm lips. It was an admirable sight exhibition of that self-control which in those days was so much cultivated by gentlemen who were in the habit of settling all matters of personal disagreement at the point of sword or muzzle of pistol.

Of course Verot had counted the cost, and fully expected a duel; but he was pleasantly surprised to find that Bauderet would not demand a meeting, Furthermore, instead of appealing to the code, the host who had been so cruelly robbed took the turn of affairs with a philosophic resignation truly admirable. After the first great struggle against the terrible disappointment which the disaster to his hopes had brought, he drew close his friend and wished him great joy.

Verot was both touched and awed by the strange change that came over Bauderet's face and manner. It was a slow, mysterious transformation of the man. His face took on an inscrutable mask of quiet, almost serene resignation, behind which something suggested immeasurable depths of acute suffering. In his eyes at times burnt a light which startled Verot and haunted his dreams at night. About this time Bauderet went frequently to see an old negress, a voudoo charm-weaver, and procured from her a phial of hideous poison—a black liquid, thick, rank, frenzy-bearing, made from the heads of snakes, the tails of scorpions, and the roots of various deadly weeds, all steeped together for many days. Among the African voudoo workers, this liquid was known by an appellation which meant "brain-burner," it was said to induce madness of the most hopeless kind. Its concoction was attended with the most solemnly horrible of rites and incantations.

It was the night before Isobel and Verot's wedding-day. Bauderet appeared to be in better spirits than usual; he had some rare old wine brought into the library, and he and Verot sat up till late drinking and smoking, while they permitted themselves perfect freedom in conversation.

Although, as I have said, their tastes were similar, no two men could have been less alike in personal appearance than were Verot and Bauderet. The Parisian was tall, athletic, fair, with blue eyes and yellow curling hair, while the Creole was dark, slight, black-eyed, mysterious-looking, possessing the singular magnetism of a face at once handsome and inscrutable. Bauderet's slightness was not physical weakness, however, for he was a noted swordsman, possessed of extraordinary nervous energy.

It was late in the night, and the lamps were burning low, when Bauderet arose, and said:

"Well, my dear old fellow, it is growing late, and you must not be drowsy on your wedding morn. One more cigar—just one of the best that Cuba ever gave to the lips of man, and then to your dreams."

He fetched from a little hanging cabinet a small ivory box curiously carved and moulded in gold, out of which he took two large oscuros separately wrapped in silver foil. One of these he handed to Verot, at the same time lighting the other.

"The last two of a priceless lot sent me two years ago by a friend at Havana," he said.

Verot daintily held the almost black cigar under his nostrils to inhale its fragrance, and instantly recoiled, for there came from it a strange, insinuating and unbearable stench.

Digitized by Google

"That is nothing," laughed Bauderet, with a hollow, brutal ring in his voice that startled Verot. "When you light it, the smell disappears, and the smoke is exquisitely fine. See!" and he puffed a light cloud towards his friend's nostrils. "Isn't that incomparable bouquet?"

Verot put the cigar between his teeth, and tried to light it, but the thrill of atrocious evil that flashed through his nerves caused him to let it fall.

"It's horrible!" he exclained. "I can't bear it!"

"Oh, what womanish qualms!" remarked Bauderet, almost testily, picking up the fallen oscuro and handing it to his guest, "smoke it; this may be our last night together, and—and——"

Something in Bauderet's voice appealed to Verot's sympathy while at the same time it made his heart almost sink. A man lying in his coffin, ready to be buried alive, might have had such a strain in his voice. His face was white, with that ghastliness which comes in extreme moments to a dark countenance, and his eyes, strangely dilated, burned with a dusky, deep-set brilliance.

"You know how I feel, Verot—you know how I feel."

Again the Parisian essayed to light the cigar; but the thing was not possible. He flung it aside, after inhaling one intolerable draught of its smoke!

"Ha, ha, ha!" laughed Bauderet. "You have less courage than I supposed; but, then, you Parisians, as I have often told you, are a degenerate set."

Verot had risen, and now stood towering above his host, his magnificent frame expanding, and a determined look in his fine, fair face.

"That cigar was poisoned!" he exclaimed, with dramatic energy of expression.

"Oh, surely not!" said Bauderet, with immediate concern, stooping and picking it up. He put it to his nose.

"Why that is strange!" he cried. "What can it mean?"

The two men looked steadily, searchingly into each other's eyes; and slowly but clearly read the whole situation. One was aware that his deadly purpose had been discovered; the other knew that death was lurking for him in every corner of that gloomy old house. Verot was the first to speak.

"How shall we settle this?" he demanded, in a hard, dry tone.

Bauderet laughed sardonically and puffed lazily at his cigar, meantime shrugging his shoulders as if the matter were of light consequence to him.

"I think the best way to settle it is to go to bed and sleep it off," he remarked with a half yawn.

"Scoundrel, villain, murderer!" exclaimed Verot, permitting for the moment his indignation to master him. "You shall answer to me now!"

"Oh, certainly, if you wish," said Bauderet calmly, "my sword-room is but a step from here, follow me if you're not afraid."

Verot followed, but not without a strange sense of insecurity. It was as if some treachery were about to be sprung upon him at every step while they passed through two or three dim rooms and along a low, narrow passage between damp brick walls, then into a bare, windowless little room.

"Look here," said Bauderet, stopping close to one of the dismal walls, "this doesn't look like a door, does it?"

He fumbled a moment about a certain spot, pressed a hidden spring, and pushed open a low shutter, disclosing another cell-like apartment, dank, grimy and ill-smelling. Into this Verot followed him. They halted, and faced each other, a little lamp carried by Bauderet lighting up their drawn and ghastly faces.

"We can settle our little trouble here without the slightest fear of being interrupted. This is where, as I have heard, one of my reckless kinsmen, who formerly owned the house, used to confine stolen slaves during the time he was awaiting a chance to run them off. Nobody living, save myself, knows this room exists."

He smiled cynically, and lifted the lamp, gazing around at the slime on the reeking walls. Then he made a little petulant motion, and said:

"The swords—the rapiers—I have forgotten them. Hold this lamp a moment, please!"

Verot mechanically accepted the proffered light: but as he did so something in Bauderet's look, or in his movement, put him on his guard, or rather startled him.

"You'll not be afraid to stand here a moment, while I go to fetch the swords, will you?"

He placed peculiar accent on the word "afraid," and Verot felt his blood tingle in response to the insinuation.

